

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

The Spectator.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, THEOLOGY, AND ART.

VOLUME THE FIFTY-SIXTH.

1883.

L O N D O N :
JOHN CAMPBELL, 1 WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND.

INDEX.—1883.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

"ABU TELFAN"—Herr Raabe	414
Affirmation Bill, the New Aspect of the	476
Defeat of the Government on	563
Africa, South, the New Trouble in	346
African Colonies, the South, a Suggestion	635
Agricultural Holdings Bill, Progress of	923
Lord Wemyss upon	1019
the Lords upon	1050
Act, What Has it Done?	1113
Agricultural Depression, Duke of Rutland upon	764
Alfonso, King, the Hooting in Paris	1272
America, the Financial Revolution in	315
the new Free-trade Movement in	1572
Argyll, the Duke of, on "Unearned Increment"	505
Aristophanes, "The Birds" of, at Cambridge	1513
Arnold, Mr. Matthew, and the "Grand Style"	319 and the Editor of Truth	1149
in the United States	1342
Arnold's, Mr. Matthew, Lectures, and the Nation	1474
Atheism as an Insult	542
Athletic Games	1616
Australia, the Dominion of	1613
Australian Conference, the	1574
BANKRUPTCY Bill, the	1083
Banks, and their Customers	1307
Barstow, Agitation, the	634
Beaconsfield, Lord, Statue	504
Beards	1408
Believe, the Wish to, Mr. W. Ward upon	1118
Benjamin, Mr. Q.C., Dinner by the Bar to	860
Birmingham, Conservative Demonstration at	1273
Bishop, Mr., and his Thought-reading	799
Bishops, the, and the Sunday Recreat on Bill	601
Bismarck, Prince, at Canossa	729
Threatens France	1080
Bismarck's, Prince, Defeats	602
Victory	762
Blasphemy Controversy, the	348
Sentence, the	313
Book-making	112
Booksellers' Grievances	288
Boys, Our	1180
Bright, Mr., at Glasgow	410
at the Civil Engineers' Dinner	478
on the Established Church	571
at Leeds	1339
as Conservative	1648
Bright's, Mr., Breach of Privilege	792
Bright Celebration, the Significance of the	763
Britain, Greater, the Federation of	1305
British Relation with France	896
Broadhurst's, Mr., Proposal	1885
Browning's, Mr., Poetry	351
Bacelouch, the Duke of	924
Budget, the	440
Bulgaria, the Revolution in	1209
CABINET, the Proposed Additions to the	143
Cambridge, Duke of, Decorated	46
Canada, the Red Man in	1278
Canterbury, the "Enthronisation" at	409
Carey, James, and the Dublin Murders	248
and the Difficulties of Invisibility	894
Murdered by O'Donnell	991
Carlyle, Mrs.	445
Carlyle's, Mrs., Diary—Mrs. Oliphant's Attack	573
upon Mr. Froude	1213-1245
Carlyle's, Professor, Address	887
Chalmers-Lacour, M.	1050
Chamberlain, Mr.	8
on Local Taxation	77
on Free Schools	143
at Swansea	856
at the Cobden Club	1337
at Bristol, on Reform	379-1050
Chamberlain's, Mr., Bankruptcy Bill	793
Speech at Birmingham	1538
Plan for Relieving the Poor	672
Chambers, William	665
Chambord, Comte de, Health of	857
Reported Death of	1080
Death of	892
Channel Tunnel, the Verdict on the	954
End of the	889
Chaplin's, Mr., Victory over the Government	797
Charitable Trust's Bill, the	312-347
Cheshire, Mid: the Contest in	380
Childers, Mr., on the Connaught Emigration	1575
on State Economy	473
Childers's, Mr., National Debt Bill	1244
Children and their Dinners	1544
Christianity and Socialism	895
Church, an Anti-Christian	1539
Body, Movement for an English	1277
Congress at Reading	281
Churchill, Lord R., at Woodstock	440
on the Tory Leadership	1650
on Egypt	1651
versus Mr. Forster	1088
Clarétie, M. Jules	900
Clarétie's, M. Jules, Play at the Gaiety Theatre	1579
Clerical Caste, the, in Scotland	956
Coal as a Factor in War	856
Cobden Club, Annual Meeting of the	794
Colenso, Bishop	1304
Collectivism, English	604
Collings, Mr. J., and the Fouthport Foreshore	537
Colonial Envoys, the, and Lord Derby	700
Commandments, the Ten, Forgery of	1119
Commons, House of, Dilatory and Dilettante	665
Course of Business in	441
Plague of Questions in	636
Congo, the Sovereignty of the	383
Conscription, the effect of, on Little Wars	1612
Content	830
Co-operative Congress, the	731
Stores and English Juries	766-859
Cornhill Magazine for Sixpence	1405
Corrupt Practices Bill, Second Reading of	1372
and Spiritual Intimidation	1572
Progress of the	5
and the Cost of Elections	173
Cotton Trade, the Crisis in the County Franchise, Ministers upon and Redistribution
Courtney, Mr., on Egypt

Courtney, Mr., on Crown Lands	1019
Cowdree	734
Cowen, Mr., on Parliamentary Shortcomings	923
at Newcastleton-Tyne	1684
Cowen's, Mr., Political Creed	43
Crime, English, Mr. Howard Vincent upon	1308
rofters, the Case of the West Highland	1114
Czar, the Coronation of the	699-701
Will he Yield?	1505
DEBTS, the Reasons for Paying-off	473
Decedent Wife's Sister's Bill in the Lords	761
and the Bishops	825
Decorations, the Latest	46
Democracies, Great Individuals in	42
Democracy and Literature	1149
or Plutocracy?	1465
De Vere, Mr. Aubrey, on the Ecceplal Bias	689
Derby, Lord, and the Australian Confederation	1540
Dignity, the Basis of	766
Dilke, Sir C., and the County Franchise	5
on Local Government	1649
Disaffection, Formless	314
Disarmament, the Rumour of	538
"Disintegration"	1837
D'sike	212
Dublin, the Revelations in	106-248
Dufferin's, Lord, Despatch on Egypt	377
Dunraven, Lord, on the House of Peers	442
Dynamite Danger, the	382
Bill, the	472
the Fear of	477
EARTH, the, and Colony Founding	1210
East-Lothian Election, the	177
Eastern Question, the Next	533
Eccelesiastical Courts Commission, Report of	1018
Education and Brain Disease	1024
Modern, and Health	1313
Educational Experiment, a New	541
Egypt, the Latest Plan for	73
Mr. Villiers Stuart on the Condition of	509
the Medical Department in	667
the Hour in	827
Cholera in	862-889
Occupation of	1016
Evacuation of	1337
the Situation in	1606
Elaborateness	607
Elections, the, of the Future	1341
England, the Expansion of	1305
English Longevity	513
Collectivism	1304
Church Body, Movement for an	1539
Workmen on Socialism	1404
Juries and Co-operative Stores	1612
Englishmen's Enjoyments, the Deficiency in	1057
Ennerdale Railway, the, Defeated	284-928
Epping Forest, the Rescue of	319
Errington, Mr., and the Papal See	664
Equette, a Needed	179
Evolution and Mind	1406
Exile, the Pains of	211
Experts, the Infallibility of	1654
FASHION, the Power of	254
Fenian Outrage, the, in Westminster	344
Ferry's, M., New Position	1338
Fiction, the supposed Appetite for	830
Fisheries Exhibition, the International	637
Forster, a Hurst	48
Forster, Mr., at Leeds	108
Forwood, Mr., on the Future of Toryism	142
on Mr. Parnell and the Land League	250
on Egypt	1049
on European Turkey	1402
at Bradford, on Reform	1611
France, the Immediate Future in	40
the Expulsion Bill in the Senate	174
Grave Situation of	205
the New Ministry in	250
and Germany	475
and England	698
British Relations with	888
Threatened by Prince Bismarck	1080
the Royalists of	1144
Will she Fight China?	1145
Italy, and Savoy	1182
the Attitude of, towards China	1688
M. Tricou's Telegram from Shanghai	1437 and the News from Tonquin	1648
the Difficulties of, in Asia	1540
Franchise, the, in Ireland	1471
Free-thinker, sentence upon, for Blasphemy	313
Free-Trade Movement, the New, in America	1572
French Schoolboys	444
Diplomacy	572
Chamber, the Responsibility of the	1365
Ministry, the	1368
Debate on Tonquin	1400
Fry, Lord Justice, on Inequality in Punishment	1147
Future Life, the	958
GAMBETTA, M.	4
Garfield's, President, Bequest	45
Germany, as the Sentinel of Europe	1241
and Spain	1470
Geneva, Socialism and Anarchism at	382
New Consistory of the Protestant Church at	895
Genevan Church, the, and its Apologists	1246
Gibraltar	861
Gibson, Mr., at Cambridge	632
at Forres, Scotland	1309
Giffard, Sir H., on the New Rules of Procedure	1053
Gladstone, Mr., in Paris	282
Violence of Tories against	730
on Cabinets	858
on English China	1690
Mr. Herbert, at Leeds	1610
Gladstone's, Mr., Holiday	1208
Speech on the Affirmation Bill	536
Gorst's, Mr., Amendment to the Address	249
Gooschen, Mr., at Ripon	108
on the Price of Gold	251
in Edinburgh	1401
on Socialism	1439
Government Programme, the	204
the, and its Work	376
and the Rates	506

Government Programme, and the Opposition	985
and the National Debt	1017
and the Representation of Opinion	1501
Grand Committee, the	476
"Grand Style," the	319
Gratitude	418
Great Men, Sayings of	47
Gouldstone, the Murderer, Is he Sane?	1214
Grévy's, M., Position	345
HAPSBURG, the, and the Croats	1177
Hartington, Lord, on Egypt	107
at Manchester	1537
at Sheffield	1144
Hartington's, Lord, Political Tone	105
Harvest, the Approach of	891-1084
Hatch, Mr., and the Canonical Vow of Obedience	145
Henry, Mr. Mitchell, on Irish Taxation	698
Hereditary Conscience	1441
Holiday Work	990
Holloway, Mr.	1699
Horton, Mr., and the Oxford Convocation	1614
Hounslow Poisoning Case, the Daily News upon	78
Houses, Locked-up, Police Notice about	1148
ILBERT Bill, the Compromise on the	1687
Indian Danger, the Great	6
Exchequer, the	803
Judges and British Criminals	986
Inquests, the Use of, the Daily News upon	78
Inspiration, the Theory of Rev. J. M. Wilson	1066
Inventors, a Spur to	1179
Invisibility, the Difficulties of	894
Ireland, and the Proposed Reforms	140
"Informers" in	248
James Carey's Evidence	106-128
Mr. Gorst on the Dublin "Revelations"	249
Formless Disaffection in	314
the Success and Failure in	1083
the Tories and	763
the Franchise in	1471
Irish Police, the	75
Land Act, Mr. Parnell's Amendments to	344
the Lords upon	988
American Convention, Meeting of the	536
Result of the	570
Viceroyalty and the Parnellites	795
Lace at the Mansion House	864
Members and the Crimes Act	1048
Migration Scheme, the	1081
Italian Politics	443
JACKSON, Dr., and Dr. Fraser	44
Jamaica Ritual Case, a	1052
James, Sir H., on the Reform Bills	41
James, Mr. H., on the Correspondence between	702
Carlyle and Emerson	377
Jessel, Sir George, Death of	1407
Jewish Sensitiveness	1085
Jews, Why are they Persecuted?	1053
Judges as Legislators	1147
Judicial Sentences	312
KILMAINHAM Question, the Tories upon	76
Krapotne, Prince, Trial of, at Lyons	283
LABOUCHERE, Mr., on the Coming Demo-	670
cracy	284
on the Derby Day	826
Lakes, Spoiling the	1247
Law, the Grand Committee upon	1370
Misleading Character of, as Index to Morals	1336
Leatham, Mr. E. A., on Ireland	1470
Leeds Liberal Conference, the	824
Lefevre, Mr. Shaw, at Reading	1280
Leo XIII. and France	957
Léonais, the	1653
Lesseps, M. Ferdinand de	108
Liddon, Canon, on Secularism	696
Liberals, Independent	697
Meeting of, Mr. Gladstone's Speech	853
Social Discipline for the	1119
Life, the Future	1578
Literary Forgeries	1055
Men, the Comparative Popularity of	665
Literature, the Pathetic Element in	206
Liverpool, Liberal Demonstration in	381
London, the Government Plan for	1272
Police, Increase in the	1306
City, and the choice of Lord Mayor	1500
Finances	1696
the Lord Mayor on	543
City Guilds Commission	1613
Longevity, English	413
Long Vacation, the	1910
Lowther, Mr., at Kirby Moorside	1473
James, at Maryport	76
Luther, Martin
Lyons Trials, the
MACCORMACK, Sir W., and the Medical De-	667
partment in Egypt	854
Mackonochie, Mr., the Deprivation of	111
Madness, the Frontiers of, Dr. Ball in Paris upon	927
Malay Country, Animal Life in the	574
"Man, the, of the Future"	1178
Manchester Election, the	761
Marriage Law, the, in the Lords
Married Women's Property Act, and the Post-	9
Office
Maudsley, Dr., on Personal and Social Degen-	893
eration	1536
Mahdi, the	1691
Melodrama, the Possibilities of	146
"Methratt"	829
Michel, Louise	540
Millions're, another Mammoth	1583
Millionaires, British	983
Ministers, the, on the County Franchise	1507
Mirage, Mental and Physical	1120
Mischiefousness	856
Mohl, Madame	9
Monaghan Election, the Lesson of the	880
Moneyed Wives	1541
Monteagle, Lord, on Irish Landlords	1024
Morris's, Mr. W., Oxford Defence of Socialism	110
Mundella, Mr., on our Educational System	601
Murderous Fanaticism	606
Museums Bill, Sunday Opening of, and the Bishops
Music, Opening of Royal College of

N APOLÉON'S, Prince, Manifesto, and its Consequences	72
National Liberal Club, the	563
— Debt, the Reasons for Paying off	473
— Bill, Opposition to	1017
— and the Government	990
— Parks	1301
Negative Vote, the	1021
Negligence, the Responsibility for	831
Niagara, the Destruction of	1023
Nineteenth-Century Rose-water	600
Northcote, Sir S., at Knightsbridge Riding School	1274
— at Belfast	1508
— on the Monumental Character of	1508
L ITERATURE
Northcote, Sir S., Motion on the Suez Canal Scheme	953-984
— Review of the Session	1081
— Speeches to the Irish and Welsh	1368
Norwegian Patriot, a	1443
O 'KELLY, Mr., and Mr. MacCoom	734
Ole Bull, the Norwegian Musician	1443
Opposition, her Majesty's	312
Overstone, Lord, Death of	1503
Oxford Convocation and Mr. Horton	1614
P ANKHURST, Dr.	1240
— Paper Securities, the Protection of	1542
Papa, the Annexation of	504
Parcels Post, the	955
— the Effects of the	989
Paris, the Panic in	104
— the Crisis in	140
Parliament, Blocking Bills in	1054
Parliamentary Recession, Political Duties of the Parnellites, the, and the Irish Viceroyalty	1112
Parnell, Mr.	795
Parnell's Mr., Speech in Dublin	281
Parties, Position of	1808
Party Feeling, Violence of	632
Patents Act, the New	730
Pastor, Mr. Mark, on Poetry	1179
Pearson, Mr. Norman, on "After Death"	1022
Pensance, Lord, on Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction	1116
Peterborough, Bishop of, on the Church	729
Piston's, Mr. A., Reply to Miss Cobbe	1441
Pigeon-shooting, the Bill to Put Down	320
Plimso's, Mr. A., Act, Failure of	1472
Poetry and Civilisation	1311
Politics, Individualism in	1275
Poor, the New Suffering of the	317
Pope, the, and the Parnellites	638
— and Italy	1117
— Leo XIII., and France	824
Position, the Worship of	549
Post-Office Clerks, Women, Civility, &c., of	1279
Poverty and Poetry	1442
Present-making	1089
"Priestman versus Thomas," the Case of	1576
Princes, the	733
Protection and Retaliation	764
Prussia, and the Vatican	144
Q UARTERLY REVIEW, the, and the Tories	74
Queen Victoria, as Goddess	350
— and the Death of John Brown	408
— the Sons of	699
R AIKES, Mr., on Opposition	7
Railway Strike, the Caledonian	109
Railways and their Customers	502
Rates, the, and the Government	1213
Recess, the Political Duties of the	1112
— Parliamentary Fruits of the	1438
Reclina, M. Elise, and the Nihilists	178
Recruits, the Failure of	732
Reform Bill in 1884, Shall there be one?	1176
— Bills, the Proposed	1436
Reid, Captain Mayne	1374
Reman, M., on the "Amusingness of the Age"	79
— on "Memories of Infancy and Youth"	1501
Representation of Opinion, and the Government	1615
Residuum, the Ultimate	179
"East," Needed for Public Men	176-1409
Ripon, Lord, and the Black Act	175
Ritualists, the, and the Evangelicals
Robinson, Mr. E. K., and "the Man of the Future"	574
Rosebery's, Lord, Resignation	728
Ruskin's, Professor, Oxford Lectures	733
Russian Coronation, the	411
— Character, a Glimpse into	446
Rutland Election, the	1146
S ACRED Anarchy	178
Salisbury, Lord, on Mr. Chamberlain's Speech	793
— on the Political Bias of Property	826
— on "Rookeries"	1371
— on the Explosives Bill	472
— at Reading	1403
— at Birmingham	408
— in the Quarterly on "Disintegration"	1337
Salisbury's, Lord, Wrath	1113
Salvation Army, the, in Switzerland	252
Sarawak, the Principality of	1504
Sayings of Great Men	47
Sceptical Bias, Mr. Aubrey de Vere upon	639
Science, Modern, the Set-off against	928
Scottish Railways, the Strike upon	109
— Universities Bill, the	540
— Highlands, the Closing of the	1089
— Professors of to-day	1215
Scotland, the Case of the Highland Crofters	1114
— the Clerical Caste in	1579
— as the Political Forum	1309
Sea Fishing	1058
Secret Societies, the Secret Motive of	253
Selfishness, the Fascinating Side of	512
Session, the Coming Programme of	172
— Is it to be Irish again?	280
Shaw's, Mr., Statement about Madagascar	1242
Shop Assistants, the Woes of	1652
Shorthouse, Mr., on Humour	287
Siemens, Sir W.	1544
Smith, Professor Henry, the late	210
— Mr. W. H., on Ireland	1503
Socialism and Anarchism at Geneva	382
— and Continental Governments	508
— English Workmen on	1404
Soudan, the Catastrophe in the	1500
Southport and Mr. Jesse Collings	604
Spain, King of, Hooted in Paris	1272
Speaker's, the	1468
Spring, the Promise of	605
Study and Stimulants	480

Suez Canal, the British Proposal for the	8
— and the Government	920
— the International Theory of the	921
— Scheme, Withdrawal of the	952
— and Sir S. Northcote's Motion	953-984
— the Future	1244
Suleiman Sami, Execution of	760
Summer Day's Journey, a	1025
Sunday Opening of Museums Bill & the Bishops	801
Sunderland, the Catastrophe at	798
Switzerland, Organised Charity in	703
— Compulsory Military Service in	1310
— the Cost of Living in	1312
— the Popular Veto in	1340
T ENANT-Right Bill, the Coming	174
— Compensation Bill Introduced	601
Tennyson Pease, the	1577
Thames Embankment, the, How to Save	317
Third-Class Passengers	828
Thought-reading Wager, the	799
Tizias Esalar, the Murderer of a Christian Girl at	863
Tonquin, the News from	1648
Tories, what they Threaten	74
— the Literary Difficulties of the	285
— and Ireland	763
— and Opinion	1440
Tory Spokesmen, the	205
Toryism, Neo, the Ethics of	923
— and Nonconformity	1369
Tourgenief, Ivan, Death of	1150
Trades Unions, the Benefits of	1178
— and the Land	1211
Tricon's, M., Telegram from Shanghai	1437
Trolope, Anthony, the Boyhood of	1343
— as a Critic	1373
U LSTER, Invasion of, by the Parnellites	1242
— "Unearned Increment," the Duke of	503
Argyll on	1843
United States, Mr. M. Arnold is the
V ACATION, the Long	1613
Vincent, Mr. Howard, on English Crime	1808
W ALES, the Princess of, and Pigeon-shoot- ing	254
"Wandle, on the"	1507
War Services, Pensions for	508
— Declarations of	1573
Ward, Mr. Wilfrid, on the Wish to Believe	1118
Warden and Waters, Trial of	1543
Water, Perils of	269
Wills, Ancient and Modern	514
— of British Millionaires	640
Wills versus Cromwell	962
Wilson, Rev. J. M., on Inspiration	1096
Wolsey's, Lord, Pension	508
Women and Commercial Gambling	415
Woolmer, Forest Fires in	48
World, the Filling-up of the	1210
Y OUNG Men, the Pecuniary Prospects of	765

POETRY.

"Across the Estuary, South Devon," 1093—Albano, 1829—At the Pit-mouth, 1153—Braithwaite and But- termere Railway, 385—Buddha, 1188—Channel Tunnel, the: a Parallel, 833—Compton Place, 707—"Devon, South, across the Estuary," 1093—English Home, an, 1315—Erin, a Cry from, 737—Fancy, a, 1283—"Fortune my Foe," 1347—France, Lines Written in the South of, 610—"Grass of Parnassus," 1219—Heaven, a Breath of, 1293—Highland Student, a, 1512—Iliad, Idylls of the, VIII.-115; IX.-303—"Jeremiad, the New," 1657 —Lamb, Charles, 1547—Mewslade, 1251—Mind-stuff, 14—Nepenthe, 183—Pericles, Lyrics of, 1412-1447-1479 —Poets, and Poets, 1479—Progress or Retrogression? 1894—Ruin, the, 1154—Skylarks, the, 1316—Sonnets, 610-1412-1658—Sunset, 1620—Tear and Smile, 355— Twilight, 896—Vox Ventura, 1311—Welcome, a, 115.

ART.

Doré, Gustave	151
Grosvenor Gallery (Mr Cecil Lawson)	53
— the	578-610-737-804
Macbeth and Gregory	215
Mason, George	183
Mason's, G., "Harvest Moon"	1316
Oil Colours, the Institute of Painters in	1638-1664
"Phiz"	1490
Rossetti, at Burlington House	14-115
Royal Academy, the First Impressions of, 576-641-770
Water Colours, Royal Society of Painters in	674-1530
— Institute of	476
Wild Weather	1412

BOOKS.—Authors.

A DAMS, W. E.—Our American Cousins	1582
Ainger, Alfred—The Essays of Elia	551
Alford, E. M.—The Romance of Combehurst	965
Allen, W. H. (Pub.)—The National Review	234
Amici, Edmondo de—Gli Amici	1188
Anderson, Joseph—Scotland in Pagan Times	1158
Archer, W.—English Dramatists of To-day	969
Armstrong, W.—A History of Art in Ancient Egypt	554
Arnold-Forster, F. E.—Heralds of the Cross	617
Ashe, T. B.A.—Coleridge's Lectures on Shakes- peare	1700
Ashley, W. J., B.A.—James and Philip van Arte- velde	835
B AGEHOT, W.—Essays on Parliamentary Reform	1547
Baillie-Grohman, W. A.—Camps in the Rockies	124
Balme, E. B. W.—The Ornaments Rubric	900
Bancroft, H. H.—History of the Pacific States of North America	88
Barlow, George—An Actor's Reminiscences	903
Bates, W. B.A.—The Maclean Portrait Gallery	1256
Beard, C. B.A.—The Reformation of the 16th Century	1418
Beaumont, Du—History of Charles VII.	1155-1187
Beck, S. W.—Gloves, their Annals, &c.	1516
Bell, Clara—Gloria	931
— Only a Word (G. Ebers)	496
Benn, Alfred W.—The Greek Philosophers	485
Bentley, E. (Pub.)—Wilfred's Widow	292
— Dr. Edith Romney	1152
Besant, Walter—The Life of Edward H. Palmer	773
— All in a Garden Fair	1664
Bignand, Rt. Rev. P.—The Life and Legend of Gautama	645
Bird, I. L.—The Golden Chersonese	897

Black, William—Shandon Bells	421
— Yolande	920
Blackie, J. S.—The Wisdom of Goethe	578
Blackwood, W. and Sons (Pub.)—My Trivial Life and Misfortune	552
Blind, Mathilde—George Eliot	547
Bothmer, Countess M. von—Aut Caesar, aut Nihil	903
Bradley, G. G., D.D.—Recollections of Dean Stanley	257
Brassey, Sir T.—The British Navy	240
Brentano, Von Lujo—The English Christian Socialist Movement	1254
Bridges, F. D.—A Lady's Travels Round the World	1000
Brinsley-Richards, J.—Seven Years at Eton	425
Brookhurst, T. U.—Mexico To-day	532
Brodribb, W. J.—Livvy: the second Punic War	935
Broughton, Rhoda—Belinda	1379
Brown, James, LL.D.—The Forester	391
Brogie, Duc de—Frederick the Great and Maria Theresa	708
Burke, S. H.—Historical Portraits of the Tudor Dynasty	1159
Burnett, F. H.—Through One Administration	1624
Burney, Frances—Cecilia; or, Memoirs of an Heiress	18
Burrows, Montagu—The Life of Lord Hawke	1320
Burton, R. F.—To the Gold Coast for Gold	653
C ALDECOTT, R.—Some of Aesop's Fables	774
Carnegie, A.—An American Four-in-hand in Britain	1224
Carr, J. C.—Modern Landscape	153
Carroll, W. G., M.A.—The Commercial Restraints of Ireland	185
Cartwright, J. J.—The Wentworth Papers	1319
Caulfield, S. L. F.—The Dictionary of Needlework	361
Cave-Brown, J.—Lambeth Palace	191
Chatto and Co. (Pub.)—Correspondence of Car- lyle and Emerson	386
— Wanda	745
Chiala, Luigi—Letters of Count Cavour	1125
Church, Rev. A. J.—Heroes and Kings	807
— Livy: the Second Punic War	935
— Roman Life in the Days of Cicero	1682
Clayden, P. W.—Life of Samuel Sharpe	1223
Coleridge, S. T.—Lectures and Notes on Shakes- peare	1700
Coles, John—Summer Travelling in Iceland	925
Collins, Wilkie—Heart and Science	679
Collet, S. D.—The Brahmo Year-Book for 1882	839
Colquhoun, A. R.—Across Chryse	872
Conscience, Hendrik—The "Lion of Flanders"	1350
Conway, M. D.—Emerson at Home and Abroad	121
Cook, G. W.—Ralph Waldo Emerson	1321
Coppinger, R. W., M.D.—Cruise of the "Alert"	1622
Courtney, W. L., M.A.—Studies in Philosophy	154
Cox, Rev. Samuel, D.D.—The Expositor	902
Craig, Henry—Life of Jonathan Swift	82
Crawford, F. M.—Mr. Isaacs	191
— Doctor Claudius	1552
Creighton, M.—History of the Papacy	424
Cumming, C. D. G.—Fire-Fountains of Hawan	152
D ALE, R. W., M.A.—The Epistle to the Ephesians	264
Daudet, Alphonse—Port Salvation	935
Daube, T. W. Rhys—Lectures on the Origin of Religion	645
Day, Lewis F.—Every-day Art	387
Detmold, C. E.—Writings of Niccolò Machiavelli	930
Dillwyn, E. A.—A Burglary	1415
Dobson, Austin—Biography of Fielding	1131
Douglas (Pub.)—Life Among my Ain Folk	294
— Lord James—Estcourt	1253
Doyle, J. A.—The English in America	86
Drummond, H.—Natural Law in the Spiritual World	997
Duffy, Sir C. G.—Four Years of Irish History	293
Duncan, P. M.—Ossail's Natural History	580
Darnford, Colonel A. W.—A Soldier's Life, &c., in South Africa	599
E BBERS, G.—Ein Wort	486
Edwards, C.—Leopardi's Essays and Dio- logues	236
— Miss Betham—Disarmed	1519
Emerson, R. W.—English Traits	1352
F ARRER, R. B.—Tour in Greece	1226
Fin. Art Society (Pub.)—S. Palmer: a Memoir	263
Fitzgerald, P.—The Family of George III.	777
— Kings and Queens of an Hour	1127
Fleet, Charles—Our Ancestors in Sussex	1160
Footman, Rev. H. M.A.—Modern Unbelief	514
Fothergill, Caroline—Put to the Proof	1333
Freeman, E. A.—Some Impressions of the United States	867
Freemantle, Hon. W. H.—The Gospel of the Secular Life	742
Froude, James A.—Mrs. Carlyle's Letters	483
G ALDOS, B. Perez—Gloria	931
Galton, F.—Inquiries into Human Faculty and Development	1029
Gardner (Pub.)—Angus Graeme, Gamekeeper	294
Gleikie, Archibald—Text-book of Geology	55
Gilder, William—Isopack and Tandra	1486
Gilmour, James—Among the Mongols	548
Godwin, Rev. G. N.—The Green Lanes of Hamp- shire, Surrey, and Sussex	261
— The Civil War in Hampshire	453
Gosse, Edmund—Cecil Lawson: a Memoir	810
— E. W.—George Tinworth and his Works	1534
Gower, Lord Ronald—My Reminiscences	837
Grant, James—Old and New Edinburgh	682
Graves, R. P.—Life of Sir W. Rowan Hamilton	117
Green, Professor T. H.—Prolegomena to Ethics	1283-1316
Greg, Percy—Sanguelac	296
— Without God	1348
Grenville-Murray, E. C.—People I Have Met	395
Griffis, W. E.—Coren, the H-mrit Nation	677
H ALL, S. C., F.S.A.—Retrospects of a Long Life	1035
Hardy, Thomas—Two on a Tower	154
— Arthur S.—But Yet a Woman	889
Harrison, Lucy—Poems of Spenser	1093
Harte, Bret—In the Carquinez Woods	1128
Hawthorne, Julian—Dust	996
— Nathaniel—Our Old Home	1352
Hay, W. D.—Brighter Britain	324
— Hay, W. D.—Summer Songs and Poems	325
Hewitt, J. A.—Jubilee Lectures	553
Hodder & Stoughton (Pub.)—Jubilee Lectures	553
Hoe, W. M.A.—Buddha: Life, Doctrine, &c.	645
Holbrooke, G. A.—The Annals of Tacitus	220

- Hollingshead, John—Footlights ... 909
Holmden, A. H.—Pressense's Study of Origins ... 908
Hood, Paxton—Scottish Characteristics ... 1158
Hopkins, Ellice—Autumn Swallows ... 710
Hopkins, Mary A. M.—A Story of Carnival ... 125
Hospitalier, E.—Modern Electricity ... 230
Howson, J. S., D.D.—Horse Petrines ... 1063
Hudson, T. S.—A Scamper through America ... 120
Hunt, Mrs. A. W.—Self-condemned ... 1333
Hurst and Blackett (Pub.)—A Golden Bar ... 237
Hutchinson, J. H.—The Commercial Restraints of Ireland ... 185
Hutton, J.—James and Philip van Artevelde ... 835
- INGRAM, J. H.—Biographical Sketch of O. M. Brown ... 1512
Ireland, Alexander—Ralph Waldo Emerson ... 121
Irons, Ralph—The Story of an African Farm ... 713
- JAMIESON, J. H.—The Laird's Secret ... 294
Jefferson, J. C.—The Real Lord Byron ... 1451
Jennings, G. H.—An Anecdotal History of Parliament ... 1065
Jevons, W. Stanley—Methods of Social Reform ... 771
Judd, J. W., F.R.S.—Volcanoes, what they are ... 1255
- KEGAN PAUL & Co.—(Pub.)—Romanism, Protestantism, &c. ... 452
— — — Living English Poets ... 15
— — — Free-trade Speeches of C. P. Villiers ... 521
Kemble, F. A.—Notes on Shakespeare's Plays ... 55
King, D. Bennett—The Irish Question ... 712
— — — Harriet, E. H.—A Book of Dreams ... 903
Knight, W.—Wordsworth's Poetical Works ... 614
Kompert, Leopold—Scenes from the Ghetto ... 323
- LESTRANGE, Rev. A. G.—Friendships of M. A. Mitford ... 17
Lallanne, Maxime—Etching ... 56
Lang, A.—Helen of Troy ... 87
— — — Andrew, M.A.—The Iliad of Homer ... 711
Lanman, Charles—Leading Men of Japan ... 1414
Lasserre, H.—Miraculeux de Lourdes ... 1515
Lee, M. H., M.A.—Diary of Philip Henry, M.A. ... 420
— — — Vernon—Ottillie, an 18th Century Idyl ... 970
Legge, James—The Sacred Books of China ... 1154
Leigh, F. R.—Ten Years on a Georgia Plantation ... 451
Lightwood, J. M.—The Nature of Positive Law ... 1298
Linton, W. J.—Rare Poems of the 16th and 17th Centuries ... 1097
Lodge, H. C.—Life of Daniel Webster ... 1225
Leeper, A. M.A.—Thirteen Satires of Juvenal ... 357
Loffie, W. J.—A History of London ... 775
Longman & Co. (Pub.)—In the Olden Time ... 741
— — — Under Sunny Skies ... 970
Low, C. R.—Memoir of General Sir F. S. Roberts ... 1298
Lucy, Henry W.—Gideon Fleyce ... 53
Lytton, Lord—Life and Letters of Lord Lytton ... 1696
- MCARTHY, Justin, M.P.—Maid of Athens ... 1514
MacDonald, George—Orts ... 518
— — — The Princess and Curdie ... 518
Macgregor, General—Wanderings in Baluchistan ... 190
Maclean, Rev. G. F.—Boyle Lectures for 1879-80 ... 423
Mackay, C.—Poetry of the Scottish Language ... 1153
— — — Rev. H. B.—Library of St. Francis de Sales ... 1252
Macmillan & Co. (Pub.)—Memoir of Annie Keary ... 217
— — — The Statesman's Year Book ... 328
Macniven & Wallace (Pub.)—Scottish Divines ... 1129
Macwalter, G. S.—Life of A. R. Serbati ... 1069
Maier, J.—Modern Applications of Electricity ... 220
Maine, Sir H. S.—Early Law and Custom ... 971
Malden, H. C.—The Relief of Vienna ... 1067
Malet, Lucius—Mrs. Lorimer ... 186
Mallison, Colonel G. B.—Life of Lord Clive ... 966
Mann, Mrs. F. J.—The Parish of Hilby ... 489
Martin, Sir T.—Dublin Cathedral ... 187
— — — Life of Lord Lyndhurst ... 1627
— — — Mrs. H.—Memories of Seventy Years ... 1447
Maxwell & Co. (Pub.)—Thy Name is Truth ... 1417
Mandeville, H. M.D.—Body and Will ... 964
Meiklejohn, J. M.D.—Life of W. B. Hodgson ... 1416
Meltzer, C. H.—Daudet's Port Salvation ... 935
Merville, H. C.—The White Pilgrim, &c. ... 258
Michel, F.—Life of Edward the Black Prince ... 1698
Milnes, Alfred—Problems in Political Economy ... 550
Mivart, St. George—Nature and Thought ... 238
Molesworth, W. N.—History of the Church of England ... 393
Moore, George—A Modern Lover ... 1069
Morris, G. S.—Kant's Critique of Pure Reason ... 326
— — — Lewis—Songs Unsung ... 1449
Mozley, J. B., D.D.—Lectures, Theological, &c. ... 583
Muir, Sir W.—The Early Caliphs ... 1191
Mulholland, Rosa—The Wild Birds of Killevy ... 1131
Munro, Surgeon-General—The 93rd Sutherland Highlanders ... 1158
Munro, A. F., M.A.—The Globe Readers ... 125
Murphy, Rev. Denis—Cromwell in Ireland ... 712
Murray, J. (Pub.)—Correspondence of F. Twining ... 990
Murray, D. C.—Hearts ... 745
— — — By the Gate of the Sea ... 1096
Myers, F. W. H.—Essays, Classical-Modern ... 1382
- NICHOL, J.—American Literature, an Historical Sketch ... 358-369
Nicoll, H. J.—Landmarks of English Literature ... 743
Norris, W. E.—No New Thing ... 612
- OBBARD, Rev. A.—Plain Sermons ... 297
O'Donovan, Edward—The Story of Merv Oidenberg, Dr. Merman—Buddha, his Life, &c. ... 1450
Oliphant, Mrs.—The Ladies Lindores ... 805
— — — Hester ... 1660
— — — Laurence—Altiora Peto ... 1190
Ormond, G. W. T.—Lord Advocates of Scotland ... 1318
O'Rell, Max—John Bull et Son Ile ... 1221
Ouida—Wanda ... 745
- PALMER, Rev. A. S.—Folk-Etymology ... 1351
Palmer, S.—The Eclogues of Virgil ... 1624
Pattison, Mark—The Sonnets of John Milton ... 1062
Payn, James—Kit: a Memory ... 118 — — — Thicker than Water ... 1698
Perrot, G.—A History of Art in Ancient Egypt ... 554
Petrie, W. M. F.—The Pyramids ... 1481
Pictou, J. Allanson—Oliver Cromwell ... 394
Pollock, W. H.—The Picture's Secret ... 829
— — — A de Musset's La Nuit de Mai ... 868
— — — The Paradox of Acting ... 1030
Poole, Richmond, &c.—Lectures on Art ... 390
— — — R. S.—The Cities of Egypt ... 454
Porter, Noah, D.D.—Science and Sentiment ... 189
Pott, Mrs. Henry—Bacon's Promus ... 295
Pressense, E. de, D.D.—The Study of Origins ... 988
Pusey, E. B., D.D.—Sermons ... 1034
Puydt, E. de—Les Orchidées ... 327
- QUILTER, Harry—The Academy, 1872-1882 ... 681
- REICHARDT, Herr H.—The German Teacher in England ... 1701
Reid, T. Wemyss—Gladys Fane ... 1584
Richter, J. P.—Italian Art in National Gallery ... 614
Riddell, Mrs. J. H.—The Struggle for Fame ... 1285
Robinson, A. M. F.—Emily Brontë ... 678
— — — Mary F.—Arden ... 776
— — — Phil—Among the Mormons ... 1156
— — — The Poets' Birds ... 1413
Rogers, J. E. T.—History of Agriculture, &c. ... 939
Ross, Percy—A Misguidit Lassie ... 1069
Row, C. A.—Revelation and Modern Theology ... 1186
Rusden, G. W.—History of New Zealand ... 648
Russell, W. Clark—A Sea Queen ... 1482
- SALA, G. A.—America Revisited ... 298
Samuelson, J.—Roumania, Past & Present ... 218
Sanborn, F. B.—Life of H. P. Thoreau ... 239
Sanders, Mrs.—Matthew Dale, Farmer ... 294
Saunders, J.—A Noble Wife ... 1549
Sayce, A. H.—Herodotus, Books I.-III. ... 1659
Scott, E. G.—Constitutional Liberty in America ... 937
Scott-Stevenson, Mrs.—On Summer Seas ... 870
Scrope, W.—Deer-stalking in the Highlands ... 1158
Fedgwick, Major—Light the Dominant Force ... 1192
Beebohm, H.—Siberia in Asia ... 51
— — — F.—The English Village Community ... 1380
Seeley, J. R.—The Expansion of England ... 1663
Sharp, W.—Dante Gabriel Rossetti ... 119
Sidgwick, H.—Principles of Political Economy ... 1219
Simcox, G. A.—A History of Latin Literature ... 517
Skeat, W. W.—An Etymological Dictionary ... 1033
Skelton, J.—Essays in History and Biography ... 615
Smart, Hawley—At Fault ... 581
Smiles, S.—James Nasmyth: an Autobiography ... 838
Smith, Bosworth—Life of Lord Lawrence ... 291
— — — E. F.—In a Vain Shadow ... 455
— — — W. C.—North-Country Folk ... 903
Stanley, Dean—Sermons Delivered in America ... 968
Stephen, Leslie—Works of S. Richardson ... 362-1284
— — — Sir J. F.—The Criminal Law of England ... 647-739
Stephens, W. R.—Memoir of Baron Hatherley ... 487
Sterne, Simon—Constitutional History of the United States ... 937
Stevenson, Rev. J.—The History of Mary Stuart ... 939
Stirling-Maxwell, Sir W.—Don John of Austria ... 1663
Stodart, J. M.—The Encyclopedia Americana ... 1622
Stoughton, J. D.D.—William Penn ... 1095
Street, G. E.—Restoration of Dublin Cathedral ... 187
Strong, H. A.—Thirteen Satires of Juvenal ... 357
Stuckenberg, J. H. W., D.D.—The Life of I. Kant ... 19
Swinburne, A. C.—A Century of Roundels ... 970
Symonds, J. A.—Italian Byways ... 611
- TENNYSON, A.—The Parchment Library ... 355
Thackeray, Miss—A Book of Sybils ... 1447
Thom, J. H.—Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ ... 84
Thompson, G. M.—Diary of B. Cooks in Japan ... 1518
Tinsley Bros.—Stories by an Old Bohemian ... 156
— — — Physiological Cruelty ... 1002
Tristram, W. O.—Julian Trevor ... 1332
Trollope, Anthony—Kept in the Dark ... 88
— — — Mr. Scarborough's Family ... 612
— — — An Autobiography ... 1377
Tuckerman—History of English Prose Fiction ... 362
Tuke, D. H., M.D.—History of the Insane ... 1066
Tudor, J. R.—The Orkneys and Shetland ... 1032
Turner, C. E.—Studies in Russian Literature ... 1484
Tyerman, Rev. L.—Life of J. W. Fletcher ... 530
Tyrrell, Prof. R. Y.—Dublin Translations, &c. ... 1581
- VOGT, Colonel Herman—The Egyptian War of 1882 ... 1349
- WACE, H., D.D.—The Gospel and Its Witnesses ... 834
Waldmüller, R.—Diaries of Princess Amalie of Saxony ... 516
Wale, Rev. H. J.—My Grandfather's Pocket-book ... 1550
Walker, Rev. W.—Life of John Skinner, M.A. ... 1463
Wallace, W. M. A.—Life of Kant ... 19
— — — Edwin—Aristotle's Psychology ... 260
Warren, Hon. G. L.—A Guide to the Study of Book-Plates ... 1325
Weiss, Dr. B.—The Life of Christ ... 1552
Welsh, A. H.—Development of English Literature ... 743
Whitelaw, R.—Sophocles in English Verse ... 427
Whitman, Walt.—Specimen Days and Collect ... 953
Williams, W.—The Negro Races in America ... 908
— — — Michael—Some London Theatres ... 969
Wills, C. J., M.D.—Modern Persia ... 901
Wilson, J. S.—Culture of the Christian Ministry ... 1129
Wingfield, Hon. L.—Abigail Rowe ... 1550
Witt, Professor C.—Myths of Hellas ... 217
YONGE, Charlotte M.—Stray Pearls ... 840
Youngusband, F.—Myths of Hellas ... 217
Yriarte, Ch.—Un Condotiere au XV. Siècle: Rimini ... 649
- BELINDA—Rhoda Broughton ... 1379
Black Prince, Life of the—F. Michel, F.A.S. ... 1369
Body and Will—Henry Maudsley, M.D. ... 914
Bohemian, an Old, Stories by—Tinsley Bros. ... 156
Book-Plates, a Guide to—Hon. J. L. Warren ... 1323
Boyle Lectures for 1879-80—G. F. Maclean, D.D. ... 423
Brahmo Year-book for 1882, the—S. D. Collet ... 839
Brighter Britain—W. D. Hay ... 324
British Navy, the—Sir T. Brassey ... 240
Brontë, Emily—A. M. F. Robinson ... 678
Brown, O. M., Biographical Sketch—J. H. Ingram ... 1512
Buddha; his Life, Doctrine, &c.—Dr. Oidenberg ... 615 — — — Life and Legend of—Right Rev. P. Bigandet ... 645
Buddhism, Points in the History of Indian—T. W. Rhys Davids ... 645
Burglary, &c.—E. A. Dillwyn ... 1415
But Yet a Woman—Arthur S. Hardy ... 899
By the Gate of the Sea—D. C. Murray ... 1093
Byron, Lord, the Real—J. C. Jeaffreson ... 1451
- CALIPHS, the Early—Sir W. Muir ... 1191
Camps in the Rockies—Baillie-Grohman ... 124
Carlyle and Emerson, Correspondence of—Chatto and Co. (Pub.) ... 396
Carlyle's, Mrs., Letters—James A. Froude ... 483
Carnival, a Story of—Mary A. M. Hoppus ... 123
Carquinez Woods, in the—Bret Hart ... 1128
Casell's Natural History—P. M. Duncan ... 590
Cavron, Count, Letters of—Lauri Chiala ... 1125
Cecilia; Memoirs of an Heiress—F. Burney ... 18
Charles VII., History of—De Beaumont ... 1155-1187
Chersonese, the Golden—L. Bird ... 897
Chia, the Across Chrys—A. R. Colquhoun ... 872
— — — the Sacred Books of—James Legge ... 1154
Christ, the Life of—Dr. E. Weiss ... 1552
Christian Ministry, Culture of the—J. S. Wilson ... 1129
Church of England, and the Ornaments Rubric—E. B. W. Balm ... 900
Clive, Lord, Life of—Colonel G. B. Mallison ... 966
Cocks, R., Diary of, in Japan—G. M. Thompson ... 1518
Combehurst, the Romance of—F. M. Alford ... 995
Condotiere, Un, an XV. Siècle: Rimini Ch. Yriarte ... 649
Cores, the Hermit Nation—William E. Griffis ... 677
Criminal Law of England, History of—Sir J. F. Stephen ... 647-739
Cromwell, Oliver—J. Allanson Pictou ... 394
Cross, Herald of the—F. O. Arnold-Forster ... 617
- DISARMED—Miss Betham-Edwards ... 1519
Doctor Claudius—F. M. Crawford ... 1552
Don John of Austria—Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell ... 1663
Dr. Edith Romney—R. Beatty (Pub.) ... 1452
Dramatists, English, of To-day—W. Archer ... 969
Dublin Cathedral, Restoration of—G. E. Street ... 157 — — — Translations, into Greek, &c.—Prof. Tyrrell ... 1581
Dust—Julian Hawthorne ... 996
- EDINBURGH, Old and New—James Grant ... 683
Egypt, the Cities of—R. S. Poole ... 454 — — — Ancient, a History of Art in—G. M. Perrot ... 554
Egyptian War of 1882, the—Col. Hermann Vogt ... 1349
Ein Wort—Von G. Ebers ... 468
Electricity, the Modern Applications of—E. Hospitalier ... 220
Ella, the E-says of—Alfred Ainger ... 551
Ellot, George—Mathilde Blind ... 517
Emerson, Ralph Waldo, his Life—G. W. Cooke ... 121
— — — Alexander Ireland ... 121
— — — at Home and Abroad—Monroe D. Conway ... 121
Etymological Dictionary of the English Language—Rev. W. W. Skeat ... 1033
England, Church of, History of—Molesworth ... 393
— — — History of Criminal Law—Sir J. F. Stephen, 647-739
— — — the Expansion of—J. R. Seeley ... 1665
English Literature, &c., Development of—Welsh ... 743
— — — Landmarks of—H. J. Nicoll ... 743
— — — Christian-Socialist Movement, the—Von Lujjo Brentano ... 1254
— — — Traits—R. W. Emerson ... 1352
English Village Community, the—F. Seebohm ... 1380
Ephesians, the Epistle to—R. W. Dale, M.A. ... 264
Essays in History and Biography—John Skelton ... 615 — — — Classical-Modern—F. W. H. Myers ... 1282
Estcourt, Lord James Douglas ... 1253
Etching—Maxime Lallanne ... 56
Ethics, Prolegomena to—Prof. T. H. Green 1283-1316
Eton, Seven Years at—J. Brinsley-Richards ... 425
Expositor, the—Rev. Samuel Cox, D.D. ... 902
- FICITION, a History of English Prose—B. Tuckerman ... 362
Fielding, Biography of—Antin Dobson ... 1131
Fletcher, Rev. J. W., Life of—Rev. L. Tyerman ... 520
Folk-Etymology—Rev. A. S. Palmer ... 1354
Footlights—John Hollingshead ... 999
Forester, the—James Brown, LL.D. ... 391
Frederick the Great and Maria Theresa—Duc de Broglie ... 708
- GEOLGY, Text-book of—Archibald Geikie ... 55
George III., the Family of—Percy Fitzerald ... 777
German Plantation, Ten Years on—F. B. Leigh ... 451
German Teacher in England, the—H. Reichardt ... 1701
Ghetto, Scenes from the—Leopold Kompert ... 323
Gideon Fleyce—Henry W. Lucy ... 53
Gladys Fane—T. W. Reid ... 1584
Gli Amici—Edmondo de Amicis ... 1188
Globe Readers, the—A. F. Marison, M.A. ... 125
Gloria; B. Percy Galdie—Clara Bell ... 931
Gloves, their Annals, &c.—S. W. Beck ... 1516
Goethe, the Wisdom of—J. S. Blackie ... 578
Gold Coast, for Gold, to the—R. F. Burton ... 650
Golden Bar, the—Hurst and Blackett (Pub.) ... 237
Gospel, the, and its Witnesses—H. Wace, D.D. ... 834
Greece, a Tour in—R. B. Farrer ... 1226
Greek Tales; or, Myths of Hellas—Prof. C. Witt ... 217 — — — Philosophers, the—Alfred W. Benn ... 485
- HAMILTON, Sir W. Rowan, Life of—R. P. Graves, M.A. ... 117
Hampshire, Green Lanes of—Rev. G. N. Godwin ... 261
— — — the Civil War in—Rev. G. N. Godwin ... 453
Hatherley, Baron, Memoir of—F. W. E. Stephens ... 487
Hawaii, Fire-Fountains of—C. D. G. Cumming ... 152
Hawke, Lord, the Life of—Montagu Burrows ... 1320
Heart and Science—Wilkie Collins ... 679
Hearts—D. C. Murray ... 745
Helen of Troy—A. Lang ... 87
Henry, Philip, M.A., Diary of—M. H. Lee, M.A. ... 420
Herodotus, Books I.-III., Notes—A. H. Sayce ... 1659
Heroes and Kings—Rev. Alfred J. Church ... 807
Hester—Mrs. Oliphant ... 1660
Hilby, the Parish of—Mrs. F. J. Mann ... 499
Hodgson, W. B., LL.D., Life of—J. Meiklejohn ... 1416
Homer, the Iliad of, in English Prose—A. Lang, M.A., and others ... 711
- ABIGEL ROWE—Hon. L. Wingfield ... 1550
Academy, the, 1872-1882—Harry Quilter ... 681
Acting, the Paradox of—W. H. Pollock ... 1030
Administration, Through One—F. H. Burnett ... 1624
Æsop's Fables, Some of—R. Caldecott ... 774
Africa, South, a Soldier's Life in—Col. Durnford ... 969
African Farm, the Story of an—Ralph Irons ... 713
Agriculture in England, History of—J. T. Rogers ... 938
Alert, the Cruise of the—R. W. Coppinger, M.D. ... 1622
All in a Garden Fair—Walter Besant ... 164
Altiora Peto—Laurence Oliphant ... 1190
Amalie, Princess, Diaries of—E. Waldmüller ... 516
America, the English in—J. A. Doyle ... 86
— — — North, History of Pacific States of—Baneroff ... 88
— — — Scamper Through—T. S. Hudson ... 120
— — — Revisited—G. A. Sala ... 298
— — — Constitutional Liberty in—E. G. Scott ... 937 — — — Sermons Delivered in—Dean Stanley ... 968
American Literature, Sketch of—J. Nichol ... 358-369
— — — Four-in-Hand in Britain—A. Carnegie ... 1224
— — — Cousins, Our—W. E. Adams ... 1582
Americans, the Encyclopedia—J. M. Stodart ... 1623
Angus Graeme, Gamekeeper—Gardner (Pub.) ... 294
Arden—Mary F. Robinson ... 776
Aristotle's Psychology—Edwin Wallace ... 260
Art, Lectures upon—Poole, Richmond, &c. ... 390
— — — Every-day—Lewis F. Day ... 387
Artevelde, James and Philip van—W. J. Ashley ... 835
— — — James Hutton ... 831
At Fault—Hawley Smart ... 581
Aut Cesar aut Nihil—Countess von Bothmer ... 806 Autobiography, an—Anthony Trollope ... 1377
- BALUCHISTAN, Wanderings in—General Macgregor, K.C.B. ... 190

Horse Pairing—J. S. Howson, D.D.	1093
Human Faculty and Development—F. Galton	1029
IRELAND, Summer Travelling in —John Coles	235
Iceland and Tundra—William Gilder	1486
In the Olden Time—Longman & Co. (Pub.)	741
Insane, History of the—D. H. Tukey, M.D.	1066
Ireland, the Commercial Restraints of—J. H. Hutchinson	185
—Cromwell in—Rev. Denis Murphy	712
Irish History, Four Years of—Sir C. G. Duffy	293
—Question, the—D. Bennett King	712
Italian Byways—John A. Symonds	611
—Art in the National Gallery—Jean P. Richter	616
JAPAN, Leading Men of —Charles Lanman	1414
John Bull et Son Ile—Max O'R. H.	1221
Jubilee Lectures—Hodder & Stoughton (Pub.)	553
Julian Travels—W. O. Tristram	1322
Juvénal, Thirteen Satires of—H. A. Strong, M.A.	357
KANT I., Life of —J. H. W. Stuckenb. G., D.D.	19
— — — — — William Wallace, M.A.	19
Kant's Critique of Pure Reason—G. S. Morris	396
Keary, Annie, Memoir of—Macmillan & Co. (Pub.)	217
Kest in the Dark—Anthony Trollope	68
Killary, the Wild Birds of—Rosa Mulholland	1131
Kings and Queens of an Hour—Percy Fitzgerald	1127
Kit, a Memory—James Payn	118
LADIES Lindores, the —Mrs. Oliphant	835
Laird's Secret, the—J. H. Jamieson	291
Lambeth Palace—J. Cave Brown	191
Landscape, Modern—J. C. Carr	153
Latin Literature, History of—G. A. Simcox, M.A.	517
Law, History of the Criminal, of England—Sir J. F. Stephen	647-739
— and Custom, Early—Sir H. S. Maine	971
— the Nature of Positive—J. H. Lightwood	1296
Lawrence, Lord, Life of—Bosworth Smith	291
Lawson, Cecil, a Memoir—Edmund Gosse	810
Lectures and Theological Papers—J. B. Mozley	583
Leopardi's Essays and Dialogues—C. Edwards	236
Light, the Dominant Force—Major W. Sedgewick	1192
Life Among My Ain Folk—Douglas (Pub.)	294
— Retrospect of a Long—S. C. Hall, F.S.A.	1035
Lion of Flanders, the—Henrick Conscience	1350
Livy: the Second Punic War—A. J. Church, M.A.	835
London, a History of—W. J. Loftie	775
Lourdes, Miraculous de—H. Lasserre	1515
Lyndhurst, Lord, a Life of—Sir T. Martin	1620
Lytton, Lord, Life and Letters of—Lord Lytton	1966
MACHIAVELLI NICCOLO, Writings of —O. E. Detmold	930
Maclean Portrait Gallery, the—W. Bates, B.A.	1256
Magazines: Argosy, 1055; Army and Navy Magazine, 1455; Art, Magazine of, 192-136; Art and Letters, 748; Art, J., 1687; Atlantic Monthly, 332-1164; Aunt Judy's Magazine, 618-1005-1324-1354; Belgravia, 458-1005; Blackwood, 20-158-351-458-1004-1455; British Quarterly, 59-469-1070-1355; Chambers's Journal, 192; Church Quarterly, 126-1069-1324; Colburn's United Service Magazine, 1036-1455; Contemporary Review, 22-157-331-45-585-747-873-1604-1161-149-1455; Cornhill, 157-311-158-747-875-1005-1290; Dublin Review, 126-523; Edinburgh Review, 126-1005; Education, Journal of, 1588; English Illustrated Magazine, 1626; Expositor, the, 1163-1523; Forestry, 619; Fortnightly Review, 21-157-158-330-457-565-746-104-1063-1064-1162-1289-1453; Gentleman's Magazine, 875; Good Words, 6-8-1588; Harper's Magazine, 192-1036; Let's Magazine, 332; London Quarterly, 90; Longman's, 21-351-586-875; Macmillan's, 22-156-331-458-375-1001-1290-1455; Mayfair, 1588; Melbourne Review, 875; Merry England, 555-1005-1588; Mind, 19; Modern Review, 59; Month, the, 875-1005-1324; National Review, 264-458-566-746-874-104-1163-1455; Nineteenth Century, 21-157-330-458-564-747-874-1003-1004-1162-1454; Pictorial, the, 748; Psychological Medicine, Journal of, 127; Quarterly Review, 126-1004; Scottish Review, 299-811-1257; Sunday Magazine, 1521-1588; Theatre, the, 619; Time, 458-1005; Tinsley's Magazine, 458-714; Westminster Review, 1036-1385.	1514
Maid of Athens—Jus in McCarthy, M.P.	294
Matthew Dale, Farmer—Mrs. Sanders	1447
Memories of Seventy Years—Mrs. H. Martin	1450
Merv, the Story of—Edward O'Donovan	562
Mexico To-day—T. O. Brocklehurst	1062
Milton, John, the Sonnets of—Mark Pattison	1096
Miserable Lawie, a—Percy Ross	17
Mittford, M. H., the Friendships of—Lestrangle	1069
Modern Lover, a—George Moore	549
Morgols, Among the—James Gilmour	1156
Morgons, Among the—Phil Robinson	191
Mr. Isaacs—F. M. Crawford	186
Mrs. Lorimer—Lucas Malet	863
Musset's "La Nuit de Mai," &c.—W. H. Pollock	837
My Reminiscences—Lord Ronald Gower	552
My Trivial Life and Miscellaneous—Blackwoods	1550
My Grandfather's Pocket-book—Rev. H. J. Wale	217
Myths of Hellas—Prof. C. Witt	838
NASMITH, James, an Autobiography —Samuel Smiles	264
National Review, the—W. H. Allen & Co. (Pub.)	232
Nature and Thought—St. George Mivart	361
Needlework, the Dictionary of—R. L. F. Canfield	908
New Zealand, History of—G. W. Williams	648
New Thing, the—W. E. Norris	612
Noble Wife, a—J. Saunders	1549
ON Summer Seas —Mrs. Scott-Stevenson	870
Only a Word—G. Ebe	486
Orchids, the—E. de Puydt	327
Origins, a Study of—E. de Pressensé, D.D.	963
Orkneys and Shetland, the—J. R. Tudor	1033
Ornaments Rubric, the—E. B. W. Balme, M.A.	900
Orts—George MacDonald	518
Ottile, an Eighteenth Century Idyl—V. Lee	870
Our Old Home—Nathaniel Hawthorne	1352
PALMER, S.: a Memoir —Fine Art Society	263
— Edward H., the Life of—Walter Besant	773
Papacy, History of the—M. Creighton	424
Parliament, Aneotal History of—G. H. Jennings	1065
Parliamentary Reform, Essays on—W. Bagehot	1547
Pars, William—John Stoughton, D.D.	1065
People I Have Met—E. C. Grenville-Murray	396
Pernia, Modern—O. J. Wills, M.D.	901
Philosophy, Studies in—W. L. Courtney	154
Physiognomic Cruelty—T. S. B. others (Pub.)	1402
Pisgah's Secret, the—W. H. Pollock	329
Poems, Rare, of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries—W. J. Linton	1097
Poems, Barlow, G.—An Actor's Reminiscences	903

Poems, Hewitt, J. A.—Summer Songs and Poems	325
— Hopkins, Ellice—Autumn Swallows	710
— King, Harriet L. H.—A Book of Dreams	903
— Merivale, H. O.—The White Pilgrim, &c.	258
— Morris, Lewis—Songs Unsu	1449
— Smith, W. C.—North-Country Folk	903
— Swinburne, A. C.—A Century of Roundels	970
— Tennyson, A.—The Parchment Library	355
Poets, Living English—Kegan Paul & Co. (Pub.)	15
Poets' Birds, the—Phil Robinson	1413
Political Economy, Problems in—Alfred Milnes	550
— Principles of—H. Sidgwick	1219
Port Salvation—A. Daudet	935
Princess, the, and Curdie—George MacDonald	518
Put to the Proof—C. Caroline Fothergill	1383
Pyramids, the—W. M. F. Petrie	1481
REFORM, Methods of Social —W. S. Jevons.	771
Reformation, the, of the 16th Century—C. Beard, B.A.	1418
Reverend and Modern Theology—C. A. Bow	1188
Richardson, S., Works of—Leslie Stephen	962
Roberts, General Sir F. S., Memoir of—C. R. Low	1288
Roman Life in Days of Cicero—Rev. A. J. Church	1662
Romanism, Protestantism, &c.—Paul & Co. (Pub.)	452
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel—William Sharp	119
Roumania, Past and Present—J. Samuelsen	219
Russian Literature, Studies in—C. E. Turner	1484
SALES, St. F. de, Library of —Rev. H. Mackay	1252
Sanguelac—Percy Greg	296
Scarborough's Family, Mr.—Anthony Trollope	612
Science and Sentiment—Noah Porter, D.D.	189
Scotland, Lord Advocates of—G. W. T. Ormond	1318
— in Pagan Times—Joseph Anderson, LL.D.	1158
Scottish Divines—Macnevin and Wallace (Pub.)	1129
— Language, Poetry of the—Charles Mackay	1158
— Characteristics—Paxton Hood	1158
— Highlands, Deerstalking in—W. Scrope	1158
Sea Queen, a—W. Clark Russell	1482
Secular Life, Gospel of—Hon. W. H. Framantle	742
Serbati, A. R., Life of—G. S. Macwalter	1099
Sermons, Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ—J. H. Thom	84
— Plain—Rev. A. Obbard, M.A.	297
— for the Church's Seasons—E. B. Pusey, D.D.	1034
Self-Condemed—Mrs. A. W. Hunt	1353
Shakespeare's Plays, Notes upon—F. A. Kemble	53
Shakespeare, Lectures on—S. T. Coleridge	1700
Shandon Bells—William Black	421
Sharpe, Samuel, Life of—P. W. Claydon	1233
Skinner, John, M.A., Life of—Rev. W. Walker	1483
Siberia in Asia—Henry Seeborn	51
Sibyls, a Book of—Miss Thackeray	1447
Social Reform, Methods of—W. Stanley Jevons	771
Sophocles, in English Verse—B. Whitelaw	427
Specimen Days and Collected—Walt Whitman	833
Spenser, Poems of—Lucy Harrison	1098
Spiritual World, Natural Law in the—H. Drummond	997
Stanley, Dean, Recollections of—G. G. Bradley	257
Statuesque's Year Book—Macmillan & Co. (Pub.)	328
Stray Pearls—Charlotte M. Yonge	840
Struggle for Fame, the—Mrs. J. H. Riddell	1285
Stuart, Mary, History of—Rev. J. Stevenson	939
Sussex, Our Ancestors in—Charles Feet	1160
Swift, Jonathan, Life of—Henry Craik	82
Sutherland Highlanders—Surg.-Gen. Munroe	1158
TACITUS, Annals of —G. A. Holbrook, M.A.	220
Theatres, some London—Michael Williams	969
Thicker than Water—James Payn	1698
Thoreau, H. D., Life of—F. B. Sanborn	239
Thy Name is Truth—Maxwell and Co. (Pub.)	1417
Tinworth, G., and his Wo—K. E. W. Gosse	1584
Travels Round the World, a Lady's—F. D. Bridges	1000
Tudor Dynasty, Historic Portraits of—Burke	1159
Twining, Rev. T., Correspondence of—J. Murray	390
Two on a Tower—Thomas Hardy	154
UNBELIEF, Modern —Rev. H. Footman, M.A.	514
Under Sunny Skies—Longmans & Co. (Pub.)	970
United States, Impressions of—E. A. Freeman	867
— Constitutional History of—S. Sterne	917
VAIN Shadow, in a —E. F. Smith	455
Vienna, Relief of—H. C. Malden	1067
Villiers, C. P., Free-trade Speeches of—Kegan Paul & Co. (Pub.)	521
Virgil, the Eclogues of—S. Palmer	1624
Volcanoes, what they are—J. W. Judd, F.R.S.	1255
WANDA—On da —Chatto & Co. (Pub.)	745
Webster, Daniel, Life of—H. C. Lodge	1225
Wentworth Papers, the—J. J. Cartwright	1319
Wilfred's Widow—Bentley, R. (Pub.)	292
Without God—Percy Greg	1348
Wordsworth's Poetical Works—W. Knight, LL.D.	614
YOLANDE —W. Black	1063

CURRENT LITERATURE.

ABBOTT, E. A.—Hints on Home Teaching	842
— Evelyn, M.A.—A History of Antiquity	876
Adams, W. Davenport—Good Samaritans	1133
Æschylus, the Suppliant Maidens of—Morsehead	842
Ainslie, General—Life as I Have Found It	876
Albert, Prince, Early Homes of—A. Rimmer	128
Aldrich, T. B., Poems of—Houghton & Co. (Pub.)	749
Alick Treherne's Temptation—Alaric Carr	127
Allcock, Mr.—The Czar	23
Aldridge, Miss—The Tower Gardens	90
Althaus, T. F. B.—Seeing and Thinking	1589
Ambassadors, Half-hours with some Famous—G. B. Smith	1134
America, North—Prof. F. V. Hayden	812
American Notes, 1881—A. Sutter, C.E.	277
— Humourists—Rev. H. B. Haweis	336
— Nervousness—G. M. Beard	813
Ames, F. S. D.—Little Hinges to Great Doors	40
Andes, a Year in the—Mrs. R. C. Williams	1133
Annual Register, the	973
Aristotle, Stories from—H. C. H. Calhoun	459
Aristophanes, the Acharnians of—R. Y. Tyrrell	1324
Arithmetic, Elementary Chemical—S. Lupton	57
Armfield, Rev. H. T.—The Three Witnesses	1100
Armytage, Hon. Mrs.—Old Court Customs, &c.	778
BALDWIN, J.—The Story of Siegfried	1705
Banks, Mrs. G. L.—Forbidden to Marry	1386
Barard, F.—Behind a Brass Knocker	491
Beckeping, Dzierzon's Rational—C. N. Abbott	267
Bell, Major E.—The Annexation of the Punjab	524
Bengal, Folk-Tales of—Rev. Lal B. Day	1385
Bentley on the Epistles of Phalaris—W. Wagner	841
Beyond Recall—Adeline Sergeant	459
Bible, the—Rev. John Robson, D.D.	1134
Biblical Atlas, the—Religious Tract Society	941
Binnie, Rev. A. J., M.A.—His Native Land	57

Bisset, A.—History of the English Parliament	906
Black and White—E. A. Meriwether	1420
Black Forest, in the—O. W. Wood	268
Blackwood and Sons (Pub.)—Allison	1708
Blair, W. D.D.—Writings of Archbp. Leighton	1290
Blake, Mary E.—On the Wing	876
Boer War, a Narrative of the—T. F. Carter	490
Brabourne, Lord—Ferdinand's Adventure	32
Bride Picotee—Bemrose (Pub.)	1703
Bristol, Past and Present—J. F. Nicholls, &c.	363
British Navy, the—Sir T. Brassey	1280
Bruce, A. B.—The Galilean Gospel	749
Buchanan, R.—Wanderings in Outer Hebrides	194
Burdett, H. C.—Hints on Sickness	1703
Barke's Peasage, Baronstage, &c.	128
Burn, J., Autobiography of—Hodder & Co. (Pub.)	266
Burton, Mrs. J. W.—My Home Farm	1164
Byrrne, E. F.—A Fair Country Maid	1237
CALDOS, Perez—Marianela	1228
Cambridge Scholarships, &c.—Robert Potts	812
Canton before Treaty Days—Kegan Paul & Co.	300
Carr, J. Comyns—Art and Letters	748-1419
Cassell's Natural History—P. M. Duncan	300
Cassilis, I. L.—Society's Queen	1455
Cavalry Life—J. S. Winter	180
Chambers's Journal	192
— Historical Readers	193
Children's Books	1420
Christ, the Temptation of—G. S. Barrett, B.A.	1133
Christian Knowledge Society's Books	1521
Christianity, the Evolution of	652
Christmas Books (See also Gift-books)	1487-152
— Cards	1522-1556-1559-1668
Church, the, in Roman Gaul—Rev. R. T. Smith	459
Ciceroni, M. Tullii—Rev. H. A. Holden	1385
Clare Stellar—Mrs. J. G. Lunn	193
— Welsman—Bemington & Co. (Pub.)	193
Clare, Austin—A Child of the Menhir	651
Classical Scholarships, Questions, &c., for	266
Clayton, E. C.—A Girl's Destiny	268
Cleland—R. Inchbracken	1420
Clergy Directory, the—Bosworth & Co. (Pub.)	57
Olive, K.—Eberhard	940
Clodd, E.—Leisure Readings	267
Cocker, Professor—Hant's Book of Philosophy	490
Colin Clout's Calendar—Grant-Allen	159
Collins, Mabel, the Story of Helena Modjeska	974
Colomb, Colonel, for King and Kent	397
Cook, Dutton—Night's at the Play	556
Corke, Miss—What Shall We Do With Them?	22
Cornelle and Ra ine—Henry M. Trollope	619
Country Rambles—Leo H. Grindon	333
Cox, Rev. Sir G. W.—Introduction to Mythology	222
Cripplegate, Records of St. Giles's—W. Denton	1703
Cromwell, Mary—In the West Country	22
Crossley, H.—Meditations of M. A. Antoninus	1420
DANTE'S Divine Comedy —W. S. Dugdale	619
Davidson, Thomas—The Parthenon Frieze	1704
Day, Henry—Pyrenes to the Pillars of Hercules	1627
Deane, Mary—Quatrefoil	398
Debreit's Peasage, &c.—R. H. Mair	1100
Derwent, Leith—Orcs's Lovers	490
Dillon, Arthur—River Songs	397
Drewry, Edith S.—On Dangerous Ground	1708
— Only an Actress	876
Doudney, Sarah—A Woman's Glory	397
Dowling, R.—Sweet Infatuation	267
Dunc, C. John, the Life of—W. Jolly, F.R.S.E.	523
Duanval, With a Show through South Africa	634
EDUCATION, Stray Papers upon	779
Egypt and Syria, Caravan Route between	1488
Ellis, Harriet W.—Our Eastern Sisters	300
— Captain A. B.—The Land of Elisha	619
Emigrate, Where to—Wymann & Co. (Pub.)	138
England, a Constitutional History of—Feilden	491
C. D. Yonge, M.A.	851
English Language, History of—Dr. F. Bierbaum	332
— as She is Spoken—J. Milington	397
Enslavement in America—J. E. Thorold Rogers, M.P.	1193
Essays in Philosophical Criticism—E. Caird	684
Essayists, England's—Rev. Peter Anton	748
Eve Lester—A. M. Diehl	555
Evolution and Creation—H. Boase, M.D.	1419
Ewing, Mrs. J. H.—Jackanapes	749
Ewing, B. shop—J. C. Lees, D.D.	1159-1323
Expositor, The	1070
FAIRS, Past and Present —C. Walford	491
Falkner, G.—Our Lady of Loreto	1420
Family Roster, the—A. G. Taunton	268
Farm, the Soil of the—J. Scott	715
— and its Inhabitants—Rachel C. Lowe	684
Farrar, Rev. F. W., D.D.—With the Poets	714
— T. H.—The State in its Relation to Trade	223
Fenn, G. Manville—Eli's Children	1101
Ferns, Where to Find—F. G. Heath	1324
Fishing-rod, Rambles with a—E. S. Roscoe	397
Fonblanque, Albany de—The Blackest of Lies	159
Food and Drink, Lectures on—R. J. Mann, M.D.	748
Foster, J.—Chronicle of James I. of Aragon	1193
Franc, M. J.—Two Sides to Every Question	684
Fraser, Mrs. A.—A Peasage of 1882	748
Fraser-Tytler, M. E.—Transplanted	940
French Revolution, History of—B. M. Gardiner	1325
— Literature, Specimens of—G. Saintsbury	193
GALLYNIPPER in Yankeland —the Tinsley	907
Gaye, Solina—Jack-by-the-Hedge	556
— Golden Year, the	1638
Geddes, G. D.—Greek Verses	193
German Prose—H. B. Boisen, A.M.	684
German Culture—J. Gostwick	651
Gibbon, Charles—Of High Degree	459
Gift-books	1533-1553-1537-1625-1636-1667
Gibber, Agnes—Sweetbriar

- Hebrides, in the—C. F. G. Cumming 1627
Hobart, Rev. W.—Medical Language of St. Luke 556
Hodgson, H. J., M.A.—Lusus Interisui 778
Hoey, Mrs. Cashel—Pompey's Peril 158
Holland and Belgium, Two Friends in 1258
Holmes, Oliver Wendell—W. S. Kennedy 1227
Holmes, George—Farmer John 1100
Home-Mission Work—Wells Gardner and Co. 57-1420
Honduras, British—A. R. Gibbs 1701
Hope, A. R., Mr.—Stories of Old Renown 23
Hope-Edwards, E. C.—Asahir 779
Hopkins, Mary A. M.—A Great Treason 1627
Horace, the Epics of—Dr. White 428
—Poems of—T. E. Page, M.A. 480
—Satires of—Arthur Palmer 1419
Horatii, Q., Orestes—K. Paul & Co. (Pub.) 749
—Flaccus, Q., Carminum, Liber IV.—T. Page 842
Houghton, L. S.—Faithful to the End 428
Howard, Lady Constance—Mollie Darling 396
Hume, Elleanor—My Heart and I 652
Hurst & Blackett (Pub.)—The Senior Songman 1037
Hus, John—Rev. A. H. Wratiaslaw 459
Hutchinson, W. H. F.—Pen and Pencil Sketches 1290
Hutton, Rev. C. F.—Unconscious Testimony 905
- INDIA, the Students' Geography of British—
Dr. G. Smith 90
—Days of Grace in—H. S. Newman 127
—Agriculture for—Lieutenant F. Pogson 876
—Our Tour in Southern—Mrs. Murray-Ainsley 905
Indian People, a Brief History of—Dr. Hunter 127
—Snake Poisons—A. J. Wall, M.D. 652
Investigation Record, the Collective—Humphrey 1298
Iron Roads, Our—F. B. Williams 194
Irving, Henry—W. Archer 1325
Italian Rambles—J. J. Jarvis 1704
Italy, the Renaissance of Art in—L. Scott 905
- JAMES, M. E.—How to Decorate our Ceilings
Japan, Eight Years in—E. G. Holtham 1325
Jay, Harriett—My Cousin's Cousins 906
—Through the Stage-door 1627
Johnstone, C. L.—Tyrants of To-day 1134
Jones Collection at Kensington, Handbook to 428
Judas and her Rulers—M. Bramston 556
Judson, Adoniram, his Life and Labours—Judson 790
Justice's Note-book, the—W. K. Wigram 365
Juvenal, Persius, Martial, &c.—W. F. Shaw 332-941
- KABUL Campaign, Recollections of the—
Joshua Duke 1100
Kafir Folk-Lore—G. McCall Theal 460
Kate—Asmodeus 1133
Kean, Arthur—The Bantoffs of Cherryton 619
Kenna, J. F.—On Blue Water 1038
Keith, Leslie—Alas! my Lady 160
King, Katharine—A Fallen Foe 1258
Kingston, W. B.—William I., German Emperor 397
- LAKE District, Guide to the—H. Prior
Larch, the Culture of the—C. Y. Michie 219
Larden, W., M.A.—A School Course of Heat 63
Lawson, J. A., LL.D.—Hymns 1037
Lectures and Pamphlets—A. V. Dicoey 1228
Leech, John, a Biographical Sketch—F. Kilton 90
Left Till Called for—Wells Gardner 842
Letts's Complete Popular Atlas 365
Liddon, H. P., D.D.—Antonio Rosmini 1588
Library Manual, the—J. H. Slater 333
Libraries and Readers—W. E. Foster 1164
Lieber, F.—The Life and Letters of T. S. Perry 523
Light, a Course of Experimental Optics—Wright 127
Lingard, Dr.—The History of England 778
Locke on Words—F. Ryland 193
Logan, Sir W., Life of—B. J. Harrington, B.A. 1137
London City Directory—Collingridge (Pub.) 223
—Charities, Guide to—H. Fry 1156
—Greater—Edward Walford 1703
Longfellow, H. W., Home Life of—B. Macbetha 127
Longman & Co. (Pub.)—A Glimpse of the World 460
Lowe, Martha P.—The Story of Chief Joseph 332
Lowell, James Russell—F. H. Underwood 128
Low, S., & Co. (Pub.)—Rambles in Spain 1037
Lynton, Mrs. C. L.—Witch Stories 194
Lyrics, English—Kegan Paul & Co. (Pub.) 1456
- MACDONALD, George—Weighed and Wanting
McEwen, C.—Miss Beauchamp, a Philistine 973
McHardie, E.—The Midnight Cry 907
Macquoid, K. S.—Her Sailor Love 779
—T. & K.—About Yorkshire 748
Macmillan, H.—The Marriage in Gana of Galilee 941
Madeline's Fault—Morris Neale 333
Magazines (see "Books—Subjects")
Majendie, Lady M.—Once More 1258
Manitoba, Letters from a Young Emigrant in 779
Marlitt, E.—The Little Princess 556
Married Women's Property Act—Ward & Lock 397
Marryat, Florence—Facing the Footlights 652
—A Moment of Madness 1005
Mars, Politics and Life in—Low and Co. (Pub.) 1256
Marshall, Emma—Constantia Carew 906
Mather, Helen—Sam's Sweetheart 780
Maurice, C. E.—Plays for the People 491
Medical Nursing—Dr. J. W. Anderson 242
Medicine, the Journal of Psychological 127
Merchant Taylor's School—Rev. C. J. Robinson 1037
Mexico, a Flight to—J. J. Aubertin 159
Middle Ages, Epics of the—Dr. W. Wagner 427
Miller, Mrs. F. F.—Social Economy 1100
—W.—The Heavenly Bodies 1227
Millington, Rev. T. S.—Straight to the Mark 1588
Milton, J. L.—The Laws of Life 342
Mississippi, the—T. V. Greene 297
Misterton—W. H. Allen and Co. (Pub.) 459
Molesworth, Mrs.—Two Little Waifs 1551
Molly Maguires, the, in America—E. W. Lucy 905
Moncrieff, H. W.—The Free Church Principle 1100
Mont Blanc, the Ascent of—W. H. Le Mesurier 222
Moorish Lotus Leaves—G. D. Cowan 586
Morley's Universal Library 1420
Moyle, J. C.—Imperatori Justitiani, &c. 1258
Muir, Alan—Hearthrug Faroes 223
- NATURE Studies—Grant Allen
New Editions... 58-288-398-620-749-1005-1228-1488
New Zealand As It Is—J. Bradshaw 491
Newspaper Press Directory—Kelly & Co. (Pub.) 223
Nicholson, J. H.—The Adventures of Halek 480
Nicols, Arthur—Zoological Notes, &c. 459
Nile, the Banks of the—Blackwood (Pub.) 396
Notley, Fanny E. M.—Red Riding Hood 1290
Novels... 21-301-364-429-524-684-941-1101-1291-1325-15-5
—and Tales... 265-491-587
- OBELISK, Life of Jean F.—Mrs. J. E. Butler
Old-Testament Commentary—C. Ellicott 223-555
Oliphant, Mrs.—Cowper's Poems 1704
- Othello—E. R. Parnell, M.A. 301
Ovillii, P., Nasoni Ibi—R. Ellis 749
- PARIS in Peril—Henry Vixetelly
Parliament, the English, History of—Bisset 491
Patterson, R. H.—The New Golden Age 1005
Paul, R. W.—Sonnichal Slabs of Somersetshire 90
Peard, Frances M.—Contradictions 779
Peck, Francis—Social Wreckage 489
Philistine, a Daughter of the—Douglas (Pub.) 1257
Physics in Pictures—Theodore E. Kharit 807
Pigeon-keeper, the Practical—Lewis Wright 397
Pirkie, Mrs.—Saint and Sybil 428
Plato, the Republic of—G. H. Wells, M.A. 811
Poeck, Robert—George M. Arnold 1194
Poetry—Various, 23-180-587-780-1070-1100-1101-1184-1194-1291-1325-1456-1487
- Cook, K.—Plays and Poems 242
—Domest, Alfred—Ranolf and Amobia 1037
—Grant, J. C.—A Year of Life 811
—Hoole, C. H.—Hermione, &c. 876
—Johnson, R.—Idle and Poet 556
—Lansbridge, Rev. F.—Sons in Sunshine 906
—McCarthy, Justin—Serapion, &c. 811
—McDowall, W.—The Man of the Woods 90
—Newell, E. J.—The Sorrow of Simons 523
—Nicholls, S. H.—Monte Rosa 363
—Pollock, W. H.—Songs and Rhymes 159
—Rodd, B.—Poems in Many Lands 811
—Rogers, T. S.—Rienzi 556
—Rosslyn, Earl of—Sonnet 1100
Political Economy—Arthur M. Smith 423
Pontefract Corporation, Book of Entries of the 212
Pope, Alexander, Works of—Rev. W. Elwin 56
—W. J. Courthope 56
Portfolio, the 748
Powell, W.—Wanderings in a Wild Country 973
Præd, Mrs. C.—Nadine 267
—Moloch 778
Prayer, the Book of Common—Professor Bright 300
Price, Eleanor C.—The Foreigners 1703
Proctor, R. A.—Vape of the Stars 333
—Flowers of the Sky 333
Psalms, the Book of—Ben Fehillim 480
—in Metre—D. M'Laren 1522
Purbeck, Isle of, Rambles in—C. E. Robinson 397
- RABBE, Wilhelm—Abu Telfan
Rebecca—R. D. G. Price 423
Readings—Charles Reade 459
Reed, Sir C., Memoir of—C. E. B. Reed 973
Regimental Legends—J. S. Winter 192
Religions of the Ancient World—G. Rawlinson 1134
—The Ten Great—J. F. Clarke 1257
Riddell, Mrs. J. H.—Weird Stories 267
Robinson, C. E.—A Royal Warren 397
—F. W.—Women are Strange 714
Rose, H.—Ten Years—An Old-World Story 523
Rosmini, A.—Five Wounds of the Holy Church 1583
Rossetti, G. G.—Letter and Spirit 1161
Rosa, D.—The Land of the Five Rivers of India 779
Royal Movements, Diary of—Eliot Stock (Pub.) 841
Rudolph, Professor—The Wonders of Nature 652
Russell, Dora—Crown's Widow 715
Rutherford, W. G.—Babirus 973
- S. T. JOHN, Percy B.—My Beautiful Daughter
Sala, G. A.—Living London 973
Salmonide at the Antipodes—A. N. Chols 21
Samos and Samian Coins—Percy Gardner 198
Sanders, W. B.—Carved Oak Work 1703
Sanderlingham, Past and Present—Mrs. H. Jones 876
Searborough, History of—J. B. Baker 715
Sarawak, Sketches of our Life at—H. M. Dougall 241
Saunders, John—Love's Martyrdom 288
Schelling's Transcendental Idealism—J. Watson 222
School-Books 749
Science without God—H. Didon 57
Scott, L.—Messer Arnolfo's Household 268
Scriptures, Sacred, of the World—Schermhorn 1133 Sermons, Hom of Christ's Garment—Dr. Mellor 127 —Towards Sunset, &c. 223
—Rev. H. R. Hunkin, D.D. 1038
Shakespeare's Historical Plays—O. Wordworth 916
Semen, C. W.—Conservation of Solar Energy 779
Silvestre, Armand—Le Conte de l'Archer 300
Sleep, the Causation of—J. Cappel, M.D. 556
Smart, Hawley—Hard Lines 1420
Smith, W. T.—Sandroscutius 523
—C. R.—Social Retrospections 780
Smith, Elder, & Co. (Pub.)—Fair and Free 460
—Lays, Lord Beresford, &c. 906
Snakes, Curiosities of—C. C. Hopley 428
Sophocles, the Seven Plays—L. Campbell 779
Spain, Holidays in—F. H. McClintock 332
Spanish Travel, Up and Down of—Bellingham 194
Spender, Mrs. J. K.—Gabrielle de Bourdaine 57
Steam-engine, the, and its Inventors—Galloway 23
Stent, G. C.—Scraps from my Saboteuse 1257
Stock, Eliot and Co. (Pub.)—The Way Thither 57
Stories, Short—Mrs. H. Dobell 128
Sun, the, its Planets, &c.—K. Ledger 263
Swedenborg, Emanuel, his Works—E. Swift 1033
Swift, Jonathan, a Novel—Harriet & Co. (Pub.) 1588
- TAIT, A. C., Sketch of Life of—A. C. Bickley
Talbot's Folly—W. B. Guiney 398
Teachers, the Training of—N. S. Laurie 459
Teaching, Theory & Practice of—Rev. E. Thring 1325
Tennyson's Princess: a Study—S. E. Dawson 556
Terms & Phrases, Glossary of—Rev. H. P. Smith 1228 Testament, the, New Revised Version of 159
—Parallel Greek and English 619
Thackeray, the Bibliography of—R. H. Shepherd 684
Theology 361-620-1070
Thomas, Annie—Friends and Lovers 941
—the Oil-herp Conins 1257
Toimer, A.—His Adventurous Career 1290
Tracts, Present-day—R. Higgins Tract Society 300
Trollope, Frances E.—Like Ships upon the Sea 1034
—Anthony—The Land-Leaguers 1627
Tuer, A. W.—Bygone Beauties 1701
- UNDINE, and other Stories—Caroline Birley
University Boat-race, record of—J. Goldie 586
- VEITCH, Professor—Sir W. Hamilton
Victoria, Questions of the Day in—J. Rowe 749
Valentini, a Sketch—E. C. Price 428
Vergili, P., Maronis Opera—T. L. Papillon 193
Victor Emanuel—Edward Dicoey 332
Virgil, the Great Poets of—J. B. Greenough 393
- WALLINGFORD, History of—J. K. Hedges
Ware, Dr. S. H., Life of—Mrs. H. Ware 841
Warwickshire, Handbook to—Ward & Lock (Pub.) 222
Wales, Lives of the Princes of—R. C. F. Nash 1257
Watson, W. H.—The Angelic Pilgrim 40
Weatherly, F. E.—Sixes and Sevens 90
- Welsh Stories—Mrs. E. Lynn Linton 194
Westcott, B. F.—The Historic Faith 1198
White, F. V. & Co. (Pub.)—On Foreign Soil 113
Whitfield, C. H.—Quarries of Omar Khayyam 1345
Wilkinson, Hugh—Sunny Lands and Seas 651
Williams, W. M.—Science in Short Chapters 619
Wilson, A. S.—A Bushel of Corn 1704
Winks, W. E.—Illustrous Shoemakers 267
Wood, T.—Lessons on Insect Life 238
Wood Engraving—G. E. Woodberry 461
Woolson, C. F.—For the Major 1100
Wordsworth, E.—This Work-a-day World 428
- YEO, J. B., M.D.—Health Resorts & their Uses
Yonge, C. M.—Careers from English History 1420

CORRESPONDENCE.

AFFIRMATION Bill, the, 513. Lord Abercrombie, in the Fortnightly, upon, 482—Africa, South, British Policy in, 644—Allbutt, Dr. Clifford, on Competitive Examinations, 1314—America, the "Scamper Through," 323—Anglicanism, a Layman on, 491—Animal Intelligence, 150-291-450-1031-1093—Animals, how our meaning is conveyed to, 1029; cruelty to, 1092; and language, 1124—Authors, the payment of, 448—"Aut Cesar, aut Nihil," 836.

BARRISTERS' agitation, the, 706-736—Beards, 1447. 1477—Begg, Dr., and the Scotch Democracy, 1318—Believe, the wish to, 1152—Benson's, Dr., letter to the Truro Clergy, 501—"Bettors, our," 482-545—Biogenesis, 1027—Bishops, the timidity of, 612—Bismarck, Prince, and the English Sunday, 149—Blasphemy sentence, the, 333—Blasphemy laws, the, and Mr. Foote, 1121-1153—Blasphemy prosecutions, Prebendary Row upon, 1181—Blocking Bills, 1091—Bordeley patronage, the, 81—"Bradlaugh, Mr., and the Blasphemy laws, 929; his disclaimer of Atheism, 321-351—Braithwaite and Buttermere Railway, the, 183-222—Bright, Mr. Jacob, and the Congo debate, 482—Bright, Mr. John, and the Established Church, 608-674-706; and the House of Lords, 1376—Browning's poem, "Wanting is, What?" 385—Bunney, Mr., the late, 81—Butler, Bishop, on the Purpose of the Creator, 516—"By Law Established," 1347-1410.

"Canons" and "Canyons," 183—Canterbury Enthronisation, the, 451—Cañales' Names, 1546—Cat mourners, 1125—Chamberlain, Mr., and the Bankruptcy Bill, 1091; and the Battersea Radical Association, 1185—Channel Tunnel, the, 322-1617—"Chap," the word, 1082-1093—Charitable organisation, 738—Church Catechism, Content and the, 333-345—Church experiment in America, novel, 1281—Church of England, the, as by law established, 1375—Clergy, Liberal, the promotion of, 215-257-290; the, and toleration, 418; of England, 1315—Children and their dinners, 1282-1315-1345-1375-1410-1478; poor, dinners for, 1510—Clive's, Lord, death, 995—Colenso, Bishop, and the Pentateuch, 833-885—Connaught emigration, the, 419—Consecrated ground, a Nonconformist's question, 81-114-148-182-215—Convicts, 1315—Cotton trade, the crisis in the, 1410—County franchise, the non-residential, 1479—Crane's, Mr. Walter, picture in the Grosvenor, 803—Cree Indians, the, 1060—Crickit slip, a, 833—Criminals, torture for, 1026-1059—Crotchete, political, and popular panic, 1282—Crown lands administration, 1091—Cumulative vote, the, 1509—"Cusa," the word, 1218-1315-1347.

DAVIDS, Dr. Rhys, Hibbert Lectures, 707—Dening, Mr., and Church Missions in Japan, 82-115; and the Church Missionary Society, 147—Disestablishment, the political effect of, 608—Dogs, do they understand our language? 996—Dress, rational, 483—Dynamite, danger, the, 420-481.

EARTHQUAKE, an, 833—East Lothian Election, the, and its lessons, 180—Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, the, 1152-1153—Education and drinking habits, 482—Egypt, the International Tribunals in, 13; women and the hospitals in, 706; condition of, 961; leaving, 1039; the state of, 1090; improvement of, 1217-1251—Egyptian Sepoys, 181—"Election, that barbaric, the next," 1118—Electoral rights and change of residence, 1353-1653; districts, 1347—Eliot's, George expression, 576-618—Emigration, 419—Encampment by the Sea, an, 1341—English land, the prospects of, 253-293; the future of, 354—Emmerdale Railway Bill, the defeated, 963—Episcopal timidity, 642.

FAITH and Doubt, 1377—Farm rentals and gold appreciation, 280—Feline mourners, 1125—Fielding, and Sarah's Andra, 1153—Foote, Mr., and the Blasphemy laws, 1121-1153—Flower, Professor, at Reading, 1315—Forster, Mr., why he resigned, 255—France, Italy, and Savoy, 1250—Franchise, the assimilation of the Borough and County, 1506—Fraser, Bishop, and the Ritualist, 111—"From am, Mr., on the Americans," 896—Friends, the Society of, 150.

GABRIELI, and the policy of Assassination, 769—Garrison, W. O., a mistaken ascription, 984—Gibraltar, Bishop of, and Monaco, 608—Gladstone's, Mr., Church patronage, 290—God and Pain, 546—Gold appreciation, and farm rentals, 290—Government, the duty of the, 419—Greek feeling towards Mr. Gladstone, 81; philosophers, the, 642; Church, communion in the, 736.

HAMILTON, Sir W. R., 151—Harrington Antiquities, 13—"Hark, my son!" an Italian's version of, 1216—High Churchmen and Bishops, 182—Highlands, the closing of the, 1121-1152-1218-1219—Hospitals and Dispensaries, 105—Houldsworth, Mr., and the Manchester Liberals, 1281—Huxley's, Professor, Pessimism, 1619.

ILLNESS Bill, the, 1028-1447—Indian agriculture, 897—Informers, 545—Instinct, 1693—Instinct versus Civilisation, 1183—Ipswich Election, 1856-1893—Ireland and England, 149; a Kerry emigration scene, 673; the success and failure in, 1122; justice to, 1376-1446—Irish reforms, 181; emigrants, 492-514; hatred of England, 1122; the Parliamentary sport of the, 1123—Isochia, the earthquake in, 1023-1062.

JAPAN, Mr. Dening and Church Missions in, 82-115—"Julian Trevor," 1347.

KERRY emigration scene, a, 673-705.
LANCASTER, Professor Ray, 1250—Liberal leaders, the, and the provinces, 833; and provincial meetings, 896; daily press, the, 963-1028-1059—Liberalism in the South, 842—Literary plectiscite, the, 1619—Littledale, Dr., and appointments to the Episcopate, 215—Local taxation, relief of, 50; rating and tenant-right, 214—London Provincial Articles Bill, the, 1185—Long Vacation, the, 1856-1893—Longevity, 1251-1314; and Canon Kingsley, 182—Lubbock, Sir J., and the finance of 1881-2, 12—Lyttton, Lord, the wit and wisdom of, 13.

MADAGASCAR, the French in, 929—Magdalen College and the Physiological Laboratory, 1478—

Mahomedan self-government, 149—Manchester, Bishop of, and Miles Platting, 11-12-49-50-81—Manchester, the Liberal party in, 1217—Marriage question, the, and the Bishops, 642—Mandale, Dr. on free-will, 908—Methrathon, 215—Miles Platting case, the, 181-256—Minority representation, 144-147-147-147-1510-1545—Minority vote, 1617—"Miss Standish," 1029—Monaco and the Bishop of Gibraltar, 609—Monstache, the old name for the, 1511—Muslim country, national life in a, 114.

"NATURAL Religion" and its drift, 757-802: Science and Biblical criticism, 1283—Negative vote, the, 1508-1546-1618—Newman, Cardinal, and Sir W. Palmer, 576—Nichol, Mr., and the poem of "Brahma," by Emerson, 463—Nonconformist Toryism, 1409—Norway, Politics in, 113.

OBSTRUCTION and the public, 450—Oliphant, Mrs., and Bishop Wilberforce, 13—Ostrich incubation, 547—Oxford, physiology at, 707; the physiological laboratory at, 1346-1510-1517; and Magdalen College, 1478; and the Thirty-nine Articles, 1655-6; religious teaching at, 1692.

PALMER'S, Samuel, "Elogues of Virgil," 1657-1693—Paper Securities, protection of, 1612—Patent Law, the new, 1217—Paton's, Sir Noel, designs from Shelley and Shakespeare, 14—Pauperism and its remedies, 354—"Peccat qui ante nos," 963—"Periah, India," 1125—"Petersburg" or "St. Petersburg," 760-802—Physical injuries, the inheritance of, 1347—Physiological experiment, &c., 1376—Political crochets and popular panic, 1282—Pomp, the worship of, 576—Poor-Law, the, in East of London, 1618—"Presbyterianism, Broad," 450—Press, the Liberal daily, 963-1023-1053.

QUEEN VICTORIA as Goddess, 419.

RAIN, provision of by the spectroscopes, 256—Rank, the worship of, 482-514-515-609—Rawlinson, Canon, on the antiquity of man, 321-355—Reading for reading's sake, 1411—Reality and Sentiment, 1377—Recruits, the failure of, 760—Reform Bill, the, 1546—Residential Freeholder, the, 1618—Revelation, and Modern Theology, 1250—Ritualistic practices, 50; logic, 115; Ritualists, the, 995—Romanes, Mr., on animal intelligence, 291—Ronsard and Tennyson, 964—Roscoe, Professor, on the inoculation of madness, 14—Rutland and the county elections, 1185.

"St. PETERSBURG" or "Petersburg," 760-802—"Saint or Sinner," 736—Sanitary associations, annual reports of, 321—Schoolmaster, the political, 418—Science, the claims of Mr. H. Merivale upon, 963—Scotch Universities Bill, the, a proposal, 643; Professors and endowments of research, 1250—Sea, an Encampment by the, 1344—Seeborn, Mr., on minority representation, 1410—Seeley's, Professor, "Expansion of England," 1580—Shelley and the "Grand Style," 355—Shirley and Tate and Brady, 1062—Sight and sunlight, 290—"Slay and eat," 609-706—Soldier's, a life and work in South Africa, 1093—Spectator, the, and the Jews, 1400—Spencer's, Mr., ethical views, 256—Spirit duties, the, and financial reform, 290—Spiritual world, natural law in the, 1027-1060-1061-1061-1062-1123—"Storm-drift: poems and sonnets," 187—Strachey, Sir E., on Ritualism, 81—Study and stimulants, 546—Suez Canal, the, 962; and the Liberal daily press, 963; and selfishness, 929—"Swift, Jonathan," 1619—Switzerland, organised benevolence in, 703-736-768.

TEKTONS Pearce, the, 1602—Thought-transference, 1025—"To think long," 385—Topsy turn, 1124—Tories, the literary difficulties of the, 321—Trespass, the law of, 1153—Trevor, G., D.D., on the Lawyers and the Clergy, 1124—Trollope's, Anthony, "Autobiography," 1376.

ULSTER farmer, the, 705; the Parnellite invasion, &c., 1282—Unbelief, modern, 546—University news, 83—"Virgil, Elogues of," Mr. Palmer's, 1693—Visitation, M. de Cyon on, 448-449; Mr. Russell upon, 459-463; at Oxford, 737-763-903; and the inheritance of deformities, 1411; human, 1446.

WHITMAN'S, Walt, prose works, 963—"Wanting is what?" 385—Wilson, George, employment for, 674—Wolves—"think long," 355—Women of business, the higher training of, 1217.

ZULULAND, the situation in, 1250.

LEADING PARAGRAPHS.

Home News.

ALISON, Sir A., presented with a sword at Glasgow, 1534—Aristophanes at Cambridge, 1535—Army Commission on uniforms, 439—Arnold, Mr. M., pension to, 1079: first lecture in the United States, 1399—Atstin, Mr. A., at James's Hall, 822.

BAKES, London Joint-Stock and their customers, 1266—Barry, Canon, to be Bishop of Sydney, 1335—Beaconsfield Statue, the, 501-567—Benjamin, Mr., Q.C., dinner to, 854—Birmingham, discovery of dynamite at, 437—Bishopric, the new, 138—Blasphemy prosecution, the, 535-897—Board Schools, amount of education in, 854—Bordeley Church, riot at, 343—Bowyer, Sir G., death of, 727—Braithwaite and Butterworth Railway Bill withdrawn, 471—Brett, Lord Justice, to be Master of the Rolls, 471—Brown, John, death of, 406—British Association meet at Southampton, 1206-1233—Brode, W. B., letter to Lord R. Churchill, 1399—Burglars, 1175—Byrne, Mr. T. R., on reading power, 1111.

CARLEILL, Dean of, 1367; to be Dean of Manchester, 1467—Carlyle Statue, the, 1535—Caledonian Railway, strike upon, 71—Cambridge degrees to Mr. M. Arnold, &c., 739; the Senate and the modern language tripos, 1533—Canterbury, enthronisation of the Archbishop, 466—Capital punishment, a plea against, 1571—Chess match with living pieces, 171—Church Association and the Bishop of London, 951; controversies, 985; Congress, the Church, 1271—Clarke, Dr. A., made a baronet, 850—Clyde, dreadful accident at, 855—Coalminers and the price of coal, 171-1867; strike of, 1534—Cobden Club, annual meeting, 854—Colenso, Bishop, death of, 789—Congregational Union, 1303—Consoils, decline in, 857—Convocation, reform of, 1469—Cory, Mr. F. W., and the spectroscope, 171—Covent Garden, offers to sell to the City, 1207—Cowie, Dean, translated to Exeter, 1467—Croke, Archbishop, returns to Ireland, 682.

DALRY, Mr., on deafness, 1647—Dicey, Professor, and the Victorian Government, 1270—Dixie, Lady F., 573—Dongall, Mr. J. D., on Highland shooting, 1335—Doyle, Mr. R., death of, 1607—Dynamite discoveries, the, 437-460-501-502-507; trial and sentence, 757; at Liverpool, 1616; explosions on the Metropolitan Railway, 1269.

Education Department and Worlestone School, 3—Electricity as a motor, 843—Engineers, Civil, annual dinner, 470—Exeter Deanery and Canon Stubbs, 1047—Bishop of, and the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill, 1357—FARMERS' Alliance on compensation to tenants, 170—Farrer, Mr. T. H., to be a baronet, 1079—Fenian outrages at Westminster, &c., 341-373; apprehension of at Liverpool, 406—Fisheries Exhibition opened, 631—Freethinker, the prosecution for blasphemy, 309—Fry, Mr. Justice, to be Lord Justice, 471; gives the prices at Saltaire, 1367.

GEOMETRIC Conference at Rome, 1367—Gibraltar, Bishop of, and the English Church in Monaco, 534—Girl's dead body found in a box, 103-203—Green, Mr. J. R., death of, at Mentone, 311.

HALL, Vice-Chancellor, Sir C., death of, 1607—Harrison, Mr., on Gambetta, 170—Herbert, Mr. A., on "Political generosity," 695—Hewett, Mr. P., made a baronet, 950—Holloway, Mr., death of, 1683—Horton, Mr., Nonconformist, rejected at Oxford, 1606—Houslow, Dr. Edwards poisons himself at, 2-70.

IRELAND, Dr. Croke and Mr. O'Brien, 38; Mr. Davitt, &c., to find bail, 102; Dr. M. Posnett on systems of voting, 139; Dublin assassins, arrest of, 137; James Carey turns Queen's evidence, 245; implicates the Land League, 245; Walsh arrested at Havre, 277; Egan, Mr., flight of, 310; Myrre not to be given up by France, 310; Brady and Curley sentenced to death, 501; Kelly found guilty, 534-597; Fitzharris acquitted, 565; Patrick Delaney and Thomas Caffrey plead guilty, 565; sympathy in Dublin for, 629; Catholic Bishops on the distress, 375; circular to, from the Pope, 629-823; Croke, Archbishop, summoned to Rome, 629; complete submission of, 629; returns to Ireland, 662; Church Synod against the Affirmation Bill, 429; Emigration experiment, success of, 439; Mr. Tuke's letter to the Times upon, 1683—Invincibles, rumoured poisoning by, 727; letters from the Pope, 623; James Carey, departure of, 823; murdered at the Cape, 981; rejoicings in Ireland, 981; General Sankey to be Chairman of Irish Board of Works, 1334; Land Act Commissioners, charges against, 951; Freeman's Journal and the Spectator, 1399—Irving, Mr., banquet to, 855.

JESSEL, Sir George, death of, 373-407—Jevons, Professor S., memorial to, 1335—Jewish World on the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, 171.

KIRKE'S College Prizes given away by Lord Salisbury, 855.

LAMBERT, Rev. Brooke, and young servants, 1535—Lancet, the, and old age, 1207—Law Society, Incorporated, meet at Bath, 1335—Leeds, Liberal Conference at, 1333; Library, free, system, slow progress of, 1207—Liverpool, Liberal meeting at, 661—Lockwood, Mr., Q.C., and Lord Salisbury, 1534—London, Bishop of, and Mr. Mackonochie, 39; and the laymen, 503; reported resignation, 1235; City dinner to Lords Alice and Wolsley, 471; banquet to Ministers, 1014; University, diplomas given by Lord Granville, 699; and its candidates, 919—Corporation and the corn duties, 1334—Lord Mayor's day speeches at the dinner, 1465—Lord Mayor at the Turners' Company, 1497.

MACCARTHY, Mr. J. G., 931—MacColl, Rev. M., "The Clergy and the Law," 695—Macmillan's English Illustrated Magazine, 1339—Manchester, Bishop of, and Mr. Cowgill, 39-1349; congratulated upon, 71-138; action against Sir P. Heywood, 138—Mansion House, dinner to Ministers at, 1014—Martin, Sir Theodore, and Mrs. Hardcastle, 1683—Marwood, death of, 1143—Merivale, Mr. H., on biographers, 171—Metropolitan District Railway and the ventilators, 534; and the explosions upon, 1398; and the parks, 1468; Board of Works, its debts, 1270; and the letter from the Treasury, 1302—Miles Platting case, the, 138—Millionaires, British, 663—Moucheff, Rev. Sir H., death of, 1435—Montefiore, Sir M., enters his hundredth year, 1367—Municipal Elections, 1399—Murders, W. Gouldstone, his children at Walthamstow, 1047; James Cole, his son at Thornton Heath, 1079—Music, College of, opened, 569.

NATIONAL Liberal Club opened, 566—Newnham College, festivity at, 759.

O'DONNELL, threats of Irishmen about, 1645—O'Donovan, Mr., and the Spectator, 1467—Old Age, the Lancet upon, 1207—Oxford, learned young lawyers at, 139; No-popery tumult at Pembroke College, 343; Physiological Laboratory, money voted for, 727; feeling against, 759; Commemoration day at, 759-1435; Hebdomadal Council, 1435; Mr. Horton rejected by Convocation, 1606; Professor Sylvester, 1607.

"PALL MALL GAZETTE" on minorities, 439; and the Spectator and Mr. Bradlaugh, 569; sends circular to the Liberal Party, 1647—Palmer, Professor, the late, pension to his family, 38—Penny Bank swindle, 1047—Peterborough, Bishop of, and the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill, 821; illness of, 919; recovering, 1047—Police not to be armed, 1175—Pollock, Mr. F., and the Jurisprudence Professorship at Oxford, 171—Porter, Dr. knighted, 919—Price, Professor B., and the Tenants Compensation Bill, 663—Psychical Research Society, the, 1683.

QUAKERS, the statistics about, 103—Queen, the, orders lamb not to be eaten, 503.

RAILWAY Passenger duty repealed, 502; servants, meeting of, in Edinburgh, 1274—Recruiting the Times upon, 139—Ritchie, Dr. Q.C., death of, 1571—Ringer, Dr. A., 1467—Ripon's, Lord, Indian policy, meeting of, 893; against, 983—Rolls, Mastership of, the, 406—Rosemore's, Lord, commission suspended, 1535—Royal Academy dinner, 569.

ST. ANDREWS University, examination for women, 758—St. Pancras Vestry and the London poor, 1434; typhoid fever in, 1303—St. Paul's Cathedral, G. Campion breaks the crosses, &c., 407; Dean of, sermon on Christmas Day, 1683—Sabine, Sir Edward, death of, 823—Sandford, Sir F. R., on elementary teaching, 1469—Sankey, General, 1334—Servants, Association for Befriending, 759—Shaw, Rev. J. A., at Exeter Hall, 1233—Smith, H. J., death of, 203—Smokeless fireplace, a, 439—Social Science Congress, 1271-1308—Sophocles, Electra, acted at Gorton, 1535—Spectator, the, and the Freeman's Journal, 1399; and the Echo, 1469—Spottiswoode, Mr. W., death of, 823; buried in Westminster Abbey, 855; Stannard, Rev. W., &c., upon, 695—Stephen, Sir F., on Indian Magistrates, 279—Stephens, J., letter from, 714—Suez Canal (see Parliament), 918—Sunday Closing Movement, triumph of, 683—Sunderland, catastrophe at, 789-790—Sunsets, wonderful, in London, &c., 1683—Surrey, West, prospects of Liberal victory in, 1469.

TAIT Memorial Fund, the, 139—Teeth, degeneracy of, 1175—Trades Union Congress and the Closure, 1175—Truro, Bishop of, Rev. G. H. Wilkinson appointed, 71—Tupper, Mr. M. F., on the Tennyson Poems, 1647—Turtle Soup, discussion in Times upon, 1467.

VIVISECTION, meeting at Lord Mount Temple's house upon, 567.

WARDEN and Watters, trial of, 1534—Weather, dreary state of, in London, 1683—Webb, Capt., drowned at Niagara, 951-983—Westcott, Canon, to be Canon of Westminster, 1335—West Malling, poisoning case at, 39-103-919—Western Mail, the, and Government, 1143—Wilberforce's, Bishop, gossip, and Mrs. Oliphant, 3—Wolverhampton, Liberal meeting at, 661—Wood, Sir E., at Fishmongers' Hall, 1302—Woolwich, explosion at, 1237—Wordsworth Society, meeting of, 566.

Parliament.

ABERDEEN, Earl of, and the Affirmation Bill, 694; questions in the House of Commons upon, 694-695—Acland, Sir J. D., to be a Privy Councillor, 1079; and his allotment holders, 1807—Address, debate upon, 201-208; Mr. Gorst's amendment, 245-246—Affirmation Bill, petitions against, 407-439; not retrospective, 466; discussion upon, 501; and the Archbishop of Canterbury, 508; debate upon, 533; Mr. MacColl upon, 535; debate continued, 565; division, 565; Cardinal Newman and the, 630—African, South, policy attacked, 1015—Agricultural Holdings Bill introduced, 567; and the Farmers' Alliance, 630; second reading, 694; Mr. Gladstone upon, 759; Mr. Balfour's amendment, 918; struck out, 983; through committee, 950; second reading in Lords moved, 1014; Lord Wemyss's amendment defeated, 1014; passed, 1109—Agriculture, Minister of, created, 535—Alcester, Lord, in the City, 470; pension to, debate upon, 502—Anderson's, Mr., Bill against pigeon-shooting brought in, 810; defeated in Lords, 1078—Argyll, Duke of, and Mr. Chamberlain, 506.

BANKRUPTCY Bill, 576-689; read a third time, 1045; passed, 1078—Bass, Mr. M. T., resigns, 736—Beach, Sir M. H., at Bridgewater, 1584—Biggar, Mr., breach of promise case against, 310-343; at Fallow, 1538—Blake, Mr., and the Irish Fisheries, 79-1015—Bonaparte, Prince Lucien, his pension, 886—Bradlaugh, Mr. C., meeting about in Trafalgar Square, 201; acquitted as to the Freethinker, 503; and Mr. Newdigate, 535; at the Bar of the House of Commons, 567; division against, 598; Lord R. Churchill's motion against, 598; letters to the Speaker, Sergeant-at-Arms, &c., 587-861—Brand, Mr., on the County Franchise Bill, 74—Brand, Sir H., wishes to resign the Speakership, 1455—Boer Delegates and the Colonial Office, 1466—Bribery Bill, the amendment of, 247—Bright, Mr., at Glasgow, 375; at the Liberation Society, 567; at Birmingham Jubilee, 757-765; and the Breach of Privilege, 769; on the Channel Tunnel, 790; and the Indian Peasants, 856; at the College for the Blind, 919; at Birmingham, 1110; at Leeds, 1883; at Keighley, 1645—Budget, the, 437; Tory reply to, 470.

CAMEBON, Dr., and the cost of Telegrams, 406—Canterbury, Archbishop of, the new, 1; enthronisation of, 406; and the Affirmation Bill, 471; dinner to at Birmingham, 599—Carlingford, Lord, at Coventry, 279; to be President of the Council, 574; on the condition of Ireland, 835—Carnarvon, Lord, at Colechester, 139—Chamberlain, Mr. J., at Birmingham, 71; at Swansea, 137-171; on the County Government Bill, 138; at Birmingham, 139-488-758-1647; at the Mansion House, 311; at the Bright Jubilee, 758; questions in Lords and Commons on his speech, 791; at the Cobden Club, 864; at the Batterssea Radical Association, 1142; at the Trinity House dinner, 1467; at Bristol, 1533; at Wolverhampton, 1571—Channel Tunnel Committee, 468; Sir W. Watkin examined, 533—Chaplin, Mr., and the Cattle Importation Act, 896; and Mr. Parnell's Land Act Amendment Bill, 341—Childers, Mr., and the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, 247; his first Budget, 437; and the Suez Canal, 885; at Pontefract, 1570; at Knottingley, 1570—Churchill, Lord R., at Woodstock, 279; on the Tory Leadership, 437; letter to the Times, 469; on the Affirmation Bill, 565; on Mr. Bradlaugh, 598; on the Civil Service, 726; at Chatham, 726; on Mr. Errington's mission, 736; and Suleiman Sami, 757; and the Khedive, 854; letter to Mr. Brodie, of Edinburgh, 1399; at Edinburgh, 1646—Clarke, Mr., at Plymouth, 3—Colonial agents received by Lord Derby, 69—Contagious Diseases Act, Mr. Stansfeld's motion, 434—Corrupt Practices Bill read a second time, 725; progress of, 853-885; the clauses about vehicles, 885; through committee, 919—County Franchise Bill, the, 1433—Courtney, Mr., at Liskeard, 170-1398—Courts, Contempt of, Bill introduced, 311—Cowan, Mr. J., at Newcastle, 39-1681—Cranbrook, Lord, at Maidstone, 208; at Birmingham, 1269—Criminal appeal, Committee on Law upon, 534—Criminal Code Bill, 727; abandoned, 760—Crofters, the Highland, 375—Cross, Mr. J. K., to be Under-Secretary for India, 69—Cross, Sir R., at Southampton, 71; at Henley-on-Thames, 860-951; at Penrith, 1233; at Aberdeen, 1464.

DAVUBE, Conference upon, Treaty signed, 342—Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill, second reading, 787; through committee, 790; Bishop of Peterborough upon, 821; thrown out, 821—Derby, Lord, receives the Colonial Agents, 69; upon New Guinea, 833; at Liverpool Agricultural Show, 1144; and Mr. Murray Smith, 1468—Derby day, motion for adjournment, 663—Dilke, Sir C., in Chelsea, 2; on Egypt, 1013; in Glasgow, 1898; at Eleusis Club, Chelsea, 1534; at Birmingham, 1647; about to enforce the Sanitary Act in London, 1662—Dodson, Mr., at Scarborough, 405—Dufferin, Lord, deputation of Armenians to, 758; at Grocers' Hall, 918—Dynamite Plot, and the Government, 469.

EGYPTIAN war, cost of, 309; the Indian contribution to, 983; our occupation, 1013—Eldon, Lord, to be Earl of Wemyss, 3—Errington, Mr., and the Poems, 698; Mr. Cowen's attack upon, 694; Lord E. Fitzmaurice upon, 694—Explosives Bill passed, 469.

FAWCETT, Mr., at Hackney, 1435; at Reading, 1466—Fitzmaurice, Lord E., to be Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, 3—Forster, Mr., at Leeds Liberal Club, 102; on Reform in Ireland, 102; attack on Mr. Parnell, 245; and Aborigines Protection Society, 663; at Stonehouse, Devon, 1046; at Devonport, 1046; at Bradford, 1467; at Cannon Street Hotel, 1467; at Bradford, 1606—Fortescue, Lord, and the Clergyman's Glebe, 1046—Fowler, Mr. H., at Wolverhampton, 661; review of the Session, 1534—Fowler, Lord Mayor, at the Turners' Company, 1498.

GIBSON, Mr., in Dublin, 170; at Birmingham, 405-406; at Cambridge, 629; at Glasgow, 1369—Gladstone, Mr., illness of, 37; letter to Professor Girdlestone on Dante, 37; returns from Cannes, 277; and Mr. Parnell's Land Act Amendment Bill, 341-342; on the Affirmation Bill, 533; at the National Liberal Club, 596; and the Midlothian Liberal Association, 789; on the French in Madagascar, 885; withdraws the Suez Canal Scheme, 949; speech upon, 949-962; at the Mansion House, 1014; reply to Mr. Healy, 1077-1078; reply to Sir S. Northcote, 1078; the Western Mail, upon, 1110; voyage on 'Pembroke Castle,' 1205; at the Lord Mayor's dinner, 1465; Echo, the, and his Ecclesiastical appointments, 1467-1499; his statue unveiled at the City Liberal Club, 1806; threats against, by the Irish, 1845; presentation of Derby China, to, 1881—Gladstone, Mr. H., in Peebles, 2; at Leeds, 102-202—Gorst's, Mr., amendment to the Address, 245—Goschen, Mr., at Ripon, 102; at the Bankers' Institute, 502; in Edinburgh, 1398; declines the Speakership, 1570—Granville, Earl, circular to Foreign Powers, 1; on the Address, 391; at Birmingham, 754; at the London Liberal Union dinner, 1806; at the City Liberal Club dinner, 1806.

HAMILTON, Lord G., on the Government expenditure, 311; at Willis's Rooms, 726; at Kilburn, 1435—Harcourt, Sir W., and Cremation, 3; on the Dynamite discoveries, 437; reply to Mr. Parnell, 502—Hartington, Lord, at Bacup, 101; at Darwen, 101; and the Irish Nation, 169; on the Address, 201-202; at the Mansion House, 1014; at Sheffield, 1141; on Egypt, 1141; at Manchester, 1533; at Accrington, 1589—Healy, Mr., to find bail, 102; sent to prison, 169; speech on County Government in Ireland, 170; attacks the Irish Government, 1045; outrageous insolence of, 1077-1078-1143—Herschell, Sir F., at Egham, 246—Heron, Commander, court-martial upon, 1079.

INCOME Tax collection, 598—Ireland divided into six districts, 2; Catholic Bishops on the distress, &c., 375; Returns about crime, 791-1047—Irish Elective Councils Bill defeated, 470; Mr. Parnell's speech upon, 470; Fisheries, improvement of, 791; Land Act and the Marquis of Waterford, 933; Registration Bill thrown out, 1078.

JAMES, Sir H., at Bridgwater, 37; on the County Franchise, 33; Bill for Criminal Appeal, 437-438; on the Affirmation Bill, 533; and the Criminal Code Bill, 822; at Dumfries, 1398.

KILMAINHAM Treaty, the, 309.

LABOUCHERE, Mr., on the Affirmation Bill, 565; on the Derby day, 682—Lansdowne, Lord, motion on Peasant-proprietorship in Ireland, 310; to be Governor of Canada, 683—Lawson, Sir W., and Local Option, 567; in West Cumberland, 1454—Leatham, Mr., at Huddersfield, 1386—Leeds, Liberal Conference at, 1333—Lefevre, Mr. S., at Reading, 1466; and the new Metropolitan Railway, 1498; at the Gladstone Club, 1535—Liberal Members, meeting of, 693;—Lincoln, Bishop of, proposed resignation, 887—Lowther, Mr. J., at Richmond, Yorks., 139; on the Gorst amendment, 245; at Coventry, 1385; at the Bristol Colston dinner, 1496—Lubbock, Sir J., on Government expenditure, 311; at Bristol University College, 1435; at Accrington, 1589—Lymington, Lord, on the preservation of open spaces, 1047—Lytton, Lord, at Willis's Rooms, 726.

MACCOAN, Mr., and Mr. O'Kelly, 604—Madagascar, proceedings in, 885—Manners, Lord J., and Lord Beaconsfield's statue, 501—Marlborough, Duke of, death of, 854—Mason's, Mr. Hugh, motion on Female Franchise, 886—Medical Amendment Bill lost, 1111—Metropolitan Railway shafts, Mr. Marriott's motion carried, 534—Morley, Mr. J., at the National Liberal Club, 567; at Liverpool, 661; on Egypt, 1013; at Newcastle, 1605—Mundella, Mr., at Birmingham, 71; at Sir H. Verney's political jubilee, 139; on the Cattle Importation Act, 886; at the Crystal Palace, 919; moves the new Education Estimates, 950—Museums, motion to open defeated, 599.

NATIONAL Debt Bill, opposition to, 693; progress of, 950-961; read a second time, 1014; speeches upon, 1014; passes through committee, 1045—New Guinea, the annexation of, 853—Northcote, Sir S., motion on the Kilmainham Treaty, 246-278-309; and the Beaconsfield statue, 406-501; and the Conservative Central Committee, 502; on the Affirmation Bill, 565; at Knightsbridge, 597; on Mr. Bright, 789; motion on the Suez Canal, 949; defeated, 983; on Egypt, 1013; review of the Session, 1078; at Belfast, 1289-1271; in Ulster, 1301; at Carnarvon, 1365; at Bangor, 1385; at Birmingham, 1499.

O'BRIEN, Mr., on the Crimes Prevention Act, 245—O'Connor, Mr. J. P., and the Land League, 246; retreat from Tyrone, 1270—O'Shaughnessy, Mr., on compulsory education in Ireland, 310—Overstone, Lord, death of, 1499.

PARLIAMENT, meeting of, 201; prorogued, 1109—Parliamentary Oaths Act brought in, opposition to, 246—Parnell, Mr., reply to Mr. Forster, 577; amendment to the Address, 278; his Land Act amendment, 341; on the Irish Elective Councils Bill, 470; on the Irish Administration, 1045; in Dublin on the Session, 1110; the Parnell Fund, 1207; banquet to, in Dublin, 1605—Peel, Sir R., at Warrington, 170—Permissive Bill, the, 1207—Peterborough, Bishop of, illness of, 887-919-1047—Pigeon-shooting Bill, second reading carried, 310—Playfair, Mr. Lyon, and the Chairmanship of Committees, 38—Plunket, Mr. D., at Chelsea, 662; at Retford, 887; at Shrewsbury, 1647—Power's, Mr. O'Connor, scheme of Migration, 471—Queen's Speech, the, 202-1109.

RAIKES, Mr., at Bury St Edmund's, 208; and Mr. Gladstone, 247; at Bangor, 1386—Reay, Lord, to be Commissioner to the Transvaal, 789; abandoned, 823—Ridley, Sir M. W., to be brought forward as Speaker, 1645—Richmond, Duke of, at Aberdeen, 1434—Ripon's, Lord, Indian policy, meetings upon, 982-983—Rosebery, Lord, at Birmingham, 438; at the National Liberal Club, 567; resigns office, 726.

SALISBURY, Lord, at Birmingham, 405-406; and the Beaconsfield Club, 597; at Southwark, 694; on Mr. Chamberlain's speech, 791; at St. James's Hall, 822; at King's College, 855; at Reading, 1397; on Liberal legislation, 1498; and Mr. Lockwood, 1534; at Watford, 1570—Selborne, Lord, to be Earl, 3; his Contempt of Courts Bill, 311; at Reading, 1466—Shaftesbury, Lord, and his income, 1607—Shaw, Mr., French compensation to, 1385—Smith, Mr. W. H., in Westminster, 374-1015; at Henley-on-Thames, 950; on Ireland, 1499—Smith, Mr. S., at Liverpool, 661—Spain, reported commercial treaty with, 1571—Spencer, Lord, precautions taken about, 169; resigns the Presidency of the Council, 342; at Lime-riock, 822—Stanhope, Mr., at King's Lynn, 662—Stan- hope, Lord, and his Wages Bill, 310—Stanley, Colonel, defends the Government, 823—Sullivan, Mr. A. M., letter on the Dynamite explosions, 373—Suez Canal, arrangement about explained, 885; deputations upon to Mr. Childers, 917; Lords Granville and Salisbury upon, 917-918; Chambers of Commerce upon, 918; Lord Dufferin upon, 918; scheme abandoned, 949; letter of M. de Lesseps upon, 949; Mr. Norwood's amendment accepted, 962.

TAYLOR, Mr. P., and the Vaccination Laws, 791—

Telegrams, motion to reduce carried, 406—Tory Members meet at the Carlton Club, 693—Transvaal, the Tories upon, 342; debate upon, 374—Trevelyan, Mr., at Hawick, 203; on the Irish Press, 203; his Tramways Bill, 1047; at Kelso, 1571; at Gala-shiels, 1571.

VACCINATION, compulsory debate upon, 791—Vivi-section, total abolition of moved, 439.

WATERFORD, Lord, on the Land Act, 983; in Ulster, 1901—Wolf, Sir H., nominated on the Committee of Selection, 278; at B rkenhead, 1647—Wolsley, Lord, in the City, 470; annuity to, debate upon, 302.

Parliament—Elections.

CHESHIRE, Mid. Hon. A. de T. Egerton (C.), 341—DREBY, Alderman Ros proposed, 726—DUBLIN, Colonel King-Harman (C.), 278—HADDINGTONSHIRE, Lord Elcho and Mr. Finlay for, Lord Elcho (C.), 169—IPSWICH, Mr. H. W. West (L.), 1605—LIMERICK, Mr. McMahon (C.), 1493—MALLOW, Ireland, Mr. W. O'Brien (H.-R.), 103—MANCHESTER, Liberals decline contest, 1904; Dr. Pankhurst's candidature, 1237; his pledges, 1237; Mr. Holdsworth (C.), 1270—MOWAGHAN, Mr. Healy (H.-R.), 853—NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, Mr. John Morley (L.), 202-273—PETERBOROUGH, Mr. S. Buxton and Major Ferguson, candidates, 791—PORT-ARLINGTON, Mr. McMahon (C.), 278—RUTLANDSHIRE, Mr. Davenport Handley (L.) and Mr. J. W. Lowther (C.), candidates, 1111; Mr. J. W. Lowther (C.), 1143—WEXFORD, Mr. W. H. K. Redmond (H.-R.), 919—YORK, Mr. Milner (C.), 1498.

Foreign Paragraphs.

AFRICA.—CONGO RIVER, reports upon the, 1239.

SIBERIA LEONE, shocking story from, 893.

AMERICA.—CARLISLE, Mr., chosen Speaker, 1570

Congress and bounties to the shipbuilding trade, 102.

DEMOCRATIC party and the Presidency, 1434.

FOLGER, Mr., and the reduction of the tariff, 1570

Floods, great, 203—Free-trade, democratic majority for in Congress, 1570—Gold withdrawn from England, 309.—INSANITY, statistics about, 1047

Irish League, meeting at Philadelphia, 434; resolutions passed at, 566; Dynamite party, opinions against in, 567—Pauper emigrants, 822.—LOWELL, Mr., and the Irish Crimes Act, 342.—MILWAUKEE, Hotel destroyed by fire at, 39.—PANAMA Canal, reports of the Directors, 1239—Peru and Chili and the United States, 279; Protect onists and the "Debt," 70

RAILWAYS, enormous grants of land to, 103.—WEBB,

Captain, drowned at Niagara, 851-933.

AUSTRALIA.—ANNEXATION Conference to be held, 1206.—CONVENTION of all the Colonies to be held at Melbourne, 1399.—FEDERATION meeting held at Sydney, 1570.—HEATON, Mr. J. H., on the resources of, 1682.—NEW GUINEA, annexation of,

1175.—PAPUA to be annexed, 501.—IRISH Informers, not to land at Melbourne, 1270.—SMITH,

Mr. Murray, and Lord Derby, 1498.

AUSTRIA.—ANARCHISTS, trial of, 311.—BALKAN

Peninsula and Austria, 631.—CALCUTTA, Court, meets

Prince Bismarck, 1143—Croatia, riots in, 1110; spread of, 1142-1174.—HUNGARY, floods in, 39—Outbreaks of the peasantry, 1174.—Jews charged with murdering a Christian girl, 791-822; and Christians intermarriage

Bill thrown out, 1606.—KALLAT, Herr von, on the condition of Bosnia, 1438.—PESTE, six ladies attempt suicide, 727.—RAILWAYS, the Galician and Baron

Schwartz, scandal, 171.—TIAZZA, Herr, addresses his constituents, 1206; speech to the Hungarian

Chamber, 1270—Treaty with Italy and Germany reported, 405.

BULGARIA.—New Constitution for, 1142

PRINCE of, acting with Austria, 1174; restores the Constitution of Timova, 1205.—RUSSIAN officers dismissed, 1399.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—BASUTOS fighting each other, 630.—CAREY, J., murdered at, 981—Cetewayo arrives at Ulundi, 108; defeat of, 631; death of, 950; reported still alive, 1015-1047; battle with, expected,

1143; reported ultimatum to, 1277; again a prisoner,

1335—Colenso, Dr., death of, 789.—FREEZE, Sir B., and Lord Grey, letters to the Times, 407.—ZULULAND, troubles in, 3-1335.

CHILI and PERU.—WAR between ended, 1393.

CHINA.—CANTON, riot at, 1173; alarming telegrams from, 1270—Shanghai, conflicting authorities at,

175; "Equality" at, 1303.—FRENCH Minister recalled, 469.—POWER in China, in whom does it reside? 1433.—WAR Party, reported triumph of, at Pekin, 1338.

COLOMBO.—SUN, the, a green colour, seen at, 1303.

EGYPT.—ARMY, satisfactory account of, 1366.

BAKER, General, starts for Suakin, 1646—Baring,

Major E., to be Consul-General, 661; interviewed by Standard correspondent, 1238; and the European colony, 1303.—CHOLERA in, in case of, 854-886;

spread of, 950; decline of, 982-1048; Dr. J. M. Lownds upon, 1047; not Asiatic cholera, 1079—Colvin, Sir A.,

to be Finance Adviser, 70; condition of very bad, 1174-1605—Control, the dual at an end, 37-70; baseness of

French proposition, 37.—DUFFERIN, Lord, not to return to Egypt, 471.—FORREST, Mr. D., on the "Short-sight" of Egyptians, 246.—INDENMITT, to be paid, 246—Isma'il, ex-Khedive, 821.—JAMES, Mr.

F. L., on the Arab tribes, 1646.—Full Mall Gazette and the occupation, 1681—Palmer, Professor, pension to his family, 38—Peasantry, indebtedness of, 277—

Prisons, crowded state of, 1175-1302.—SUDAN, victory of Colonel Hicks, 566; reported defeat of, 1399;

total destruction of, 1497-1533-1571; Mr. O'Donovan, death of, 1497; left to the Egyptian Government,

1571; another defeat, 1605—Khartoum, reported advance of the Mahdi upon, 1631—Suez Canal, a second one proposed, 599; ill feeling in France upon, 631;

proposition of the Canal company, 631—Suleman

Sami, execution of, 757—Sultan intriguing in, 726.

WAR, cost of, to England, 309—Wood, Sir E., on forming an Egyptian army, 1302.

FRANCE.—ALFONSO, King of Spain, hooted in Paris, 1269; his official opinion of it, 1269.—Bismarck, Prince, and the Pyrene, 727; and the French

Press, 1077-1112—Broglie, Duc de, on the tripartite treaty, 567.—CABINET, disputes in the, 439—Challemeil-Lacour, M., reply on the tripartite treaty, 567; resignation of, 1498—Chamber, extravagance of the,

1302—Chambord, Comte de, illness of, 663-853-886-1047;

death of, 1077; Comte de Paris not present, 1141—

Chanzy, General, death of, 38—China, recall of M.

Bourgeois, 469; war with imminent, 723-1141—French fleet ordered to Chinese waters, 1142—Communist anniversary in Paris, 37.—DEBT, the 5 per cents. to be changed to 4, 534—Doré, Gustave, death of, 103—

Ducro Ministry, fall of, 137.—EGYPT, the dual control at an end, 37; proposals upon, 37—England, rag-of the Paris Press against, 853—Estimates passed, 1682.—FERRY, M. Jules, forms a Ministry, 247-309; difficulties of, 1269; and M. Wilson, 1269; and the Extremists, 1333; his foreign policy, 1333—

Foreigners, numbers of in France, 1532.—GAMBETTA,

M., death of, 1; effects of, 1—Germany, war-ain given by, 727-1077-1142—Government, difficulties in forming one, 202.—JUDGES, proposition to make elective, 33.

LESSERFS, M. de, on English civilisation, 932—

Lyons, trial of the anarchists at, 70.—MADAGASCAR,

M. Duple upon, 138; resistance to French demands,

631; landing of French in, 603; serious incident in,

885; Admiral Pierre's conduct at Tamatave, 1045; and

Mr. Shaw, 1077; operations suspended, 1110; M.

Shaw released, 1110; ultimatum by Admiral Pierre, 1173; correspondence with Captain Johnston, 1173;

his letter to Sir J. P. Hennessy, 1174—Magistracy, new Bill up n, 983.—NAPOLÉON, Prince Jerome, manifesto of, 69; arrest of, 69; released, 202; and the

Empress Eugénie, 303.—ORLEANSIST Princes, &c.,

Government demands powers to exile all, 69-101; Expulsion Bill passed, 137; before the Senate, 137;

Committee of, report of, 169; M. Farber's scheme accepted, 202; rejected by the Senate, 247.—PARIS, riot in, 341; Comte de, and the Throne of France,

1141; retires to Eu, 1174; recognised as King, 1239—

Pope Leo XIII. writes to M. Grévy, 822.—RAILWAYS, the, and the State, 662—Revenue, deficit in the,

1302.—SAR, M. Léon, on Colonial expansion, 406—

Seditious displays, 599—Spain, King of, irritation against, 1237; hooted in Paris, 1269-1311—Suicides of children, 103; number of, 1111—Suez Canal, another to be made, 598-631; negotiations about, 917-918; basis of an agreement, 1465.—Times correspondent, the,

and religious emblems, 101—Tirard, M., and the conversion of the five per cents, 503; his Budgets, 1466

—Tonquin, strong measures to be taken in, 342-599-

631; Captain H. Rivière killed, 694; troops sent, 694; attitude of China, 694; war with imminent, 725-822;

breaks off negotiations, 1301; outrageous statement about, 759; debate upon, 886; death of the King of Anam, 1014; French intentions, 1046; severe check to,

1077; victory, 1110; negotiations, 1173-1205; still pending, 1238; civilian commissary sent out, 1305; reported ultimatum to Peking, 1270; Ministry refuse to issue a "Yellow Book" upon, 1365; issued, 1569; a credit to be asked, 1365; Chamber affirms a policy of conquest,

1397; defence of Government by M. Ferry, 1397; reads a telegram from M. Tricou, 1413; rumours of French successes, 1433; fears in Paris about, 1534;

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,845.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1883.

[REGISTERED FOR TRANSMISSION-ABROAD.] PRICE.....6d. BY POST, 6½d.

THE WEEK	1	Mrs. Oliphant and Bishop Wilberforce	13
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		Professor Roscoe on the Experimental Inoculation of Madness	14
M. Gambetta	4	Sir Noel Paton's Designs from Shelley and Shakespeare	14
County Franchise and Redistribution	5	POETRY—
The Great Indian Danger	6	Mind-stuff	14
Mr. Raikes on Opposition	7	ART—
The British Proposal for the Suez Canal	8	Rossetti at Burlington House	14
Mr. Chamberlain on Local Taxation	8	BOOKS—
Moneyed Wives	9	Living English Poets	15
M. Renan on the Amusingness of the Age	10	The Friendships of Mary Russell Mitford	17
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		Mr. Burney's "Cecilia"	18
The Bishop of Manchester and Miles Plating	11	Two Works on Kant	19
Sir John Lubbock and the Finance of 1881-2	12	The Magazines	20
The International Tribunals in Egypt	13	CURRENT LITERATURE	22
Harington Antiquities	13	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	25
The Wit and Wisdom of Lord Lytton	13	ADVERTISEMENTS	25-36

* * * The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

M. GAMBETTA expired on Sunday, the last day of the old year, a few minutes before midnight. He was aware that there was no hope, and before death unconsciousness had supervened. Ten doctors made a careful autopsy of the body, and report unanimously that the wound from the pistol-bullet had healed completely, and that old suppurations of the bowels existed, ending in an abscess in the caecum, the matter from which produced pericolicitis and death. All the other organs were healthy. M. Gambetta had, in fact, during the later years of his life, led far too indolent a life for his constitution, and had overfed himself with food too rich for him, and against which he was warned by his physicians. He was only forty-four years of age, and unmarried, and he died without a will, though he left a small fortune of £28,000, saved out of the revenue of the République Française, in which he was a large shareholder, and which, more especially in its evening edition, enjoys a great circulation. He had of late lived much in retirement among his friends in a small house in Ville d'Avray, where his amusement was to talk politics to his intimates over a good dinner.

We have said enough of M. Gambetta's character elsewhere, and have here only to consider the effect of his disappearance. In France, this has not as yet been so great as was expected, though the Government has ordered a State funeral, and though addresses are pouring in from all the provinces; but it will be considerable. M. Gambetta, as leader of the Opportunists, controlled 180 votes in the Chamber, and could, therefore, upset any Government; while his vague but immense ascendancy with the peasantry made it difficult to carry out any policy to which he did not assent. His death, therefore, will tend to make the first substantial Ministry which obtains power more stable, and less disposed to avoid all serious measures. Moreover, M. Gambetta was the main resisting force against the "policy of the fireside," which M. Grévy and the peasantry approve, and which will, therefore, for a time be steadily carried out. The death, too, will increase the fears of the Moderates, as M. Gambetta was considered a bulwark against anarchists, and will induce them to adhere more closely to any Republican Government which maintains strict order. On the other hand, it will to some extent decrease Republican influence in the Army, and thus render a coup d'état a shade, though, we believe, only a shade, more probable.

The effect of the event in foreign countries cannot as yet be fully seen, because the papers are fettered by useful conventional rules, but we believe the following will be found to be near the truth. In England, there is distinct regret for a great misfortune to France, modified by a hope that the Egyptian problem will now be more easily solved. In Germany, there is a strong sense of relief, tempered among the statesmen, and especially in the mind of Prince Bismarck, by a belief that a revival of Monarchy is more probable in France, and that Monarchy makes armies more formidable. In Austria, the Court misses a possible ally, but popular feeling is confined to the Magyars, who regarded Gambetta as a patriot, and as the enemy of German ascendancy. In Italy, there is a decided sorrow, cooled among the governing class by an impression that Gambetta expected and wished to see Republics accepted in the three Latin countries. In Greece, there is bitter and universal sadness, for Gambetta was, next to Mr. Gladstone, the most sincere of Philhellenes; and in Turkey, for the same reason, there is exultation. And finally, in Russia, opinion is undecided, there being traces of a desire to express less regret than is felt, and to assume, with a sort of bounce, that, Gambetta or no Gambetta, France must always be friendly to St. Petersburg.

The Times assures the world that Lord Granville has addressed a Circular to the Powers recapitulating what has been done in Egypt, but not asking permission to do anything, and not expressing any distinct view of the future. The Foreign Secretary ends, however, with the definite proposal that the Suez Canal shall be declared to be, in International Law, an arm of the sea, open at all times to all vessels, though as free from fighting within its limits, and to a certain distance beyond them, as it would be if it were within the municipal jurisdiction of a neutral Power. Under the circumstances, the proposal is most disinterested; but it will be acceptable to the Powers, and, as we have argued elsewhere, it does not weaken any security of Great Britain. If we are at war, we have an unbroken, open waterway from Southampton to Bombay, and can fight in any part of it, except the Canal. That is all we need, while the final separation of the question of the Canal from the question of Egypt will greatly simplify the latter. There will be much less jealousy of an influence which cannot shut the Canal.

The new Archbishop (Designate) of Canterbury has taken farewell of his Truro diocese, in a letter which is, to our minds, rather wanting in simplicity:—"I believe you think it was right," he says, "to accept this call to the Primacy. I could never have thought so but for the prayers offered far and wide ere it came, and strange concurrences of circumstances which preceded and attended it. I consulted the chief layman of the county. His judgment was that, while it would have been wrong to exchange this for any other see, however distinguished, I had no right to decline a leadership full of labour and anxiety, and not wholly detaching me from the hope of working with and for you still. His judgment concurred with what I seemed to see right." Is not that a rather elaborate way of saying that a call which came in answer to prayer, which seemed strangely Providential in its concurrence of circumstances, and which was sanctioned by the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, was probably divine? No doubt, it is not fair to scrutinise too minutely the language used on such occasions as these; but we do wish that Bishops would not so often seem to regard their disinclination to decide simply on their own best judgment and highest instinct without external advice, as intrinsically pious. Why should not Dr. Benson have said at once that there is in the See of Canterbury plenty of room for the exercise of an honourable ambition of the highest and most spiritual kind, and that as he believed himself to be well fitted, by the help of God, to serve the Church in that high post, he should have been guilty of a false humility in refusing it? Stout Cornish Tories like Dr. Benson doubtless entertain a great respect for the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, but the Church at large will scarcely like to regard that worthy person as the highest interpreter of the will of God to an English Bishop.

The Council of the Church Association have openly condemned the Bishop of London for his share in the arrangement which has transferred Mr. Mackonochie to St. Peter's, London Docks, and Mr. Suckling to St. Alban's, Holborn, and by implication, of course, they condemn the late Archbishop of Canterbury for having on his death-bed initiated that arrangement. We cannot say that, from its point of view, the Church Association is wrong. That the whole transaction was one intended temporarily to evade the provisions of the ecclesiastical law as it has been laid down of late years, no candid man will deny. All that we say is, that when the injustice of that law is forced so strongly on the mind of so manly and simple a Broad Churchman as Archbishop Tait that all his dying thoughts were concentrated on the best way of escaping its provisions till there should be more chance of rectifying them, there must be a very strong prima facie case for the real existence of that injustice. We find no fault with the Church Association for persisting in its old view, in spite of Archbishop Tait's virtual recantation of all sympathy with it; but we do wish that those who applaud Bishop Fraser for what he has lately done would openly condemn the late Archbishop and the Bishop of London for yielding to the conviction that the Ritualists have been hardly dealt with, and ought to be protected, even by virtue of an evasion of the law, till some opportunity can be found for changing the law.

Sir Charles Dilke has been making a series of speeches in Chelsea, in which it seems to have been his object to sustain the part of President of the Local Government Board with something of that superfluity of thoroughness displayed by the actor who, when acting Othello, thought it well to black himself under his clothes, as well as over hands and face. Not a word of moment on Foreign Affairs dropped from those prudent lips, beyond a graceful tribute to the constant courtesy of the late M. Gambetta, as President of the French body with which Sir Charles Dilke, in negotiating on the question of a commercial treaty with France, had to communicate. If the subject of local government did not really dominate Sir Charles Dilke's imagination in all his speeches, he must be a consummate political artist, for he almost exhaled it. Yesterday week he told the excellent story about an Indian governor who received a telegram, "Tiger jumping about on the platform, please telegraph instructions;" and Sir Charles, of course, improved the occasion by descanting on the dangers of a centralisation which renders people helpless to grapple with their local tigers without instructions from head-quarters. His object, he said, would be to deprive the Local Government Board of a good deal of the work which is now expected of it, and to this end he hoped that the County Government Bill and the Government of London Bill would materially contribute. On the whole, Sir Charles Dilke,—powerfully assisted in his canvas by Mr. Mundella, who has thrown more heartiness into the popular appeal than the new Minister himself,—has met with a most cordial reception throughout Chelsea, and the effort of an Irish voter to create an Irish diversion against him in the constituency, failed lugubriously.

Mr. Herbert Gladstone on Saturday made a speech at Peebles, in which he stated that the condition of Ireland was improving. There were but 65 agrarian offences in October, 1882, against 246 in October, 1881; 90,622 applications had been made under the Arrears Act; landlords were "accepting the situation," rents were being paid, and juries were beginning once more to convict. All this showed a great improvement, but, nevertheless, though there should be no more agrarian legislation on a large scale for the present, the administration of Ireland ought, by-and-bye, to be radically reformed. It was the most centralised Government in Europe, and one of the worst. Everybody looked to the Castle for everything, even for public works if there were a famine, and the Irish people obtained no political education. That is perfectly true, with this strange addition, that all the people who apply to the Castle, from the Magistrates to the mob, hate the Castle with all their hearts. Centralisation exists in many countries, in France, for instance, but usually the masses think the officials their best protectors. In Ireland, they run to the officials like children to their mothers, and then shoot them for the crime of being in office.

A good commencement has already been made towards this decentralisation. It is stated that Mr. Forster's division of Ireland into Five Districts, each under a "Special Resident Magistrate," who acts as a Royal Commissioner, and is within his division, for police purposes, "the Castle," is working excellently. The number of divisions has been increased to six, under the Hon. T. O. Plunkett, Mr. Clifford-Lloyd, Mr. H. Blake, Captain Slacke, Captain Butler, and Colonel the Hon. W. Forbes, and the police, being made responsible to them and watched over carefully, have been greatly increased in efficiency. The contradictory or impossible orders which used to issue from the Castle have ceased, and the Administration is organised so that none of its force is wasted. Every fortnight each Commissioner makes a full report to the Castle, and the Viceroy has thus before him a complete and continuous record of all that passes in Ireland, of the conduct of every officer, and of every new agitation. On any great occasion the "specials" are consulted, and become a kind of Executive Council for the maintenance of order. This is, of course, the French system and the Indian system, and so long as the Specials act strictly within the law, it is probably liable to only one objection. It takes picked men to work it fully. In Ireland, however, where the divisions are few, and where the Government is interested in filling such appointments well, it can hardly fail of its end, which is to make authority efficient within the limits of the law. The mere knowledge of persons thus obtained speedily becomes invaluable, and all policemen gain new heart from the certainty of being understood.

Hounslow has been the scene this week of a sort of mild insurrection. A practitioner there, Dr. Edwardes, purchased of the local medical officer, Dr. Whitmarsh, a share of his practice, for £1,800. Dr. Edwardes was not satisfied with the profits, and bad blood had arisen between the men, when a female patient in Hounslow accused Dr. Edwardes—a married man, previously of high character—of a criminal assault. Dr. Edwardes demanded and obtained a written retraction; but Dr. Whitmarsh, professing to believe the story, insisted that he should leave, and accept £500 in discharge of all demands. Dr. Edwardes, after instructing a solicitor to prosecute on a charge of conspiracy to extort, told his wife that Whitmarsh's conduct would ruin him, and took prussic acid. The actual facts are not yet conclusively ascertained, Dr. Whitmarsh not having been examined upon them; but the populace of Hounslow, who know all the parties, are convinced that the charge against Dr. Edwardes was groundless, have wrecked Dr. Whitmarsh's house as far as possible without entering it, and have threatened the woman. The village is held by strong bodies of police, and the excitement will subside, not, however, without leaving the impression that the conditions which in America produce Lynch Law exist here also. Whatever the merits of the case—and prima facie, Dr. Edwardes was certainly an oppressed man—the mob has no authority in the matter. The police seem to have acted prudently, but our laws should make a mob demonstration more dangerous to its leaders.

Count Wimpffen, Austrian Ambassador in Paris, shot himself in a by-street on the 30th ult. Kings never kill themselves—unless, indeed, Nicholas of Russia, as was rumoured at the time, died with his own consent—and Ambassadors so rarely, that the occurrence excited a European interest. The popular belief in Paris is that the Count had become in some way entangled in the Bontoux frauds, or repented having supported that speculator; but his friends give the most positive denial to these stories, asserting that all his financial affairs were in perfect order. His reason for irritation with life, as alleged by himself, was that he had selected a very bad house to live in, but that was obviously a symptom and not a cause of his state of mind. The diplomatic temperament is calm, but Ambassadors are worried, like other men, and, like other men, are subject to dementia, and it is quite reasonable to believe that the Count had suffered from some affection of the brain, and in an access of melancholia put an end to his life. Though popular in Society, the deceased Ambassador was not a man of much political mark, and his death will not make any change in the relations of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy to the Republic, which have always been tepidly friendly. The death of M. Gambetta may make a much greater difference, if it is true that in 1870 he offered Austria large terms for military aid.

The Standard has renewed its statements about negotiations with the Vatican, and even quoted despatches alleged to have passed between Cardinal Maccabe and Cardinal Jacobini. Cardinal Maccabe, however, denies their authenticity, while the Government categorically asserts that there neither has been nor is any foundation for the rumours. That is final, and we can only regret a decision which seems to us as foolish as it would be for the Indian Government to refuse to communicate with the Grand Lama, if that spiritual potentate influenced millions of Indian subjects, or with the Shereef of Mecca about the safety of Indian pilgrims. Statesmen must take the world's forces into account, and not say that because this or that force rests on an illusion, therefore they will not see it. The odd fact is that the sceptics, who ought to consider all creeds equally baseless and equally worthy of conciliation, are quite willing to negotiate with the Grand Lama or the Khalif, but cannot think with patience of sending official information to the Pope. Is it only because he is a Christian, or do they really think, like some English Evangelicals, that Popery is a catching disease, a mental scarlet-fever? If so, why is not Mahomedanism, that most propagandist of all faiths?

The rumours from Zululand are hardly intelligible. It is stated, more especially in the Daily News, that though Cetewayo is about to be restored, he will receive only a third of his kingdom, that he is to obey in all things a British Resident, and that a large slice of his dominion, nearly half, is to be placed under a British Protectorate, and governed by John Dunn, and one or two chiefs friendly to him. This is not the arrangement to which the British people assented. Their idea was that Cetewayo, having learned by experience that he could not resist the British, was to be restored and left alone, a moderate territory being reserved for such chiefs as Cetewayo might be inclined to put to death. They were, however, to defend themselves, and British territory was to terminate at the Tugela. Any departure from that arrangement must be impolitic, as the restoration of Cetewayo was intended to limit, not to extend British responsibilities. Nothing ever goes right in South Africa, where the whole of the British genius for blundering seems to be concentrated; but we see some reason to hope that the plans of Sir Henry Bulwer have been misunderstood. Certainly, Lord Derby will not take any more African territory than he can help.

The Lord Chancellor has been raised from a Baron to an Earl, and is now to be styled Earl of Selborne,—a perfectly ideal title, if the United Kingdom can furnish an ideal title at all.

Lord Elcho, after a very long experience as a Commoner—he has sat for forty years in the House of Commons—has succeeded to the Peerage, through the death of his father, the Earl of Wemyss and March, in his eighty-seventh year. Haddingtonshire only returned Lord Elcho by the very narrow majority of 44 in 1880, and it is to be hoped that we may now rescue the seat from the grasp of the Tories. Mr. Finlay, the Liberal candidate, is said to be a little unsound on the burning question of the Established Church in Scotland,—that is, he is not eager for Disestablishment. But surely, even if Haddingtonshire has to be wrenched piecemeal from the grasp of the Tories, and if it takes two separate efforts to achieve it, it would be better to achieve something and transfer the seat to a Scotch Liberal who is hazy on the Church question, than to achieve nothing and leave a Scotch county in the hands of the Tories. Lord Salisbury will gain a new follower in the Earl of Wemyss and March.

Do all the Dukes get the Garter, as a matter of course? We observe that the vacant Garter has been conferred on the Duke of Grafton, of whom we only know that he saw service in the Crimea, and is Equerry to the Queen. If the Garter were always given for distinguished services, as it often has been, it would mean more than it actually does. If it had been given to the Marquis of Bath, for instance, who, though a Conservative in politics, has held a steadily Liberal course in relation to the political affairs of the East, affairs which he has evidently carefully studied, it would have tended to raise the value of a Garter; whereas to give it to a mere Duke,—we suppose, for being so good as to be a Duke,—tends decidedly to depreciate its value.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice has been appointed Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the place of Sir Charles Dilke; while Lord Enfield, who, since Lord Kimberley, the new Indian Secretary, is in the House of Lords, cannot any longer hold the office of Under-Secretary for India, consistently with the convenience of the Government, has simply resigned that post.

Lord Enfield is a great loss to the Government, whom he has served with much ability, and we hope some other office may before long be found for him. The office of Under-Secretary for India, which must be held by a Member of the House of Commons, has not yet been filled up, and we still hope that Mr. Bryce, one of the very ablest and most Liberal of the younger men who hold no place under Government, may be destined for the post.

Complaints of the unauthorised publication of Bishop Wilberforce's very flimsy and rather unscrupulous gossip multiply daily. In our own columns, Mrs. Oliphant gives reasons for not believing in the accuracy of a report of a supposed conversation between the Bishop and the late Mrs. Carlyle; while in the Times of Tuesday, Lord Amphilh expresses his annoyance that the Roman gossip of 1870, which he had reported to the Bishop, should be published as his, without any mention of the very different opinion of the matters referred to which was entertained by himself. But the fact is that Dr. Wilberforce would, we are sure, have been horrified at the notion that the many idle words in his diary should see the light, before even the time had come when those whom they were likely to wound had passed away. If the Bishop were to be judged not only for every idle word he had spoken, but for every idle word which he had put down in his diary, his spiritual fate would be terrible indeed,—especially if his own creed were true, that no purgatory can be admitted into the future state.

Sir W. Harcourt is blamed for saying that cremation ought not to be sanctioned, except under the authority of an Act of Parliament. But it is a matter of some moment, in a time when poisoning is so frequent, that the means of investigating the cause of death should not be hastily disposed of, without a full consideration of the dangers involved. We have had not a few cases lately in which poisoning has not even been suspected till some weeks had elapsed after the burial of the poisoned person, and where every trace of adequate evidence would have been removed by the cremation of the victims' bodies. Whether cremation at present be illegal or not, we are quite satisfied that, if it is to be permitted at all, there should be some barrier in the shape of requiring special investigation of the cause of death, interposed in the way of those who might like to adopt this method of destroying the most damning evidence against them.

We see with pleasure that the Education Department have censured the managers of a school at Worleston, in Cheshire, for making a short Church service part of the religious instruction given to the children of an elementary school. The Department intimate that unless this rule be rescinded, and Nonconformist children readmitted to the school without being required to attend this Church service, all annual grants will be withdrawn from the school in question. The Rector of Worleston, who is said by one of the Nonconformists to teach that all who attend the Wesleyan chapel will "go to hell," must be one of the most ill-judged proselytisers in the United Kingdom. If he has made any such assertion, he is certainly an heretical, and not an orthodox Anglican, in his belief. But even if that assertion be fabulous, is it possible to imagine sillier proselytising tactics than an attempt to override the conscience-clause, and drive Wesleyans to Church against their will? If this class of clergymen were not as rare as they are mischievous, the Church Establishment would hardly survive another Parliament.

Mr. Clarke, M.P., speaking at Plymouth on Wednesday evening, made the regular conventional Conservative speech of the present time, assailing the Government for everything they had done, except the Bill for permitting the issue of Reply Post-cards, and threatening that the Conservatives, directly they are in power, will rescind the Standing Order permitting a majority to vote the Closure of debate. The last threat is the only one of interest in Mr. Clarke's speech. Probably it will not be taken up by the Tory leaders, but even if it became a popular cry with the Tory rank and file that the Standing Order for stopping irrelevant chatter should be rescinded, the party would only, we are persuaded, lose ground thereby with the constituencies. The party that favours chatter for the sake of chatter, will find it difficult to regain the confidence of the electorate.

Bank Rate, 5 per cent.

Consols were on Friday 101½ to 101¼ ex. div.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

M. GAMBETTA.

THAT strange continuance in the destiny of individuals which is so often noticeable in history marked the career of Gambetta to the end. His death was but the last of a series of incompletenesses. In his public ambition, in his private ambition, in his ambition for the future, he failed; and yet he went nearer to his object than any man of less force could have done, and he left on those around him no impression of failure. Almost a private citizen, for it is only by straining words that we can assign to him at Bordeaux any legal position, he strove to expel the Germans, raised armies from the ground, discovered Generals, Ministers, and diplomatists, fought great battles, raised great loans, and fixed himself in the hearts of Frenchmen as the one man who never despaired of the Republic. No man could be more successful, in a sense; but he did not expel the Germans, or deliver France, or even win a campaign. The son of a grocer of Cahors, only half-educated, and without political training, he raised himself before he was forty so high, that all Frenchmen regarded him as the natural President, and the world invented absurd reasons to explain the fact of his being less than first; while he himself, it is now well known, regarded the Presidency as the only goal worth reaching. No ambition could be more successful, in a way, but he never was President of the Republic. A Premier who had fallen, he yet so dominated the mind of France that he was able to set to himself as an object revenge on Germany; so impressed all Germans, that they regard his death as a relief from an apprehension; yet he had done nothing when he died towards the revanche, had won no battle, secured no alliance, prepared no insurrection, had, indeed, as there is reason to fear, from the Tunis Expedition, organised no army strong enough to be his instrument in such an undertaking. The greatest of Republicans, he did not found the Republic, and though he may be said to have saved it in the great contest with MacMahon, the Constitution he saved was not the one he would himself have framed. His was no spoiled career, in the ordinary sense of the words; but it was a career which, great as it was, and full as it was, and, on some sides, noble as it was, was marked throughout by a note of incompleteness, of failure such as comes to a man in whom the something is wanting which conciliates Destiny. Many men have said many things of Léon Gambetta, who has been described as a genius and a lunatic, a statesman and a wordmonger, a patriot and a self-seeker, but no man in the wildest hostility or the basest adulation ever said of him that he was fortunate. He was always the Dictator who was deserted, the great statesman who could not pass his Bills, the financial genius who paid too much, the "reserve force for France" whose destined hour was never to arrive. Since Columbus, no man has had such a fate; and Columbus, though his manhood was a struggle and his old age a defeat, though he died without knowing what he had found, and though posterity refused him even the glory of affixing his name to his discovery, still, though all ignorant of the fact, succeeded, and revealed to mankind a new world. Gambetta, unless his death produce some consequence as yet hidden from our eyes, had not even one unconscious complete success.

The incompleteness in his destiny showed also in his character. That he was the greatest of political Frenchmen, we maintained ten years ago, when M. Thiers was calling him the "fou furieux," and all Europe was condemning him, and observers even in France believed that his career was ended; and often as it has been our lot to oppose his policy, we have seen no reason to recall that verdict. But he was the greatest of Frenchmen by reason of his powers, through his imagination, his oratory, his gift for command, his amazing insight into the ideas, the aspirations, even the fears, of vast multitudes of men, through his courage, his finesse, his immeasurable "go," rather than through and in himself. There was in him, with all his greatness—for he was great, great in his force, in his patience, in his superb contempt for power to be won by coups d'état—some want, some failure, which diminished, if not the area of his ascendancy, at least its depth. His death is not a cataclysm. He was here and there incomplete. Gambetta had not quite that daimonic brain, so nearly superhuman on every side but the moral one, which enabled the First Napoleon in all departments of life to succeed apparently alone; he needed aid, and yet he did not choose men well. They were effective under him, but they were nobodies alone. Chanzy is not a first-class soldier, De Freycinet not a great administrator, General Faure not an organiser of strong armies, Paul Bert not a man who could defeat the spiritual forces of the Church. He chose the half-efficient—for Faidherbe was too old—and he tolerated, under some illusion we do not pretend to understand, the positively bad. He stole nothing, but he bore with plunderers. His entourage when in power was hardly better than that of Napoleon III. The greatest of orators, the most persuasive of demagogues, a man occasionally of magical insight into the minds of huge classes, he could bind all Frenchmen to follow him, except the Deputies of France and the Ultras, who had first raised him to power. He had the art of conciliating soldiers and extorting their confidence and admiration in a degree scarcely ever given to a civilian, though the late Lord Lawrence is another instance; but he never quite bound them to the system to which he was devoted, never secured to his military lieutenants the adhesion granted so readily to himself. His power of insight, great as it was, did not proceed either from sympathy or reflectiveness. He understood part of the French nature, without quite understanding the whole. The refusal to continue the German war surprised him, the dislike of the peasants to adventure perplexed him, the regard felt for M. Grévy—an incarnation of a perpetually recurring French type—was to him permanently unintelligible. It was characteristic of him that, himself preferring a rather bourgeois type of life, a life of lax and irregular comfort, he did not see the Frenchman's respect for asceticism, and at the Palais Bourbon wearied himself with the tawdry grandeur and vulgar luxury of the Second Empire; and perhaps even more characteristic that, though thirsty for information and justly confident in his diplomatic powers, he was proud to know no language except his own. There was something of smallness in that great nature which will not be thoroughly explicable until the secret memoirs of our time see the light, but which we imagine to have proceeded from a certain grossness inherent in the French bourgeois, and a limitation of the sympathies in a sympathetic man, such as keen observers often attribute to all men of Jewish descent. He simply could not be as just, and therefore as wise, towards Bonapartists as towards Legitimists, towards Germans as towards Englishmen, towards Clericals as towards any other fanatics with whom he disagreed. There was something, too, in him of the Southern or even Oriental temperament, to which all periods of relaxation are injurious, in which rest, that so strengthens the Northerner, brings out some flaccidity of mental and bodily tissue. Gambetta's brain, like his body, degenerated in ease. It was only when he was in full motion, when there was a superior enemy, like the Germans, to defy, when there was a reactionary soldier-President, like Marshal MacMahon, to counteract in his own army, when there was a raging populace like that of Belleville a year ago, to subjugate into reluctant confidence, that Gambetta rose to true grandeur, and displayed the smelting fire that glowed in his unwieldy, gross, yet Titanic nature. At ease, and free from any need for effort, the bourgeois streak in him came out, as it did not in Thiers.

He is a great man gone, for all that, and a severe loss to the Republic. That it will perish at his death, or even tremble, we do not believe, for we believe that it rests upon a rock,—the conviction of the peasantry and artisans of France, of six millions out of seven millions of male adults, that only under the Republic are they sure of their own way. But, in a country like France, every leader who can lead is a great force, if only for the weight behind him, and Gambetta was by constitution of mind contemptuous of visionary dreams. He could insist, and insist successfully, that whatever the speed, the horses must be kept in the harness, or there would be a catastrophe. That was much, and there was this more. If the overturn ever comes in France, it will come either through the action of the Army or its refusal to act against insurgents; and while Gambetta lived, neither catastrophe was in the least degree probable. He was probably the one sincere Republican who had in the French Army the influence of a successful Marshal of France, certainly the one civilian who, if France were to win a campaign against Germany, would not have been overshadowed by the General in command. To have lost a man of that kind is a grand misfortune for France, for an abler man than Gambetta might rise, and yet not have Gambetta's history or his rooted abhorrence of what he called the "sterile round of coups d'état." Still, he has died, while the Comte de Chambord is not dead, and while Prince Jerome is still alive; and the Republic, therefore, has time to root itself undisturbed by dangerous Pretenders. For the rest, the heritage of Gambetta's influence will, we suspect, fall for a year or two very much to the least visible politician in France, the President of the Republic.

COUNTY FRANCHISE AND REDISTRIBUTION.

SIR CHARLES DILKE has alarmed some of our Liberal contemporaries, both in the provinces and in London, by saying that the Government have not yet made up their minds whether to deal with the County Franchise and the Redistribution of Seats in one Bill or in separate measures, and it seems to be taken for granted that the entertainment of the second alternative implies a certain lukewarmness in the minds of the Government as to the question of the redistribution of power itself. We confess to a totally different opinion. The Pall Mall Gazette of Wednesday puts the matter as follows:—"Suppose that the Government determine to separate the two questions, what will be the probable course of events? The Franchise Bill will be introduced in 1884 or 1885—probably the latter. The Lords will either pass it, or reject it. If they reject it, as is most likely, there will be a dissolution on the question. Supposing the Constituencies to be favourable, the Bill would be passed at once in a new Parliament. But that Parliament would have to be at once dissolved, in order to admit the new voters. The theory of separation assumes that redistribution would be dealt with in this second new Parliament, braced and invigorated by the fresh popular element. But then redistribution in that case would be sure to be deferred until the Parliament was near its end, on the same grounds of general convenience that defer the Franchise Bill now. If all this comes to pass, we shall see a Redistribution Bill about 1890, and not before. It is no wonder that a great many Liberals think that this is too long to wait." That is just, and, of course, disheartening, so far as it goes; but it is a very small part of the case. Take it how we will, the passing of a new Reform Bill containing a large redistribution of power is no small matter, and cannot be effected even by the most powerful of all Governments,—with a hostile House of Lords,—without a good deal of delay and difficulty. The Pall Mall forgot to put the alternatives to the course it condemns, nor does it state the contingencies accurately as to either the course it approves or the course it condemns. We do not agree with it in thinking that a simple Bill extending the household franchise to the counties—passed, as it would be in the House of Commons, by the full majority of the Liberal party,—would be rejected in the Lords. In the first place, nothing was more distinctly submitted to the constituencies in 1880, and approved by them, than the principle of equalising the suffrage in the counties and the boroughs. This was a matter put probably before every constituency in the United Kingdom, and was one of the principal issues of the last general election. Mr. Goschen excepted, no Liberal still calling himself a Liberal could refuse to vote for this measure, and it is probable that even Lord Salisbury, acting on principles which he has often avowed, would hesitate to advise the House of Lords to reject a measure so plainly sanctioned by the Electorate. It is certain, at all events, that if he did give that advice, he would lose the confidence of many moderate Conservatives, and not at all certain that he would be able to carry with him the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, and the Conservative Peers who declined his advice as to the Arrears Bill, in so unconstitutional an interpretation of the functions of the Lords. We believe, therefore, that if a simple County Franchise Bill were separately introduced, it would probably pass the Lords, and not be rejected by them. But what ought we to look for if a large general measure, including both the extension of household franchise to the counties and a great redistribution of power,—one satisfactory to the country at large,—were introduced? In the first place, a great many of the Liberals who sit for boroughs to be merged in larger constituencies, or to be wholly disfranchised as boroughs, would vote against it, and the measure, if it passed the Commons at all,—which is not quite certain,—would pass the Commons by a majority by no means comparable with that of a simple County Franchise Bill,—by a majority so much diminished, that on that account alone the Lords would be encouraged and almost invited to reject it, and to insist on an appeal to the country,—an appeal, moreover, which would then be made to the present constituencies. In the next place, the Lords would have the excuse of saying that though the question of assimilating the borough and county franchise was certainly referred to the constituencies in 1880, the principle on which the redistribution of power was to be arranged had never been agreed upon by the Liberals, and never sanctioned by the constituencies; and, of course, the Tory leader would maintain that the principle actually adopted by the Government was not one pleasing to the country. Now, we would put this point rather strongly to the Liberal party. If the two measures are to be inseparable, and to share the same fate, we shall inevitably have a dissolution under the existing law, without even household suffrage in the counties. But if the two Bills are separated, and the County Franchise Bill is passed first, we shall in all probability have a dissolution on the second Bill only, and have the extended constituencies in the counties to which to appeal.

But then it is assumed that the moment a County Franchise Bill is passed, there must be a dissolution in order to give the new voters their voice in determining the question of the redistribution of power. Why? If this be so, it surely ought to be accounted wrong in principle to think of binding up the two measures in one Bill. It is making very much indeed of the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee, to maintain that a House of Commons which passes a County Franchise Bill in March, may not propose and discuss a Redistribution Bill in April, without an appeal to the new electors, though there is no objection at all to its passing a clause in a single Bill determining the County Franchise in March, and yet discussing other clauses of the same Bill which propose the same redistribution of power as the second measure would have sanctioned, in April. It is sheer common-sense that any House which is competent to discuss a reform measure as a whole, is competent to discuss separately two quite separable parts of that whole. Nor can we see the ghost of a reason why the Redistribution Bill should not be introduced in the same House and in the very same Session in which the County Franchise Bill had been discussed and passed. There is, as we have said, this very strong reason for separating the two measures,—that on one the Liberals as a party, and the country at large, are completely agreed; while, on the other there has been as yet no possibility of agreement, because there has been no responsible proposal. It seems to us perfectly childish to assume that if the Bills be separated, the House which passed the first ought to be dissolved before it can properly discuss the second, although, if they be amalgamated, there would be no impropriety in the same House taking the discussion of both. What seems to us by far the wisest and most respectful course to the constituencies is to separate the two measures, but to bring forward both in the same House and the same Session; sending up the Franchise Bill first to the House of Lords, and then immediately introducing the Redistribution Bill in the Commons. This course would at least afford the Liberals the opportunity of exhibiting their complete unanimity on the former Bill, and leave the House of Lords no constitutional excuse for rejecting it; while if the Lords did reject it, the Liberals could appeal to the country with absolute confidence to condemn that rejection. If, on the other hand, as we think much more likely, the Lords should pass the Bill on which the constituencies have already given judgment, but decline to pass the Bill on which no opinion has as yet been passed by the constituencies, and on which the Liberals would certainly show a less united front, we should at least have gained Household Franchise for the counties before the Dissolution. In fact, take it how you will, there seems to us nothing but gain in the separation of the discussion of the principle on which the Liberals are unanimous, from the discussion of the principle on which they are certain to be divided, and to give occasion to the Conservatives to exult over their differences of opinion.

What we fear, if the Government do not separate their proposal for Redistribution from their proposal for extending Household Suffrage to the counties is this,—that in the battle which will arise over the many difficult questions involved in the second measure, the country may lose sight of the point on which all Liberals are agreed, and that an appeal to the country might even result in a defeat,—a defeat which would not in the least mean that the constituencies had changed their minds on the subject of extending Household Suffrage to the counties, but would, nevertheless, involve the indefinite postponement of that most necessary and wholesome measure, because it had been unwisely mixed-up with a number of other issues at once complex and difficult. It seems a mere political axiom, when one important matter has been virtually decided by universal consent, to keep that matter separate from other matters which have not yet been decided, and on which a great number of very difficult issues may be raised. So far from seeing any vacillation or hesitation in the course suggested by Sir Charles Dilke as a possible one,—the separation of the two parts of the Reform Bill,—it seems to us much the most truly wise and Liberal course; for it will keep separate the issues which really are separate, and will discriminate the points on which we are all united, from the points on which it is hardly possible or conceivable that we can be all united.

THE GREAT INDIAN DANGER.

EXTERNALLY, everything in India is at peace just now. Lord Ripon is governing sensibly and well, with unusual appreciation from natives, and with little criticism, except from those who think that he presses the work of decentralisation too fast and too far. It is felt, however, by all experienced men, that if India is to be permanently benefited by our rule, this process must be commenced; and after the first plunge has been made, opposition will slowly die away. After all, the Indians established municipalities and worked them successfully while their present rulers were tattooed savages; and as they continue to do so in Native States, they cannot have lost the art. The frontier troubles are nearly over, the Burmese troubles never come to a head, and in the length and breadth of India, with its population of 250,000,000, there is no local insurrection. The budget of the next financial year will be a fairly good one, if Egyptian expenses are small; and the Government has recurred with success to the older and wiser plan of raising necessary loans in the country itself, at rates calculated and paid in silver currency. All these are reassuring facts, as are also the growth of Indian trade, and the consequent enrichment of the trading class; but nevertheless, we wish it were possible for English politicians to attend, if it were only for a week of the Session, to one Indian subject. All accounts, independent and official, show that the ultimate difficulty of India, the economic situation of the cultivator, is coming to the front in a most disheartening way, and is exciting among the most experienced officials a sensation of positive alarm. In Bengal proper, the mainstay of the British sovereignty, the increase in the numbers of the people, the consequent competition for land, and the enhancements of rent by landlords, have all become so great, that the responsible officials are suggesting changes far more radical than the Irish Land Law. They, in fact, dread lest the spirit of resistance to rent already manifested in Pubna and other fertile counties should become general, and end in a movement, a passive insurrection, with which the Government could not cope, and which might break the sheet-anchor of Indian finance, the Land Revenue of Bengal. They, therefore, propose laws which will seriously diminish the landlords' power of evicting and of raising rents, but will not, we fear, relieve the pressure arising from increasing population, which has already absorbed all the good land in the country, and converted Bengal into a warren, swarming with people of whom one-third are, for their wants, well off; one-third struggling, but not in despair; and one-third perpetually on the verge either of famine or of bankruptcy, both being averted only by excessive labour, and an economy extending to an insufficient consumption of food. There must be many millions of people in the Presidency now, including, of course, Behar, who could not stand up against two bad harvests, but must be fed, through remissions of rent or direct grants, either by the landlords or the State.

That is not a safe position, and in the Mahratta country matters are even worse. Mr. Hunter's speech on the condition of the peasantry there, wisely telegraphed in extenso to the Times, was uttered before the Viceroy in Council by a servant of their own, and was uncontradicted. Mr. Hunter declares that in the wide Mahratta country, filled by the people who once conquered Central India and defied us, people made for guerrilla war, the situation is going from bad to worse, till the peasantry, by the admission of the special Judges appointed to examine their debts, not only cannot pay them, but cannot pay the Government assessment—their only rent—and have, in fact, "not enough to support themselves and their families throughout the year." This means that in these great districts, which are fertile, though possibly overcropped, the population lives in bad years upon the verge of starvation, and is perpetually increasing its permanent debt, which can never be paid except by the surrender of the fields, without which Indian peasants consider their case desperate. The Mahrattas in particular have absolutely no other resources. On the last occurrence of such pressure, they broke out and overflowed Central India as soldiery; but they cannot do this again, for the British sword is in the way. They have lost their carrying trade, killed for ever by the British railways. They have lost their village manufactures, killed, probably for ever, by British competition. And they have lost, we must add, though Mr. Hunter does not, their "wild" lands, lands, that is, of third-rate quality, formerly left uncultivated, except in times of pressure, but now absorbed in the increasing numbers. They are, therefore, reduced to the soil, and the soil cannot yield enough for all they have to pay. This is at least the official statement, supported by official reports specially ordered from most experienced men, whose direct and pressing interest it is to justify the Government in taxing heavily.

To Old Indians, such accounts as these are the more distressing, because they know well that no attacks upon the Government will remedy the evils described; because they despair of dealing with the grand economic cause, the increase of numbers; and because they realise, what no Englishman can realise, that while India is a continent, and not a country, and has in it, therefore, many prosperous and a few unusually happy regions, "distressed districts," though only "districts," may be so wide and include such huge masses of feeble people, that they may be as difficult to deal with as ruined kingdoms. If the fault were that of the Government, it could readily be cured; but what are the group of statesmen who constitute the "Government of India" to do? They can pass, and probably will pass, a law restoring the fixity of tenure to which in Bengal great sections of the peasantry have a clear historic right. They can, and certainly will, warn the Government of Bombay that its collectors must abstain from "enhancing" the assessments,—that is, the quit-rents of the people. They may restrict severely the money-lenders' power of recovering old debts, and this they have done, and are doing. But, should these measures fail, as they readily may fail—for in the growth of population, the landless peasantry hire from the fixed ryots as well as from landlords, and essay to live on impossible patches of soil—what more can the Government attempt? They cannot surrender all revenue. They cannot, in Bengal, confiscate all Zemindars' rights. They cannot, in Bombay, pass the sponge over all mortgage debts. They cannot establish a self-working and permanent Poor-law, for taxation cannot be increased, and no grant the Treasury could make would seriously relieve the masses who would rightfully claim a share. They cannot force the people to emigrate, even if there were lands at their disposal fit for emigration. They cannot, in short, reduce the population, or increase the fertility of the soil, which, except in the Deltas, is racked already, and is much better cultivated than Englishmen believe; and they cannot give up all claim to a share in the produce, and so make the preservation of order and the distribution of justice simply impossible. They are faced on every side by impossibilities, or rather by a compulsion to pass small measures, when they know that only large measures could succeed, and doubt their right to sanction them. They could, for example, quiet Bengal, if not improve it, by declaring all tenants whatsoever to be khodkhas, or hereditary tenants beyond eviction or enhanced rents, but would not that be a breach of faith? The landlords say it would, and the Government evidently thinks so also. They could in Bombay remove distress for the present by reducing assessments one-fourth, sweeping off all mortgage debts, and, as the old Princes did, declaring cultured land inalienable for debt. But where is the remitted taxation to come from? Can a Christian Government declare debts contracted under its laws irrecoverable? Ought a civilised Government, even with the consent of the people, to declare to a whole population that its only available property shall be no longer available as a pledge?

We shall be asked how we reconcile these despondent views about the Indian cultivator with the admitted prosperity in many departments of Indian affairs. Just as we reconcile the condition of Donegal with the price of shares in the Bank of Ireland, or the condition of Essex farmers with the general state of British trade. There are states of society, as we see, in which every class will prosper except the cultivator of the soil; and that state, as officials warn us, begins to exist over large sections of India. Tens of millions of persons there either can do or will do nothing but cultivate; and if cultivation does not pay, what hope have they? The traders do not buy more food of them for being rich, and they have only food to sell. They can get their "clothes" cheaper through free-trade and railways, but they have reduced clothes to such an inappreciable minimum, that the saving is not a rupee a year per house. They need nothing else save only land, and land, under the pressure of numbers, becomes so dear, that either the profit per acre will not keep them, or they get too few acres for a maintenance. New occupations would save them, but they must be occupations for millions, and where are they? Emigration would save them, but even the British Government dare not force them to emigrate, and voluntarily they will not go, except into neighbouring Native States, where they are not wanted, or neighbouring districts, which they speedily reduce to the old condition. Indian trade might be doubled, and all Indian traders made rich, and yet the pressure of ever-increasing multitudes upon the soil of Bengal and the Deccan might in a bad year produce famine, or a distress amidst which society would dissolve. Five people cannot live and pay a direct tax in money and the interest of old debts at sixteen per cent., upon five acres of overcropped soil, without danger in bad years of a catastrophe. That is the position of whole districts in India, and the comparative wealth of other districts is nothing to the purpose. All, however, that we want is thorough examination of the subject by men who can lead opinion. We have no course to recommend, and no law to oppose. We believe ourselves firmly that in India, as in Ireland, fixity of land tenure is the sheet-anchor of society, because it binds the majority closely to the State, but even fixity will not meet the economic danger. Let the statesmen say what will, or face the consequences, which in India will either be recurrent famines, or a bewildering, passive insurrection of men whom the Government cannot blame, or shoot down.

MR. RAIKES ON OPPOSITION.

MR. RAIKES'S article, in the Nineteenth Century, on the duties of Opposition, is interesting chiefly as betraying how curiously deep the Tories' belief still is that by highly appreciating Lord Hartington, they can produce the effect of depreciating Mr. Gladstone. It contains one very spiteful sentence, in which Mr. Raikes hints that Mr. Gladstone, during his retirement, was "suspected of prompting independent action" embarrassing to Lord Hartington. Suspected by whom? Certainly not by Lord Hartington, but perhaps by Mr. Raikes. Mr. Raikes's suspicions, however, on these subjects are not important factors in the policy of the Liberal Party, and though he is so anxious to panegyriser Lord Hartington, at the expense of Mr. Gladstone, he will not produce the effect of diminishing the strength of Liberal confidence either in Mr. Gladstone or in Lord Hartington. Mr. Raikes has shrewdness enough to see that the myth growing up as to Mr. Disraeli's infallibility as a Leader of Opposition is a misleading myth, which is leading more than one free-lance of the Conservative party,—Lord Randolph Churchill, for instance, in particular,—into very serious blunders. But he himself contributes not a little towards a myth at least as misleading, and quite as popular among Conservatives, as to the almost infallible sagacity with which Lord Hartington led the Opposition between 1875 and 1878,—a myth the value of which to Mr. Raikes is obvious enough, since it gives him the double opportunity he wants,—first, the opportunity of depreciating Mr. Gladstone, whose vast influence in the country is, as he rightly thinks, so mischievous to the Tory party; next, the opportunity of magnifying the particular style of Opposition leadership for which Lord Hartington, as he thinks, has gained the applause of both parties.

Our own opinion of Lord Hartington as the Leader of Opposition is not at all that of Mr. Raikes. We should say, indeed, with him, that he made an admirable leader on all the greater occasions, before Mr. Gladstone brought forward his series of Resolutions on Eastern affairs. But it is simply a mistake to speak of him, as Mr. Raikes does, either, on the one hand, as exceptionally "moderate" in "his own political views;" or, on the other hand, as a very industrious leader, a view of him which Mr. Raikes rather suggests than asserts. Lord Hartington was a popular leader because he was so heartily Liberal,—even Radical,—in his views on all critical occasions, until at least subjects came up on which he had no very strong opinions of his own, and on which he was misled by the strong anti-Russian feeling which he supposed to pervade the Liberal Party in the country, as it certainly did pervade the circles in which he himself chiefly mingled. But Lord Hartington earned no popularity at all as an indefatigable leader of Opposition. Sometimes he was not even in his place on a Budget night. Often, for night after night of debates on Estimates or Supply, he left his place on the Front Bench unoccupied, and the conduct of Opposition to the guidance of Sir William Harcourt, or Mr. Forster, or even Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, or in the absence or inactivity of the whole Front Bench, of Sir Charles Dilke or Mr. Dillwyn below the gangway. Till the Eastern policy of the late Government came to be discussed, Lord Hartington did admirably on great occasions; but he was nothing like an indefatigable leader, showed nothing like Mr. Disraeli's tenacity when Mr. Disraeli occupied the same post. To this, in some degree, perhaps, Lord Hartington owes the excess of credit assigned to his leadership in the Tory ranks; to this, and their great desire to find some rival whom they can praise to the discredit of Mr. Gladstone. They like him partly for not bothering them much. They like him more for having turned the cold-shoulder to Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions on the affairs of the East. But they like him most of all because they believe that he could never have brought the country round to his side, as Mr. Gladstone brought it round; because they think that they should have fought a much more equal contest with him, than they have fought with Mr. Gladstone.

In all these reasons for admiring Lord Hartington, Mr. Raikes certainly concurs. But on one other point he has as certainly but little ground for his admiration. Lord Hartington has never been an especially mild Liberal. No doubt, when he thought the resistance to flogging in the Army had gone far enough, he administered a snub to the leaders of that resistance, which Mr. Chamberlain took up with more heat than wisdom. But on all the subjects on which the strength of Liberalism is usually tested, Lord Hartington often satisfied the left wing of the party even better than Mr. Gladstone has satisfied it. It would be difficult to find a better handbook of Radicalism than Lord Hartington's speeches in Lancashire during the canvas of 1880. We have heard these speeches referred to by Radicals as containing about the best condensation of sound Radical opinion that it would be possible to find. It was Lord Hartington, for instance, who first gave to the proposal of closing debate by a majority its true political importance. It was Lord Hartington who firmly insisted that this power was needed not merely to put down Obstruction, but to get rid of superfluous discussions for which the House has really no sufficient time. Indeed, there is not a test-subject for Radicals, from the reform of the Land Laws to the uses of what is commonly called a caucus, on which Lord Hartington has not expressed opinions on which Mr. Chamberlain himself could not easily improve. Why, then, is it that we hear so much from Conservatives of Lord Hartington's "moderation?" Only, we believe, because Lord Hartington now and then deferred, on subjects which he had not personally studied, like those affecting Russia and Turkey in the East, to the very strong opinions prevalent in London Clubs, though unshared by the country. This is only saying in another way what we have already admitted, that Lord Hartington is not the most diligent of politicians, that he has not Mr. Gladstone's versatility and enormous power of digesting subjects for himself, and that, consequently, when he is at fault, he is more or less biassed by the stratum of social opinion in which he lives. This is no very serious fault. But it is the only foundation that exists for the fable that Lord Hartington is at all less thorough-going in his Liberalism than Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. Raikes, though he advances no general theory of the manner in which Opposition ought to be conducted, refers to Sir Stafford Northcote's failure to assail the Government effectually on the subject of the so-called "Kilmainham Treaty" as the greatest blunder which Sir Stafford Northcote has made, and professes his belief that if Mr. Gathorne Hardy had still been in the House of Commons during last April, the Government would have received its death-blow. All we can say is that no Member of the Government spoke with more effect on that subject than Lord Hartington; and though, of course, it does not follow that because his plain common-sense was effective in defending the release of Mr. Parnell, his plain common-sense might not have been equally effective, had he been Leader of the Opposition, in attacking it, yet it does lend a certain presumption to that view. It would be difficult to find leaders less like each other in their conception of the duties of Opposition than Lord Hartington and Mr. Gathorne Hardy (Lord Cranbrook). The one was always strong and lucid on matters of principle, but always unwilling to press a personal attack beyond what was reasonable; while the latter has always revelled in personal attacks, and on a very famous occasion even attempted to support a justification of the policy of the Empire in India in 1878, on a vilification of the policy of the Empire in India under Lord Lawrence and Lord Northbrook in 1869 and 1873. We find it very difficult to believe that Lord Hartington would have discharged effectively, as leader of Opposition, the office which Mr. Raikes justly thinks that Mr. Gathorne Hardy would have discharged very effectively indeed. It has never been Lord Hartington's art to use happily the force of political prejudice and personal innuendo, and to refuse opponents credit for meaning exactly what they say. Mr. Raikes's conception of the duties of Opposition is a little confused. He would like to combine in the Conservative leader a pungency of personal criticism like Mr. Gathorne Hardy's, with the reputation of a perfect fairness and candour of criticism like Lord Hartington's. But these qualities can hardly be combined. We must allow statesmen the defects of their qualities, whether those qualities be justice and candour, or a talent for personal criticism. Lord Hartington's qualities imply a certain deficiency in the power of running-down opponents who have merely excited against them very wide-spread prepossessions. Lord Cranbrook's qualities imply a certain deficiency in allowing fairly for the atmosphere of prejudice with which unpopular politicians of the type of Irish agitators are viewed. Mr. Raikes might conceive a Leader of Opposition who had the qualities of either, and the defects which accompany them, but hardly a Leader of Opposition who combined the qualities of both, and the defects of neither. Yet, that is what he wants.

THE BRITISH PROPOSAL FOR THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE Times of Friday makes an announcement which, if true, is of great importance. The British Government, after a deliberation almost needlessly long, has agreed to propose to the Powers that the Suez Canal shall be declared a free water-way for the world, an arm of the sea, to be traversed at discretion by the navies and commercial steamers of all Powers wishing to use it. Those who pass must pay duties for the privilege, as they used to do in the Sound, and equally, of course, must abstain from fighting within the Canal, as they must now abstain from fighting within the waters under the municipal control of any European Power. The rule against fighting in harbour will be applied as it would be applied in the Channel, and all fighting in the Mediterranean or Red Sea must be done so as not to impede the International waterway.

If this statement is correct, the Government has, we believe, hit upon that proposal which, while most just to other nations, safeguards most completely the interests of this country. The general need of every Power using the Canal is, that whether the nations are at war or at peace, its own ships shall have a right of unimpeded passage, and this is secured. England and America or England and France might be at war, and still their ships could pass through the Canal, just as they could pass through the Channel unimpeded, except by material force exerted on the open sea; and so also could the ships of all neutrals. No Power, under pretext of being at war, could block or occupy the Canal without incurring the hostility of all Europe; and no Power could, as owner of either bank, shut the Canal, without the same consequence. The Canal, in fact, could not be legally shut at all, and the law keeping it open would have this peremptory sanction, that any nation using it would fight, rather than see it shut. The law, therefore, is sure to be observed, and the Suez Canal becomes a narrow gulf of the Mediterranean, or a prolongation of the Red Sea. That must be good for Europe, and especially for the less formidable European Powers; while, as regards England, it is perfect security. Any Power which fights us must fight us on open water, which is just what we want. True, we waive the right of asking Egypt to close the Canal, and a French or Russian Fleet may pass through to attack India; but then also a British Fleet can pass through to defend India, and we can fight in the Red Sea as easily as in the Mediterranean.

Only one danger, in fact, remains. Suppose the Canal blocked by a new Arabi, or a conqueror coming from Southern Egypt, and careless of International Law, which is, of course, possible. Well, suppose the Straits of Malacca blocked by a pirate. The new Arabi, like the pirate, would become at once hostis humani generis, and would be attacked and hanged as rapidly as might be. We cannot prevent such an occurrence, any more than we can prevent O'Donovan Rossa from blowing up an Irish ship in the Canal itself, but we can punish it in a way which no one but a lunatic would risk. Moreover, we intend to construct, in one way or another, a stable Government in Egypt, whether Native or European, and without the consent of that Government no such outrage is possible; while, as such consent would be followed by the downfall of the Government, no such consent will be given. The Canal, in fact, will for us be as secure as if we held it; while for the rest of Europe it will be more secure, a result most acceptable to all diplomatists, and calculated in the highest degree to smooth the British path in Egypt itself. The first source of all the jealousy in that matter is, that England, ruling in Egypt, might block the Canal; and, under Lord Granville's proposal, she, while demanding that the Canal shall always remain as open as any other arm of the sea, renounces that power for ever. The Canal Question is cut out of the Egyptian Question, and settled by itself, on so strong a basis that every Power in Europe will be directly interested in keeping the law intact. That would be an admirable total result of diplomacy, and will, we believe, be assailed in England only by those fanatics who fancy that England could have gained the right to close the Canal whenever she was herself at war. She could not, and if she could, would have acquired an almost nominal advantage. A French Fleet or a Russian Fleet cannot defeat a British Fleet one bit the more because it can get into the Red Sea. We, possessing also a permanent right of transit through the Canal, can follow it there just as easily as into any arm of the Mediterranean; and, indeed, much more easily, because from the Red Sea there is no escape without encounter with a squadron stationed, as it would be in war-time, off the Isle of Perim. The British, in fact, without exciting jealousy and without committing an unfairness, get rid of the possibility of the Canal being shut, of Turkish claims to its sovereignty, of Egyptian claims to its sovereignty, and of M. de Lesseps' claims to do as he likes with his own creation. The Suez Canal becomes the Suez Channel, —which is precisely the result that suits all the world, and especially England, best.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN ON LOCAL TAXATION.

MOST people have at one time or another been stopped on their way from a foreign station to their hotel by the officers of the Octroi, and many of them, perhaps, have thought with pride of the freedom from such annoyances enjoyed by Englishmen. To the traveller who has merely to answer the conventional question by the conventional negation the inconvenience is nothing, but to the marketwomen who are bringing in their goods, and to the townspeople who have to pay an enhanced price for every article so brought in, it is a real inconvenience. Yet the Octroi, after all, is only a method, clumsy, perhaps, but not quite ineffectual, of avoiding the gross injustice of our English system of local taxation. It is one among the Continental answers to the question put by Mr. Chamberlain, in the letter which was printed in Tuesday's papers, "How far should personal property contribute to local taxation?" Englishmen dismiss the inquiry with a gruff "Not at all!" Land, and the houses built on land, are the only things that are tangible enough for the dull vision of a local authority. That is all very well, if the only thing to be considered is how the question may be soonest got rid of, but it bears hardly upon owners and occupiers. There is room, perhaps, for some difference of opinion as to the precise division of local burdens between these two classes, but there is no doubt that they fall upon them, and upon none other. No third kind of property is admitted to share the honour. A man is judged by his house, or by his estate. If that is large, he has to give largely; if that is small, he must give as cheerfully as he can out of that little. Two men may have precisely the same income, but if one lives in a large house and the other in a small one, or if they live in houses of the same size, but at opposite ends of the town, there will be all the difference in the world between the sums they severally pay to the rate-collector. It does not matter what other sources of income either of them has, the local authorities are powerless to touch them. A man who lives in lodgings and does not own land, may be a millionaire, and the parish be none the wiser. What he has is only personal property, and as such, it is held to be too insignificant to be worth rating. There was a time, no doubt, when it was so,—a time when the wealth of the country lay almost exclusively in land, and all that land contained or supported. But that time has long passed away, and in towns especially there is a vast amount of property which pays nothing whatever towards the cost of local government. It is said, indeed, by way of extenuation of this system, that though local taxes do not fall on the right property, they fall on the right people. The rich do not pay rates on all that they have, but they pay them on a kind of property which varies in value with the amount of their wealth. A man's house-rent is a good index to his income, and if the rates are levied on house-rent, the rich and the poor pay about in proportion to their means. In a very general sense, indeed, this is true. Poor men live in poor houses, and pay low rents; well-to-do men live in good houses, and pay large rents. But as between one class of well-to-do men and another, house-rent is no index at all. A man with £10,000 a year who has no children, may not care to have a better house than the man with £3,000 who has children. Custom determines that they shall live in the same class of house, and the size of the family determines whether in that class the house shall be small or large. And then there is a whole army of lodgers, of all ranks and pursuits, who present nothing that the rate-collector can take hold of. It may be an unavoidable anomaly that local burdens should be unequally distributed, but the fact that they are unequally distributed is beyond dispute.

In Mr. Chamberlain's review of the several plans that have been proposed for remedying this inequality, the first place is given to the plan of making grants from the Consolidated Fund. Mr. Chamberlain condemns this, as costly to the State and not economical to the Ratepayers. No amount of reasoning could establish the contrary, so long as the experiment, whenever tried, is uniformly unsuccessful. Of late years, contributions from the Consolidated Fund have been very much in fashion, and if they were really suited to the end they are supposed to answer, local rates ought to be considerably lower than they were. Instead of this, they have remained pretty much what they were, and in many instances they have even increased. The fact is not at all hard to be explained. When a burden which used to be borne by one person is divided between two, the relief seems much greater than it is. The ratepayers are in the position of two men who have agreed to dine together, on the plea that it is cheaper than dining separately. So it may be, if they order no more for the two than each would have ordered for himself. But the chances are that they go a good deal beyond this limit, and that in the end each has to pay more than he would have paid if he had dined by himself. It is the same thing, Mr. Chamberlain says, with a local authority, when it has to consider an increase of the police force, or in the provision for lunatics. "A strong argument in favour of additional expenditure is always found in the fact that half the cost will be provided by the Government." The ratepayers are relieved so far as this, that the whole bill does not come upon them; but if, in consequence of this, they give their orders with proportionately greater readiness, their special half of the expense may be as large as the whole would have been, had they had greater incentives to economy.

Mr. Chamberlain's own thoughts turn to the allocation of some of the Imperial taxes to local purposes, "thus increasing the income of the local authorities, while leaving to them the whole amount of and responsibility for their own expenditure." He does not explain, however, by what machinery he would effect this. Is the amount of the tax made over to vary with the needs of the local authority? Supposing the carriage tax, for example, to be chosen, would each local authority be at liberty to fix the duty on carriages within its own jurisdiction? Or would the tax be fixed, as now, by Parliament, and only the specified amount collected and appropriated by the local authority? In the latter case, the effect on the local authorities would be only that of a grant from the Consolidated Fund. In the former case, the inequalities would be as great as those in the Poor-rate are now, and they would be more startling. The same carriage which in one place was charged, as now, two guineas a year, would in another place be charged ten guineas. We do not know that there would be any more harm in this than there is in the difference between a Poor-rate of sixpence in the pound and one of three shillings, but it would be novel, and being novel, it would excite more attention and remonstrance. The French plan is to add a certain number of centimes to certain taxes, the amount of the addition being fixed by the local authorities, but the money being got in as part of the tax, so that there is no additional expense for collection. "It has been proposed," says Mr. Chamberlain, "that local authorities should serve upon the Income-tax Commissioners a precept of so much in the pound, to be collected for local objects and handed over by the Commissioners." In many ways this would be the fairest of all the substitutes that have been suggested for the present system. The existing arrangements, however, for collecting the Income-tax offer very serious obstacles to its adoption. Mr. Chamberlain apparently regards these obstacles as insurmountable, but it is not quite clear why they should be so. All Income-tax on investments, he says, is collected in London, and a man with property in the Funds or in Railways who happened to live in the country would pay nothing towards the expenditure of his own district, while he would contribute largely to the London rates. So, too, a man may have a house in the country, and another in London. At present, he returns his Income-tax at either of them, at his choice; but if he had to pay some additional pence for local purposes, he would find out where the rates were lowest, and return his Income-tax in London or in the country, according as he had fewest of these additional pence to pay in one place or the other. These are obvious objections to the application of the French plan to England, but is it certain that they could not be met by some change in the process of collection? Perhaps it would be impossible, but we should be sorry to see the idea abandoned until some fiscal ingenuity has been brought to bear on it. Hitherto, the one object kept in view in the collection of the Income-tax has been to make it as little burdensome as is consistent with the maintenance of the few safeguards which it is possible to devise, where so much is necessarily left to individual honesty. But if the Treasury would give its mind to modifying the regulations with a view of localising the tax, and thus adopting it for local as well as for Imperial purposes, it is possible that the difficulty might in a great measure disappear. At all events, where the injustice of the present system of rating is so great, it is worth while to set experts upon inquiring whether something cannot be done in this direction.

MONEYED WIVES.

IT is only necessary to read the "Instructions" about Deposits issued by the Postmaster-General on January 1st, to see the extent of the change which will be effected by the Married Women's Property Act. The Post Office which, as a great Bank, is constantly liable to suits-at-law, has very good legal advice; and its advisers interpret that Act with a breadth and freedom which, much as the measure has been discussed, will take many husbands' breath away, and perhaps at first work some injustice. In brief, the Post Office announces that from January 1st a married woman's deposit in the Savings' Bank is her own, as absolutely as if she were single, and that she can take it away, and therefore spend it, without her husband's concurrence or signature. He has no more to do with the matter than if his wife were his sister, or his mother. As thousands of husbands in England deposit their savings in their wives' names, in order to keep them more secret from their employers and their neighbours, this decision will at first, we doubt not, create a good many heart-burnings. The husband will be compelled to ask his wife to pay his own savings over to him, that he may open a new account; and though, in the vast majority of such cases, this will be done without a word, in a few the wife will suspect that the money will be spent, will resent the loss of influence created by the necessity for her signature, and will be bitter about the matter. She will not be entirely wrong, either, as a good many men will take out money to waste when they can do it unseen, who would leave their money safe in the Savings' Bank, if they had to tell their wives of its withdrawal. It is, however, only just that the husband should have his own money, and the bitterness will pass away, while the good of the Act will remain, and will, we confidently predict, as regards the Depositing Class, be unexpectedly great. Novelists will not admit it, but nothing is better established than that the English woman of the working-class, especially the woman whose husband has from 25s. to 40s. a week, is, when she does not drink—which, unless very miserable, she rarely does—a saving creature. She likes to accumulate, if she can, to possess a little "unbeknown" to spend on her children or herself, or it may be her husband, to make a purse for a rainy day,—to be, as she puts it herself, "a little in front of the world." Women hunger for the pleasure of security much more than men do. The English working-wife will save as carefully and persistently as the French peasant's wife, though not quite with such rigid penuriousness—the French women having, for example, a moral horror of candles and fire, as wasters—but she has hitherto had to encounter one great obstacle. It is difficult to keep money in a little house in secret, with husband and children and neighbours all ravening for silver, and more difficult to bank it, because then the husband must be consulted as to its withdrawal, knows exactly how much there is, and is always, to say the best, under a temptation to liberality, which the wife crushes down. Henceforward, the wife, if she can make or save any money, can keep it all by herself, in absolute security and earning interest, without consulting anybody; and, as we believe, she will do it to an unexpected extent. Certainly she will when, as is the case in so many of the great cities, she is one of two bread-winners, works as hard as her husband, and is expected to bear a share, often a principal share, in all expenditure for the children other than buying food. She will, in those cases, like to hoard through the Post Office very much; and whether she improves her own character or not—we never feel quite certain as to the moral effect of close thrift—she will certainly become more independent, and the house more comfortable. There is no need to assert, though it is often sadly true, that the wife is, in this country, fonder of the children than the husband, is less given to drink, and is more far-sighted; it is sufficient to remember that she values pence more, and has more microscopic eyes, which is universally true, to be certain that the habit of saving among married women will, with their new independence, become much larger.

The operation of the Act within much higher households will, we believe, be nearly the same,—a great development of individuality among women, and a decided increase in economical management. It may be, probably will be, years before middle-class women, or rich women who are not compelled by misery to understand law as their poorer sisters do, will fully recognise the alteration which has been made in their position by the Act; but when they do, they will undoubtedly feel a novel sense of independence. It is this point which, as it seems to us, our contemporaries forget, when they say the social result of the Act will be so small. We do not expect, any more than they do, that laws which have their foundation deep in human nature will cease to operate; that all wives with money will defy their husbands, or that all husbands with moneyed wives will cease to rule their own households. All that, we agree, is nonsense, akin to the nonsense that educated women make bad housekeepers, or that the girl who knows Greek will never mend a frock; but it is not nonsense to say that a new spirit will enter households in which both husband and wife have incomes. The differences caused by mental change is much greater than the difference caused by material change, and the mental change will be very great. The wife may leave her husband to manage the joint income as before, or may spend her share on the house as much as ever, but she will do either with a new sense that the money is her own, that she has more right over it, more claim to be heard about it,—more justice, so to speak, on her side. The mere fact that if the wife insists the husband cannot in future take his own way regardless of her remonstrance will have a great effect, and there is more than this in the change. English people are not only law-honest, but they are very law-honest. One-half of us, at least, will regard spending money legally our own, though it came from the wife, as a different matter from spending money not legally our own, but still belonging to the wife. No relation in the world quite extinguishes the instinct of meum et tuum, which, with the alteration of the law, will revive in its full force. To take the commonest of cases. A man receiving some fortune with his wife allows her £200 a year to do as she likes with. She spends it, but always with a sense that she is in some sort spending as a trustee. She receives, however, subsequently to the Act £200 a year by bequest, and the allowance stops. We contend that the second £200 a year will be spent under a totally different sense of responsibility, with more independence, and therefore more individuality, even though, gifts being sweet to givers, it is spent more directly on the husband. There could be no gift before. This increase of individuality is about to accrue, moreover, just at a moment when, as all observers admit, women are seeking individuality with a sort of passion, when they are crying for "rights" which are all rights to be separate and unmerged in their husbands, when they are educating themselves with a diligence never before known, when they are trying so hard to earn for themselves, that new classes of swindlers are trading upon the desire, and that dozens of societies, most of them very badly contrived, are trying to force women's way to new careers. The effect will, therefore, be great, and one of its manifestations will be a new vigour of economy. The journalists all seem to be bemused with the notion that the wives owning their own money will want to waste it, or, at all events, to spend it, on their own fancies. Some will waste and a good many will spend in a direction which the husband may disapprove,—that is, will spend upon the children in a way very injurious to his own authority. The fondness of women for their children just when they seem to be going wrong, the disposition to send money to Tommy when he is outrunning allowances, and to back up Lucy in buying three dresses instead of two, will, we doubt not, be an operative force, and a frequent cause of trouble, or even of bitter dissension, in well-off households. But the majority of Englishwomen are not spenders, but savers; are annoyed by many of men's extravagances, in gifts as well as purchases; are vexed, not pleased, to see the money disappear without visible return. They say little now, unless the extravagance becomes dangerous, because the money is not theirs, and all people have about money some instinct of justice; but when it is theirs, they will say much more, and often very effectually. It is not so easy to resist prudent counsel at any time, and when the prudence takes the form of advice to save money which is legally as well as morally the speaker's own, what is to be done but yield? We do not, as we have said, expect many dissensions to arise from the law, for husband and wife can get along in pecuniary matters like any other partners; and nine times out of ten, the husband, if he will only be at the trouble to reason, instead of ordering, will have his own way; but depend on it, of such as do arise, the majority will spring from the wife's wish to accumulate, and not from her wish to spend. That this will be the case among the poor is not only certain, but admitted; and the human nature of the poor is not a separate article, belonging to them alone. Whether that change will be for good, we do not pretend to decide. Very often it will not be, for Englishmen seem, when they become over-prudent, to suffer some moral and intellectual loss which is not so great among over-prudent Continentals or among women; but that the change will, on the whole, increase the stability of English households, we feel sure. That the contrary should be so widely fancied, or, at all events, so widely said, is one more proof among many how much more men form their ideas from books than from their own observation. The satirists accuse women of extravagance, the observers accuse them of over-thrift; the satirists say they never understand pecuniary business, the observers say they understand every business rule quite readily, except the usefulness of a little waste in lubricating the movement of affairs. The total result of the Married Women's Property Act will be to make women more independent and individual, and, therefore, to bring out in a stronger way their penchant for accumulation.

M. RENAN ON THE "AMUSINGNESS" OF THE AGE.

M. RENAN, in the striking autobiographical study which he has recently contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes,—a sketch of himself which well deserves separate study,—remarks, in conclusion, that the age we live in will probably not be regarded as one of the greatest, but will be regarded as the most amusing of ages; and M. Renan adds that, unless the close of his life has something very severe in store for him, he shall have no right to feel anything but thankfulness towards the Cause of all Good "for the charming progression which he has been permitted to make through Reality." We wonder to how many men of our own day, and especially to how many men of our own country, M. Renan's saying will recommend itself as a true description of the age in which they are living. To M. Renan, who, as he says, has seldom been looked upon even by the French omnibus-drivers as "un voyageur sérieux," so willing has he been to let any one who wished it sit upon him, if it would spare the sitter inconvenience, a good deal has probably seemed amusing which would not seem amusing to every one. He has evidently had an exceptionally sweet and easy temper, which has annihilated for him the smaller vexations of the world; and he has evidently also had that power of not taking too much to heart the greater issues of life, which sometimes accompanies a very sweet and easy temper, being related to it, indeed, partly as cause;—for when the greater issues of life do not strain the nerves to their highest tension, there is much more elasticity left for meeting the smaller crosses with an easy indifference, or even an amused and cheerful display of intellectual and moral stoicism. M. Renan may, perhaps, be regarded as having rarely been “un voyageur sérieux” through life in any capacity. He has known so well how to throw oil on the troubled waters of existence, whether the trouble has arisen from earnestness, or want, or care, or doubt, that even through the breakers of youth his path was comparatively smooth and safe. He is, indeed, hardly a type of average men,—first, because moral and intellectual problems which many of them would never care for are sufficiently interesting to him to furnish him with a very delightful mental occupation; and next, because he is very unlike most of those who would share his preoccupation with these problems, in the completely unimpassioned character of the interest which is all that he can feel in their solution or their insolubility. M. Renan, if we may trust his own account of himself, has felt much the same kind of pleasurable imaginative interest in the greater issues of human destiny which beguiled Gibbon into his great work on “The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,”—an interest not too small for long, vivid, and preoccupying meditation, but not so great as to involve an impatient repudiation of the plausible and superficial treatment of many subjects the adequate and thorough treatment of which would be quite inconsistent with a brilliant and fascinating manipulation of the whole matter in hand. M. Renan has found our age “amusing,” partly because he has just the kind of mind to be thoroughly roused by the deeper questions which interest so few, but which are sufficiently pressed upon the present age to loom larger than ever on the literary class; partly because he has not the kind of mind to feel, even on these subjects, any passion of spiritual interest. We can hardly take, then, M. Renan’s evidence as the evidence of a typical man of culture, either for France or England, least of all for England. What would most educated men who have any sufficient acquaintance with other ages to criticise those ages at all, say to M. Renan’s assertion that our age is, of all ages, probably the most amusing?

We think they would say, first, perhaps, that in England, at all events, whatever may be said of France, there is amongst educated men hardly that easy self-tolerance which is the first condition of an amused life. In the earlier part of the last century, there is evidence, as well in England as on the Continent, that a feeling of self-satisfaction was felt in the mere possession of educated intelligence, which rendered such intelligence very much better adapted to form the basis of an amusing life than it is now. To be constantly amused, you must not have too deep a sense of reality. After all, amusement means being drawn away from the more engrossing pursuits of life, to lighter kinds of interest. If this be the most amusing of all ages, it must be so because the engrossing interests of other ages are less engrossing, and the lighter interests are more various, and more capable of taking the place of the engrossing interests. Or we may, perhaps, put it this way,—that if the present age is the most amusing of all ages, it must be because some of the interests which were life-and-death interests to the older world, are not life-and-death interests, but only lively imaginative interests, to the modern world. Now, does that truly represent the culture of the present age, or not? We should say that in England, at least, it does not represent it well; that so far as we can see, the world of Pope and Steele and Addison was far better contented to play with the intellectual side of life, and to meddle with life’s greater issues only in that superficial way which can best produce “amusement,” than our own. It is one result of the universal recognition of the duty of educating the whole people, that those who are best educated are less able than they used to be to regard knowledge chiefly as entertaining, or even wit itself as positively absolving him who possesses it from all social obligations except those necessary for its display. The earnestness of the age is too real to admit of any pervading sense of amusement. A very amusing age must be an age of many and various interests, like ours, but also of little pressure, unlike ours. Among the classes who look chiefly for amusement, there is too little restfulness to obtain successfully what they look for. Somehow, even they catch the contagion of unrest from those who cannot rest because they see so much left undone which ought to be done; and that is a contagion which, once caught, is fatal to true amusement. You cannot be amused without an easy mind, and the present age, in England at all events, is not remarkable for an easy mind. Matthew Arnold has asked:—

“But we, brought forth and reared in hours
Of change, alarm, surprise,—
What shelter to grow ripe is our’s,
What leisure to grow wise?”

And though the implied negative answer may be a poetic exaggeration, we believe it is true that the combination of greatly increased facilities for knowing the world with a greatly increased sense of the duty of improving the world, has done at least as much to undermine the amusingness of amusements for us, as the increased intellectual resources of our age has done to multiply the number of accessible amusements. Undoubtedly, the new rapidity of life has, on the whole, impaired its amusingness to educated people, though, doubtless, to the duller classes of all lands it has brought a new element of variety. To the educated, however, it spoils amusement to have so many competing amusements and entertainments between which to choose. Indeed, this hurry of competition too often injures the quality of the amusements themselves, for the strain after novelty is not the atmosphere in which genuine humour, or playfulness, or the easy, meditative wit which is most truly amusing, is at all wont to grow. Compare the age which is most genuinely taken with Gilbert’s Patience with the age which was most genuinely taken by Sheridan’s Rivals or Critic, and we shall, we think, be compelled to say that both the power to amuse, and the genuineness of the amusement, were much greater in the earlier age than in our own. The great increase in the number of interests, the vast multiplication of small supplies of knowledge from all quarters, is too distracting for the genuine amusement of mankind. A certain power of brooding is necessary to every one with a real genius for amusing mankind, and a certain power of absorbing the atmosphere of amusement is necessary to those who would really enjoy it. The more active spirits of our age have neither the leisure to produce the highest forms of amusement, nor the leisure to enjoy them when produced. It is only quiet and solitary writers who can provide us with the higher forms of amusement, and they provide what it takes more leisure and rest of mind to enjoy, than the ordinary class of enjoyers are willing to give. It is quite true, of course, that those who, like M. Renan, can find the truest enjoyment in the consideration and discussion of the highest spiritual and moral questions, and who are not sufficiently open to the morally disturbing influences of our time to have their imaginative enjoyment interrupted by external causes, have fuller opportunities of enjoyment, and fewer of the troubles appertaining to such enjoyment, than the men of any other age could have had before them. But then, as a rule, those who share M. Renan’s interests find in them much more than opportunities for intellectual enjoyment; while those who do not share those interests will rarely find their amusements important enough to fill that place in their mind which they obviously fill in M. Renan’s. It is, doubtless, the most amusing of all ages to one who can find the most profound enjoyment, and little beyond enjoyment, in considering the origin of all religions, for while no age has ever been permitted to deal so frankly and freely with these questions as the present age, no age has ever had such rich intellectual opportunities for dealing with them thoroughly. But for those whose amusements are not derived from themes so solemn, but are really relaxations from the strain of practical life, the age is not, we think, nearly so amusing as many which have preceded it,—partly because those who provide the amusements are more jaded by the moral pressure of the day than their predecessors, and still more because those who should enjoy the amusements, have not the spring of mind left to enjoy them as thoroughly as similar amusements were enjoyed by previous generations.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER AND MILES PLATTING.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—Unlike my old friend, Mr. Hughes, I feel very grateful to the Spectator for the line that it has all along taken, throughout these miserable squabbles, in favour of toleration and the rights of congregations. That the Ritualists, if refused that religious liberty which the other parties in the Church so freely enjoy, will be sorely tempted, not to turn Roman Catholics, as the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol kindly suggests, but either to cause a disruption, or to promote disestablishment, is obvious. True statesmanship, as well as true charity, would surely try to remove the temptation to either course. Archbishop Tait would have done this. It is to be hoped that Archbishop Benson, and the majority of his brethren, will follow that Christian lead. We want different types of service, to suit different types of mind and feeling. Ranging from the worship of our forefathers in the beginning of King Edward VI.'s reign, which the Ornaments Rubric, according to its author, Bishop Cosin, was meant to cover, to the mission service which many of us have found both useful and popular, which in the Prayer-book is conspicuous by its absence, and which differs in nothing, except, I hope, in its refinement, from that of any little or big Bethel in the kingdom. After all, the Ritualists, whatever their faults, have a good deal to complain of. An Act of Parliament (of a non-Christian Parliament) is passed avowedly for the partisan purpose of "putting down Ritualism." Its spirit is faithfully carried out by the Judicial Committee, in direct contradiction of previous decisions, in "Westerton v. Liddell," and "Martin v. Mackonochie." The plain, natural, common-sense meaning of the Ornaments Rubric, as declared in these two judgements, had previously been affirmed by the famous Committee of Lords and Divines in 1641, as well as by such authorities on Ritual as Dr. Nicholls, Wheatley, Bishop Phillpotts, and Dr. Stephens; while the later decision was declared by Chief Baron Pollock, one of the Judicial Committee himself, to have been founded on policy, and not on law. Then the Judge of the so-called Arches Court never fulfils the conditions of subscription, &c., which alone could give him any spiritual authority; and, indeed, he expressly repudiates any authority not that of Parliament. And now the Ritualists may fairly complain that the Bishop of Manchester, who, we are told, is "the officer in charge upon whom it rests to see the law as it stands obeyed," is himself a notorious law-breaker in this very matter, seeing that he never wears the Eucharistic vestment (a cope) which Canon xxiv. orders him to wear; while, by sanctioning the innovation of evening communions, contrary to all the customs and usages of the Church of England, he lays himself open to the censure pronounced in Article xxxiv. upon all who, "of their private judgment, openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church." Mr. Hughes forgets that the Bishop has said many "an unkind word of Mr. Green" and his friends. He has never tired of proclaiming that they were "bad citizens," who "posed as martyrs." Perhaps the Court Bishops in the time of Charles I. thought and said the same of John Hampden, when he resisted the illegal decisions of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council in his day. We all now feel that John Hampden won the civil liberties of England by his "bad citizenship." I venture to think that our religious liberties will owe very much the same debt of gratitude to the Ritualists.—I am, Sir, &c., Burghclere, January 1st.

G. R. PORTAL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Permit me to say that your article on the Bishop of Manchester's refusal to institute Mr. Cowgill to St. John's, Miles Platting, is not characterised by that fairness which is looked for in the Spectator.

The paragraph to the effect that the Bishop commits the offence for which he blames the Ritualists, by setting up "his own interpretation of the law against the interpretation affixed to it, or, at all events, believed to be affixed to it, by the Courts," is surely proof that my complaint is well founded. The Bishop, in truth, would only lay himself open to your charge if, after the Courts had expressly ordered him to institute Mr. Cowgill, he contumaciously refused to obey the order, and still held on to the exercise of his office as Bishop of Manchester. Nor is the difference between "affixed to it" and "believed to be affixed to it" one to be slurred over. If "believed to be" is the right phrase, then an explicit declaration of the law is plainly needed, in order to remove responsibility from those who act under the law.

A weak or a cowardly Bishop would have found ease and comfort in yielding to what appears to be an attempt to force the hands of an ecclesiastical authority, and so to discredit the action of the Ecclesiastical Courts; but the Bishop of Manchester has preferred to vindicate the law, even with the certainty of bringing on himself much personal ill-will.

Here, in his diocese, the Bishop's candour of mind and deep conscientiousness have been too abundantly shown, and are too fully appreciated, for your words to be of much account; but where confidence in his judgment and uprightness, through want of knowledge of his character, is more feeble, your censure may have undue weight, and, therefore, I beg you to admit to your columns at least one protest against its justice.—I am, Sir, &c.,

WALTER S. KINCH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have read with deep regret your remarks on the refusal of the Bishop of Manchester to institute Mr. Cowgill to the living of St. John's, Miles Platting. I agree with Mr. Hughes in the opinion that the Bishop has made a noble stand, and I think he deserves the support of all loyal Churchmen.

I, in common with my Evangelical brethren, deplore the action of the Bishop of London in the Mackonochie case, and consider it fatal to the introduction of true peace into our divided Church. It would seem as if the Episcopal Bench, with a few honourable exceptions, had ceased to resist the reintroduction of sacerdotal errors, both in teaching and practice, into the Church,—nay, had resolved to throw their shield over such errors, though they are opposed to the principles of the Reformation, and to the existing constitution of the Church, as established by law. The Evangelical body is still a power and an influence in the Church, though, to read some of the secular papers, one might think it was dead past revival; and many outside the Church Association are sorely grieved and troubled by the late official connivance with the sacerdotal conspiracy.

I trust a general expression of sympathy may before long be conveyed to the Bishop of Manchester, from those who admire the firmness and dignified moderation he has shown in circumstances of undoubted difficulty.—I am, Sir, &c.,

CHARLES D. BELL, D.D.

The Rectory, Cheltenham, January 3rd.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Is there not a fair defence of the Bishop of Manchester upon the charge of truce-breaking which you bring against him? There are two benefices now in exactly the same position as to avoidance by deprivation. In the one case, the patronage rests with a High Churchman; in the other, with a body of Evangelical Trustees. The way of peace would, apparently, be that no nomination should be made in either case; and the period of lapse, first to the Bishop and then to the Metropolitan, would afford ample time for the issue of the report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission.

But if the Bishop of Manchester had held himself bound to institute to Miles Platting, the Evangelical Trustees of Bordesley might reasonably have claimed a right to put a similar pressure on the Bishop of Worcester. As it is, the way is left open to these Trustees to abstain from nominating; and Sir Percival Heywood has intimated with sufficient clearness that the services at Miles Platting may meanwhile be conducted as the Bordesley services are now, sentences of deprivation notwithstanding. The London analogy is incomplete, as Mr. Mackonochie has not been deprived,—I am, Sir, &c., F. S. L.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Not wishing other than the right shoulders to bear the responsibility of holding an opinion with which Mr. Thomas Hughes disagrees, I write to say that the view that a Bishop "goes beyond the law in refusing to institute a man who will not undertake to keep within it," has been expressed by this journal, and by no other legal newspaper. Mr. Hughes may possibly think the difference between this journal and that to which you, Sir, erroneously attributed the opinion on December 23rd last, a difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee; but even the humblest individual is entitled to his own identity.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE EDITOR.

"Law Journal" Office, December 30th, 1882.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK AND THE FINANCE OF 1881-2.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I do not often see the Spectator when out of town, but the number for December 23rd I got because I wanted to read a friend's article on Landor. After that, I lighted on your praise of Sir John Lubbock's financial ability, &c. This, as general praise, is doubtless deserved; but surely his statement on the present occasion is not a perfectly fair statement. You may have a right to deduct from the expenses of 1882 the cost of the Afghan war, but not also that of the Egyptian war; utrum horum mavis, accipe, as the Latin grammar remarks. Subtract, if you please, the Beaconsfield expenditure; but then, you must add your own in its place, unless, indeed, by some formula of Midlothian logic, Sir John is entitled to assume that as all Tory wars are wicked and foolish, the Tory Ministers have to answer, in their guilt, for what such wars cost; whilst, on the other hand, all Liberal hostilities are wise and virtuous, and, therefore, the great heart of the nation refuses to consider Liberal Ministers responsible for their blood-money, but nobly looks upon it as its own debt. If that is the argument, it admits of no answer; only, of course, you do not expect it to be accepted by your obedient servant,

A FOSSIL TORY.

[Sir John Lubbock was not dealing with the present financial year, but with that ending March 31st, 1882, and with that he dealt completely. Of course, the cost of the Egyptian War ought to be counted, and will be counted in the finance of the present year.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNALS IN EGYPT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your note upon Egyptian affairs, in the last number of the Spectator, you allude to the difficulty, in regard to law reform, caused by the existing Capitulations. It is very true that these same capitulations are an obstacle in the way of improved criminal jurisdiction under purely native authority. But your remarks seem to imply that they also bar the progress of reform in civil cases. Now, it is just this civil side of the Egyptian Courts in which a great step has already been made. The International Tribunals were established by the Khedive Ismail to hear "mixed cases,"—that is to say, cases between either natives and foreigners or foreigners of different nationality. The Tribunals have worked well, on the whole, and have, I believe, been found very useful by the European colony in Egypt. There are foreign Judges of character and position in the service of the Khedive, and they form a majority in each of the International Tribunals. These Judges are appointed on the recommendation of their respective Governments, and their presence gives so complete a guarantee of the fairness of the Courts in which they preside, that the various Christian nations have been content to waive their Consular privileges to the extent of this "mixed" jurisdiction. Could not the treaty be revised, so as to include civil cases between foreigners of the same nationality, and also criminal proceedings wherein foreigners might happen to be concerned? The foreign element, so powerful in Egyptian affairs, would then be duly protected, and would have no reason to interfere with such reforms of the purely Native Courts as Lord Dufferin may persuade the Khedive to adopt.—I am, &c., Temple, E.C., January 1st.

J. HILARY SKINNER.

HARINGTON ANTIQUITIES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As the antiquities of my family seem to possess a greater interest for your readers than I should have supposed would attach to so unimportant a subject, may I be permitted, as its present head, to correct an error into which your correspondent "Exul" has fallen, with regard to its connection with the Gospatrics and Ormes?

Robert de Haverington, son of Michael, did not marry Joan, grand-daughter of Robert de Vipont, first Lord Westmoreland, but Agnes, sister and heir of William de Cancefield, who brought him large possessions at Aldingham. From this alliance were descended the three families of Harington (Barons) of Aldingham, Harington of Exton and Ridlington, and Harington of Hornby Castle, the two first of which I now represent in the male line.

The history of the transactions of the families of Gospatric Orme and Harington with the Abbey of Holm Cultram is to be gleaned from the cartulary of that Abbey, preserved amongst the Harleian MSS., Nos. 3,911 and 3,891. From these it appears that Gospatric, son of Orme, of Flemingby, granted Flemingby, with certain exceptions, to the Abbey of Holm Cultram, that this grant was reiterated by his son Thomas, with the consent of his brother Alan, and subsequently confirmed by Adam de Haverington, of Flemingby. The validity of this grant or confirmation was disputed by Robert, son of Michael Harington; and the issue, whether Adam, who is described in the proceedings as "antecessor ipsius Roberti," had granted or not, was tried by a jury, who found against the demandant, my ancestor, who then, and not before, quitted claim to the Abbot.

The precise nature of the relationship between Adam and Robert Harington I have never been able to ascertain, nor how Flemingby, which is stated in my pedigrees to have been held by Osulphus, my most distant traceable ancestor in the direct male line, in the time of Richard I., originally came into the Harington family. If "Exul" will give me his name and address, and assist me in throwing any light on this obscure, but to me interesting, question, I should be much obliged to him.

In conclusion, will you permit me to express my gratification at seeing the cudgels taken up for Mrs. Halliday. In the main contention which she made, that the Harington and Courtenay pedigrees were incorrect, with respect to the alliance of William, Lord Harington, of Aldingham, with Katherine Courtenay, she was conclusively shown to be right by the documents which she cited; and I should fancy that most of your readers will agree with "Exul" in thinking that the article finding fault with her general history was hypercritical.—I am, Sir, &c.,

RICHARD HARINGTON.

Whitbourne Court, Worcester, December 31st.

THE WIT AND WISDOM OF LORD LYTTON.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your notice of "The Wit and Wisdom of Lord Lytton," you ask, with reference to myself, "Why did he not remind us—though it be not always true—that 'the worst possible use you can put a man to is to hang him'?" Will you let me answer at once, for the simple reason that the Earl of Clarendon was the one who, early in the seventeenth century, when descanting, "in his younger dayes," upon "The Disparity between Buckingham and Essex," first employed the phrase that "hanging was the worst use man could be put to." See "Reliquiæ Wottonianæ," p. 201, a rare collection, made, according to its title-page, "by the curious pencil of the ever memorable Sir Henry Wotton, Kt., late Provost of Eaton College," and originally published in 1651 by Isaac Walton.—I am, Sir, &c., Athenæum Club, January 1st.

CHARLES KENT.

MRS. OLIPHANT AND BISHOP WILBERFORCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF "THE SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—So many people have been alarmed and dismayed by Mr. Wilberforce's indiscreet publication, that you will, perhaps, permit me to ask whether one should not employ the same rule in respect to written and posthumous gossip, which we freely and constantly exercise in respect to oral? When I am told that my friend has, behind my back, said something disagreeable of me, I pause (probably after the first sting of irritation), to ask myself whether the report of what he has said is at all characteristic, or like what he would probably say. When both the friend and the report are dead, is this rule inapplicable? I cannot see why it should be so. My attention has been called to a passage in Bishop Wilberforce's "Diary," in which he jots down a conversation with Mrs. Carlyle on the subject of my "Life of Irving," to the effect that I "did not understand him at all," with further remarks on the loveableness of his character (as if I had misrepresented that), and the conclusion that I was "narrow and jealous, and greatly the cause of submitting him [Irving] to his foes."

Now, I take leave to say, as I should have done had this been reported to me by word of mouth, that I do not believe that Mrs. Carlyle ever said anything of the kind. The Carlyles are at present, I think most unjustly, the sport of every scribbler, and any kind of mud will stick that is thrown at their desecrated house. But I, for one, believe in what I know of my honoured friends, rather than in what an analysing biographer may deduce, or an irresponsible diarist jot down through the fumes of careless talk. My conception of Irving's character was drawn in some respects from the inspiration of Mrs. Carlyle herself, so much so as to offend and annoy friends on the other side; and I kept back the letter she wrote to me on the publication of the book, from the number of her letters which I sent to Mr. Froude, on account of the too exuberant praise and report of her husband's approbation which was conveyed in it.

The cynical reader will say, perhaps, that this is no reason why Bishop Wilberforce's report should not be true. I utterly decline, however, to receive it, were it vouched for by a dozen Wilberforces.

This is not the only case in which the Bishop has put into the mouths of well-known persons utterances so uncharacteristic and unlike the supposed speakers, that those who know them stand aghast at the loose-lipped babble of a man whom they had considered the impersonation of reserve and discretion. In such a case, must we depart from all the usual rules of evidence in such matters, because the reporter is dead?—I am, Sir, &c., M. O. W. OLIPHANT.

PROFESSOR ROSCOE ON THE EXPERIMENTAL INOCULATION OF MADNESS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—With reference to your strongly-worded paragraph respecting Pasteur's experiments on rabies, I would venture to remark that your inability to detect, in the results to which you refer, the first glimmering of the flame which may illuminate the cause of one of the darkest and most awful of human diseases, is, to use your own words, "to us" men of science "extremely surprising."

We feel strongly that the objection taken by the Spectator to these noble endeavours to search out the cause, and, therefore, possibly to dispel the horrors of this disease, "is," again, to use your own powerful words, "one of the strangest of human superstitions," and "that the recklessness displayed," by the insertion of the paragraph in question, "in relation to the inevitable agony inflicted" (upon the human race), "is one of the most disheartening of all the moral symptoms of our time."—I am, Sir, &c., Manchester, January 1st.

HENRY E. ROSCOE.

[We have always favoured experiments in the inoculation of ordinary diseases like cattle-plague, which involve only common illness at most, and hold out hope of an important safeguard against any serious epidemic. The inoculation of madness is a totally different thing, involving a very certain and cruel torture for a result which, even if attained, hardly any one would use, since the bite of a mad dog is not a contingency probable enough to justify a serious, if not dangerous, inoculation. What would Professor Roscoe say of the morality of inducing diseases of the most agonising character tentatively even in convicts under sentence of death? Yet what more right have we to inflict these agonies on perfectly innocent creatures which are wholly at our mercy?—ED. Spectator.]

SIR NOËL PATON'S "DESIGNS FROM SHELLEY AND SHAKESPEARE."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As it is a matter that somewhat concerns my character for good-taste, and, indeed, for common-sense, will you kindly allow me to state in your columns, what has already been stated in another London weekly, that I am in no way responsible for the republication of the "Designs from Shelley and Shakespeare," which you "dispose of" in your issue of the 30th ult. with an amount of forbearance for which I am duly grateful? These designs were originally published in London nearly forty years ago, and have been dragged from their long obscurity without any knowledge or sanction on my part, and much to my annoyance and regret.—I am, Sir, &c., NOËL PATON.

33 George Square, Edinburgh, January 2nd.

POETRY.

MIND-STUFF.

SYSTEM DES TRANSCENDENTALEN IDEALISMUS.

"And oozoombs vanquish Berkeley with a grin."

You said that life was Lyric,—
Or Epic, was it, you said?
Your words are so wise at times, friend,
The meaning not seldom seems fled.
But perhaps 'twas the hearer at fault, friend,
And not the words that you used,
For I notice when you are wisest
My mind only gets more confused.
But Life, you say, is Lyric,
And you mean, I think, or I guess—
For the words "subjective subsistence"

Only puzzle me more, I confess—
You mean, I say, or I fancy,
That life is a sort of sham,
The result of a mental delusion
The conceit of a fancied "I am."
For I know you said, your friend, friend,
Was not the identical "I,"
But only a kind of phantasmos,
A myth, a deception, not I:
A picture, in fact, projected,
In mathematical phrase,
From the plane of a mental perception
On the plane of a mental haze.
You denied, I think I remember,
The existence of Matter per se,
And said it was only a "concept"—
No matter most certain to me—
And you spoke, I know, of "subjective,"
Of abstract, of concrete, of real;
And the scorn you put in your tone, friend,
Was certainly nothing ideal.
The mind, you told me, was only
The perpetual flux and the flow
Of certain perceptions we connote—
Another word, I believe, for "we know"—
That the "self" was merely a fiction,
The result of "connoting," in fact;
But nothing that really existed,
Save only in phrase, in abstract.
And then, I remember, you quoted
Some words that you said were by Hume;
No wiser could well have existence—
His words, not himself, I presume—
But I felt, as I heard you declaim them,
"True or false, I know, for my part,
I'm content to hold as sufficient,
'I think, I exist,' with Descartes."
For I gather, I think, as resulting,
If I take what you say to be true,
That yourself, friend, are only delusion,
And I but a function of you.
But still, it is curious and strange, friend,
After what you say is so plain,
That considering how close our relations,
We should differ so much in the main.
For, not to use words that are rude, friend,
Or to wax unneedfully hot,
I am clear that whatever I am, friend,
Most certainly you I am not.
And so, farewell, if you please, friend,
To your queer metaphysical stuff,
For though Life with you is delusion,
With me it is real enough.
"Life is a shadow," says Scripture,
But certainly not, as I'm taught,
A shadow, indeed, of nothing,
Projected on nothing from naught.

CHARLES W. STUBBS.

Granborough Vicarage, January 1st.

A R T.

ROSSETTI AT BURLINGTON HOUSE.

THE Royal Academicians, in their Academic capacity, can hardly have had a very merry Christmas-time. Scarcely had the last revels of Boxing Day ended, than Baron Huddleston and his jurymen were disposing of their pretensions to connoisseurship in sculpture and drawing, and ere the New Year has fairly "settled into its stride," the Council and President have drawn down upon themselves the general censure of the Press and the public, for the manner in which they have crowded into one small, ill-lighted room the chief works of a great painter's lifetime. So loud and so consistent, indeed, has been the condemnation passed upon their conduct in this latter matter that, we believe, for the first time in their history, they have been shamed into making some tardy and grudging amends, and, when we were at the exhibition on Wednesday, half of another small room had been utilised for hanging the Rossettis.

Mr. Dante Gabriel Rossetti was by no means an artist without faults. To the calm perfection which marks the works of many of the older artists, he never attained. To the last, there was in his painting, his drawing, and his manner of conceiving his subject, many peculiarities,—we might almost say conventionalisms. What may be just noted briefly in this connection is that these conventionalisms were in the main original ones, and though, perhaps, something analogous to them may be found in early Italian Art, they were, in no sense of the word, imitations of the practices of previous painters. The strange physical peculiarities which many people find so trying in Rossetti's women, are due, by no means, to any defective knowledge on the part of the painter, and still less, as we hold, to any deliberate affectation. It is perfectly easy to find in his poetry, as it was to see in his house and its furniture, that his mind consistently ran in a strange groove of mediævalism; and he chose the types of womanhood, and accentuated their peculiarities, which he found would best serve the purpose of his art. If there is one thing more certain about his paintings than another, so certain that even a second Belt jury would have to consider it, it is that their feeling is entirely natural and spontaneous. If ever a "passive master lent his hand," that master was Rossetti; and in looking at his work, one is chiefly possessed by the fact of its mastery over the man who executed it. This is not the painting of an Englishman of the present day, who is looking to mediæval Italy and trying to paint like its artists; it is the work of a man who in thought and feeling (as half by birth) is an Italian to the core, and who has so saturated himself with the literature, poetry, and religion of his countrymen of ancient times, that his real life is more that of Florence in the fourteenth, than London in the nineteenth, century. Had we space, it were interesting to compare him with Mr. Burne Jones, who wears his "rue with a difference," and try to show the discrepancies and similarities of their art; but here we can only pause to point out the great vital distinction between them. Mr. Burne Jones is a painter of the present, who regrets the past; Mr. Rossetti was a painter of the past, who ignored the present. By this, we do not mean that Mr. Burne Jones takes his subjects from the present, that is well known not to be the case; but that when he paints his old-world themes, he does so as a Modern, with a half-sick regret that they are past. But to Rossetti, they are not only alive, they are the only verities living. And this springs from the difference of what is sought to be represented. The living artist is wedded to the form of ancient life, as evidenced in the dresses, the architecture, the quaintnesses of movement, the peculiar, half-allegorical manner of representing it, which was adopted by the elder Italian painters, and with all these things he seeks to make his canvas beautiful. That is his aim. But Rossetti does not think about his ancient life at all, does not think very much about making a beautiful picture. What he does consider is how to tell something as truly as possible. That he tells it in terms of antiquity is owing to his being,—Rossetti. But, with him, truth means truth of emotion, and if he can gain that, he will surrender to it all else. He is, perhaps, the only painter in the world who deliberately works in the same picture on two totally distinct lines, the natural and the conventional, and succeeds in combining them without offence. The conventionalities which he introduces are so dramatically and emotionally natural, that the mind accepts them frankly, and, recognising their aid in enforcing the meaning of the picture, would not, if it could, have any more consistent treatment. In a matter like this, a painter's method must be judged by its results; and if the result is beautiful, the justification is complete.

One other point must be mentioned, before we speak of this more fully. We have not yet used the obnoxious word "pre-Raphaelite" in this article, but we must do so now, if only to remind our readers that in connection with that celebrated word and the brotherhood it denoted, one charge has been frequently made, and maintained up to the present time. It was said that, alike in the painting and the poetry of the school and its followers, there was an unhealthy exaltation of the sensual side of love. Without stopping to discuss that, let us ask if this can be alleged as against Rossetti's pictures. Taking them as a whole, the answer is most certainly, "No." And yet a very slight variation in the form of the question would necessitate a different answer, for never in the whole course of Art has there been a large collection of works by one painter in which the subject was so completely limited to various phases of love. It will be found, however, that in each of those pictures which represents a love-scene (and there are very many) it is, in so many words, an impossibility to think of the painter as taking a sensual view of his subject. From the whole Beatrice series, to that wonderful picture of "Found," which represents an incident of our own day, Mr. Rossetti's love pictures are free from any sensual or morbid suggestion, unless it be, as perhaps some would have us think, morbid to paint this matter at all. We should be disposed to say that as a painter of love and lovers, this art of which we are speaking has never been exceeded, perhaps never even approached. We know no corresponding paintings at once so free from exaggeration and defect of the sexual passion, they are neither ascetic nor sensual, but preserve the perfect and healthy balance of manhood and womanhood. To this must be added the remark that the larger single figures, in which no story is told, are not, perhaps, quite free from the charge above mentioned. Their luxuriance of beauty, their full lips, their masses of hair, their brilliancy of colouring, are more akin to the women of Rubens than those of Raphael; and the main impression that they convey is one of perfect and somewhat sensuous loveliness. But even in these there is almost invariably to be found a meaning which is absolutely distinct from the above expression; and the majority of them are embodiments of some definite poetic conception. In truth, in all Mr. Rossetti's work, his aim is to embody some poetic idea, to express in terms of colour and form certain thoughts and emotions. We do not say that his view of the province of Art was absolutely the highest, we do say that it was warped by shortcomings which were the inevitable results of the painter's life, nationality, and mode of thought; but when all allowance is made for the possible faultiness of his conception, and the admitted drawbacks in the manner in which that conception was wrought out, what are we to say to the work as it stands? Simply that it forms the most lovely series of pictures which we have seen in the whole range of modern Art, and to find a parallel with which, we must go back to Italy and her greatest masters. There is not a single living colourist in Europe (we will give our readers Asia, Africa, and America, in), whose pictures would not look cold and clay-like, if placed in this gallery; there is not a single colourist the world has ever seen, beside whose paintings some of these might not hang, and hold their own. We are not speaking hastily or in exaggeration in saying this; it is a literal fact that there is no lovelier colour in existence than that of which there are many specimens here. And here, before we close the article which touches the general view of Rossetti's Art, we must just note two of its other great merits, first amongst which is its power. There is not a feeble bit of work in the exhibition. Strange it is often, bizarre sometimes, but weak never. And again, its grace is very remarkable. The manner in which the position of the hands and arms and the poise of the head carry out the main idea has all the unstudied beauty of free, natural movement, as opposed to the manufactured grace of the schools. And, for a minor detail, the treatment of drapery has never in modern times been more successfully grappled with. From the slightest chalk sketches, to the most highly-finished oil pictures, the drapery is splendidly disposed and painted, with no small unmeaning folds, and still less with great, unbroken masses, such as used to mark what was called the "grand style." As a last word, it is consolatory to find that nine-tenths of the visitors to Burlington House pass through the four large first galleries unheedingly, and collect in crowds in the little room where the Rossettis hang, crowded, but triumphant.

BOOKS.

LIVING ENGLISH POETS.*

THE editors of this volume of selections from living English poets lay great stress on the principle they have adopted of presenting, "in chronological order, examples of the highest attainment, and none but the highest, of the principal poets of our own age." We cannot say that with regard to the chief poets of the day, we think that they have succeeded. In the case of Sir Henry Taylor and Browning they have succeeded tolerably, but in the case of Tennyson and of Matthew Arnold, who doubtless count for more than any remaining living poets, the editors seem to us to have carefully omitted specimens of the very highest work which these poets have achieved, while they have included not a few pieces of very inferior power indeed. Then, again, as to the chronological order, they should, we think, have had, and have told us that they had, the authority of the poet himself for their arrangement. If they have that authority, the public would have been glad to know it, and it would have added to the value of their book. If they have not that authority, we should be very slow to believe that they can support their own rather remarkable arrangement. Is it, for example, really true that "Tithonus," which was first published with "Enoch Arden" in 1864, was written before the "Princess," which was first published in 1847? The editors have placed "Tithonus" before the passage they extract from the "Princess," and must have, we suppose, Mr. Tennyson's authority for so doing. But if so, we wish they had told us so. We had always imagined that "Tithonus" had upon it the marks of the maturest and severest taste of the great poet who wrote it, while the "Princess," as a whole, is certainly the poem of a comparatively fanciful period. Still more extraordinary are the revelations concerning the dates of Matthew Arnold's poems. The piece placed last in the selection, "A Modern Sappho," appeared in the very first of Mr. Arnold's publications,—The Strayed Reveller and other Poems, by "A." (1849), and Mr. Arnold has included it, in the latest edition of his works, amongst what he calls his "early poems;" while "The Scholar Gipsy," which follows it in this selection, is not included amongst his early poems. Is it possible that "A Modern Sappho" was really written later than "The Scholar Gipsy," which has all the marks in it of a very much maturer genius, and which certainly was not first published till several years later? Even if it be true that "A Modern Sappho" was the last written of all the pieces selected by the present editors from Mr. Arnold's poems,—which we cannot but gravely doubt, till we are assured, on Mr. Arnold's own authority, that it is so,—we can only say that the selection from Mr. Arnold stands thereby self-condemned. A poet of Mr. Arnold's standing ought not to be judged by poems the latest of which is described by himself as an early poem. Speaking without, of course, any authority from Mr. Arnold himself, we should have said that the arrangement here given as one in "chronological order" is in Mr. Arnold's case almost the reverse of the truth. The poems given are these:—1, "To Marguerite;" 2, "The Scholar Gipsy;" 3, "The Sick King in Bokhara;" 4, "Lines Written in Kensington Gardens;" 5, "The World's Triumphs;" 6, "A Modern Sappho." We should have arranged them, judging partly by internal evidence, but more by order of publication, thus:—1, "A Modern Sappho" (classed by Mr. Arnold as an "early" poem); 2, "The World's Triumphs" (also classed by Mr. Arnold as an "early" poem); 3, "The Sick King in Bokhara;" 4, "Lines Written in Kensington Gardens;" 5, "To Marguerite;" 6, "The Scholar Gipsy." If, however, "A Modern Sappho" be actually the latest written of these poems, which we certainly find it hard to believe, it is quite certain that the editors of this book have deliberately excluded every specimen of Matthew Arnold's mature genius. For our own parts, we should have classed "The Scholar Gipsy" as one of his maturer poems, though by no means the maturest of them all. But of those selected, "The Scholar Gipsy" is the only one which seems to us to represent "the highest attainment" of any portion of this poet's career.

* Living English Poets. London: Kegan Paul and Co. 1882.

To pass now to the still more important point of the substantive adequacy of the selection itself. From Tennyson these editors have selected fourteen pieces, of which, in our estimation, only four, at the very most, "Love and Duty," "Tithonus," "The Northern Farmer (Old Style)," and "Rizpah," can be said to represent "examples of the highest attainment, and none but the highest," of this great poet. The other ten appear to us examples of very decidedly inferior attainment; and one piece at least, "The Sailor Boy," of which only the last verse is good, hardly deserves to be remembered as Mr. Tennyson's at all. Tennyson appears to us to touch his highest point in three very different directions; first, and, perhaps, highest of all, in lyrics of passionate regret, of which the editors give us simply no example; next, in poems of semi-dramatic, self-delineating monologue, in which either moods or characters are carefully painted, and of these we have here three noble specimens, "Tithonus," "The Northern Farmer (Old Style)," and "Rizpah," though not the noblest of all, "Morte d'Arthur" and "Ulysses;" and lastly, Tennyson surpasses almost all other poets in that swift, rich pageantry of the imagination which strikes off a landscape or a grand historic figure in some four terse and unforgettable lines, of which style, perhaps, the best examples are to be found in the "Palace of Art," and "The Dream of Fair Women." Of this last style, again, the editors here give us no single specimen. Now, what are we to say of a selection which, professing to give us "the highest attainment, and none but the highest," of Tennyson, omits not only "Break, break, break," perhaps the noblest lyric of its kind in the language, and "Tears, idle tears," but gives us absolutely no hint whatever of Tennyson's unequalled power in this direction? No poet who ever lived catches the unutterable sadness of unavailing regret, with so exquisite a delicacy as Tennyson. Even in quoting from "In Memoriam," the editors, with perverse ingenuity, have managed to select a passage, beautiful indeed, but fanciful, and certainly not specially marked by,—nay, we might even say, specially deficient in,—the dominating sentiment of the whole poem. To our minds, a selection from Tennyson omitting all the lyrics of passionate regret, omits all evidence of the highest reach of the poet's genius. It is obvious that the editors appreciate the self-delineative poems more justly, but even here to omit not only "Ulysses,"—that grandest of all its class,—but Cenone and the splendid vision of Arthur's last struggle with Sir Bedivere,—and even we might say, to omit a poem toned in a very different key, "Will Waterproof's Lyrical Monologue," while inserting such very second-rate productions as "The Sisters," the passage taken from "The Princess," "The Daisy," "Will," and worst of all "The Sailor Boy," seems to us very indifferent editing. We regret, too, the complete omission of the third class of poems in which Tennyson attains so unique an excellence. There are passages, and brief passages, in "The Palace of Art" and "The Dream of Fair Women" which contain richer and more vivid pictures on a smaller canvas than any other poet of our century could paint. But it is the omission of the more exquisite lyrics of regret which seems to us the most marvellous blunder of all.

In dealing with Matthew Arnold, the editors have been even less successful. Two very fine poems, "The Scholar Gipsy" and "The Sick King in Bokhara," they have given, nor should we have objected to "A Modern Sappho," as a specimen of the poet's "early" style. But to give us no example whatever of what Mr. Arnold has himself called the "criticism of life,"—neither "The Memorial Verses" on Goethe, Byron, and Wordsworth, nor the sonnet on "Sophocles," nor the lines on "Heine," nor the stanzas suggested by "Rugby Chapel," nor those on "The Grande Chartreuse," nor either of the poems on "The Author of 'Obermann,'" nor "The Youth of Nature," nor "The Southern Night,"—this is to give us Mr. Arnold without his most characteristic element, to leave the part of Hamlet out of the play of Hamlet. No lover of Arnold will admit that this selection gives us any adequate conception of his mature poetry at all. Indeed, to our minds, the omission of "The Memorial Verses," and the two noble poems addressed to "The Author of 'Obermann,'" is the omission of the most essential and the most striking of all the specimens of Arnold's genius.

Nor can we say that we are satisfied even with the selections from the minor poets. There are many things among Mr. Buchanan's poems—which deserved, we think, more than one extract—far more characteristic than the description of Drowsie Town. "The London Lyrics" are quite unrepresented here, though they contain the finest things Mr. Buchanan has written. Lord Houghton is represented only by the mawkish, sentimental song, "I wandered by the brook-side," though there are a dozen poems of his at least, far better marked with the imprint of his shrewd and worldly genius, and one, the poem on the Spanish Friar who showed Wilkie a famous "Last Supper," which is marked by a much higher tone of feeling. Mr. Lewis Morris is very inadequately represented by the pieces here given. There is not amongst them a single one of the fine pictures in "The Epic of Hades." Again, Mr. Aubrey de Vere is still more inadequately represented by the two pieces given, neither of which even approaches his best work. Mr. Woolner, too, seems to us passed over carelessly with a single quite insufficient extract. The most perfectly represented of the minor poets, at least, among those best known to the present writer, are, perhaps, Mr. Austin Dobson, from whom we have three exquisite little cameos; Mr. Gosse, of whom good specimens are given; Mr. F. W. H. Myers, of whose poetry the two pieces taken are admirable illustrations; and Mr. Courthope, with whom it was not easy to go wrong. But taken as a whole, we entirely deny that this selection presents at all an adequate idea of either the great poets or the small poets of our time. We are absolutely ignorant as to who the editors may be, but we are quite sure that their taste does not represent the best poetic criticism of the present day. Nevertheless, we need hardly say that a great deal of very true poetry is to be found in this volume, poorly as, in our opinion, it represents the poetic faculty of our countrymen.

THE FRIENDSHIPS OF MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.*

ABOUT thirteen years ago, Mr. L'Estrange published in three volumes a Life of Miss Mitford, "related in a selection of letters to her friends." The book, as we said at the time, abounds with delightful gossip and with personal reminiscences. True woman as she was, Mary Russell Mitford had the power of winning love not merely from friends admitted to close fellowship, but from men and women who knew her only by correspondence. Her pretty country cottage, with its lovely garden, may be said to have been known all over England, and from all parts presents of flowers and of books were sent to Swallowfield. She read voraciously, and her passion for books and flowers gave light and warmth to a life the anxieties of which would have crushed a less buoyant spirit. Miss Mitford, as all the world knows, had the misfortune to be cursed with a handsome, good-for-nothing father, in whose virtues she believed implicitly. He was her idol, and neither the reckless squandering of £70,000, nor the bitter fact that she was forced to work like a slave to keep the wolf from the door, lessened the glow of her devotion. "My life," she wrote, "is only valuable as being useful to him. I have lived for him, and for him only;" and she adds that she had lost her health in the struggle. Some of Miss Mitford's friends seem to have taken her word for it that this scapegrace of a parent deserved all the affection she lavished upon him. "Tell me anything of yourself," writes Miss Sedgwick, "anything of your noble father." The daughter's self-sacrifice is beautiful, but it is also not a little irritating. One does not like a sensible woman to set up an idol of clay, believing all the while that it is made of pure gold.

Affectionate and warm-hearted though she was, Miss Mitford does not spare her words in criticising books and men. She had strong prejudices and decided opinions, and expresses both with the utmost frankness. Uncle Tom's Cabin she cannot read, Longfellow's prose is trash, Leigh Hunt's want of truth prevents his being a poet, but "he might have been near to Chaucer, if he had only been true;" Wordsworth sat next to her one year in London four days running, "to the great endangerment," she writes, "of my admiration, for a man so wrapt up in the double worship of his own poetry, and of mere rank and riches in others, I never did see." She considers Dickens, Jerrold, and Bulwer Lytton "all so vulgar, in their different ways." She is indignant with "a lad called Vernon Harcourt," for writing "inflated and bombastic" letters to the Times, abusing her "dear Emperor," the Third Napoleon; sneers at Landseer for being "faithful to his worship of lords," and tells a saying of the late Alexander Smith, the impertinence and gracelessness of which seem well-nigh incredible. Carlyle is accused of writing according to the ill-humour of the moment, and without the slightest regard to consistency and truth; Macready is blamed for his "most offensive mannerism;" and Thackeray wins no praise for Emona, which she finds "tiresomely long." "The English novels of these days," she writes, in 1853, "seem to me the more detestable the one than the other. Dickens all cant (Liberal cant, the worst sort) and caricature; Thackeray all cynicism, with an affectation of fashionable experience; and the lady writers, the Miss Jewsburies, the Miss Lynns, and tutte queste, emulous of the passion and doing of George Sand, without her grossness, but also without her genius and her beauty." Miss Mitford's heart was open as day, and her strong feelings often overpowered her judgment. She declares that justice was not done by the newspapers to an oratorio called "Jerusalem," because the composer was a gentleman, well-born and highly educated. "Henry Chorley, who gives the tone to the musical critics, had the audacity to tell me so;" and she adds,—"Truly, of all the fine things Louis Napoleon is doing for France, none, to my mind, is so valuable as the putting down of journalism. That vile engine, the Press, is to genius of modern times what the rack was of old. I abhor it, not on my own account, for to me it is civil enough, but on the score of my betters."

* The Friendships of Mary Russell Mitford, as Recorded in Letters from her Literary Correspondents. Edited by the Rev. A. G. L'Estrange. 2 vols. London: Harst and Blackett.

On the other hand, Miss Mitford's judgment of herself is uniformly modest, and she does not over-rate her own work, except in preferring her dramas to her tales. The success of both was very great. At first, indeed, like almost all dramatic writers, she had great difficulties to encounter, and was "thrown about like a cricket-ball between Kemble and Macready," but ultimately her plays drew full houses, and for Rienzi the writer received "probably the largest sum given to any tragic author during the century." Of this drama, eight thousand copies were sold in two months. One of Miss Mitford's correspondents calls her a "great poet," which assuredly she was not. Her dramas are nearly forgotten, but the author of Our Village and of Atherton has taken a place in our literature which is occupied by few other writers. There is art in her stories, but no artifice, and the kind of charm we find in cottage gardens and woodland flowers. She pleases every one whose taste has not been depraved by sensational fiction, and it is scarcely fanciful to say that her pages have the fragrance of clove pinks, of lavender, and of southernwood. The success of these books was sufficient to satisfy the pride and ambition of any author, and they were as warmly welcomed in the United States as in England. "I must tell you," writes Mr. Fields, one of Miss Mitford's best friends and pleasantest correspondents, "with what delight I have read Atherton, and how everybody is charmed with it. Whittier wrote me to-day a note filled with expressions of his gratitude to you for writing such an exquisite story. Every page is a gem, and our newspapers and periodicals are outvying each other in their words of praise. I know of no book that has appeared for years which has been received with such an outburst of applause."

"You would soon get tired of authors, if you saw much of them," writes Miss Mitford, with perhaps a slight feeling of feminine spite; but it is evident from these volumes, and is one of the best traits in them, that her friends loved the woman even more than they admired the author. Several of Miss Mitford's own letters are given, but a large portion of the book consists of letters addressed to her, or written about her. The compilation is not always edited satisfactorily. We complained, when noticing the Life, that allusions were often made which, for lack of an explanatory note, the reader would not understand. A similar fault occurs in these volumes, which also contain matter that is almost, if not wholly, irrelevant. We have noticed, too, several errors, misprints, and misstatements, one of the latter being that a certain S. J. Pratt preceded Southey as Poet Laureate.

These errors affect the literary character of the book, but they do not greatly diminish its interest. It is eminently readable and entertaining, neither is it without suggestiveness. For example, one feels upon reading it, how few years suffice to sweep away many a literary reputation. We wonder whether any of our readers are acquainted with that prolific author, R. A. Davenport; with George Darley, who wrote volumes of poetry, and also, if we remember rightly, a mathematical textbook; with Courtier, who wrote the Pleasures of Solitude; with Pratt, the supposed Laureate, and author of the Tears of Genius; with Digby Starkey, whose poems, published in 1847, gave Miss Edgeworth "exquisite enjoyment;" or even with Mrs. Opie, who, after she became a Quakeress, was not permitted to invent a story. We wonder, too, if the once famous Mrs. Hofland has even seventy readers, for her seventy works; and whether a poem called "Passion Flowers," by Mrs. Julia Howe, which delighted the Quaker poet Whittier in 1854, retains any freshness of poetic beauty still?

After all, quotations from a chatty book like this are better than speculations. Here is a characteristic passage from a letter written at Keswick by Mr. Ruskin, who, in Miss Mitford's judgment, "is the best letter-writer of his or any age:"—

"I am recovering trust and tranquillity, though I had been wiser to come to your fair English pastures and flowering meadows, rather than to these moorlands, for they make me feel too painfully the splendour, not to be in any wise resembled or replaced, of those mighty scenes, which I can reach no more,—at least, for a time. I am thinking, however, of a tour among our English abbeys,—a feature which our country possesses of peculiar loveliness. As for our mountains or lakes, it is in vain they are defended for their finish or their prettiness. The people who admire them, after Switzerland, do not understand Switzerland,—even Wordsworth does not. Our mountains are mere bogs and lumps of spongey moorland, and our lakes are little, swampy fishponds. It is curious I can take more pleasure in the chalk Downs of Sussex, which pretend to nothing, than in these would-be hills; and I believe I shall have more pleasure in your pretty Lowland scenery and richly-painted gardens, than in all the pseudo-sublime of the barren Highlands, except Killycrankie.

I went and knelt beside the stone that marks the spot of Claver's death-wound, and prayed for more such spirits—we need them now." And here is an account still more characteristic, of a conversation between Carlyle, whom Miss Mitford evidently cannot tolerate, and Fields, the American publisher, in her judgment the most brilliant of talkers, whose conversation "is for your pleasure and his own, without an idea of display;"—

"So, Sir, you're an American?" quoth the self-sufficient Scotchman. Mr. Fields assented.—"Ah, that's a wretched nation of your ain. It's all wrong. It always has been wrong from the vera beginning. That grete mon of yours—George (did any one under the sun ever dream of calling Washington George before), 'your grete mon, George, was a monstrous bore, and wants taking down a few hundred pegs.'—'Really, Mr. Carlyle,' replied my friend, 'you are the last man in the world from whom I should have expected such an observation. Look at your own book on Cromwell! What was Washington, but Cromwell, without his personal ambition and without his fanaticism.'—'Eh, Sir,' responded Carlyle, 'George had neither ambition, nor religion, nor any good quality under the sun.—George was just Oliver with all the juice squeezed out!' Another thing in Carlyle displeased him (Mr. Fields) far more; every one knows that Emerson makes him a perfect idol, and it was thought that if Carlyle cared for any one in the world, it was for Emerson. I have heard it said of them, they are not only like brothers, but like twin-brothers. Well, remember that Emerson and Hawthorne both live at Concord, and you will appreciate the kindness of Mr. Carlyle's speech. 'Isna there a place called Concord-near ye? What like is it?'—'A pretty little New England town,' was Mr. Fields' answer, 'of no political importance, but lively and pleasant as a residence.'—'Pretty! lively!—ye ken I had fancied it a dull, dreary place, wi' a drowsy river making believe to creep through it; slow, and muddy, and stagnant, like the folk that inhabit it.'"

We have not space even to recount the number of notable personages introduced in these pages. Miss Sedgwick, Miss Edgeworth, Mrs. Trollope, Mrs. Howitt, Mrs. Holland, and Mrs. S. C. Hall, Eliot Warburton, Serjeant Talfourd, Mrs. Opie, N. P. Willis, and last and best of all, Miss Barrett, who will be better known in poetical history as Mrs. Browning, all take a share in the story of Miss Mitford's life. Barely more than a quarter of a century has passed since Miss Mitford's death, and now, with one exception, for Mrs. Howitt is still living, all these friends of hers, and many more that might be mentioned, have been gathered to their fathers. It is after reading a narrative like this, recorded in letters from persons whose voices and features are still remembered, that one feels the truth of Burke's saying,—"What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!"

MISS BURNEY'S CECILIA.*

In his Diary written in London in 1826, Sir Walter Scott records an interview with Madame d'Arblay. The passage is worth quoting, for the author of Evelina describing the triumph of her youth presents a pleasing picture:—

"Madame d'Arblay told us that the common story of Dr. Burney, her father, having brought home her own first work and recommended it to her perusal was erroneous. Her father was in the secret of Evelina being printed. But the following circumstances may have given rise to the story:—Dr. Burney was at Streatham soon after the publication, where he found Mrs. Thrale recovering from her confinement, low at the moment and out of spirits. While they were talking together, Johnson, who sat beside in a kind of reverie, suddenly broke out,—'You should read this new work, Madam, you should read Evelina, every one says it is excellent, and they are right.' The delighted father obtained a commission from Mrs. Thrale to purchase his daughter's work, and retired the happiest of men. Madame d'Arblay said she was wild with joy at this decisive evidence of her literary success, and that she could only give vent to her rapture by dancing and skipping round a mulberry-tree in the garden."

Evelina, though not an elaborately constructed story, like Cecilia, has a freshness about it which we look for in vain in the later novel. The style is better, and the characters are less laboured. As the work of a young woman of twenty-five, it is indeed a remarkable production, but the praise it received from Fanny Burney's contemporaries will probably excite the surprise of the modern reader. Dr. Johnson's admiration of the tale seems to have been unbounded, and Cecilia equally delighted him. "Sir," he said to Boswell, with an air of animated satisfaction, "Sir, if you talk of Cecilia, talk on." He loved the woman, too, as well as her novels, called her his sweet Fanny, talked to her, to apply Swift's phrase, in the "little language" of endearment, and spoke of her to the last with the tenderest affection. The praise Fanny Burney won in those days, and the folly of her proud father in promoting her to the dignity of a waiting-maid to Queen Charlotte, spoil her for literature. Her style was never a good one, and it grew worse as she grew famous. Dr. Johnson, despite Macaulay's assertion, gave her no assistance in Cecilia, for he states that he never saw a word of the "little rogue's" book before it was printed. Evelina, as we all know, was written without his knowledge, and yet both these novels abound with passages that show the influence of the Great Cham of letters. In the earliest chapters of Evelina we meet with sentences like the following:—"A youthful mind is seldom totally free from ambition; to curb that is the first step to contentment, since to diminish expectation is to increase enjoyment." And again,— "Their regard may be mutually useful, since much is to be expected from emulation, where nothing is to be feared from envy."

As pictures of manners, Evelina and Cecilia have not lost their interest. Fanny Burney, as Miss Ellis suggests, in her admirable preface, probably learnt more from reading and seeing plays than from reading novels. She failed, as Scott failed, when she attempted to write a play; but her situations are dramatic and her characters are more true, perhaps, in some respects, to the stage of the eighteenth century than to the town life of that period. The incidents she frequently depicts have the vulgarity of the plays which amused the groundlings a century ago. Her style of writing borders upon farce, and her characters, unlike Miss Austen's, with which they have been absurdly compared, are distinctly "stagey." The incongruity that exists between the conduct of her dramatis personæ, and the positions in which they are placed, is astounding. Something must be allowed for the story, and in Evelina the coarse effrontery and selfishness of the Branghtons may pass for a true picture; but that a girl brought up as a lady and with a lady's instincts should be introduced to such scenes as she witnessed at Ranelagh, Marylebone, and Vauxhall, and that a rake like Sir Clement Willoughby should have belonged to the set in which Mrs. Mirvan moved, is incredible. Evelina is more than once in real danger from his advances, yet she declares that though his style of gallantry is disagreeable, no man can "make more fine speeches, while his language, though too flowery, is always that of a gentleman." But Sir Clement is a more natural character than Madame Duval, while that grossly vulgar woman is not so much lacking in verisimilitude as Captain Mirvan. And the farce, for such the story frequently becomes, instead of exciting laughter, creates a feeling of annoyance, if not of disgust. Witness, for instance, the scene in which Captain Mirvan and Sir Clement Willoughby unite in frightening Madame Duval out of her wits, and in spoiling her fine attire to boot, at the time she is a guest in the Captain's house. Brutal tomfoolery of that kind would not have been tolerated by Miss Austen, whose sense even of broad humour is more humane, while her humour generally is infinitely more subtle.

Lord Macaulay has said that Fanny Burney first showed how a tale might be written "in which both the fashionable and the vulgar life of London might be exhibited with great force, and which yet should not contain a single line inconsistent with rigid morality, or even with virgin delicacy." Some exception must be made to this statement. To say that Miss Burney is ever an immoral writer would be ridiculous. She is, indeed, far more moral in purpose than many of the novelists of her sex whose tales are in demand at Mudie's. But the scenes she describes show, to say the least, a familiarity with the evil side of London life and an acquaintance with some forms of vice which, while far from being incompatible with rigid morality, seem a trifle inconsistent with virgin delicacy. This is most apparent in Evelina, a girl whose mind has been formed by Mr. Villars, a country clergyman. She is, he says, as innocent as an angel, and artless as purity herself; yet to her guardian she does not hesitate to relate the conversation of town rakes, as well as their actions. The accounts of the evenings at Vauxhall and at Marylebone Gardens, familiar to every one who has read the story, whatever may be their merit, do not exhibit the special virtue insisted on by the essayist. Another point strikes us in Evelina. The girl is more ashamed of associating with her vulgar relatives, the Branghtons, than of her intercourse with Sir Clement, who belongs to the coarsest type of libertine; and to confess to her lover, Lord Orville, that she is staying in Holborn, instead of in a more aristocratic neighbourhood, is a terrible mortification to her pride!

Illustrations of an age in which the heads of criminals figured on Temple Bar abound in Fanny Burney's pages. Let us give one or two examples. Lord Orville is a hero of the most refined and exalted type. When at Bristol Hot Wells, he drives Evelina and her temporary guardian to their lodgings; and on reaching them Mrs. Selwyn says:—

* Bohn's Novelists' Library: "Cecilia; or, Memoirs of an Heiress." By Frances Burney. With a Preface and Notes by Annie Raine Ellis. 2 vols. London: Bell and Sons. 1882.

"I suppose, my lord, you would have been extremely confused, had we met any gentlemen who have the honour of knowing you."—"If I had," answered he, gallantly, "it would have been from mere compassion at their envy."—"No, my lord," answered she, "it would have been from mere shame, that in an age so daring, you alone should be such a coward as to forbear to frighten women."—"O!" cried he, laughing, "when a man is in a fright for himself, the ladies cannot but be in security, for you have not had half the apprehension for the safety of your persons that I have for that of my heart." He then alighted, handed us out, took leave, and, again mounting the phaeton, was out of sight in a minute. "Certainly," said Mrs. Selwyn, when he was gone, "there must have been some mistake in the birth of that young man; he was undoubtedly designed for the last age, for he is really polite."

Politeness, in Fanny Burney's age, according to her showing, was, indeed, rare among fine gentlemen. One day, when on their way to the pump-room, Evelina relates how they were much incommoded by three gentlemen who were "talking very loud, and lounging so disagreeably that she knew not how to pass them."

"They all three fixed their eyes very boldly upon me, alternately looking under my hat, and whispering one another. Mrs. Selwyn assumed an air of uncommon sternness, and said, 'You will please, gentlemen, either to proceed yourselves, or to suffer us.'—"O! ma'am," cried one of them, "we will suffer you with the greatest pleasure in life."—"You will suffer us both," answered she, "or I am much mistaken; you had better, therefore, make way quietly, for I should be sorry to give my servant the trouble of teaching you better manners." Her commanding air struck them, yet they all chose to laugh; and one of them wished the fellow would begin his lesson, that he might have the pleasure of rolling him into the Avon; while another, advancing to me with a freedom that made me start, said, 'By my soul, I did not know you, but I am sure I cannot be mistaken! Had not I the honour of seeing you once at the Pantheon?' I then recollected the nobleman who at that place had so embarrassed me."

In Cecilia, as in Evelina, the love-making is much of the type with which Sir Charles Grandison once made novel-readers familiar. This is how Delville parts from his lady-love:—

"Farewell, then, most amiable of women, and may every blessing you deserve light on your head! I leave to you my mother, certain of your sympathetic affection for a character so resembling your own. When you, Madam, leave her, may the happy successor in your favour—" He paused, his voice faltered. Cecilia, too, turned away from him; and uttering a deep sigh, he caught her hand, and pressing it to his lips, exclaimed, "O great be your felicity, in whatever way you receive it!—pure as your virtues, and warm as your benevolence! Oh! too lovely Miss Beverley!—why, why must I quit you?" Cecilia, though she trusted not her voice to reprove him, forced away her hand, and then, in the utmost perturbation, she rushed out of the room."

We have said that we do not consider Cecilia equal to Evelina, but to say, as a voluminous living writer has said, that it is "as stupid, lethargic, and affected" a story "as can be found in the entire library of fiction," is to betray an ignorance both of fiction and of life. There are affectations of style, no doubt; there is much in it foreign to the taste of our age, and we cannot, as Miss Ellis observes, sympathise "with the tender and 'elegant' readers of 1782—from Mrs. Chapone, whose nerves were shattered, even to the loss of sleep for a week, to the Duchess of Portland and Mrs. Delany, who thrice wept their way through the five volumes." On the other hand, the farcical humour of the story, its touches of pathos, its variety of character and incident, its weaknesses even, as well as its strength, are far beyond the mark of a common-place novelist. It has a place, though not a very high place, in literature, and we are glad that the publishers have seen fit to bring out the tale, now a century old, in so readable a shape. The editor has done her part with skill, and with a knowledge that shows no sign of having been acquired for the occasion.

TWO WORKS ON KANT.*

It is a remarkable fact that, until quite recently, we have had no biography of Kant in the English language. The great German metaphysician has exercised a most powerful influence on English thought. The works of Sir W. Hamilton, Dean Mansel, and Mr. Herbert Spencer show distinct traces of this influence, and modern Agnosticism in this country is, perhaps in some degree, the outcome of his speculative teaching. It seems strange, then, that no one should hitherto have undertaken to give us some knowledge of the man himself. Works on Kant there are in abundance, and Professor Caird has written upon his philosophy better, perhaps, than any one else, German or English. But his biography was a desideratum, and we are glad to see that Professor Stuckenberg has at last supplied the want. We may at once say that he has presented the public with a valuable and interesting work, written in the most conscientious spirit, and evidently the result of much labour and research. He speaks pathetically in his preface of the difficulties he has had to cope with, and of the scant information which he gained at times, after greatest pains taken. "One may glean long," he says, "and on many a field, and as the result of his labours bring home only a light sheaf, and even that nearly all straw." However, the net result of his gleanings is eminently satisfactory, and the book before us will, we are sure, be read with interest and real profit by every student of Kant's philosophy. The interest of the biography is mainly psychological. It is rather as the history of the peculiarities and progress of Kant's mind, of his habits and character, than as a narrative of events, that it is valuable. Kant's life was, indeed, uneventful, and during many years of his professorship at Königsberg, the history of one week, or even of one day, is the history of the whole year. We shall here only reproduce one or two remarkable facts in his mental constitution, which may throw light upon the character and writings of the man.

Professor Stuckenberg most justly says that it is unfair to judge Kant by the Kritik der reinen Vernunft alone. The moral element was intensely strong in his character, and exercised a supreme influence over his view of life as a whole. Although his intellect was cold and critical in analysis, he was frequently aroused to great enthusiasm, when speaking of moral or religious questions. And certainly at one part of his life he by no means regarded this habit as an amiable weakness, but rather looked upon those who thought it unreasonable, as persons of small mind and mean understanding. "Whoever is more powerfully inspired by a moral emotion as a principle, than others, on account of their cold and often ignoble heart, are able to appreciate, is, in their estimation, an enthusiast," he writes with contempt. Jackman, in his reminiscences of Kant, gives the following account of his experience in the matter:—

"How often did Kant speak with rapture of God's wisdom, goodness, and power, when conversing with his friends on the structure of the world? How often he spoke touchingly on the blessedness of a future life! And here the heart both of the philosopher and the man spoke, giving indubitable testimony of his emotions and honest convictions. One such conversation on astronomy, during which Kant was constantly inspired by his theme, was not merely enough to convince every one who heard him that he believed in God and Providence, but it would also have changed an Atheist into a Believer."

The absolute regularity of the philosopher's life, his habits of study, his powers of acquisition, his sense of humour, his extreme sensitiveness, the slowness with which he formed his views, and the tenacity with which he adhered to them, his simplicity of character, his powers of conversation, his complete and unintermittent absorption in his own thoughts,—these and many other peculiarities are dwelt upon and illustrated by Professor Stuckenberg. Kant had a great contempt for mere knowledge of facts, if it was not systematised and impregnated with philosophy. This habit of mind led him by degrees to an extraordinary overestimate of the value of a priori argument, which was utterly unreasonable, and would surprise us in a man of his exceedingly cautious and philosophical temper, did we not remember how common a penalty of genius is intellectual eccentricity. We think it worth while to extract at length an instance of this remarkable phenomenon:—

"He had come to the conclusion in 1798 that Napoleon could not have the intention of landing in Egypt, but that while he pretended to be fitting out an expedition against that country, he was really preparing to enter Portugal. It was his opinion that England would feel most keenly the capture of Portugal by the French, owing to the important commercial relations between those two countries. So satisfactorily had he demonstrated to himself this supposed stratagem of Napoleon, that even after the French had landed in Egypt and the Government had announced the fact to all Europe, he still asserted that the expedition was against Portugal, and that the announcement to the contrary was only a pretext to mislead the English."

It may be new to some, as it was to the present writer, that Kant was the first thinker to whom it occurred that the universe, as it exists at present, might have been evolved by the known laws of attraction and repulsion from a nebulous mass. In other words, he was the originator of what is known as the nebular theory, although Lambert, who propounded the same hypothesis some years later in his Cosmological Letters, did so, we believe, without any previous acquaintance with Kant's work, which appeared in 1755, and was entitled, General Natural History and Theory of the Heavens; or, an Essay on the Constitution and Mechanical Origin of the Whole Universe, discussed according to Newtonian Principles.

* The Life of Immanuel Kant. By J. H. W. Stuckenberg, D.D., late Professor in Wittenberg College, Ohio. London: Macmillan and Co. 1882.
Kant. By William Wallace, M.A., LL.D., Fellow and Tutor of Merton College Oxford. Edinburgh and London: William Blackwood. 1882.

Mr. Wallace's little book on Kant, which is one of Professor Knight's useful series of "Philosophical Classics for English Readers," seems to us a work of unequal merit. He says, in his preface, that it "has been partly shaped by the desire not to tread, more than was inevitable, on ground which" recent English writers on Kant "had already occupied with greater plenitude;" and it is doubtless to this desire that we are indebted for the very interesting résumé of the first part of the Kritik der Urtheilskraft, given in the thirteenth chapter. Kant's analysis of the sense of beauty and sublimity is unknown to many who are familiar enough with his Critique of Pure Reason and his ethical works. Among the many psychological facts noted by the philosopher in this connection, is one which has always struck us as curious and interesting, and is, if we remember rightly, spoken of by Mr. Ruskin, in his recently-published Arrows of the Chase. Whence comes it that a painting, if perfectly faithful to nature, possesses for us, in many cases, extreme beauty, when the original is common-place and uninteresting? A lover of art will go into an ecstasy of admiration over a well-painted hand. He will note the perfection of the flesh-tint, the accuracy with which each vein is traced, the grace of every curve, and will say, as the highest praise he can give, that it seems like a real human hand, standing out from the canvas. But, after all, it is difficult to explain wherein its especial beauty lies. No doubt, the skill of the artist who can note so accurately and reproduce the exact features and details in the appearance of a hand, excites marvel and admiration. But in what, especially, consists the beauty of the picture, when the highest praise we can give it is that it closely resembles a human hand? There is, doubtless, a certain beauty in the human hand, but it would seem to fall far short of and to differ from that unique artistic beauty, which we perceive in the picture. If one who was gazing at the latter with delight were suddenly told that it was no picture, but, like Peg Woffington's portrait, a real hand inserted through a hole in the canvas, half its charm would be gone. And yet the curves, veins, and flesh-tint would be not one whit less perfect. We are inclined to think that the true explanation of this is somewhat similar to a parallel phenomenon in music. A beautiful melody, if heard constantly, ceases to arouse any emotion. Our sense of the beautiful in its regard becomes dulled. But we sometimes find that if it is performed in an unaccustomed way—for instance, by an entirely new combination of instruments—our faculties become once more stimulated by this element of freshness, and our enjoyment of it is as keen as ever. This very thing happened recently to the present writer, who heard a beautiful air by Mozart, whose charm he had deemed destroyed for ever by the agency of repeated barrel-organ performances, executed on a mandolin and guitar by Swiss peasants. And just as the novelty and cleverness of the performance aroused, in this case, a keen sense of the beauty of the piece, so, we suggest, is a sense of the beauty of the human hand, which has been lost on account of our familiarity with it, aroused by the stimulus given to him who notes with admiration the wondrous skill of the artist. The hand itself really possesses all the beauty of the picture, and doubtless Adam admired it as much in nature as we do in art. But to us, it is too familiar in nature to be appreciated, without some especial stimulus given to our faculties. This we take to have been Kant's view, when he said, with almost epigrammatic tersehess, "Nature was found beautiful, when it looked at the same time as if it were Art; and Art can only be called beautiful if we are conscious that it is Art, and it yet appears to us as if it were Nature."

Kant's analysis of "the Sublime" is interesting and suggestive, and deserves to be reproduced. Mr. Wallace thus summarises it:—

"An object is styled sublime, when the perception of it stimulates the imagination to grasp in one single picture the mass of details, and imagination falls short of the task; or when the feeling of its overwhelming power, as compared with our physical weakness, suggests immediately, by way of counterpoise, the thought that there is in us somewhat which all the efforts of physical force are powerless to subdue. In both cases (Kant distinguishes them as the mathematical and the dynamical sublime), the strange pleasure which we take in what is too great for imagination to apprehend as a unity, or too powerful for the unchecked buoyancy of flesh and blood to feel at ease in its presence, is due to the revelation that we have a higher vocation and a nobler humanity, which commands the imagination by a vague idea, and keeps us tranquil amid the grandeurs of Nature."

This last passage recalls the German philosopher's well-known saying, which has thus been rendered:—

"Two things there are that fill the mind with awe,
The starry heavens, and our sense of law;"

and this leads us to speak of that most remarkable element in Kant's philosophy,—the Categorical Imperative. If Kant, as some say, heralded Agnosticism by the Kritik der reinen Vernunft, he certainly suggested also the antidote to modern Agnostic principles in his Kritik der praktischen Vernunft. Man's "sense of law" is daily becoming more unmistakably the rallying-point of those who oppose the Evolution psychology. The unique character of conscience and of the sense of duty, may be called the central doctrine of Christian Ethics. If this is disproved, their distinctive characteristic is gone; and where this is acknowledged, the author of the Moral Law cannot be ignored or passed over. Two of the greatest Christian philosophers of the last century or the present, Bishop Butler and Cardinal Newman, insist on no principle more strongly than on this,—that our sense of moral obligation is the most important channel whereby the existence of a personal God becomes known to the individual mind. On this subject Kant is very explicit, and Mr. Wallace gives an excellent summary of his teaching. The hypothetical imperative—that which a man is warned to do, if he desires to be happy—is contrasted with the categorical imperative of true morality, which commands without condition, and refuses to be explained or analysed into anything else than the absolute law of our moral nature, irrespective of consequences, and complete in itself:—

"To ask why we ought to obey the moral law is absurd, because any explanation would only destroy the morality of the law. We cannot comprehend the practical, unconditional necessity of the moral imperative; we can only comprehend its incomprehensibility. But that unaccountability has important consequences. As imperative, it seems to be a stranger and an outsider; as moral, it must be within us. The recognition of the authority of the moral law is known as the sense of duty, and in duty there is set before us a necessitation,—we feel that we are obliged to act in such and such a manner. And this sense of subjection to law, of limitation—this presentation of the moral idea as an imperative, and of the realisation of that idea as duty—is the peculiarity, according to Kant, of morality as human."

We are inclined to think that the two subjects of which we have spoken are those most successfully handled by Mr. Wallace. The biography is not uninteresting, although it is, of course, from its limited dimensions, less attractive than the other one which we have noticed, by Professor Stuckenborg. Where, we think, he fails is in his account of the Kritik der reinen Vernunft, which, whether or no it is substantially correct, is difficult and heavy reading. The value of a work of the scope and dimensions of Mr. Wallace's depends much, as it seems to us, upon the clearness of its thought and expression. This, indeed, is the only quality which would render it preferable to a translation. The writer is supposed to have digested Kant, and to present him to us in a simplified form. Mr. Wallace has not, we think, always succeeded in doing this; and we doubt, in some instances, whether he has clearly apprehended his own thought. He would have been all the better for some of Mr. Huxley's "ineradicable tendency to make things clear," which renders that writer's Life of Hume—a book of the same scope and aim as the present—so lucid and interesting. However, no doubt the obscurity of Kant's own style has much to answer for in this respect.

THE MAGAZINES.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD are probably not delighted at the slur cast on them by the proposal to establish a new Conservative magazine, and Blackwood for January contains quite a small volume. It has been increased from 142 pages to 174 pages, and contains two stories, two political articles, and four other papers, of which Miss Faucit's criticism on Imogen is the longest. It does not interest us, but the story of "The Ladies Lindores" advances well, and "A Singular Case" is most original. We doubt if the most practised novel-reader would foretell the dénouement of a story which seems impossible, and is probably in essentials an exact account of well-ascertained facts. We shall not reveal the secret, but would ask the author whether a man whose memory has disappeared suddenly from a particular date would not be well aware that he was not as other men, and be inclined to discuss that matter, at all events with intimate friends or doctors. The paper called "A Little Chat about Mrs. Oliphant" tells us nothing about the personality of that charming novelist, whose books the late Mr. Charles Darwin never ceased reading, and seldom closed without the remark that "people do not quite appreciate Mrs. Oliphant yet." We cannot agree with the writer's criticism of her works, except, indeed, in his hearty admiration of Katie Stewart, and hardly understand his comparison of them with each other; but he has at least given us, for the first time, we think, a list of them. Mrs. Oliphant has, we see, written over fifty regular novels, not including the half-dozen or so now publishing, of which at least twenty-five reach, in our judgment, a very high level. We wish Messrs. Blackwood would induce her to publish those twenty-five in a series at about 7s. 6d. a volume, not omitting that very powerful, though painful, sketch of a rotten character, which is now, we think, forgotten—"The House on the Moor."

The New Year does not open well for the Magazines, though Longman's has decidedly improved in interest. The Fortnightly for January contains no essay of much mark, and one, on "The New Rules of Procedure," by Mr. G. Byron-Curtis, besides being an anachronism, is tedious; but there are plenty of fair papers. Sir R. Temple, for instance, discusses a very grave question—the probability of the rise of any dangerous religious ideas in India—with great knowledge of the subject, deciding, finally, that the probability is very slight. He is a little vague, but his governing impressions are evidently that, although the Mussulmans expect a Mehdi or Teacher, and the Hindoos hope for some leader with an afflatus from above, neither feeling is much more than a yearning, which for a long period may come to nothing; while the only definite religious movement—that of the half-educated towards the mysticism taught by Keshub Chunder Sen—does not threaten the influence of the West. Sir Richard Temple, however, adds this ominous and, as we judge absolutely, true remark, which should never be forgotten by any one who studies India:—

"One among the lessons learnt by Anglo-Indian statesmen from the Mutiny was this, that when once a spirit of fanaticism and of national ambition shall arise, once a resolution to have done with foreign masters shall be formed, considerations of material advantage, of regularly received emoluments, of security to agriculture, trade, and industry, are flung to the winds. Although men are much wiser after these events, yet if before those events they had questioned themselves regarding the probability of such occurrences, the answer would have been that surely natives had become too deeply interested in the continuance of peace, too sensible of the benefits thereby acquired, too timid of risking their prosperity, to think of insurrection. This was true, indeed, of the mass of voiceless, easy-going people, but not at all true of many classes whose influence would for the moment determine the course of events. With such classes, the benefit from British rule was counted as dross, in comparison with the pleasure of reasserting Indian nationality. The bearing of the Brahmins in Benares, of the territorial classes in Oude and Behar, of the Mahrattas in Western India, of the Muhammadans almost everywhere, of the Sikhs after (though not during) the crisis,—attests what was to us a melancholy truth."

That—the existence in all classes of influential natives of a strong Indian feeling, which is not exactly patriotism, but which is that India, the secluded continent, ought to belong to its people—is the real danger to our rule. It remains quiescent for years on years, but the moment it is excited, "common-sense" vanishes, the fire is in the prairie, and in a week British rule is dependent solely on the English sword. Sir George Campbell argues in favour of a total abandonment of Egypt, Tewfik Khedive being made really independent, not as a very safe course, but as the safest practicable. He thinks if Great Britain retains any direct control she will be vulnerable to Europe, which will attack her there. As nothing prevents Europe from attacking us in Malta or in India, except our command of the sea, we do not see much in the argument. Egypt on its two desert sides is readily defensible, and we should have armies for its defence procurable by two seas. M. "Jehan de Paris" reviews the evidence for the existence of any secret society in France, and finds none, but his argument is a little a priori. That the majority governs is true, and it may, therefore, act openly; but why should not a dangerous secret society represent a minority? Because it would not be dangerous? We do not find that to be true in the case of Thuggee, and political offenders can use dynamite, the torch, and the revolver, as the Thugs could not. Any secret society may be dangerous, if it is only fanatical and careless of life. The "initiated" followers of the Sheikh of the Assassins can never have exceeded a thousand or two. Mr. Wedmore has an interesting and, we think, sound criticism of the School of Impressionists which has arisen in Paris, and which seeks to reproduce the momentary impression received from any scene, careless of refining, or, indeed, of altering it; Mr. Woulfe Flanagan deprecates Home-rule for Ireland once more, as fatal to her future, her people being still uneducated in governing; and Mr. F. Pollock concludes his striking series of essays on the history of the science of politics. His conclusion is the true one,—that the State is more than an organisation for the protection of life and property, and that it may justifiably seek to promote all noble ends which associated man is capable of seeking. Mr. G. Russell, in prophesying about the coming Session, doubts if its action in Egypt has strengthened the Government, but hopes for a long array of domestic Bills, of which the one evidently nearest his heart is Sir Henry James's Bill to defeat corruption at Elections. He reasons in favour of severe legislation in this direction from a side too often forgotten,—the excessive burden imposed by corruption upon the active men who even now injure their careers for the public good. We doubt if so much can be done next Session as Mr. Russell thinks, and entirely disagree as to his estimate of the Home Secretary. Sir W. Harcourt is a very able man, but the Liberal party is not going to fight under his banner.

Mr. Raikes's paper in the Nineteenth Century is noteworthy, as the first grave Tory protest against the absurd Beaconsfield mythus now so rapidly growing up. Mr. Raikes holds that leader to have been greatest when abstaining from action, and to have frequently committed grave errors when he began to move. His ideal of a Leader of Opposition is Lord Hartington, with his pertinacity, courage, and "saving common-sense," and it will, we fear, be poohpoohed by impatient spirits among the Tories, and even by men who, like Mr. W. St. John Brodrick, in the next paper, think the great need of the Conservative party is a definite programme, and who would take up with "Relief to agriculturists, retrenchment, and philanthropy," for want of a better. We suspect the old cries of the party, "Landlord interests, no cheeseparing, and no cant," were more effectual, as well as more sincere. Prince Krapotkine gives a horrible account of the Russian prisons, the most definite portion of which is a statement that torture is habitually practised on political prisoners, two in particular, Adrian Mikhailoff and Ryksakoff, having been submitted to torture by electricity. That frightful abuses may occur in the prisons of an empire we all know, from the revelations as to torture in Southern India made at a time when the Government was honestly and furiously opposed to any such practice; but why do not the Nihilists address themselves more directly to this single abuse, convince Europe of its existence by testimony less liable to the suspicion of exaggeration than their own, and then make terms with the Czar for its suppression? It is not the interest of the dynasty to support its subordinates in these excesses of power. The paper is ghastly reading, and much of it—for instance, the narrative of Madame C—, with its constant acknowledgment of any kindness received—gives a strong impression of truth. Scenes quite as terrible as the one she describes occurred in our own prisons before Howard began his work, and will always occur where brutal gaolers are entrusted with large powers, and where money for scientific management is not procurable. The first reform would be to abolish the secrecy of Russian prison life by allowing inspection from outside, and we must still believe that Prince Krapotkine's idea that reform is hopeless is an expression of that despair which seems to have fallen on most Russians like a disease. Why should reform be impossible, while there are Russians who feel these things as Prince Krapotkine obviously does? If the Prince will read the next paper to his own, "The Girl-children of the State," by Mrs. Trench, he will know that cruelty may exist in free States, and in spite of the most determined efforts to suppress it. It is perfectly maddening to read of the dull, callous cruelty with which, if Miss Trench may be trusted, little children are treated in some English workhouses, and to know that if the facts could but be brought before the people, the remedy would be so quick. We do not understand, by the way, why, if the managers of the Kilburn Orphanage believe the stories here published, they do not lay the facts, with names, dates, and localities, before the Local Government Board, with a view to prosecution. Do they actually know that girls (vide page 81) have been killed by "sheer cruelty" in workhouses? The account of the "National Party in Egypt," by M. Ninet, Arabi's Swiss adviser, is worth reading, if only for its sketches of individuals and of existing laws, one of which, the Egyptian law of foreclosure, would in India produce an insurrection. We distrust M. Ninet's views entirely, but many of his facts are substantiated from other sources, and if he invents, he invents with an intention worth studying.

The best paper in the Contemporary Review is Mr. Herbert Spencer's on America, most of which has appeared before, and has been sufficiently discussed. We may, however, we presume, from the reappearance of his views here, conceive that in his deliberate judgment, the dangers of the United States are, first, the transfer of power to an oligarchy of political wire-pullers, and secondly, the destruction of vital force, not only in this generation, but in the race, by over-ferocious competition. The first danger is real, and differs very little from the old danger from self-seeking demagogues; but is the second danger actual? That the foremost class in America will consume itself in its haste to be rich, we think probable; but as far as we can see, the millions who will evolve new and ever new foremost classes are already revolting against overwork. They want to limit labour to eight hours a day, which, though quite enough, will kill nobody. Everything tends in the Union to the production of a leisured class, who do not now, it is true, care about politics, but who will care about them, and when they care will, as candidates, greatly attract the people. That at least has been the course of events in all other countries, and there is nothing in America except the general well-being to make it a separate continent. When the great war broke out, the wealthy came forward in dozens, and so far as we could perceive, and we had occasion to watch, obtained commands quite as readily as they would in England. The article on "Panislamism and the Khalifate" is by an author whose name the editor thinks it expedient to conceal, but there is hardly sufficient visible reason to justify that rather pompous introduction. The writer's view is that if Arabi had been successful, the Turkish Khalifate would have ended; and he is inclined to believe that if the Sultan surrendered the spiritual throne to the Shereef of Mecca, he would be stronger in his empire. The Sultan thinks differently, and probably knows his own business. The writer surely forgets that a Shereef who was also Khalif would also pronounce the Sultan an Infidel, or an enemy of Islam, and so dethrone him. That England should no longer support the Ottoman Khalifate is, we think, clear; but the main reason for abandoning it is that Ottoman power in Europe has been shown to be pure evil. The Rev. G. T. Stokes, writing of the Bollandists and their great work, the "Acta Sanctorum," which has been continued for three centuries, fills more than sixty huge volumes, and is not finished yet, maintains that though credulous, they have tried to tell the truth, and have saved and reprinted many documents important to history. Mr. Lilly commences under the title of "The Religious Future of the World" another of his able, and eloquent, though, as we think, one-sided protests against materialism; and Mr. H. Dunckley ("Verax") points out with great force that Democratic Toryism has so far shifted its ground as to be landed in this dilemma,—that either Tory ideas are untrue, or, if the electors voted against Monarchy, Monarchy ought to be abolished. If Tories think there are institutions beyond the control of the people, how are they Democrats? If they do not think so, how are they Tories? That is the question that Old Conservatives have been asking since 1866, and have not received, and will not receive, any reply. Nevertheless, the Englishman not being logical, there are, and will continue to be, Democratic Tories.

In Macmillan, Mrs. Oliphant proceeds with her story, "The Wizard's Son," intended apparently to be half-supernatural; Mr. J. Cotter Morison gives us a most kindly, perhaps over kindly, sketch of Carlyle, in which he only forgets, as it seems to us, the peasant element in Carlyle's nature,—that is, the element which is perpetually and at all points standing up in self-defence; and Mr. A. J. Wilson describes, with a half-cynical smile, the first result of the success of teetotal legislation, the instant smash of all existing methods of taxation. We do not believe in teetotalism; but the danger of direct taxation is certainly no argument against it, nor do we suppose that Mr. Wilson thinks it is. Mr. Freeman writes pleasantly of Anthony Trollope, but the time for estimating the personal character of the novelist has hardly arrived. He was, we imagine, a curious instance of an original and, in many respects, fine character, shot with streaks that were probably hereditary. Certainly, his works leave on us the impression of a certain double drift of taste.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Corneille and Racine. By Henry M. Trollope. La Fontaine, and other French Fabulists. By the Rev. W. Lucas Collins, M.A. (Blackwood.)—In the first of these two volumes of "Foreign Classics for English Readers," the average excellence which has been reached by the series is fairly maintained. Besides giving a general account of the two poets and their works, it deals at length with three tragedies of each author, as well as Le Menteur, and Racine's only comedy, Les Plaideurs. The weak point of the volume is in the translations, of which the author rather oddly says:—"Save in a few passages in the Cid, where the version, in the measure of the original, has been supplied by a friend, he has thought it better to render the meaning of the French verses into English prose, than to attempt verses of his own. He is not aware of any English translation into verse of the plays of Corneille which would be endured now, even by the most patient reader. The best, perhaps, is Ambrose Philip's English version of Racine's Andromaque." Prose translations of French tragedy come, in our opinion, under the general head of books "which cannot be read except with sorrow." But when the alternative is such verse as,—

"Each instant that he lives after this crime Prolongs his shame, and with his infamy, mine,"

one is tempted to think that, even regarded as verse, the prose is better. We can heartily commend Mr. Collins's volume. The sketch of La Fontaine is full of anecdote, and the fables chosen are exceedingly well translated. But especially good is the account of earlier and later French fabulists, which occupies nearly half the book. Many of the fables introduced in it will be new, we think, to most readers. Two very good ones are "The Confession of the Ass, the Fox, and the Wolf," and the following:—"The Wolf was ill of the glanders, and made a vow to Heaven that if he should recover, he would forswear the eating of flesh, and become one of the brethren of the Chartreuse. He soon got well, and on first taking his walks abroad, he met a fine, fat sheep. His mouth watered at the sight,—but he remembered his vow. 'Heaven bless you, Master Salmon!' quoth the Wolf, by way of greeting. The other assured him that he was no fish, would not venture into the water for his life; he was the son of a sheep, of very honest parentage,—nothing more. 'That is no matter to me,' said the Wolf; 'you have all the look of a salmon to my eyes, by St. Siquat! and as a salmon I shall treat you.' And so he ate him up on the spot." We have not space to quote one of the verse translations, but may instance as excellent the version of "The Clock and the Sun-dial," by Houdard de la Motte.

With the publication of Ferdinand's Adventure (Routledge), we are glad to welcome back Lord Brabourne to his old seat on the back of the nursery hobby-horse. He should never have left it for party politics, the Channel Tunnel, and a peerage that blisters. It is possible, indeed, that this collection of stories in the old style of Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen may be really a number of political satires well disguised; the last one, in particular, "The Bird War," has a look of something of the sort. But taking the volume as bona fide, we have nothing but hearty praise for Ferdinand's experiences among various lower animals, whose slave he is for a time compelled to be. Others of the collection, such as "Dora and Claude" and "The Lost Children," are equally clever and humorous, and perhaps pleasanter.—Messrs. Routledge also send us Songland, a series of ditties for children, selected, arranged, and composed by William M. Hutchison—an admirable collection, very humorously illustrated; Little Lays for Little Folk, selected by John G. Watts—the illustrations, of a graver sort than those in Songland—are also specially worthy of notice; and Sunny Days and Snowdrop, two capital little picture-books for children.

The Fourth Book of the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. By Hastings Crossley, M.A., Professor of Greek in Queen's College, Belfast. (Macmillan.)—Seven years ago, Mr. Crossley tells us that he "conceived the idea of producing such an edition of Marcus Aurelius as should tempt those who have not entirely forgotten the Greek of their youth, and who are yet interested in that most fascinating of all studies, the history of ethics, to read the thoughts of the Emperor in their original form." Finding it impossible to secure in the present or in the near future "the ample leisure sufficient to enable one to saturate one's mind with the literature and thoughts of the period," Professor Crossley now publishes an instalment, consisting of Book IV., with revised text, translation, and commentary. It will be seen that more than one class of readers is provided for; for each the work has been done with a care and skill which make us regret the book is likely at present to remain a fragment. The translation is clear and readable, while the commentary is full of valuable illustration. In an appendix is reprinted from Hermathena Professor Crossley's most interesting article on the correspondence of Fronto and Marcus Aurelius, with an account of its discovery by Cardinal Mai.

The Larch: a Practical Treatise on its Culture and General Management. By C. Y. Michie. (W. Blackwood and Sons.)—This is a really valuable book, and an interesting one also. It is clearly the outcome of much practical experience in larch-planting and management. In twenty-six chapters, Mr. Michie gives the story of the introduction of the larch, descriptions of the soils and situations suited for its favourable growth, the rearing and management of the young trees, and the characteristics, value, and uses of larchwood. Nor does the author omit to say something about the picturesqueness and ornamental character of the larch; he adds a few illustrations representing famous trees, such as the Dunkeld larches and those at Mouzie Castle. Some of these and other equally fine specimens have attained a height of over one hundred feet, and a girth of twelve to sixteen feet at three feet from the ground, while their ages range from one hundred and forty years and upwards.

Mr. Alcock, the author of "The Spanish Brothers," has just published two works—The Csar (Nelson) and The Roman Students (Unwin)—which, from their peculiar character—their bringing history to the aid of Evangelical religion—should make excellent gift-books for readers of a certain appreciative class. The two books are, however, of unequal merit. The Csar, which is a story of the struggle of Russia with the First Napoleon, is a well constructed, historically realistic, and enjoyable one. Alexander I. is an admirable portrait, and, in the main, correct, though flattering. The two heroes, Ivan and Henri, who turn out in the long-run to be cousins, are also well drawn; and their adventures, many of which are based on fact, are related with much spirit. In his other book, which is ostensibly a tale of the Renaissance, Mr. Alcock seems to have got beyond his historical depth. The chapters descriptive of life in Constantinople and Rome are, however, vigorously written.

The Steam-engine and its Inventors. By R. L. Galloway. (Macmillan and Co.)—Here we have the story of the steam-engine once more told, and told carefully and clearly. Mr. Galloway does not take us back beyond the seventeenth century, but begins with the invention of the air-pump and the construction of pneumatic engines. In succeeding chapters he describes the experimental engines of Papin, Newcomen, and Savery, before giving full details concerning the further progress made by Watt, Trevithick, and their contemporaries and immediate successors. The narrative is not continued to a later date than 1830. The volume is illustrated with woodcuts and plates.

In Stories of Old Renown (Blackie and Son), we have that now veteran literary caterer for the young, Mr. Ascott R. Hope, retelling such old tales as "Ogier the Dane," "Patient Griselda," "Guy of Warwick," and "Généviève of Brabant." A peculiar vein of humour differentiates Mr. Hope from other writers for boys, and in this book it is well supported by the efforts of his illustrator, Mr. Gordon Browne.—Count up the Sunny Days, by C. A. Jones (Wells Gardner), is a book of a very different sort, dealing with every-day, not to say "low" life. But it is thoroughly deserving of commendation. The moral of the story is wholesome; several of the characters, especially "Little Binkie," are admirably drawn; and the incident of the "return from the dead" character with which it closes is a pleasing surprise. The illustrations, of the "outline" variety, are clever.—The Boys and I (Routledge) is a child's story, by Mrs. Molesworth, who displays her wonted skill in revealing the mysteries of the infantile character. It is perhaps too long, but the telling of several of the incidents, such as "The White Dove," is marked by a felicity that is truly touching.

An Englishman's Views on Questions of the Day in Victoria, by C. J. Rowe (Trübner and Co.), may be thoroughly recommended as a compact little handbook of the various questions that at present press for solution in our leading Australasian colony—Protection, land, railways, education, public works, and the suffrage—written by a man who has evidently done his best to master them. Mr. Rowe takes an anti-Berryite view of most matters in Victoria, but his book is none the worse for that. He points out one thing in connection with the recent reform, and broadening of the electoral basis, of the Legislative Council of Victoria, which has escaped the attention of most writers—certainly of most English writers—on the subject. Under the Reform Act, the electors of the Upper House are also electors for the Lower. As out of a total electorate of 200,000 in the colony these number 108,000, they have really 216,000 votes, as against 92,000 electors with only 92,000.

Abu Telfan; or, the Return from the Mountains of the Moon, a novel, by Wilhelm Raabe, translated from the German by Sofie Delffs (Chapman and Hall), is introduced with a considerable flourish of trumpets by the translator as "one of the best novels that have lately appeared in German." We are also informed that "one of Raabe's chief charms is his rich vein of the truest, most genial humour." We confess, however, that we see nothing in Abu Telfan to justify such enthusiasm. It is most unconscionably long drawn-out. The plot is involved, and the tragedy with which the story ends appears quite unnecessary. It is impossible to say whether the hero, Leonhard Hagebucher, who returns to his native Germany from imprisonment in Darfur, is more fool or German metaphysician. As for Raabe's humour, we sometimes find in it far-off echoes of Sterne—and of Mr. Toole—and it is quite genuine, so far as it goes; but then it goes such a little way, after all, and the vein is so poor. This may be all insular prejudice and ignorance, but we utterly fail to see in the author of Abu Telfan a new light in the firmament of fiction.

MINOR POETRY.—The Legend of St. Olaf's Kirk. By George Houghton. (Houghton and Co., Boston; Trübner and Co., London.)—In this booklet we have a narrative in verse, founded on a Scandinavian legend. The author names "Prior's Ancient Danish Ballads" and Oehlenschläger's "Tragedy of Axel and Valborg" as having suggested the theme, but says that in this, its second edition, his poem has been much expanded, besides undergoing material changes. There is some vigorous writing and successful rendering of local characteristics, which help us to realise the sough of the biting winter wind, and the wild charge of the snow-flurry in the mountain-pass. The treachery of Prince Hakon to the friend of his youth and the patient fidelity of Valborg are sharply contrasted. Perhaps the writer's happiest efforts are those which illustrate Nature in her varying aspects. Axel's return to Norland after his seven years' exile is so pleasant a picture, that we quote a few lines from it:—

"Each sight and scent and sound
Spoke to him, saying, 'Welcome!' Still the air,
But filled with small, sweet noises, plaint of gulls
Circling their young, the flight of cormorants,
Waves lapping on a beach; nearer at hand,
Brooks babbling, larches talking low together,
And from the vales below, under the hills,
The far, faint buzz of labor, that now seemed
A pleasant pastime; and he longed to stand Among the workers, working to be found."

—Leolyn, and other Verses. By Herbert Gardner. (Remington and Co.)—As a contribution to the lyric poetry of our day, this volume deserves a cordial welcome. There are some pieces of considerable merit in a collection of poems almost all of which are above the average, passages in which modern thought finds expression in very graceful and sparkling verse, free, too, from overstrained and exaggerated sentiment, though not wanting either depth or tenderness. The song "Between the Green Corn and the Gold" is, in particular, very pretty. We believe that Mr. Herbert Gardner will win greater distinction as a poet, when the gift he possesses shall have had time to develop.—Mary Magdalene: a Poem. By Mrs. Richard Greenough. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—The subject of this book does not commend itself either by the good-taste shown in its treatment, nor, having regard to the slender thread of narrative concerning the Mary Magdalene of the Gospels, by its historical vérité. It is true that in the popular mind the Mary who is stated to have been the victim of demoniacal possession, is identified with the woman of sinful life who came to the Saviour in the Pharisee's house. The assumption is, however, rather hypothetical. The picture, repulsive in itself, of certain aspects of society in Jerusalem is drawn for us as if with a serene satisfaction by the writer, and though not from a sense of its exaggeration, one is more displeased by such elaborately ornate description. We feel that a theme selected from one of the most touching episodes of the Gospel narrative—a simple story tricked out in this artificial guise—is so far spoilt for us; it seems like building on a noble structure "wood, hay, and stubble." The verse, though giving evidence of culture, and of some power in the mastery of detail, fails to impress us as poetry. It is stilted, and it lacks spontaneity.—The Consolation: a Poem. By George Gerrard. (Hunter, Rose, and Co., Toronto.)—There is an unintentional irony in the title of this book. Anything more calculated to depress even the buoyant spirit than this dreary dissertation in verse, it would be difficult to find. If the author is ambitious to distinguish himself in literature, we would advise him to take steps preliminary to that end by turning his attention to decent prose composition, and, for the present at least, to eschew verse.—We pass next to Life's Pathway, and other Poems. By Thomas Leech. (Satchell and Co.)—We cannot grudge the writer—a constable of the Metropolitan Police—the solace he seems to derive from essays in verse, and whatever their merits or demerits, the author at least has some claim on our sympathy and indulgence. No great results are, perhaps, to be expected from such desultory efforts in literature; but it is natural that, with such ability as he possesses, and encouraged by the approval of friends and patrons, Mr. Thomas Leech should wish to strike out a path for himself other than the customary beat.—In Echoes of Song, by a Cambridge Undergraduate (Newman and Co.), we have a book of trashy effusions, which are simply below criticism. Faulty in rhythm, faulty in grammar, such compositions could scarcely find admission, one would think, into the columns of one of our provincial newspapers. A schoolboy with any taste for versification might surely express himself with more regard to sense and syntax than this Cambridge Undergraduate.—There is not much that calls for comment in Anne Boleyn: a Tragedy in Five Acts, by the Author of "Palace and Prison," "Ginevra," &c. (C. Kegan Paul and Co.)—Why does the historical drama of our day so seldom rise, in point of literary achievement, above the level of a résumé in respectable verse of a well-worn story? Little more than this can be said of the work before us. It gives but slight evidence of dramatic power, not much distinctness in characterisation, and, moreover, the verse is too often disfigured by feeble and halting lines.

—Our Holiday among the Hills. By James and Janet Logie Robertson. (William Blackwood and Sons.)—In this collection of poems the summary of contents is as follows:—Part I., Songs; Part II., Scenes; Part III., Satires; Part IV., Psalms; Part V., Horace in Homespun. There is a marked inequality in these verses, perhaps explained by the double authorship; but as no indication is afforded, nothing pointing to James or to Janet, the reader is left to his own inferences. It strikes us that some of the weakest of the poems are to be found among the "Satires." To pen a really good satire, a master-hand is needed, and in these verses we miss the subtle edge and the keen point which the weapon, deftly used, should possess. We must protest against such words as "jewel" and "rule" being made to rhyme:—

"Load them with gem and jew'ly,
And pearl and purple fine—
Not these, not these, the Kings that rule
By right divine!"

How comes it that among the "Psalms" we light upon a poem called "A Railway Accident"? By an accident, surely, it must have found place there. Part V., "Horace in Homespun," will be best appreciated by readers familiar with the Scottish dialect. "A Transformation" is unquestionably good, and will be understood and felt by most dwellers in Britain, more especially in North Britain.—The Flying Dutchman, and Other Poems. By E. M. Clarke. (Satchell.)—Here the first and longest of some five or six "Ballads of the Sea" gives the title to a book of verses occasionally marked by much spirit and fire, but too often sinking to a most provoking tameness. Of these, the "Bell of the Sklangenzan" is the best, and "Erline" the poorest; but some excuse may be made for it—though not for its publication—if it was written, as it claims to be, when the author was in his fourteenth year. The translations strike us as really the best part of the volume; that of "A Sonnet on Majorities," in particular, is not without cleverness.

NEW NOVELS.—Royal Angus. By Lord James Douglas. (Bentley and Son.)—If Lord James Douglas's picture of the life, the aspirations, the conduct, and the conversation of young men of the class to which he himself belongs, is to be accepted by rational beings as even approaching to the truth, his lordship has furnished democracy with an argument and a plea of no insignificant strength. It has seldom been our lot to read so vulgar a book as Royal Angus, in which the adjectives "royal" and "reckless" are used as Christian names, by an author as "regardless of grammar" as Mr. Barham's people, who "all cried, that's him." My lord and my lady swarm all over the pages; "noble lords" are always "drawing on" their gloves, except when they are pulling them off; and a "noble youth," who lives for what decent people are accustomed to regard as the lowest forms of excitement; who is an habitual gambler, an impecunious debtor, a "sponge" on his more respectable elder brother and his silly sister-in-law, finishes his career by a deed of reckless rashness, and is eulogised as a "noble, fearless, unselfish man." With questionable taste, Lord James Douglas has introduced into a singularly unpleasant work of fiction the tragic circumstances of the death of his own brother, the lamented Lord Francis Douglas, on the Matterhorn, several years ago. This, however we may regard its interpolation into the narrative, is the one feature that redeems Royal Angus from a dead-level of snobbishness.—Proper Pride. (Tinsley Brothers.)—Only a pair of fools could possibly have been parted, in the early days of their happy married life, by a device so clumsy and absurd as that to which the author of Proper Pride has resorted, in order to bring about the separation of Sir Reginald and Lady Fairfax. This objection to the construction of the story being stated, we desire to record the pleasure it has given us to read a bright, clever novel, full of interest, distinguished by good taste and an excellent style, in which the author accomplishes the feat of making us forget she is proceeding all the time from a basis of utter nonsense; that the imbroglio which constitutes the story could not have occurred in real life, and if it had occurred, would have been dispelled by return of post. The device of the letter found in the lining of an old gown, which clears up everything, is not new, but it is borrowed with effect in Proper Pride. The author of this novel will, we make no doubt, write many a better one.—The Turn of the Tide. By Lady Margaret Majendie. (Bentley and Son.)—This is a pretty story of the beginning of the French Revolution, before the tide had reached the full, and swept over the old régime with the effacing force of 1793 and 1794. The author fails to invest her characters with the tragic interest of the time, but she tells the eternal story of love, youth, obstacles, pride, constancy, and final triumph, fairly well, and the stamp of refinement and good-taste is set upon her story.—Grey- stone Abbey. By Emily Foster. (Wyman and Sons.)—Miss Foster's book is a proof that young writers believe that failure is the only road to success, or she would surely have taken the trouble to avoid the glaring deficiencies in construction of plot and delineation of character which make Greystone Abbey a warning to all novices in literature. Without being unduly exacting, a reader may fairly require the novelist to write naturally, to construct clearly, and to make his characters talk like human beings. Miss Foster does none of these things, however. Her story tells how a rightful heir was deprived of his patrimony by the intrigues of his sister and her husband, how he left the ancestral home, and under an assumed name achieved competence and marriage. Ultimately, evil actions bring their own punishment, and the right people get the estate, and settle down to opulent happiness. A description of a fire will please those who are connoisseurs in unintentional humour. With this exception, there is nothing in the novel to interest the least critical reader.

Light: a Course of Experimental Optics. By Lewis Wright. (Macmillan and Co.)—The main characteristic of this well-written and amply illustrated handbook is its practicalness. Science teachers who are determined to teach optics as they should be taught ought to welcome this book cordially. It is original in method and material. The explanations of the phenomena of light here described are as full, as clear, and as precise as are the instructions for the making and using of the apparatus needed for their demonstration to a class. This book, moreover, can be read, used, and, we may add, enjoyed, by those students of optical phenomena who are not conversant with mathematics.

The Acclimatisation of the Salmonide at the Antipodes. By Arthur Nichols. (Sampson Low.)—The difficulties which have been at last successfully met in the introduction of our salmon into Australasia are faithfully described in this volume.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK.

Beale (A.), Queen of the May , 16mo.....	(B.T.S.)	3 0
Bourne (C. E.), Great Composers , or 8vo.....	(Sonnenschein)	3 6
Baxton (H. J. W.), The Illustrated Handbook of Art History (S. Low & Co.)		5 0
Dentow (W.), Records of St. Giles's, Cripplegate , 8vo.....	(S. Low & Co.)	4 0
Donnelly (J.), Ragnarok, the Age of Fire , or 8vo.....	(S. Low & Co.)	12 6
Fenn (G. M.), Elfr's Children , 3 vols. or 8vo.....	(Chapman & Hall)	31 6
Homer's Iliad , Done into Prose, by A. Lang and Others, or 8vo.....	(Macmillan)	12 6
Jeanette, or 8vo.....	(Houlledge)	3 6
Kent (G. E.), Darkened at Noontide , or 8vo.....	(Sonnenschein)	10 6
Kinglake (A. W.), The Invasion of the Crimea , Vol. 7, or 8vo.....	(Blackwood)	6 0
Kirtton (J. W.), Cheerful Homes , or 8vo.....	(Ward & Lock)	3 6
Legge (M.), Life of Consecration , or 8vo.....	(Nisbet)	8 6
Macdonnell (J.), The Law of Master and Servant , 8vo.....	(Stevens & Sons)	25 0
Macmorran (A.), The Married Women's Property Act , or 8vo.....	(Shaw)	5 0
Mosley (J. B.), Lectures , &c., or 8vo.....	(Rivington)	10 6
Parker (J. J.), Apostolic Life , Vol. 1.....	(Simpkin & Co.)	8 0
Park (J.), Kit, a Memory , 3 vols.....	(Chatto & Windus)	31 6
Playfair (W. S.), Systematic Treatment of Nerve Prostration (Smith & Elder)		3 6
Powell (H. J.), The Principles of Glassmaking , or 8vo.....	(Ball)	3 6
Powell (E. B.), Maxims from Writings , 16mo.....	(Rivington)	2 0
Rawlinson (G.), The Religions of the Ancient World , or 8vo.....	(B.T.S.)	4 6
Robinson (C. E.), Royal Warren , 4to.....	(Simpkin & Co.)	35 0
Robinson (S.), Scary Thoughts on Wealth , or 8vo.....	(S. Low & Co.)	5 0
Sedgwick (W. J.), Light, the Dominant Force of the Universe	(S. Low & Co.)	7 6
Smith (A. E.), Knight of Castle (The) , 12mo.....	(Ward & Lock)	3 6
Sparks (W. E.), Our Village Mission , 12mo.....	(Rivington)	3 0
Stephens (L.), Notes from the Sick Room	(Smith & Elder)	2 0
Tait (A. C.), Sketch of the Public Life of , 12mo.....	(Nisbet)	2 6
Tolmer (A.), Reminiscences of a Chequered Career , 2 vols.....	(S. Low & Co.)	21 0
Turgeneff (I.), Virgin Soil , 12mo.....	(Ward & Lock)	2 0
Twigg (R.), Sermoes , or 8vo.....	(Griffith & Farran)	7 6
Tyrell (E. Y.), Dublin Translations , &c., 8vo.....	(Longman)	12 6
Whitfield (F.), Holy Footprints , 18mo.....	(Nisbet)	1 6
Ziegler (E.), Text-book of Pathological Anatomy , 8vo.....	(Macmillan)	12 6

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE SPECTATOR."

	Yearly.	Half-yearly.	Quarterly.
Including postage to any Part of the United Kingdom.....	£1 8 6	0 14 3	0 7 2
Including postage to any of the Australasian Colonies, America, France, Germany,.....	1 10 6	0 15 3	0 7 8
Including postage to India, China, &c.....	1 12 6	0 16 3	0 8 2

SCALE OF CHARGES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

OUTSIDE PAGE, TWELVE GUINEAS.
Page.....	£10 10 0
Half-Page.....	5 5 0
Quarter-Page.....	2 12 6

Five lines and under, 5s. and 9d. per line for every additional line (of eight words).

Displayed Advertisements according to space.

Special Contracts for a Series of Three, Six, or Twelve Months.

The SPECTATOR can be had on Sunday mornings at Mr. K. Nilsson's, 212 Rue de Rivoli, Paris.

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

It is particularly requested that all applications for Copies of the SPECTATOR, and Communications upon matters of business, should not be addressed to the EDITOR, but to the PUBLISHER, 1 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,846.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1883. [REGISTERED FOR] PRICE.....6d.

TRANSMISSION ABROAD. } BY POST, 6d.

THE WEEK	37	Dr. Benson's Letter to the Truro	50
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		Clergy	50
The Immediate Future in France	40	Relief of Local Taxation.....	50
Sir H. James on the Reform Bills	41	ART—
Great Individuals in Democracies	42	Grosvenor Gallery. — (Fourth
Mr. Cowen's Political Creed	43	Notice.).....	50
Dr. Jackson and Dr. Fraser	44	BOOKS—
President Garfield's Bequest	45	Siberia in Asia	51
The Latest Decoration	46	Gideon Fleyce.....	53
Sayings of Great Men	47	Fanny Kemble on Shakespeare	53
A Burnt Forest	48	Geikie's Text-book of Geology	55
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		Lallanne on Etching.....	56
The Miles Platting Case	49	CURRENT LITERATURE	56
Ritualistic Practices	50	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	58
		ADVERTISEMENTS.....	58-68

* * The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE negotiations with France have been broken off, and the Dual Control in Egypt was on Thursday formally terminated, Sir A. Colvin resigning his office; but the English position remains undefined, and legally we are still occupying the country on the invitation of the Khedive, who legally may send us away to-morrow. That is not very satisfactory, the legal situation and the actual situation being directly opposed, while the Convention which is to put matters straight halts, probably through difficulties raised in Constantinople. Sir Evelyn Wood is, however, organising the Army on the plan of half the regiments being purely Egyptian and half commanded by English officers; Baker Pasha has raised a Gendarmerie, said to be efficient; and a nondescript police for Alexandria and Cairo is getting into order, under General Della Scala. This police has hitherto been composed of Europeans, Albanians, and Egyptians, but as the two former kill one another whenever they get drunk, the Egyptians are to be preferred, and the force has been placed under Baker Pasha. An organisation strong enough to maintain order is, in fact, being evolved; but the essential points of ultimate authority and financial security are still unsettled. According to the latest official statement, revenue and ordinary expenditure exactly balance; but there is nothing for the British troops, or for the indemnities which, it is expected, will amount to three millions. It will be wise of the Foreign Office to quicken things a little, and be ready with an intelligible plan when Parliament meets.

The Temps publishes an account of the recent negotiations between France and England on the subject of Egypt, which appears to be at least demi-official, and as such is reproduced in extenso in the Times. It is a most melancholy narrative. If it is true, and we fear it is true, M. Duclerc rejected the control of the Public Debt of Egypt offered to France, but hinted that if she were offered the control of the Domain and the Daira in addition, and, in fact, invested "with the general supervision of the Liquidation Law, regulating the employment of all the revenues of Egypt," a "basis of agreement" might be found. In other words, if France were allowed to pillage Egypt at discretion, for the benefit of the financial houses still loaded with Egyptian Bonds, and more especially Daira Bonds, Great Britain might dispose of the country as she pleased. No baser proposition was ever made, or one which showed more clearly the frightful ascendancy of the Rings in the councils of Paris. The negotiations have, of course, dropped, and it is asserted that M. Tissot, the French Ambassador in London, has resigned, assigning as his reason that "the cause of the Bondholders is almost hopeless." This disposition of great Governments to sacrifice political ends to the interests of great loanmongers is a novel and most ominous feature in modern politics. The tendency is not confined to Paris, but is displayed also in Rome and Vienna, and, in a different way, in Berlin. There, however, pecuniary claims are regarded as excuses, not as ends.

The world,—or at least all the world which is not so insanely Tory as to exult in Mr. Gladstone's illness, and it is a mournful fact that this is not absolutely the whole world,—was alarmed on Monday by hearing that Dr. Andrew Clark had been telegraphed for to Hawarden, and had insisted that the Midlothian visit should be abandoned by Mr. Gladstone, whose sleep has not been good lately, and consequently his strength not up to the mark. And yesterday, again, we heard that Mr. Gladstone's sleeplessness had not disappeared, and that he was keeping his room under the influence of a severe cold. Fortunately, Mr. Gladstone is a good patient, and when a physician in whom he has confidence gives him orders, he does not neglect those orders, but implicitly follows them. For this England is heartily grateful to him; and even, we do not doubt, the Midlothian audiences themselves, who have lost so great a gratification. It is not a gratification, however, that any part of the political world would chuse to purchase at the cost of a single day of Mr. Gladstone's Ministerial life.

The Prime Minister has written a very remarkable letter to Professor Giambattista Giuolini, who had sent him a copy of his work on "Dante Explained by Himself." In this letter, Mr. Gladstone explains how great is his own debt to Dante, in the following emphatic words:—"You have been good enough to call that supreme poet 'a solemn master' for me. These are not empty words. The reading of Dante is not merely a pleasure, a tour de force, or a lesson; it is a vigorous discipline for the heart, the intellect, the whole man. In the school of Dante I have learned a great part of that mental provision (however insignificant it be) which has served me to make the journey of human life up to the term of nearly seventy-three years. And I should like to extend your excellent phrase, and to say that he who labours for Dante labours to serve Italy, Christianity, the world." No doubt, Dante served all three,—Italy, by giving her (pagan as her genius was) something of his own severely Christian type of mind; Christianity, by bringing out the sublime imaginative aspects of that too dogmatically inculcated creed; and the world, by teaching it a new reverence at once for Italy and for the Christian intellect. Mr. Gladstone's own "severe and earnest air" has often been remarked; but probably few knew till this week, whence he had derived that air of burdened but passionate purpose which breathes all through Dante.

The Attorney-General, Sir Henry James, made a very striking speech at Bridgwater on Wednesday. After an eloquent tribute to Mr. Bright, and a sharp criticism on the refusal of the extreme Irish party to co-operate in any way with Mr. Gladstone in the noble effort which he has made to do justice to Ireland at the same time when he is firmly repressing crime, Sir Henry went on to the subject of the Reform Bill, and advocated very strongly the same policy which we ourselves advocated last week,—namely, the separation of the Reform measure into two distinct portions, one dealing with the question of the franchise, and the other with that of redistribution. "I am certain," said the Attorney-General, "that if ever the attempt is made to deal with the question by one Bill, or even what is termed one scheme, failure, a certain failure, will ensue." The Tories, he added, would certainly try to insist on having before them a single scheme for dealing with the whole question, in the confident hope that on the whole scheme so presented they would be able to obtain a victory, through the defection of those Liberals whose seats may be endangered by the disfranchisement or merging of small boroughs. The Liberals should unite to resist this policy, and should point out that in 1867, the Liberal majority, though in Opposition, permitted Mr. Disraeli to pass the first portion of his Reform measure, and to delay the remainder to the Session of 1868, when he introduced and carried the Boundaries Bill and the Election

Petitions Bill and the Scotch and Irish Bills, by which that scheme was completed. "To postpone enfranchising those who are entitled to be electors till the details of a redistribution scheme have been settled, would be like showing food to a hungry man, and then saying, 'But I cannot let you have it till I can arrange the table at which you are to sit, and the people who are to share it with you.'"

Sir Henry James also pointed out the probability that the extension of household franchise to the counties might involve the abandonment of the 40s. freehold qualification. It would not be easy to accept a residential household franchise as the basis of the borough and county franchise, and yet allow a non-residential freeholder to vote for the county, though we give no similar privilege to the holder of property in boroughs. If the 40s. freehold county qualification is retained, something of the same sort must be discovered to balance it in the boroughs. Further, Sir Henry James dropped a rather ominous hint to the Universities. If we deny the non-residential freeholder a vote, he says, how are we consistently to give a University man a second vote in a place where he does not reside, in addition to his residential vote in the place where he does reside? "If that question be asked, I trust some one will be found to give a satisfactory answer, but at present I cannot suggest one,"—with which uncomfortable sentence Sir Henry James passed from the subject of University electorates, without having elicited any demonstration of grief or dismay from his Bridgewater audience.

Mr. Lyon Playfair has announced his intention on the meeting of Parliament to resign his post as Chairman of Committees, mainly on the ground of ill-health, partly, no doubt, that a new Chairman may start fair with the new Rules of Procedure, and without the dead-weight with which his one serious mistake of last Session would have handicapped himself. It is said that the House will be asked to elect Sir Arthur Otway as Chairman of Committees in his place. We suppose that this appointment is suggested because Sir Arthur Otway, who resigned his post of Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Mr. Gladstone's first government, on the ground of disapproving its foreign policy, is regarded as an impartial man by both parties, and one, therefore, whom the Conservatives would be likely to trust with the administration of the new Standing Orders. Mr. Gladstone announced last Session his wish to raise the character of the office of Chairman of Committees and Deputy-Speaker to one rather nearer the level of authority with which the Speaker himself is invested, and Sir Arthur Otway will be the first of these weightier Deputy-Speakers.

Death is busy with the French heroes of 1870. Gambetta was still unburied when, on the 4th inst., General Chanzy suddenly expired from apoplexy at Châlons, where he held a divisional command. He was hardly fifty, and might have expected ten more years of active life. Though selected by Gambetta for command, and willing to accept a Republic, General Chanzy is believed to have had strong monarchical and especially Orleanist proclivities, doubting whether a Republic would ever secure public order. He was watched with some suspicion, and there was a great desire to shunt him into civil life, as Governor-General of Algeria, or as an Ambassador. Nevertheless, the Government, recollecting his share in the National Defence, ordered him a public funeral. The Parisians ask whether Prince Bismarck has bribed Death, that Skobelev, Gambetta, and Chanzy should all pass away before himself.

We trust that the statement of the Times' correspondent in Paris as to the attitude of the Right in regard to the election of Judges is inaccurate. This writer, who usually knows well what the Orleanists will do, asserts that the whole Right will vote with the Extremists for the Bill making Judges elective, because they think the chances of public disorder will be increased. They did so vote, he affirms, last time, and it was by their aid that the vote was carried, and the Minister of Justice forced to resign. Such conduct is almost too monstrous to believe. It amounts to a deliberate and conscious sacrifice of the country to party feeling, and this upon a subject which to the Right must seem to involve a grave, moral question,—the purity of the Bench. Frenchmen may have a terrible penalty to pay for such wickedness. Experience shows that while there is no power so injurious to the Democracy as this, there is none which it is more difficult to induce them to resign. Even the Reformers in New York have been compelled to stop short of this proposal, and to palliate the evil by suggesting longer terms of office. They say that if the people cannot be trusted to elect Judges, they cannot be trusted to elect Representatives, a palpable begging of the question. Election is only a good system when the will of the people is to be carried out, which is exactly what Judges are expected not to do.

Spain has been going through the throes of a crisis not very intelligible to outsiders, the history of which we believe to be this. The King, true to his policy of allowing all parties to reach office, wished S. Sagasta to admit some members of the Democratic party into his Cabinet. S. Sagasta consented, though as we judge, with some reluctance, and as the Finance Minister wished to sell the State Forests, and the Minister of Public Works claimed them for his Department, he took advantage of S. Camacho's resignation to remould the Ministry. It is now, therefore, though still his Ministry, a little more Democratic than before, and contents Marshal Serrano a little better. The matter would be of little importance, but that the military chiefs reappeared on the scene, and that the Government fell, though supported by heavy majorities in the Cortes. Substantial power in Spain still belongs to the Army, though the King, a much abler man than any Bourbon has recently been, is gradually making himself independent of the Generals. They would not even now venture to risk a pronunciamiento, in which he might appeal to the soldiery at large.

Several papers, notably the Standard, pay great attention to war rumours, one of which is that the Vatican has been convinced by its agents that war is immediately at hand. The theory is that Austria is about to take steps in the Balkan which will compel the Czar to declare war, and that Prince Bismarck will then have his long-desired chance of ridding Germany of her Eastern incubus. He thinks, the story goes, that the death of Gambetta will enable him to fight Russia when she has no ally. We do not believe one word of it all. The Czar may be carried away by his fears, or by the Revolutionary party, which would like a defeat, as leading to a break-up of the autocracy; but the governing men of Europe are old, and will not voluntarily play for such tremendous stakes. Prince Bismarck does not want war while his master lives, and without his consent the Hapsburgs will not risk their whole future to get Salonica too soon. As for the Vatican story, who has revealed to the correspondent secrets kept with the most jealous care?

England appears to be equally well served by the rich and the poor. When Professor Palmer undertook his mission into the Desert "to buy camels," he was accompanied by Captain W. J. Gill, R.E., who had orders to interrupt the telegraphic communication with Arabia. Both were murdered by the Arabs. It is this week announced that the Crown has granted a pension of £200 a year to Professor Palmer's family, and that the Admiralty will educate his children; while the Illustrated London News tells us that Captain Gill left £160,000 for division among his relatives. We wonder which is the more creditable, from the patriotic point of view,—the spirit which induces a rich man to face a painful death, in order to do obscure work that he thinks beneficial to his country; or that which urges a man without property, but with income, to volunteer for the same risk, although, if he dies, his family must want. The latter is the more common, but we do not know that it is in any way the nobler. Captain Gill has been a little too much forgotten, in the universal sorrow for the fate of his gifted comrade in the expedition.

The Archbishop of Cashel, Dr. Croke, is, consistently enough, doing all in his power to promote disorder in Ireland. He is not connected with the borough of Mallow, but he has written a letter supporting strongly the candidature of Mr. O'Brien, whose chief recommendation it is that he is now the object of a Government prosecution for the violent language he has used in the Press, tending to disturb civil order in Ireland. "Were I connected with the borough," says his Grace, "either as an elector or as a non-elect, I should most assuredly exercise every legitimate influence that I possessed to secure the triumphant return to Parliament of the gifted, fearless, patriotic, and uncompromising Editor of United Ireland." Cardinal McCabe, who is doing all in his power to preserve the peace in Ireland, must have said in his heart, when he read this letter, "Wo is me, that I am constrained to dwell with Mesek, and to have my habitation among the tents of Kedar. My soul hath long dwelt among them that are enemies unto peace. I labour for peace, but when I speak unto them thereof, they make them ready to battle,"—which last is exactly the rôle of his Grace of Cashel.

At Newcastle, on Monday, Mr. Joseph Cowen delivered his apology for the very eccentric course he has pursued in Parliament, in an eloquent and laboured attack on the Government for everything they have done. The principle of the closure of debate, he said, "was sophistical and unfair,—it fettered the whole, for fear of the few;" but he did not explain how, the Liberal view of the matter being that the principle of the closure of debate fetters the few for the sake of the whole. Under the New Rules, says Mr. Cowen, the occupation of the independent Member will be gone. And those whom the closure of debate is to silence in Parliament, the influence of the caucus will paralyse in the constituencies. "He did not believe in this immoral and emasculating Parliamentary opportunism." He did look forward to the recovery of freedom of debate, as soon as the Conservatives should come back to power. He then went on to inveigh against both the repressive measures which have been aimed against the criminal outrages in Ireland, as well that which expired last September as that now in force. He advocated buying out the landlords of Ireland, and took the extreme Irish view of the practical inadequacy of the Land Act. He denounced our occupation of Egypt as in plain contradiction, to his mind, of that Liberal policy for the East which Liberals had urged against Lord Beaconsfield,—but which, as Mr. Cowen forgot to say, he himself at that time, being a partisan of Lord Beaconsfield's, vehemently condemned,—and predicted that the Liberal policy would end in the annexation of Egypt, and the final destruction of Egyptian nationality. Mr. Cowen, in short, is nothing, if not anti-Liberal. He may be called either a Tory Irreconcilable, or an Irreconcilable Tory. He inveighs against the Liberal policy as an Irreconcilable would inveigh against it, where he can find a party, like the Irish party, to support him. And where he cannot, he inveighs against it as the Tories inveigh against it. But in all things alike, he draws his sword upon the Liberals.

The Bishop of London has written a letter, in reply to the attack of the Church Association, in which he declares, first, that if by refusing to accept Mr. Mackonochie's resignation, he had defeated Archbishop Tait's dying desire and effort to promote the peace of the Church, he should never have forgiven himself, nor should he ever have expected the forgiveness of the great bulk of the clergy and laity of England; and next, that having accepted that resignation, he had no choice but to institute the man presented in due form with the proper certificates, without attempting to make illegal previous conditions. Dr. Jackson, in short, concedes nothing to the Church Association, to whom he presents a very stony countenance indeed.

On the other hand, Bishop Fraser has written a letter, thanking a Manchester meeting for supporting him in refusing to institute Mr. Cowgill at Miles Platting. He assumes that if he had not tried to make Mr. Cowgill promise to conform to the ecclesiastical law as it is now explained, before instituting him, he would have been virtually admitting that "all ecclesiastical order and authority had ceased in the land,"—an admission of the reasonableness of which he does not appear to have given the slightest explanation. In fact, we doubt whether Dr. Fraser is not breaking through true ecclesiastical order, in making any conditions beforehand at all; but, however that may be, no one doubts his absolute legal right to institute ecclesiastical prosecutions against all who, after being instituted, do not conform to the existing law, if only he thinks it right so to do. As a matter of fact, however, the law gives him a perfect discretion to prosecute or not to prosecute, as, in his own view of ecclesiastical policy, he may think fit. And if we find fault with him, it is for thinking fit to push hardly on men whom Dr. Tait thought it better to spare till some mode of relieving them from pressure could be discovered. In any case, how it can be truly maintained that, even if no legal proceedings were at present to be taken against a special class of law-breakers whom no Bishop is bound to proceed against unless he think it wise, all ecclesiastical order is at an end, we are wholly at a loss to conjecture. As a matter of fact, we have always understood that though Dr. Fraser unfortunately permitted the Church Association to take proceedings against Mr. Green, he has never before attempted to enforce for himself the ecclesiastical law against any one of these law-breakers. And yet he will not assert that "all ecclesiastical order and authority has ceased" in the diocese of Manchester ever since he became bishop there.

The rivers this year have been working great havoc on the Continent. It is said that the warm weather melted the snows, which usually lie on the hills till spring, and the water swelled the unusual rainfall in the plains. At all events, the rivers in Italy, Switzerland, Germany, and Hungary have burst their banks. The Palatinate has been drowned, and there is devastation all along the course of the Rhine; while the Danube has so deluged Hungary, that 10,000 persons are said, officially, to be in need of immediate relief. The town of Raab, a place of 20,000 inhabitants, in particular, has just escaped the fate of Szegedin last year. Its most populous suburb is eight feet under water, and the houses have melted in hundreds. The Emperor of Germany has given the Rhine folk £30,000, and all the Governments are voting relief; but they shrink from digging the canals, which would carry off the over-spill of the rivers. What seems to be wanted is a plan by which the riverine districts could be lightly taxed, while the Governments offered moderate guarantees. Private enterprise is foiled, because, though you can charge a peasant for water, you cannot charge him for keeping it away. Negative advantages, however great, are not calculable in francs.

Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, has been the scene of a catastrophe which may be a warning to Londoners. A huge hotel there, able to receive 800 guests, took fire on Wednesday, at 4 a.m., while 167 persons, guests and servants, were sleeping in it, and in a few minutes was entirely enveloped in flame. There were no means of exit, as the staircases were burning, and the lifts useless for want of workmen; and the unhappy inmates were either burned or leaped from the windows, and were smashed literally in dozens on the pavement below. Nearly fifty maid-servants, who slept in the sixth story, perished, the deaths known exceed 100, and it is believed they may reach 120. The proprietor, who had often been warned, and had accumulated fire-escapes, which proved useless, went mad. We shall have a scene of this kind in London some day, in one of the modern gigantic hotels, with their high-pitched roofs, and their dependence on lifts, in place of supplementary staircases. The fire brought out the energy of American firemen in a novel way. Milwaukee wanted a steam fire-engine, and telegraphed to Chicago, ninety miles off. It was at work within two hours, the firemen having traversed the ninety miles in eighty minutes, a rate of going previously unreached on any American railroad, and we should think as dangerous as the fire.

A curious investigation was held on Wednesday on the alleged poisoning of a girl at West Malling, in Kent, by oil of bitter almonds. Mr. Timins, the incumbent of the parish, who studied medicine at St. Thomas's Hospital in his youth and has been accustomed to use his knowledge for the benefit of his parishioners, who has been the incumbent for forty years, and who is sixty-nine years of age, admitted that he had himself given the girl a teaspoonful of oil of almonds,—he believed it to be the innocent oil, not the one containing prussic acid,—and had, on her crying out, taken a teaspoonful of it himself, to show its harmlessness. He had remained with the girl for three-quarters of an hour after giving her the dose, and except at the moment of taking it, she had seemed perfectly easy. He himself had found it very difficult to swallow, but he had suffered no subsequent inconvenience from his dose. The girl, however, it is stated, after his departure became sick, and according to the testimony of the chemist who analysed what came from her stomach, prussic acid was found in it, and was the cause of death. The case is a very curious one,—the girl's mother admitting that she saw Mr. Timins take a teaspoonful after her daughter had cried out, and Mr. Timins asserting that the oil was certainly the innocent oil, and not the poisonous oil. On the other hand, he never produced the bottle from which the dose was taken, for analysis by the chemist,—as it is said, though it is denied positively by himself, that he had promised to do,—and the analyst declares that death proceeded from no natural disease, but from the poison of this dose. The inquiry stands adjourned.

Bank Rate, 5 per cent.

Consols were on Friday 101½ to 101¼.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE IN FRANCE.

IT is always difficult, and usually vain, to forecast events in France, but we incline to believe that the Duclerc Cabinet will not last long, and will be succeeded by a Government which will accept the "policy of the fireside" with more openness than has hitherto been the case, will abandon all adventures beyond sea, and will pay severe attention to the condition of the Treasury. Unless we are greatly mistaken, our prediction of last week is coming true. The "Opportunists" are too divided even to issue an Address to the electors, as they originally intended; there will be no successor to M. Gambetta's special position as the Minister in reserve, and much of his authority is falling to the President of the Republic. M. Grévy, though strictly constitutional, and inclined to keep in the shade, has decided views of his own, which he will follow, now that M. Gambetta has disappeared, with greater freedom; his legal position is a much stronger one than observers usually remember, the Constitution having been framed before the hope of a Monarchy had disappeared; and in spite of his great reserve, his experience, lucidity of thought, and decision give him great weight with politicians. He has never been friendly to the Gambettist ideas, and now that their author has passed away will not be sorry to see an end of semi-Gambettist Cabinets like that of M. Duclerc, whose Egyptian policy was inspired from Ville d'Avray. Under these circumstances, we expect to see M. Jules Ferry, or some man of his type—a man of ability, but no genius—form a Government which will be strongly favoured by the President—who has great influence with the Senate, which dissolves—and supported by the moderates of all sections in pushing on domestic legislation. This Government will have more than peace for its object. It will seek tranquillity, will abandon, formally or informally, all expeditions, will accept the situation in Egypt, will restrain, if it can, all "subversive" motions, especially those directed against the Magistracy, and will be as little anti-Clerical as is consistent with determined secularism in education; and with a quietly relentless antagonism to the Orders, who, it is evident, have lost in the cities, if not among the peasantry, all effective hold on the masses. The Government will, of course, persist in making changes in the Civil Service, and will probably relax the fetters on the Communal authorities, but its main preoccupation will be the revenue and taxation.

The experienced men who, whenever the majorities in the Chamber will let them, guide affairs in France are obviously alarmed at the financial position, which, independent of all exaggeration, is not a sound one. The credit of France is in no danger, for "the bayonets own the Rentes," that is, the Debt is held by the body of the population, and not, as in England, by the well-to-do, and much of the existing trouble is temporary, having been caused by over-haste in extending the Railway system; but there are facts of an ugly kind behind all that. The Republic is not cheap, and both the taxation and the borrowings have been imprudently heavy. We are inclined to believe that the ease with which the Indemnity was paid was a surprise to French politicians, as well as to the financiers of Europe; that it altogether enlarged their conceptions of the wealth of France, and that schemes which in 1869 would have struck them as dreams suddenly seemed possible in their eyes. They certainly stood silent while vast sums were voted for "re-organisation," fortifications, and compensations, and made no effective resistance when M. de Freycinet unfolded a Public-Works Budget which would make Mr. Gladstone wince with alarm. No Australian Premier ever rushed into roads as M. de Freycinet, with no public lands to sell, plunged into railways. The parties caught the infection; the English rule that no private Member can propose direct additions to expenditure does not exist in France; and the groups vied with one another in proposing outlays for works, for enhancements of wages, and for education, which were highly acceptable to constituencies, but seriously burdened the national revenue. At last, all surpluses were eaten up, the taxation "reached its limit"—that is, began to cease to draw—the revenue declined, the experts began quarrelling about accounts and their meaning in a very ominous way, little errors occurring of 50,000,000 francs, and serious financiers, like M. Léon Say, decided that the country must be warned. They were not too soon. If the figures sent home to the Foreign Office by the British Embassy, and quoted in the Times, from an early copy, are correct—which there is no reason whatever to doubt—the situation, even for so rich a country, is most grave. The French Debt, if we convert the Five-per-Cent. loans into their equivalent in Three per Cents., has risen to £1,690,000,000 in all, more than double the British Debt, the annual charge being actually £51,300,000. The charges for the Army and Navy and Colonies have been recklessly raised, until the Treasury has actually to provide £88,000,000 a year, more than the entire Revenue of Great Britain, for Debt and defence alone. Part, of course, of this huge sum is spent in paying interest for capital expended on "productive" works; but the extravagance has extended to details, and it will be years before most of these will yield even the interest required. If we strike off the odd £8,000,000, as money returned in receipts or hopes of receipts, and, therefore, only payment on paper, France is still burdened with the tremendous dead-weight of £80,000,000 a year, £2·5 per head on her population. In addition to this, the Government has temporarily swelled the outlay on Public Works to £23,000,000 a year, and the total expenditure of the Treasury this year reaches the previously inconceivable sum of £142,000,000. Even this burden, France may bear. Under her system of taxation, the State receives, through the contribution foncière and the transfer duties, a large share of the money which in this country is paid to landlords in rent and to lawyers in legal expenses, but still the burden is a crushing one. The Embassy believes that the revenue is now falling, M. Léon Say publicly announces that another loan is "impossible," the last not having been nearly absorbed, and the price of Rentes goes slowly down, till French credit stands far below that of England and the United States. The demands for exemptions are so incessant as to excite suspicion of fraud, and Deputies in the Chamber are constantly pressed to propose the abolition of productive taxes. In any other country, the danger of a tax on coupons like the Italian would be great; and even in France, if the extravagance does not stop, the Treasury will be driven to dangerous expedients. Retrenchment in the Army cannot, for the moment, be hoped for.

A comprehension of this state of affairs is rapidly spreading among the well-to-do classes, and the better-informed of the peasantry, and the bureaucracy, and will immensely strengthen M. Grévy's hands. These are the classes which fret under the compulsory "effacement" of France, and are tolerant of adventure. The masses desire peace, light taxation, and a high price for Rentes, and it is the "classes dirigeantes" who are inclined for more dependencies, and adventures in Egypt, Tonquin, Madagascar, the Congo Valley, and the rest. These classes are, however, at bottom not only sensible, but sordid; they are profoundly sensitive to great financial risks, and if they are once alarmed about the Treasury, they will thoroughly sympathise for the time with M. Grévy's policy, which, again, curiously enough, is approved in Belleville, where the whole body of "Jingoes," as we say in England, are suspected, sometimes justly, of pecuniary motives. No one can read the recent despatches without seeing that this is the root of much of the recent declamation about Egypt, and that if Lord Granville would only feed the Rings, he might adopt almost any decisions he pleased as to the political fate of Egypt. The President, therefore, in urging on the statesmen that "it is time to look after the kettle," that "enterprise" should be avoided altogether, and that finance must be put straight, may have an unexpectedly easy time. Whether the Chamber will consent to a policy of quiescence, we do not know, the groups are so jealous, so indifferent to Ministers, and so determined to have their share of public patronage; but it is evident, from the action of M. Duclerc about the Tonquin vote—which, to use plain English, he was afraid to put—that the Ministers think the consent certain; and if the Deputies refuse, the Chamber is not as it was yesterday. It has a Dissolution hanging over it. There is no power left in the Senate to resist the President, the Senators are, of all men, most sensitive about finance, and every Deputy knows that, with no M. Gambetta to direct the peasantry, he goes to the polls under entirely new conditions. There is no ringing voice to declare the Republic in danger, and to command that old Deputies, whatever their views, shall be returned again. Each Deputy would be judged by himself, and possibly compelled to support retrenchment; and the fear of that result will tend to restrain the groups from capricious combinations. A penal Dissolution becomes possible, with M. Gambetta's death; and in France, as in England, that great reserved power will tend to strengthen any Ministry which believes itself to be in accord with the inner will of the country. New men and new forces are sure to rise in France to fill the vacuum left by M. Gambetta, but for the present, we believe that M. Grévy has the strings in his hands, and that he will pull heavily in the direction of a policy of quiescence.

SIR HENRY JAMES ON THE REFORM BILLS.

THE Attorney-General, Sir Henry James, in his speech at Bridgwater, has dealt very vigorously with the subject which we discussed last week as to the shape of the Reform Bill. And the Solicitor-General, Sir Farrer Herschell, has indicated his sympathy with the same view, in his speech at Durham. Indeed, so far as we can see, the argument in favour of uniting the Franchise Bill with the Redistribution Bill grows feebler and feebler the more it is examined. We say this, of course,—and our more constant readers at least will give us credit for speaking with the utmost sincerity,—from the point of view of those who wish for a very substantial reform in the direction of the redistribution of seats, and not from the point of view of those who wish to attenuate that reform to the finest possible limits. We quite agree with our contemporary the Pall Mall Gazette, that the real question is this,—‘How shall we make most sure of redistribution,’—and we mean by redistribution a substantial, and not a minimised redistribution like Mr. Disraeli’s of 1867,—‘at the earliest possible time?’ To this we answer,—‘Certainly, by separating the two measures, not by uniting them. To unite them would endanger both, and would especially endanger the substantial character of the second measure.’ Let us explain somewhat more fully our reasons for giving that answer. In the first place, if you unite the fate of the two Bills, you lose both if you lose either, and you lose both without learning against which of the two the representative who rejects it is really voting. Now, there is hardly a Liberal in the House, except Mr. Goschen, who is not absolutely pledged to extend household franchise to the counties. There are exceedingly few who are not pledged to the view that such an extension, even without any other change whatever, would be an improvement, and not a change for the worse as compared with the present system. It would be very difficult indeed even for half-hearted Liberals to argue that you ought to know what the new borough and county constituencies are to be, before deciding that every householder in the counties ought to have a vote for the county in which he resides. No doubt, arguments to this effect by the dozen may be produced, and have been produced, from Tory speakers. But it is almost inconceivable that any Liberal speaker already pledged to household franchise in the counties should stand up and gravely say:—‘It is quite true that I wish to see household franchise in the counties, and that I wish to see a redistribution of power in the boroughs, so as to give a fuller representation to the mass of the people; but I do not wish to get the former reform, unless I can get the latter also. I think the agricultural labourers ought to remain unrepresented in the counties, until the working people of the boroughs can be represented better than they are at present. It seems to me a greater injustice to give votes to one class of working people,—at present wholly without political influence,—without also giving more votes to a class who have already great influence, than it would be to refuse both classes that justice which I desire, indeed, to see done, but not to see done till it can be done simultaneously.’ Would a Liberal who made such professions as these get any credit at all for sincerity in his reforming principles? It may be perfectly competent for a Tory to say, as Lord Derby himself said in 1866,—‘It is as insane to sanction part of a scheme, without knowing the whole, as it would be to begin building a palace room by room, without an estimate or a general plan, and with only the assurance of the architect that he understands his business.’ But the answer is that in this case, the change made by the extension in the franchise is like throwing out a bow in a room where the window is inadequate to the room’s wants. It would be quite consistent with other alterations to your house, to have that bow, but it would also be a great improvement in your house as it is, without any such alterations. To a Tory, of course, it is competent to say, ‘No; unless we are assured that the power which the middle-classes forfeit in the counties by the proposed change will be restored to them by the effect of other changes in the distribution of seats to the boroughs, we will not consent.’ But that position is not competent to a Liberal. No Liberal now professes to want anywhere specially middle-class constituencies, as counterbalancing weights to the constituencies of labouring men. The only effect of the proposed redistribution of seats would be to give a larger proportion of political power to the more populous and wealthy boroughs, and a smaller proportion of political power to the thinly populated and poorer boroughs. Well, that change would be useful in itself, but no Liberal can assert that its tendency is to rectify the effect of giving county votes to the artisans and labourers. If the effect of giving votes to the artisans and labourers of the counties is in any way dangerous, that dangerousness will be increased, not diminished, by taking power from poor and torpid places, and giving power to active and go-ahead places. If there is no such danger in giving votes to the artisans and labourers of the counties, then it is childish to say that it ought not to be done till another great access of power, tending in the same direction, is given to the same classes.

But then it is said the Liberals tried, in 1866, the experiment of introducing a Franchise Bill alone, and that they suffered a great defeat. Therefore, they will only invite a similar defeat by following the same course again. But the answer is easy. On what point were they defeated? Not on the point of separating the Franchise Bill from the Redistribution Bill. The Tories tried to defeat them on that point, and failed. The Tories defeated them on the question of the franchise itself. The Tories wanted to make the proposal one for basing the new borough franchise on “rateable value,” instead of on rental, the object being to reduce greatly the number of the new votes thereby conferred. In other words, they defeated the Liberals on a proposal essentially Conservative, and one which the Conservatives themselves were compelled to abandon, the moment they attempted to deal with the question for themselves. That defeat would have come much earlier, and have been much more decisive than it actually was, had the Liberals combined the Franchise Bill with the Redistribution Bill. But then again, it is said, ‘How can you maintain this, when you know that the Tories did combine the Franchise Bill with a Redistribution Bill in the following year, and passed their Bill?’ We can maintain it most consistently. In the first place, what the Tories proposed on this head the Liberals could not refuse, though it was quite open to the Tories to refuse what the Liberals proposed. In the next place, Mr. Disraeli proposed a minimum,—almost a modicum,—of redistribution which, as both parties know, was much less than any Liberal Government would have ventured to propose. Hence, the Tory precedent really tells against the union of the two Bills. When Tories propose reform, Liberals can hardly say, ‘It is too much!’ so that there was not the same danger for the Tories in uniting the two measures. Again, what the Tories did propose was so petty that the Liberals would not have dared to propose it, so that if we followed the Tory precedent of 1867, it would only be because we were determined to follow the Tory example in minimising to the utmost the change we were compelled to make. To our minds nothing can be more certain than that if we make the two measures parts of one scheme, which we present to Parliament as a whole, we shall either run the utmost risk of losing both, or obtain both only by the extreme and unstatesmanlike insufficiency of the second, i.e., the redistribution measure.

Sir Henry James has shown by the Tory example that there is no pretence at all for the supposition that if the Franchise Bill is passed in one Session, a dissolution must take place before the scheme of Reform is completed. In 1867, Mr. Disraeli passed his Reform Bill in a very incomplete condition. A Boundaries Bill was absolutely essential, before it could be said to be a measure at all. Moreover, the Bill as passed only extended to England and Wales, and the Scotch and Irish measures were postponed. In 1868, the Liberals allowed Mr. Disraeli to complete his measure, before a dissolution took place; nor did anybody pretend that it was essential to consult the new constituencies created, before rounding off the measure. The same course would be perfectly open to us, whenever we pass the Franchise Bill. Indeed, it would be resented generally by the country, if the perfectly fair party-contention of the Tories that we ought to pass our Reform measure as a whole, and not in two parts, were to be made an occasion by the House of Lords either for the rejection of a reform already deliberately submitted to the constituencies and deliberately approved by them, or for forcing on a dissolution before the second portion of the Reform Bill had been produced. The House of Lords which did either of these things would not understand its work, for the result would be to secure the Liberals a much larger majority at the poll than the Liberals could secure for themselves. We may rest perfectly easy that whether the House of Lords rejects the County Franchise Bill, or refuses the Liberal Government the chance of submitting its second measure, in either case alike it will absolutely play into the hands of the Liberal leader.

GREAT INDIVIDUALS IN DEMOCRACIES.

THERE is one end secured, or at least advanced, by the practice of public speaking, and especially by public speaking under responsibility, which is too often forgotten. It helps to make the speakers visible to the community. One of the greatest obstacles with which self-governing peoples have to contend is the excessive difficulty of making civil merit visible in a democracy. The vast multitudes who, under that system, possess all ultimate power learn little or nothing from conversation. The quiet talk, the short comment from experts, the whisper of some success in official work through which an aristocracy learns that So-and-so is efficient and had better be pushed forward, never reach the mass of voters. They hardly see the work done, they never see the memoranda which have caused it to be done, and they acquire no idea whatever of the people who do it. The crowd in London does not know, for example, the Permanent Chiefs of Departments, or why they have been made chiefs, or which of them would in an hour of crisis be trusted with dangerous work, or why any distinction would be made among them. The greatest administrator, if he never spoke or spoke badly, would of necessity remain invisible, as invisible as, to take an extreme instance from modern history, Cambacérès permanently remained. The Parisian public is very observant, very gossippy, and exceedingly shrewd; but Parisians never understood why Napoleon, who comprehended men, persistently made of Cambacérès a kind of civil Emperor,—selected him to rule France whenever he himself was away, and left him free in his action to an extent which, as regards most of his agents, he was incapable of allowing. The simple truth was that of all civilians under the First Empire, Cambacérès, the man so fond of his dinner, was by far the ablest administrator, and that he remained, except to Napoleon and a few very great officials, absolutely unrecognised. This invisibility extends to every kind of civil merit, and is, so far as we can see, nearly, if not quite, irremediable. Scarcely any act that a silent civilian can do is big enough to disperse the cloud that conceals him; and the Democracy, if it were obliged to choose administrators from among the silent, would be compelled to choose them blindly. This is an immense evil, and the only check on it is that conception of intellectual force which the multitudes derive from studying speakers who, when once recognised, are entrusted with the task of selecting the necessary administrators. Their views, their powers, their characters are understood from their speeches, and they become, in many most important respects, delegates of the Demos. What could Gambetta have done at his age, and under the Second Empire, which would have revealed him to the hosts of France, except speak? What device can one even think of through which Mr. Gladstone could have become known, except that of speaking to the people? Even writing to them would have failed, for the writer on politics remains, in comparison, invisible and unappreciated. The masses have never read yet, and when they do will probably never understand the evidence offered by writing of the writer's inner powers. Mr. Bagehot, a really profound political writer, with a mastery of finance which would have made him a first-rate Chancellor of the Exchequer, never could get a seat; and John Stuart Mill, though he did, through the determined efforts of the educated, obtain one, could not keep it. In America the effort to reveal great civilians is so hopeless that party managers, if they cannot get a General who has succeeded, constantly prefer "a dark horse," who can be brought in by votes given blindly in a spirit of party discipline. A singularly sustained and determined effort was made to reveal General Garfield, not as soldier, but civilian, through pamphlet biographies, many of which were well written, and two of which, at least, accurately painted the man and his qualities; but it failed, and though General Garfield was elected President by the party vote, he remained nearly invisible to the people until the attempt to kill him, and his long fight with Death, placed his personality under a light so intense that men could not choose but see. It is all very well to talk of deeds, but the opportunity of doing deeds is given only to those in high places; and the question for Democracy is not only to sustain great men in such posts, but to select among the unknown those fit to be placed in them. Kings who are silent may be recognised, even if they are not Generals, but then they are visible because they are Kings. English electors would never have chosen a William III., and King though he was, they never understood him. He could not speak, and though understood by all Continentals from his deeds, he was not comprehended here.

It has been usual to say, and perhaps to believe, that one reason for this difficulty is the indifference of the Demos to greatness. The masses, it is alleged, dislike greatness, prefer something nearer to themselves, and will, as they ascend to supreme power, dwarf the individual. That notion, like the kindred one of the fickleness of the masses—who are constantly selfish, often tetchy, and occasionally credulous, but are never fickle—was once universal, and comes out even in the poetry of Tennyson, who, like every genuine poet, has flashes of deep insight into the general mind, and is probably the exact reverse of the truth. The lesson of our day is the Titanic force an individual can acquire, if a democracy once recognises him as one who should either govern or lead, the tendency of the populace to make of his individuality even too great a thing. Look for a moment over the events of the week. On Saturday, France followed a citizen to the grave. On Monday, all England visibly winced because another citizen was believed, erroneously, to be seriously ill. On Tuesday, all Germany felt a thrill of interest because a third citizen chose unexpectedly to appear in Parliament, and apologise for not speaking. Surely, if three men in history ever were recognised and supported and obeyed by the Demos, they were M. Gambetta, Mr. Gladstone, and Prince Bismarck. There was not a hostile critic in France who did not regard M. Gambetta's hold over the people as too great for his country's good. There is not a Tory in England who does not dwell on the "infatuation" of the people for Mr. Gladstone. There is not a politician in Europe who does not see and say that the unwillingness of Germans to let Prince Bismarck resign and disappear is, of all visible obstacles to free Parliamentary action in Germany, the one most immediately felt. The disappearance of M. Gambetta will, and that of Mr. Gladstone or Prince Bismarck would, it is believed, alter history. That belief may be accurate or otherwise, and still it remains true that an individual can, in spite of wide suffrages, become as great in our generation as he ever could in any period of the world's career. So far from the individual dwindling, he looms larger and larger, and his force grows greater and greater. The latter statement is denied, but only by those who do not see that Parliaments can, and do, do things which no King would ever attempt, and that the chosen man of the people, whatever his other demerits, has behind him their irresistible strength and weight of motion. To take an unpopular, and therefore effective illustration, was ever a man more purely representative of the Demos alone than O'Connell, and was there ever a man more visible in the Irish multitude, or possessed of more ascendancy, or more completely an individual force? Our belief is that the multitude, so far from disliking, or distrusting, or envying greatness, is disposed, when it sees it, to worship it too much, too trust it too fully, as if greatness must be great in all things, to think too despondently of the vacuum created by its disappearance. A letter has been published this week from Mr. Gladstone conveying in almost passionate terms his appreciation of Dante. We undertake to prophesy, rash as it may seem, that the letter will sell whole editions of Cary's "Dante," and that among men who do not know in the least Mr. Gladstone's exceptional right to give opinions on Italian literature. That is a mere illustration of one of the greatest, and, as we believe, the most important of political truths, the deep, inner humility of the Democracy, its desire to find anywhere guides abler, more instructed, above all, more perceptive, than itself. The jealous Democracy! It has been creating heroes and kings and gods from everlasting. We are all deceived by two examples,—the jealousy of the thirty thousand Attic slave-owners whom it pleases us to consider the "Athenian Democracy," and who treated their leaders as the Whig aristocrats treated Burke; and the absence of great men in Switzerland and America, where the Federal system so shatters the Demos into fragments that true "Democracy," the rule of the people in emotion, scarcely exists. When the barriers break down, as they broke down in the Civil War, and the people recognise greatness as they recognised it in Abraham Lincoln, they allow him individuality enough. President Lincoln, had he lived, would have towered among his people as much as any figure in the Old World. It is not Democracy which prevents the rise of great figures in the Union, but the most craftily-combined system of checks upon Democracy ever devised in this world. In genuine democracies, the individual tends, if once recognised, to be greater than in States under Monarchs, and the only difficulty is to secure him recognition, a difficulty which, though easily solved in the case of a General, has hitherto only been solved for civil merit through the right and power of speech. There is not a member of the Cabinet to-day who, but for debate and oratory, would not have remained unknown to the English people, or who could by possibility have been fully made known in any other way. Silence may be golden, as Carlyle used to say, and as the Times preaches noisily about once a week; but silence means for the Democracy ignorance of those on whom it ought to depend. The Times may rejoice because there is no second "Midlothian campaign," but the people suffer.

MR. COWEN'S POLITICAL CREED.

MR. COWEN is a puzzle. We could understand his attitude easily enough, if he only supported the Irish Extremists and the rights of minorities,—which, by the way, are the wrongs of majorities. Indeed, his line on Egypt would be intelligible too, if he had but remained what he once was, a consistent non-interventionist, who disapproves of any attempt to put down anarchy abroad, as indeed of like attempts to put it down at home. But what is puzzling in Mr. Cowen is his new Conservatism,—his perfect indifference to all reform, his hints to his constituents that the most valuable function of Parliament is, after all, not its legislative function, to which he seems quite indifferent,—though verbally he speaks of this as the more valuable, and then runs it down,—but its airing of administrative grievances. Again, his sympathy with the late Government in its Afghan expedition, a sympathy totally inconsistent with his old non-interventionist Radicalism, and explicable only on the principle of a Russophobia which would usually operate quite as much to justify English influence in Egypt as to justify English influence in Afghanistan, makes it almost impossible to construct any theory on which Mr. Cowen's creed can be rationally interpreted. We suppose the truth to be simply this,—that he has really lost all interest in practical reforms, and therefore sympathises with the Conservatives on that point, believing that the extension of Household Franchise to the counties, a County Government Bill, a reform of the Land Laws, and so forth, are all of no importance at all as compared with the right of private Members to air their grievances as long and as diffusely as they wish; while he makes up for his abandonment of all his former Liberalism by making common cause with the Irish, whom he does not like at all the less for being the chief difficulty in the way of the present Government. Mr. Cowen may, perhaps, be accounted a sort of irreconcilable, who sympathises chiefly with French Reds, and incidentally with all who make the position of moderate English Liberals difficult or impossible. The difficulty of that view is that French Reds have usually had so strongly anti-German a feeling as to imbue them with a little of the Pan-Slavic enthusiasm, since they regard the Slavs as their allies against Germany. There is no trace of this feeling in Mr. Cowen. Strongly Gallican as he is in his sympathies, he is still more of a Russophobe, and would hardly relax in his fears of Russia, even if the Revolutionary party succeeded in upsetting the Czar. Take him how you will, he is an eccentric,—a politician of caprices, who divides his sympathies between the Tories and the Anarchists in almost equal proportions. His democracy now, indeed, seems to be conditional on democracy refusing to reign. Where the people only go so far as to prevent all government, he seems to approve. Where they go so far as actually to govern themselves, his approval is turned into denunciation, and even vituperation. He delights in democracy while it does nothing but expose the wrongs of the people; the moment it begins to give a legislative sanction to the rights of the people, he loses sympathy with it, and quotes the old and very misleading couplet,—

"How few of all the ills that men endure
Are those which kings or laws can cause or cure!"

Mr. Cowen does not believe in the Procedure Rules, which he has christened by a new title of his own, "this immoral and emasculating Parliamentary Opportunism," a happy collocation of phrases, which entitles Mr. Cowen to the highest honours as a coiner of cries. In fact, however, no one has produced a more unanswerable argument for altering the Rules of Procedure than Mr. Cowen himself, in the following passage:—"In the Session of 1872, ten years ago, when the Liberals were in office, and during a period of legislative activity, the House sat 120 days; and out of these, private Members had the initiative of the business on seventy days, and the Government on fifty days. In 1877, five years ago, the House sat 122 days. The Government had control of forty-two days, and private Members of eighty. These were typical Sessions in the last Parliament and in the Parliament before last. Now notice the difference between them and the three Sessions of this Parliament. In 1880, the Session lasted 87 days. The Government had control of 70, and private Members of 17 of those days. In 1881, the House sat 184 days. The Government had control of 144, and private Members of 40. This Session, the House has sat 162 days, and the Government has had the initiative on 127, and private Members on 35 of them. Measuring the proportion of time between the two classes by the hour instead of the day, the difference is equally striking. Out of 1,027 hours the House sat in 1872, the Government had control of 560 hours, and private Members of 467. In 1877, out of 1,039 hours, the Government had control of 540, and private Members of 499. But in 1880, out of 778 hours the House was in session, the Government had command of 522, and private Members only of 258. In 1881, out of 1,409 hours, the Government had 1,029, and private Members only 380. For this year the returns are not published, but out of about 1,320 hours the House has sat, the Government has had command of about 920 hours, and private Members of about 400. Five years ago, and ten years ago, the time of the House was about equally divided between the Government and private Members. The contrast would be more marked, if it was carried back fifteen or twenty years ago. Then the proportion of time assigned to private Members was much greater than it was a decade ago. Now, the Government has command of from two-thirds to three-fourths of the working hours."

Now, if with all this time at the nominal disposal of the Government, the obstruction (which has received all Mr. Cowen's own support) has risen to a point at which only two measures of any public importance can be carried in a whole Session of unexampled effort, and though supported by the whole weight of a great majority, it would be evident, we should think, to any man less prejudiced than Mr. Cowen, that the Rules of the House must have been hopelessly defective for the purposes for which they were drawn up. The truth of course is that the private Members,—and very few of them,—have really had the disposal for obstructive purposes of almost all the time nominally disposed of by the Government. Perhaps Mr. Cowen may really think that the old Standing Orders of the House of Commons were drawn up for this very purpose—to render it simply impossible to carry more than one or two measures of the least importance in a year, so long as any minority, however minute, objects to those measures. That is the only reasonable inference from Mr. Cowen's frank confession of the enormous and rapidly growing expenditure of time on very insignificant results during the last three Sessions, and his denunciation of the attempt to diminish such waste of time for the future. But, then, if he does think so, he should not even nominally profess that the first function of a Legislature is to legislate. Again, if it be his real conviction that we can hardly do better than waste the time of the House, so long as it is the chief object of the House to improve the condition of Ireland by remedies which are obnoxious to a minority of the Irish Members, he should frankly confide this opinion to his constituents. A good many more than two hundred hands would, we think, have been held up against him, had he avowed his belief that all Irish measures deserved to fail which are not submitted to an Irish Parliament.

So far as we can judge by his speech of Monday, Mr. Cowen is a Tory in Scotland and England, an Irreconcilable in Ireland, and a Non-interventionist abroad except where intervention can be justified on the ground that it will hurt Russia,—in which case, he is prepared to withdraw his objection to the policy of intervention. No one can pretend that it is easy to find any coherence in such a political creed as this. Does Mr. Cowen approve of the Irish Irreconcilables because they help the English Tories, or does he approve of the English Tories because they help the Irish Irreconcilables? Does he disapprove of intervention in Egypt because he approved of intervention at Constantinople and in Afghanistan, or did he approve of an intervention in Constantinople and Afghanistan, which did nothing but harm, in order that he might show his impartiality by disapproving of the intervention in Egypt, which promises to do nothing but good? It is all a mystery. The only thing clearly perceptible is that Mr. Cowen appears to favour a democracy that is weak, and to dislike a democracy that is strong. He approves of the Irish Democracy, because it is weak and helpless. He was favourable to what he is pleased to term the Egyptian nationality, which would have been equally weak and helpless. He wants to keep the British legislative assembly weak and helpless too. Mr. Cowen's ideal of political life seems to be the publication and free discussion of abuses, together with the careful restriction of all power to reform them. If there were no abuses for Mr. Cowen to inveigh against, where would his occupation be? Therefore, apparently, he is resolved in his own mind that no one shall do anything to remove them, without attracting almost as much of his indignant denunciation as he lavishes on abuses themselves. Whatever Mr. Cowen may be, he is, at least, in no sense a Liberal.

DR. JACKSON AND DR. FRASER.

BY a useful coincidence, the Bishop of Manchester's acknowledgment of certain resolutions forwarded to him by the incumbent of a church somewhere in Manchester, was printed in the Times immediately after the Bishop of London's reply to the Church Association. The difference between the views and tempers of the two prelates is thus brought into great distinctness. Comprehension is the note of the one, technicality is the note of the other. We do not at all say that the Bishop of Manchester is necessarily wrong because he prefers technicality to comprehension. He is within his rights in making his choice,—provided, that is to say, that the law bears him out in what he is doing. All we are concerned to point out is that in the present case the two ideas are irreconcilable. You may choose which you like, but you cannot have both. Nor are we in the least disposed to find fault with the Church Association for resenting the action of the Bishop of London. The language in which they have conveyed their wrath to the Bishop recalls a Papal fulmination against heresy, but in this respect religious extremes not unfrequently meet. Putting aside the tone and wording of the resolution, it seems to us to express a perfectly natural feeling. They have been beaten; and what is more irritating, they have been beaten by what is neither more nor less than a condoned evasion of the law. Those who are persuaded that the law which has been evaded was a just and salutary law, that it aimed at results by which the Church of England would have profited, and that but for the gratuitous intervention of the late Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, these results would have come about by mere effluxion of time, cannot be expected not to be restive under a defeat which they regard as not inflicted on them in fair fight. The simple question is whether, under the circumstances, it was not well to apply a little sharp practice to a law which had proved to have a different operation from that expected of it, and one which was likely to give rise to some highly inconvenient consequences. The general feeling of the laity, we believe, is that in resorting to this expedient, Archbishop Tait showed the instinct of a statesman and the charity of a Christian; but we do not expect the Church Association to feel this. One of the principal objects for which they have existed has been the submission or deprivation of Mr. Mackonochie, and in this respect they must lead for the future an aimless life. They cannot deprive him of St. Peter's, London Dock's, without the Bishop's consent being given to fresh proceedings, and they are very well aware that no such consent will be given. The Bishop of London gives three reasons why he was right in accepting Mr. Mackonochie's resignation. Had he refused it, he would have defeated the late Archbishop's dying desire and effort to promote the peace of the Church; he would have been imposing conditions of admission to a benefice which he is not aware that the Bishop has the power to require; and he would have shown himself either "unable to appreciate, or afraid to acknowledge," the "good and self-denying work done among the poor and ignorant by such men as Mackonochie and the late Mr. Lowder." There is no doubt, in our judgment, that the Bishop of London was quite right in regarding these considerations as of more moment than a strict adherence to the spirit of a law which is pretty generally acknowledged to be unnecessarily rigid; but we do not blame those who, holding the law to be no more rigid than the case requires, are vexed that it should have been evaded, at a most critical moment, by authorities from whose action there is no appeal.

The Bishop of Manchester does not share the Bishop of London's view. The only condition on which he will allow of any truce in the warfare with Ritualism is "that both parties should keep within the limits of defined law as it stands, existing provocations being withdrawn, and no fresh ones introduced." This conception of a truce is at least original. The Bishop of Manchester apparently suffers from a peculiarity in language analogous to colour-blindness in eyesight. What the world calls a surrender, he calls a truce. The main thing for which the Ritualists have so long been contending is, that they shall be free to exceed the limits of defined law, as it stands. If they had consented to withdraw existing provocations and introduce no fresh ones, the Church Association would have triumphed. Does the Bishop of Manchester really think that if this had been their attitude, there would have been any disposition on the part of the Episcopate to increase the amount of ceremonial liberty in the Church of England? We are quite sure that he does not. He knows very well that if the Ritualists had consented to obey the law until it was altered, there would never have been any chance of its being altered. If there is such a prospect of its being altered, it is because the Ritualists have shown unmistakably that they cannot or will not obey it as it stands, and because the law itself is not valuable enough to be worth the cost of enforcing it. If, three months ago, Mr. Mackonochie had submitted to the orders of Lord Penzance, Archbishop Tait would have been content with the progress that pacification was making, and would have left things to take their course. When, therefore, the Bishop of Manchester writes:—"Is it an unnatural or an improper thing to ask,—Till the law is altered, keep within the limits of the law?" we reply that it is neither unnatural nor improper, but simply useless. The only objection to the request is that it is one which, in the nature of things, cannot be granted. The Ritualists know perfectly well that the reason why their position to-day is so much more hopeful than it was ten years since, is that they have convinced everybody except the Bishop of Manchester that they prefer deprivation to obeying the law as it stands. Now that the authorities of the Church—the Bishop of Manchester again excepted—have satisfied themselves on this head, they are anxious to find some way out of the difficulty. They do not wish to see the Ritualists expelled from the Established Church, and if the existing law is to be put in force, expelled they clearly must be. Consequently, these same authorities—the Bishop of Manchester, as before, excepted—have for some little time past been anxious to devise a compromise. One difficulty in the way was how to prevent the law from taking effect in one or two conspicuous cases. Happily, the most conspicuous of all was Mr. Mackonochie's, and as the late Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London were agreed in their desire to bring about a real truce, not a truce which is indistinguishable from a capitulation, it was easy to get this difficulty out of the way. It required, of course, a combination of circumstances which might have been unattainable. If, for example, Bishop Fraser had held the See of London, instead of Bishop Jackson, Archbishop Tait's last wishes must have gone unfulfilled. Bishop Fraser would have felt "bound by every sentiment of fealty" to his Church and his office to refuse the Archbishop's request. Mr. Mackonochie would now be or would very shortly have been the deprived incumbent of St. Alban's, and the first step towards a schism would probably have been taken. A correspondent, whose letter we print to-day, says of this argument that it "would force the Church to embrace Jews, Turks, infidels, and heretics; in short, all who could establish the fact of obstinacy." What it really does, is to force the Church to consider, in each case, whether the point at issue is important enough to make the exclusion of a certain number of people preferable to concession. There are some doctrines, of the holders of which a Church may fairly say that she would rather have their room than their company, and it must be supposed that the Church of England feels in this way towards Jews and Mahomedans. Those who entertain a similar feeling towards Ritualists, are quite consistent in refusing to make any concessions with a view to keeping them in the Church. They have certainly established "the fact of obstinacy." So far, we agree with Mr. Collins. The difference between us is that, in spite of this, we think that it would be wise for the Church to embrace them, while he does not; and on this point, nothing that we can say is likely to convince him. We may, however, point out that when he says that the institution of Mr. Cowgill "would have been but the prelude to further prosecution," he forgets that no prosecution can be instituted in the Diocese of Manchester without the consent of the Bishop of Manchester. As Mr. Collins himself tells us that the Bishop is not an "upholder of the Public Worship Regulation Act," it may be assumed that this consent would not have been obtained. The coat might have been trailed, but the Church Association would not have been able to tread upon it.

The Bishop of Manchester insists in his letter that the real object of the Ritualists is to destroy "a constitution of this Church and realm which has existed for the last forty years, and which is practically and in principle identical with the constitution devised at the time of the Reformation, which places the supreme and final appeal in Causes Ecclesiastical in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." Upon this point we certainly shall not quarrel with the Bishop. We have again and again asserted the substantial identity of the existing ecclesiastical constitution with that set up at the Reformation, and maintained that the Ritualists are inconsistent in objecting to a constitution "against which," as the Bishop of Manchester truly says, "the Church has never protested by any organised or authorised voice." But the simple truth is that the Ritualists never would have objected to this constitution, had it not been enforced against them with injudicious and short-sighted harshness. What they really want is liberty to use a ritual which, till certain judgments of the Judicial Committee were pronounced, most people, including Ecclesiastical Judges, who had thought about the subject at all, believed to have been technically lawful, though it had fallen into complete disuse. If some means had been devised ten years ago of giving them this liberty, under proper regulations, their attack upon the Appellate Jurisdiction of the Crown in Matters Ecclesiastical would never have been begun. It is simply a case of a law's breaking down because too little regard is paid to the feelings of those against whom it is directed. We do not expect the Bishop of Manchester to agree with us, for he has apparently persuaded himself that the Reformation is in danger; and we have always observed that when this is seriously said, further argument is useless.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S BEQUEST.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD did not die altogether in vain. Charles Guiteau, in killing him in "Stalwart" interest, gave a deadly wound to the system of Patronage which the "Stalwart" party were trying to protect. The crime fixed the attention of the people on the "Wire-pullers," whose desire for patronage was its originating cause, and it was silently decided throughout the Union that their trade should end. So strong was the popular feeling that, although the Republicans were beaten at the polls in November, and although the Democrats, who have never got rid of the Jefferson taint, were most unwilling to alter the system until they had cleared out the Republican employes, it was found impossible to resist the current. Mr. Pendleton, Senator from Ohio, introduced what the Americans call an "ironclad Bill," the text of which has not yet reached England, but which provides that officials under the United States Government shall be appointed by competitive examination, and shall hold their places during good behaviour; that they shall be promoted only by merit and after examination, and that no "levy" shall be made upon their salaries for political purposes. Moreover, by a clause which in England would seem ridiculous, but which is consistent with the rest of the Federal scheme, "appointments in the Washington Departments shall be apportioned among the States and Territories according to population,"—a blow levelled straight at the system hitherto prevalent of favouring the State from which the President came. Mr. Hayes, for instance, was said to have "emptied Ohio." The Bill is made applicable to all existing holders of office, and is so strong that the Democrats who opposed it denounced it as a mere device for securing to the Republican employes a life-tenure of office, even though the people might elect a Democratic President. The Democrat Senators openly expressed their dislike for the measure, and it is probable that no Senator of either party cordially approved it. The high social position of the Senators is, in fact, based upon their influence in dispensing patronage, which, when a friendly President is in power, is always distributed upon their recommendation, and when an unfriendly President is in power is conceded out of fear; and with its disappearance they will lose much of their control over the President, whose nominations they could formerly reject, and much of their consideration within their own States. Nevertheless, they scarcely ventured to oppose, and Mr. Pendleton's Bill passed the Senate by 46 to 19, every Senator voting or pairing except the Chairman. In the House of Representatives, the drift of opinion was even more directly operative. The Members scarcely discussed the Bill at all, and it was passed as an order from the people by 155 to 47, a majority of more than two-thirds. The assent of the President has not yet been recorded, but although General Arthur belongs by tradition to the Wire-pulling section of the Republican party, and although he is well aware that his own re-election is next to impossible, he will hardly venture to veto so popular a measure.

The reform, though its effect must not be exaggerated, may prove a most important step in the development of the United States. It does not, of course, extinguish corruption, the root of which is not patronage, but direct bribery to secure contracts, concessions, and special insertions in the tariff. The prizes to be obtained at Washington are very great;—a new duty, for example, on English tin plates will double the dividends in all native tin-plate factories in the country;—and the "Lobbyists," as they are called—the agents who secure votes—do far more direct mischief than the Wire-pullers, who sell "popularity" for patronage. But the Bill strikes heavily at a special form of corruption which lies close to the root of all. Under the present system, a clever party manager, if he can raise money to pay the expenses of numerous agents, can often induce the conventions and caucuses of his party to accept names that he suggests, and he raises this money by distributing patronage, and "levying" 10 per cent. on salaries for "election expenses." Of course, he chooses men who will play into his hands and distributes office only to electioneers, and a "machine" is thus built up which works almost by itself. The quiet voters are told by the active canvassers, by the office-bearers, and sometimes by the Representatives—that is, by men who, in one way or another, are bought—that if they will not vote for the ticket—i.e., for the wire-pullers' nominee—the party will be defeated, and they accordingly vote for him. "Delegates" to Conventions are constantly thus chosen, and the result is that a small group of men who keep in the shade actually control the votes of Delegates, who, except in times of popular excitement, virtually select the candidate even for the Presidency. Mr. Pendleton's Bill breaks the very bones of this contrivance. The Wire-pullers will have no money to work with, no patronage to distribute, and no agents fearful of dismissal, and must either take to disinterestedness as gouty men take to cold water, go out of politics, or rely entirely upon persuasion, oratory, and promises. The result will be that the people, undeceived or less deceived, will choose men whom they know, rather than men whom managers know, especially as Delegates; and politics will, pro tanto, cease to be a trade. This freedom of choice is the condition of a healthy democracy, and it will be assisted by the immense social change now passing over the Union. Office, even small office, was some years ago very valuable, because it brought actual cash, an annual sum of hard money, which, small as it looked, was unprocurable by any other means. The people were rich in everything but money, and a hunger for cash was developed which, more than any other quality of Americans, struck their novel-writers, who used it as the motive-power in their stories. Now, the people have not only grown richer, but they have become so immensely more numerous, that office has lost half its attraction. A man will contend against fifty competitors who will abstain if they are five hundred, and, abstaining, will feel very strongly that the candidate who is elected ought to devote himself to the public service,—and, if it be possible, shall do it. The new desire for official purity coincides, therefore, with a new decrease in the selfish desire for office, till the majority are able to perceive clearly that good service is worth much more to them than any remote chance of filling office for themselves. They know they cannot be postmasters, and therefore grow keen about the proper delivery of letters.

There is, we see, an idea in some quarters that the Pendleton Bill will not last long; that if the Democrats come into power, they will either repeal it, or pass explanatory Bills which will destroy its efficacy. That, however, is very doubtful. Not to mention that the people are extremely conservative when a change has once been made, and that they will rapidly see how much better the work is done, the Service itself will be strongly enlisted on the side of the life-tenure. In every township there will be two men at least, the Postmaster and his expectant successor, who will be passionately interested in defending the new system, and whom members of Congress and Senators will be slow to irritate, with the chance that all the people in that township will think them cruel. The old idea that a long tenure of office was unfair to the community, all whose members ought to have a chance, has died away, with the increase of population, while the relative value of appointments has much diminished. The notion that office is dignified, which so sways entire classes in France till men comparatively independent will slave in petty posts, has never had much influence in the Union; and there is another safeguard besides. Life without petty patronage is far pleasanter than life with it. The Senators and influential Representatives, and, above all, the Presidents, have been worried to death by office-seekers, whose impudence has been developed, in a land where social grades are few, till at Washington they have become as numerous and as pestilent as mosquitoes. Nobody who has once lived free from mosquitoes would ever invite them back again; and after a few years of rest, the Senators will be as unwilling to accept free patronage as British Ministers would. They will feel free, and unless coerced by opinion will not go back again into slavery; while of the necessary change of opinion, we see no chance whatever. A closely-packed community wants good service; and good service is only obtainable when men are selected for ability, and made so secure in office that dismissal is regarded as a penal sentence. You cannot without penal laws enforce discipline upon a man who knows that, do what he may, the next election will send him into the wilderness.

THE LATEST DECORATION.

MR. LANGTON SANFORD, the historian, always maintained in conversation, and in his "Characteristics of the English Kings" publicly argued, that it was unfair to blame Sovereigns for either selfishness or self-esteem. They could not be justly accused of either, as lesser mortals could. Trained from childhood to consider themselves as the representatives of great States, and as identified with them, they learn to regard themselves and their countries as the same, to confuse service to themselves with service to their subjects, to consider insult to their persons as insult to the nation, and, in brief, unconsciously to merge patriotism and self-worship into one single and very powerful sentiment. That Mr. Sanford may have explained the process inaccurately is possible, but that the effect described occurs, whatever its cause, is certainly true. It is impossible to read Memoirs of the inner life of Courts, particularly in countries where Kings are still realities, without perceiving that Kings, even when men of capacity and experience, never quite free themselves of the feeling that their favour is national favour, that honour is measurable by access to them, that service to them ought to be accounted in a special degree service to the State. To them, as to the Pharaohs, it seems natural that the Captain of the Guard should be a great dignitary, with rights of imprisonment. They think their approval a reward, like the approval of a nation, essentially nobler than any other, and regard concrete evidences of it, such as decorations, with a seriousness such as even those who strive for and obtain them can hardly feel. The recipient has an inner doubt when, after infinite striving, he has obtained his Star, as to whether he is greatly altered, whether he is improved, or only his coat; but the giver does not feel that, but takes the Star to be a sign of something of true value,—the Sovereign's approbation, which is equivalent to the approbation of a State. It is this confusion of thought which is, we are convinced, at the bottom of much of the ascendancy of favourites, once so marked in all political annals. The Sovereign does not promote the worthless knowingly, but holds them worthy for service to himself, which in his mind is indistinguishable from service to the country. He governs in his own eyes, and the man who pleases, or soothes, or serves the governing power, is necessarily a person whose exertion is beneficial to the governed. When the servants of the Court are decorated in the same gazette as the soldiers who have won a battle—an incident which, even in England, once produced a Parliamentary explosion—the public suspect contempt for their heroes, and are angry; but they are utterly mistaken. The Sovereign honours the heroes, but thinks, as he has been trained to think, that service to himself is civil service of the most patriotic kind, and should be paid for, not in money, but in the best recognition, whatever it is, given to the most meritorious servants of the State.

It is not folly, or even arrogance, which dictates such an act, but only a perfectly explicable mental confusion common to an entire caste. This is, we imagine, the true explanation of the amazing announcement in the Times of Monday, which must, we think, have made even old courtiers rub their eyes, and certainly taxed heavily the credulity of the public. "We understand that the Queen has been pleased to signify her intention to appoint Field-Marshal his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., G.C.B., to be a Personal Aide-de-Camp to her Majesty, in recognition of the service rendered by his Royal Highness in connection with the Egyptian War." It is, of course, not the honouring, but the form of the honouring, which is so surprising. The Duke of Cambridge as the Commander-in-Chief—or rather, to be officially accurate, the General Commanding-in-Chief, the Queen being Commander-in-Chief—during the recent Egyptian Campaign, must have had a great deal to do with the success of the Expedition. He must, officially at all events, have chosen the Generals, and selected the troops, and arranged the Staffs, must have sanctioned all plans, must have worked very hard, and must have displayed either great skill in design or ready appreciation of good advice, and he was a little overlooked. The public applauded the Generals and Admirals most vehemently, and praised Mr. Childers and Lord Northbrook with pleasure, though not sufficiently; but they forgot the Commander-in-Chief almost as completely as if he had never existed, or as if the men employed had been selected by ballot or by their own volition. That was not fair, and as the people cannot be directed to sing hosannas whenever it is proper, it was most natural that the Duke, who would have been held responsible in the event of failure, should receive some marked evidence of his Sovereign's favour. Only, what was it to be? It was no honour to a Prince who, though far from the Succession, is still in it, and who stands next but one to the Throne of Brunswick, to be invited to stay at Windsor. The Duke of Cambridge is Field-Marshal, and cannot be promoted. He is K.G. and G.C.B., &c., and cannot be more decorated. He is a Prince of the Blood, and cannot be elevated in social rank, or in the strange and long-drawn hierarchy of English official precedence. An appanage was out of the question, as he already enjoys one, and as it is the English official theory that a money grant is of no use to anybody, unless he has either commanded successfully in the field, or has surrendered his right to a patent for a machine of public utility. Apparently, no special recognition was possible; but then the governing feeling of all Courts came into play. The Royal Duke, commanding three hundred thousand men, might receive an office, not before held, about the immediate person of the Sovereign. That would be the greatest of conceivable gratifications, an honour at once real and fresh, and so the Field-Marshal of sixty-three, greatly, one cannot help thinking, to his own surprise, became an Aide-de-Camp to the Queen, in recognition of his services in the Egyptian War. Could the world offer him a more satisfactory or ennobling position?

It is impossible not to smile at such an appointment, more especially if one tries the honour by the test of an analogy. Suppose President Lincoln, after the surrender of Richmond, to have rewarded General Grant by appointing him "My First Usher," or "My Chief Orderly," what would the world have said? The laughter would have been endless, but that Mr. Lincoln's love of joking being well known, he would have been suspected of some invisible jest with a deep meaning in it. Yet the English appointment, although, when simply stated, it looks the quintessence of absurdity, is in reality only absurd because it is an anachronism. The world has ceased to feel that an appointment about the person of the Sovereign of itself confers honour on the great. It allows little Peers and obscure Members of Parliament to accept "Household" offices without much ridicule, and with only a dull wonder why they should wish for such posts; but it does not expect them to be accepted by great personages still in active life, even as decorations. It would rather resent seeing Mr. Gladstone appointed Groom of the Stole, and only tolerates the Archbishop of Canterbury as "Chief Almoner" because he has always been so, any anomaly, however glaring, being consecrated by age. This state of opinion is, however, quite modern. Had Queen Elizabeth, after the defeat of the Armada, appointed Lord Howard of Effingham, who had just saved her throne, her Chief Ewer-bearer, she would have been considered not only by the Admiral, but by her subjects, to have been most graciously liberal of honour. The Admiral would have been esteemed a greater person in Europe because of his dignity at Court, and he would himself have intrigued for permission to transmit it to his descendants. As late as 1803, Sovereign Princes were proud to be reckoned Napkin-bearers to the Emperors of the West. The change is in opinion only, and it is not unnatural that its effect should be last felt in Courts, where they see every day the slightest honour from the Crown sought with as much eagerness as if precedence would continue in Paradise. (We wonder, by the way, what a Sovereign who happens to be a good man does when he gets to Heaven. He is entitled to happiness, like another, and how can happiness be consistent with such a shock as his sudden downfall must be?) It is ridiculous to blame the Court for dispensing "honour," while honour is so eagerly sought, and there is no more reason why the Duke of Cambridge should object to be Aide-de-Camp, than why Mr. Grenfell should object to sacrifice a seat to be made a Groom-in-Waiting. The one appointment is not a bit more absurd than the other, though certainly the selection of a Commander-in-Chief to be an Aide-de-Camp in recognition of the real and important help he rendered in conquering Egypt, brings out the anomalies and anachronisms of the ancient system in a rather grotesque way. Princes, however, have, fortunately, very little sense of humour—if they had, they would be made miserable by all the kotowing—and if the Duke of Cambridge thinks himself well paid with a set of aiguillettes, well, the British people may congratulate itself, for it gets good work for very little money indeed. Three hundred years ago, the Duke would have received a monopoly of the Post Office, or a perpetual right to certain Customs or at least a perpetual Rangership of a Royal Forest, without impeachment of waste. An Aide-de-Campcy is a cheaper reward, and its bizarre oddity will not be apparent to courtiers, who alone are much concerned. Only the Khedive, who will wake up when he sees the Gazette to the perception of a discourteous omission in his distribution of honours, must be told that he is not to gazette his Royal Highness to the post of First Orderly. The imitative fit is on him just now, and he might think of that, which would not be seemly.

SAYINGS OF GREAT MEN.

IN turning over the admirably edited and amusing book which Mr. Samuel Arthur Bent has just given us on the sayings of great men,* nothing, perhaps, strikes one more than the interest attaching to the sayings of persons of very poor capacity, so long as that poor capacity has been weighted with sufficient self-confidence to make it measure itself coolly against the world. The most memorable quality attaching to the sayings of eminent men, is not usually the wit, or the wisdom, or the truth of the saying, but the stamp of a distinct personality upon it. A hundred wise or witty sayings go astray in the world, and get fathered upon wrong parents, for every one sharply-marked characteristic saying that thus goes astray. For example, Goethe's sayings are very many of them really wise and instructive, but it is often extremely difficult to remember from whom they proceeded, because they are not stamped with a distinct personality. "Stupidity is without anxiety," or "Architecture is petrified music," or "Mastery is often considered a kind of egotism," for instance, are all sayings of interest, but not sayings which shed much light on the character of the sayers, and, therefore, not closely associated with the sayers. But when George III. said, "Was there ever such stuff as great parts of Shakespeare? Is there not sad stuff? But one must not say it," it is impossible to forget this courageous attempt of the poor old King to cut himself out, as it were, in a bas-relief on the background of Shakespeare, and to mark even his British deference to a widespread admiration which he did not in the least share. Mr. Bent might also have recalled King George's remark, when he was asked to give preferment to Archdeacon Paley, and replied, with reference to Paley's celebrated illustration of the artificial character of the institution of property taken from the demeanour of a crowd of pigeons scrambling for their share of a heap of corn,—“What, Paley, Paley, pigeon-Paley? No, no, no, no.” George III. gained from his crown only the ability, which most dull people lack, to have confidence in himself,—to hold his own opinion against the universe, however “infinitely little” that opinion may have been; and it is this power to annex an opinion, to make it part of a man's own character, much more even than the greatness or truth of it, or even the brilliant manner in which it is expressed, which makes it memorable for us. George III.'s sayings are, like his own image stamped on copper, poor in expression, but very strongly stamped. It was the same with Madame de Pompadour's celebrated expression of recklessness,—“Après nous, le déluge,” a saying which has become part of history, partly from its truth, partly from its vivid expression of the selfishness and recklessness which made it historical. And it is this quality of personal expressiveness which, when the character so stamped is not poor, but has anything magnificent or noble in it, that makes a great saying take rank with a great deed. Louis XIV.'s declaration on his death-bed to Madame de Maintenon, “I imagined it more difficult to die,” as though his departure at least must have involved a convulsion of nature; and Pitt's grand farewell to power, when he returned, dying, from Bath, “Fold up the map of Europe,” are excellent specimens of the sort of sayings which, though containing no thought at all, nothing but a great consciousness of power, yet impress us more than the most vivid wisdom or the most poignant wit. This is why dignity tells for so much in a saying of this kind,—for so much more, indeed, than even truth. Burke's grand sentence on the hustings, when referring to the death of another candidate, “What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!” makes an even greater impression on the imagination than the other sentence, “I do not know how to draw up an indictment against a whole people,” not because it embodies half the political wisdom of the second sentence, but because it recalls Burke and his soaring imagination more impressively to the mind. Even Lord Chesterfield, with all his thinness and superficiality, makes his mark upon us directly he begins to delineate himself. “There is a certain dignity to be kept up in pleasures, as well as in business,” and, “Knowledge may give weight, but accomplishments give lustre, and many more people see than weigh,” paint so exactly a man thoughtfully and consistently anxious about appearances, that they impress us almost as much as one of Dr. Johnson's vivid self-portraits of a much nobler kind. Indeed, they impress us not only almost as much, but for nearly the same reason, that by imaging the man who lived in appearances, they throw up in strong relief on our minds the recollection of men to whom mere appearances were naught.

Sayings, however excellent, which do not convey in them any self-portraiture are seldom vividly associated with their true authors. How many of our readers will remember who it was that said, “Nothing is certain but death and taxes;” or, “We must all hang together, else we shall all hang separately;” or even, “It is better to wear out than rust out,” which last does represent the energy of a certain kind of temperament, but energy so common that it marks rather a class than an individual. Benjamin Franklin said the two first sayings, and Bishop Cumberland the last, but we should be surprised to find any one in a company of literary men who could have pronounced on the spot to whom any one of the three was to be attributed. On the other hand, we seldom misappropriate sayings containing much less that it is worth while to remember, if only they vividly portray a memorable figure,—like Frederick the Great's indignant, “Wollt ihr immer leben?” (“Do you fellows want to live for ever?”) when his soldiers showed some disinclination to being shot down (a saying which Mr. Bent has forgotten, though he has included several by the same speaker much less remarkable), or Gambetta's peremptory, “il faudra ou se soumettre, ou se démettre,” of Marshal MacMahon's “Government of Combat.” Thus, the most impressive of all sayings are probably those of great rulers who contrived to embody the profound confidence they felt that a life of command was before them, in a few weighty words. Julius Cæsar's “Veni, vidi, vici,” and his question to the skipper who feared for the loss of his boat, “What dost thou fear, when Cæsar is on board?” or his disdainful apology for an unjust divorce, “Cæsar's wife ought to be free even from suspicion,” are likely to be in every one's mouth as long as the world lasts. And so, perhaps, is Napoleon's, “I succeeded not Louis XIV., but Charlemagne,” and the same great man's remark, “Imagination rules the world,” and, “I ought to have died at Waterloo.”

But the most influential of all great sayings are those which combine great force and weight of character with a precept, express or implied. Thus, Cavour's remarkable prophecy, written seven-and-twenty years before its fulfilment, “In my dreams, I see myself already Minister of the Kingdom of Italy,"—the most impressive of all precepts to have faith in great national cravings, —or, again, his expressive saying, "In politics, nothing is so absurd as rancour;" or, "I will have no state of siege; any one can govern with a state of siege," will do more to keep Italy united, to keep her governments statesmanlike, and to keep her people free, than reams of argument from men less memorable and less potent. Has not Danton's "Let us be terrible, to prevent the people from becoming so," and his still more celebrated, "De l'audace, encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace!" done more to excite an unfortunate enthusiasm for deeds of terror done in the name of the people, than all the windy eloquence of the Gironde or the Mountain? When a man once manages to compress a strong character,—good or bad,—into a pithy sentence which claims to regulate the conduct of others, he lives after death in a sense denied to the great majority even of men of genius, though his posthumous life may be either for evil or for good.

* Published by Chatto and Windus.

Indeed, the essence of the grandest sayings appears to be that in such sayings the speaker flings down his glove to all the forces which are fighting against him, and deliberately regards himself as the champion in some dramatic conflict the centre of which he is. Cromwell's "Paint me as I am," and the more elaborate, though not more memorable, "I have sought the Lord night and day that he would rather slay me than put me upon the doing of this work," or his reputed saying of Charles, "We will cut off his head with the crown on it," all implied his supreme conviction that he was the involuntary minister of a great series of providential acts. It is the same with Mirabeau's contemptuous thrusting aside of the part taken by Lafayette with the scornful remark, "He would fain be a Grandison-Cromwell!" and still more with his inflated, but still genuinely sincere, avowal in the Constitutional Assembly, "When I shake my terrible locks, all France trembles," and his brushing away of the thought "impossible,"—"Never mention that stupid word again." Even Voltaire, in his flippancy, regarded himself, and deliberately elected to regard himself as the one personal enemy of the Roman Catholic Church, when he said, in reply to a friend who had noticed his reverence as the Host passed, and who asked whether he had been reconciled to the Church, "We bow but do not speak." It is true that many such sayings acquire their dramatic meaning by the artificial moderation rather than the emphasis of their language, as when the Duke of Wellington spoke of the battle of Navarino simply as "an untoward event;" but this, too, was supreme assumption in disguise, for it meant that he was able entirely to ignore its drift as a battle, and to concentrate his attention and the attention of the world solely on its tendency to unsettle "the balance of power." The perfect silence in which he passed over the common-place view of Navarino, and insisted on looking at it solely in the attitude of a diplomatist, indicated in the most graphic manner how completely indifferent he felt to the class of consequences which would first strike the popular mind. His serene indifference to the Turkish disaster as a disaster was quite Olympian. Perhaps the finest thing ever said was Burke's answer to Pitt, who declared that England and the British Constitution were safe till the Day of Judgment,—"It is the day of no judgment I am afraid of;" but it is not certain that Burke really meant to convey all that the words do convey. Possibly, he meant it chiefly as a sarcasm on Pitt's want of judgment; but the larger sense of the saying, in which it means that it is not the day of divine judgment that is to be feared, so much as the day when the reality of divine judgment is hidden from men, and human beings go on in the frivolous, irresponsible pursuit of their own wishes, is quite worthy of Burke, and conveys a grander conception of the spiritual scales in which political negligence will be judged, than any other saying which even Burke himself has uttered.

A BURNT FOREST.

AMONGST the Forests which met their doom in the rage for inclosure and improvement which possessed reformers some thirty years ago, was the Forest of Woolmer, in Hampshire. Parliament was not then in a mood to listen to any but the narrowest considerations of economy on such a subject, and it would have been vain to appeal to the memory of Gilbert White in behalf of the forest which he knew so well, or to quote his shrewd observation that "such forests and wastes are of considerable service to neighbourhoods that verge upon them, by furnishing them with peat and turf for their firing, with fuel for the burning their lime, and with ashes for their grasses, and by maintaining their geese and their stock of young cattle at little or no expense." The fiat had gone forth that Forests were to be made profitable to the State, and nothing would serve but that the Queen's seignory over this wild tract of land should be turned into the ownership of a large inclosure. Happily, however, it was not thought necessary to convert the Commons' property in like manner. When the Crown was satisfied, they were left to do what they liked with the residue. Partly for this reason, and partly because much of the land allotted to the Crown was not worth the expense of inclosure, a large tract of the ancient Forest still remains in as primitive a condition as in the days when it afforded the Vicar of Selborne "much entertainment, both as a sportsman and as a naturalist." True, some of the Forest Ponds have been drained, and of the three thousand acres allotted to the Crown, large areas have been inclosed and planted with monotonous Scotch fir. But outside these inclosures, as in the last century, there is nothing but sand, heath, and fern. Except where young, self-sown firs are spreading near the fences, there is still "not one standing tree in the whole extent." And yet the effect is undeniably impressive. A sense of wild freedom and loneliness is produced by the expanse of stunted heather, skirted by gloomy firs, and rising, in one direction, into a curious camel-backed ridge, tufted at the extremities with scraggiest, thinnest-foliaged pines. Like the other sand-hills in the neighbourhood, this forest ridge, Weaver's Down, falls abruptly on one side with a tolerably even face; while on the other it breaks up into shoulders of sand, running back at right angles to the summit line, and sloping down gradually to the more level ground, with interspersed hollows and bottoms. Although Weaver's Down is of no great height, 500 or 600 feet, it commands a very delightful view. To the south, are the Downs, broadening out on the west into the chalk district of Hants and Wilts, with Nore Hill, over Selborne, in the foreground. To the east, are the wooded hills and fields of Sussex, and to the north the long slope of Hindhead. It is probably due to the isolation of the ridge that the wind is felt so keenly; but certainly there is on Weaver's Down a sense of exposure which is not felt on either of the much higher neighbouring hills of Blackdown and Hindhead, and the severity of the wind, in fact, is attested by the ragged and ghost-like appearance of the few firs which survive in the planted clumps. Immediately beneath the hill, to give animation to the somewhat severe landscape, is a considerable sheet of water, and some warmth of foliage of oak and birch.

Early in the last century, there were large herds of red deer in Woolmer Forest, and it is said that no less than five hundred head were on one occasion driven before Queen Anne, who diverged from the Portsmouth Road at Liphook to see the sight. The deer were subsequently unconsciously poached by a notorious gang, known as the "Waltham Blacks;" and at length, to check the wholesale demoralisation of the neighbourhood, the few remaining were caught alive, and conveyed to Windsor. There is little life to be seen in the Forest now. A few cattle crop the heather, and perhaps the wild-looking inmate of one of the few cottages in the Forest may be encountered, while the "chip" of the hatchet is heard from one of the plantations. But stillness and loneliness are the prevailing characteristics of the scene.

The sombre aspect of the Forest is, no doubt, heightened by a peculiarity which might well be dispensed with. Nearly the whole of the open waste has been burned within recent years, and is in various stages of recovery. Large parts are absolutely black, the only vegetation consisting of pin-points of young heather piercing the scorched surface at intervals of two or three inches; on other tracts, where the fires are of older date, a scant, short covering of heath is spreading, dotted here and there with whitened furze-stalks. Scarcely anywhere does furze, heather, or bracken attain to the height or thickness which, even in this hungry soil, would be natural to it. Such a condition seems to be not altogether novel in the Forest. "About March or April," says Gilbert White, "such vast heath fires are lighted up, that they often get to a masterless head, and, catching the hedges, have sometimes been communicated to the underwoods, woods, and coppices, when great damage has ensued." In his day, the fires seem to have been lighted intentionally, the excuse being that when the old heather was burned, young sprouted up, which afforded tender browse for cattle. Unfortunately, the fire sometimes struck so deep that it destroyed all vegetation, so that (to quote again) "for hundreds of acres nothing is to be seen but smother and desolation, the whole circuit round looking like the cinders of a volcano." No language could more accurately describe the state of a vast tract of the forest last year, and at the present time it need be but little qualified. Even to the destruction of private property, history has repeated itself, for in 1880 considerable damage was done to the enclosures of a Mr. Cardew; while in the great fire of last year, injury to the extent of thousands of pounds was inflicted upon the property of another neighbouring landowner, the Rev. William Smith.

In the last century, the fires seem to have been the work of the Commoners, wishing to improve their herbage. At the present day, some at least have been due to the Crown officials. The pretext is that it is necessary to clear the surface for the purpose of camping. But troops very seldom camp in the Forest, while, on the other hand, pheasants are reared in the Crown plantations for the Game Preserving Association at Aldershot, and a belt of burned land is often a great safeguard against the straying of these costly birds. It is not surprising, then, that neighbouring proprietors should have come to the conclusion that their property was being put in jeopardy in the interests of sport, and that they should have appealed first, to the Government, and then to the House of Commons, for protection. At the fag-end of the summer sittings, Mr. Sclater-Booth was enabled to raise a discussion on the subject in the House; and though the assurances of the War Office were somewhat vague, the measures which have been taken and the publicity given to the question may, it is to be hoped, at least for a time, check the recklessness which has recently marked the conduct of the officials in charge of the Forest.

For the facts, as disclosed by the published Parliamentary papers, are sufficiently startling. "During the last three years," says Mr. Smith, the principal sufferer by the fire of last year, "three very considerable and many lesser fires have taken place in the Forest." The first extensive fire, in 1878, was stopped before it reached private property by the exertions, in great part, of private persons. The authorship of this fire was denied by the Government Keepers. The second, in 1880, which damaged Mr. Cardew's property, was at first repudiated by the Forest Warders, but was afterwards admitted to have been their work, and to have got beyond their control. The third and most extensive, in May, 1881, is alleged by the Warders to have been the work of an incendiary; and their view has been accepted by a Military Court of Inquiry, so that Mr. Smith, whose plantations were totally destroyed, and whose house and stables would, but for the small garden surrounding them, have been burnt also, is denied all compensation. This fire extended in all over about 670 acres, 300 consisting of Crown plantations. It broke out on Sunday, May 22nd, and was not finally extinguished till the 30th, occupying a detachment of men from Aldershot, under the command of an Engineer officer, a whole week. One peculiarity of the fire was that it appeared in its inception to be the natural sequel of some smaller fires, which were admittedly lit by the Government officials some two months earlier, and one of which was stated by the Chief Warder to have had for its object the improvement and preservation of the game, as well as the clearance of the surface for military purposes. These earlier fires cleared the rough covert between two of the Crown plantations, and the large fire commenced in the covert edging one of these plantations on another side. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that Mr. Smith should not be entirely convinced as to the incendiary nature of the fire to which he fell a victim. But, admitting the conclusion of the War Office to be the correct one, it is obvious that, when so dangerous an agent as fire is freely employed by those who are charged with the management of an extensive tract of open land, and that with a view, if not solely, at least among other objects, to the raising of game, it is not unlikely to be employed by the uneducated inhabitants of a wild region for other purposes, which, to them, would seem quite as justifiable. The difference between the exercise of a legal right and incendiarism becomes in such a case rather a fine one, and one which would certainly not come home to the rustic mind. The public generally will, on this subject, be disposed to sympathise with the view of the Lord Chancellor, himself a near neighbour of the Forest, and by no means free from danger, that "there ought to be a stringent law making those who do these things (whomsoever they may serve) criminally responsible, when they are done so as to injure the property of those who have not authorised them, either from the omission of the precautions necessary to prevent their spreading (when such precautions, if properly taken, would be sufficient), or from doing the thing at all, in any places or in any circumstances in which such precautions cannot be effectually taken." The War Office have, to some extent, admitted the propriety of this view and the seriousness of the case, by making rules for the future management of the Forest. It is to be intrusted to the care of an officer of Engineers, specially detailed for the purpose; broad rides are to be cut round the edges; whenever fires are lighted, the officer of Engineers in charge is to be present, with a sufficient force to keep the fire under control, and all owners of property in the neighbourhood are to receive adequate previous notice. Possibly, under the operation of these rules, the Forest may gradually recover its natural state, but it would have been more satisfactory to know also that fires would not henceforward be lighted at all with any reference to the interests of game-preserving. In any case, it will be some years before the singular air of desolation which the district now wears will have altogether disappeared.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE MILES PLATTING CASE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you permit me to notice briefly a few errors in the correspondence published by you on the above subject last Saturday?

1. Mr. Portal speaks of the judgment in "Martin v. Mackonochie" as "declared by Chief Baron Pollock. . . . to have been founded on policy, not on law." Such a statement was made by Chief Baron Kelly about the judgment in "Ridsdale v. Clifton." But nothing like it has ever been publicly attributed to Sir F. Pollock.

2. Mr. Portal also says that "John Hampden resisted the illegal decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in his day." Now, there was no Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in his day. And Hampden's case was tried not by the Privy Council, but by the twelve Common-law Judges.

3. Mr. Portal also avers that the Bishop of Manchester has "never tired of proclaiming that they" (Mr. Green and his friends) "were bad citizens who posed as martyrs." The Bishop once used these expressions in a manner which seemed to apply them to Mr. Green. But he afterwards said he had not intended so to apply them.

4. "F. S. L." tells us that the patronage of the living of Bordesley "rests . . . with a body of Evangelical Trustees." The patron of Bordesley is the Vicar of Aston.—I am, Sir, &c., Saham Rectory, January 9th. COKER ADAMS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The right bearing of the Bishop of Manchester's conduct does not appear to me to have been quite correctly discriminated. The present position of the Church of England—that of a body whose organisation has been outgrown by the progressive development of her internal life, the power of efficiently moulding her organisation in accordance with her organic needs, meanwhile, being atrophied—imposes a special duty on her sons, differing in its character, as the position they occupy is that of executors of her laws, or subjects under them.

As entrusted with the maintenance of the organic functions of the Church, and with the responsibility for this trust overriding personal considerations, I do not see how the Bishop of Manchester, having been an official participator in the execution of the Church's laws in Mr. Green's deprivation, after proceedings resulting in a distinct statement of their bearing, could institute Mr. Cowgill to the same benefice, knowing that he would continue to practise the proscribed ritual (unless he was legally obliged to do so, which has not been shown), without weakening the claims of all law to obedience, and being untrue to the responsibilities of his position.

His present conduct is, I think, a necessary outcome of his position, and is quite consistent with the highest desire to promote the permanent unity and usefulness of the Church, and with sympathy with the claims of the High-Church school for greater liberty and toleration.—I am, Sir, &c., Hanley, Staffordshire, January 10th. FREDERICK HAIGH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It is to be hoped that Canon Bell and his friends will pause, before they rush to "support and rally round the Bishop of Manchester," in his present attitude. To all appearance, his Lordship is acting quite as illegally as any "Ritualist" was ever supposed to have done, and is alienating many of those who have hitherto sympathised with him. And could a more unfortunate moment have been selected for such a high-handed proceeding, than the very time at which the late Archbishop's dying act seemed to promise a more hopeful state of things?—

I am, Sir, &c.,

R. BROWN-BORTHWICK.

All Saints' Vicarage, Scarborough, January 10th.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A little time back, one of your articles taught us that, because the Ritualists had established the fact that they were ready to suffer imprisonment, rather than obey the law, their voluntary martyrdom should atone for law-breaking, and decide on the advisability of an alteration of the law,—an argument which would force the Church to embrace Jews, Turks, infidels, heretics; in short, all who could establish the fact of obstinacy.

On December 31st, another article—a personal attack on the Bishop of Manchester—taught us that, because the late Archbishop, with all good intention, persuaded the Bishop of London to allow two beneficed clergy to exchange livings, the Bishop of Manchester, in a different Province and under different circumstances, ought to have instituted an unbeneficed clergyman, who flaunts an intention of disobedience; and why, forsooth? Because the diocese of Manchester is not as great or as venerable as the diocese of London! No doubt, the late Archbishop and the Bishop of London acted with the best motives, but still, they have unfortunately given the Church Association the chance of saying that it has not been foiled fairly, but by what in a secular matter would be roughly called compounding a felony. Had the Bishop of Manchester instituted Mr. Cowgill, it would have been but the prelude to further prosecution. The very nomination is only a throwing-down of the gauntlet. It is trailing one's coat, in the hope that some one will tread on it. No one objects to an attempt to alter a law, but until the alteration, it must be obeyed as it is.

Are law and authority to pass into abeyance? If each priest, after having sworn to obey his Ordinary, is to be free to follow out his own whims, and disobey with impunity, the sooner a different constitution is provided for the Church of England, the better. It cannot live in anarchy. We are simply making ourselves ridiculous before the eyes of those who desire our destruction. The institution of Mr. Cowgill is not a question on which High Churchmen must range on one side, and Low Churchmen on the other. It is a question whether the Church has a limit, or none. There is ample proof in these parts, which not even the ability of the Spectator can overthrow, that the Bishop is not a partisan. He is not the author or upholder of the Public Worship Regulation Act. Your article has given the greatest pain to many.—I am, Sir, &c., T. F. COLLINS.

RITUALISTIC PRACTICES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Portal writes that Parliament is "non-Christian." The greater part of the Christian laity would deny this to be so; but, at least, it is the National Parliament, and it will never give up its right to deal with all national interests as it thinks fitting. It does not claim to decide whether the Mass and Auricular Confession are elements of the pure Christian faith, but it can, and in the last resort always will, lay down the conditions on which the national endowments and privileges of the so-called Establishment shall be held. Mr. Portal is probably right in thinking that if the Ritualists are refused the liberty they claim, they will promote disruption and disestablishment; but he seems to forget the irresistible demand for disestablishment which will certainly arise, if that liberty is granted.

The Ritualists, to do them justice, do not accept the minimising explanations and defences of their temporising friends, such as Mr. Portal. They avow that they are bringing back all those doctrines and practices which the nation at the Reformation decided should not be held by the National Church, and to expect the State to permit such a reconstitution of that Church is as reasonable as to look for a restoration of Monarchy by divine right, or the feudal privileges of the nobles. I do not forget that the Spectator would limit this claim of the Ritualists, by the wishes of the particular congregation; but if you grant such liberty in one direction, you must grant it in every other. Not only the Salvation Army, but far more questionable sects, must be allowed to take possession of their parish church and its endowments. But, in truth, no such inorganic organisation is possible. A national institution must maintain a harmony among the several members which make up the body, and also a harmony with all the other national institutions. And Auricular Confession and the worship of the Host are among the things which it is now impossible to embody in an institution of the English nation. Disestablishment will be a great loss, but it will be better than that mediæval restoration; and if the choice is between the two, the people of England will certainly take the former. If Disestablishment can be averted, it must be by progress, not by retrogression,—by comprehending the Nonconformists, not the Ritualists.—I am, Sir, &c.,

EDWARD STRACHEY.

[Sir Edward Strachey assails a view which we have never adopted. We have, on the contrary, always asserted that the limits within which Ritualistic practices may be tolerated, are the limits laid down at the Reformation. Sir E. Strachey, however, apparently desires to forbid what Edward VI. directly permitted.—Ed. Spectator.]

DR. BENSON'S LETTER TO THE TRURO CLERGY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I think you misunderstand the drift of the remark of the Archbishop Designate in reference to the Earl of Mount Edgumbe to which you take exception. It was quæri representative of the laity of Cornwall, not quæri Cornish nobleman and Tory, that Dr. Benson consulted him; and any one who knows the circumstances of the recently-formed diocese will consider truly that the laity had a right to be consulted, on a change which will be a critical one in the history of the struggling Church in the county.—I am, Sir, &c., CORNUBIENSIS.

RELIEF OF LOCAL TAXATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I hardly follow your objection to the allocation of certain Imperial taxes to local purposes. That the local authority should fix the amount of the tax, I regard as a wholly impossible suggestion; but when you go on to say that if the amount of the tax is fixed by Parliament, "the effect on local authorities would be only that of a grant from the Consolidated Fund" (viz., to make the local authorities extravagant), I think you forget that the allocated tax would be a fixed amount, or one whose variations would be slight, and would in no way depend on the expenditure; whereas, the grants from the Consolidated Fund rise (never fall, of course) in proportion to the expenditure.

If Lord A says to his brother Parson B, "I will pay you half your son's education," Parson B sends his son to Eton, because only half the difference of cost between Eton and Marlborough falls on him. But if Lord A says, "I will give £100 per annum towards your son's education," Parson B sends the boy to Marlborough, because, in that case, the whole of the difference of cost falls on him.

I am anxious to point this out, because I have thought over the matter for many years, and feel certain that the allocation of Imperial taxes (say, the Excise licences) is the true way of relieving local taxation, by making personal property bear some share of it. These taxes are local, and are the fit subjects for local expenditure. The Income-tax and other sources of Imperial Revenue are not and never can be local, as Mr. Chamberlain has pointed out.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A. J.

ART.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.—(MR. CECIL LAWSON.)

[FOURTH NOTICE.]

In our last article upon this Gallery, we spoke of Mr. Lawson's art in its broader aspects, and tried to show what, in our opinion, were its chief characteristics; in the present article, we shall close our notice of this painter, by saying a few words upon some of the special pictures which are exhibited here. We need not trouble ourselves about the numbers of the pictures, for the most important are all in one room, and there will be no difficulty in identifying the subject of our remarks.

The first thing that is likely to impress a stranger is that there are three distinct divisions, into one or other of which these landscapes fall, each of which seems to have been more dependent upon the painter's mind than upon his hand; that is to say, his works are not divided the one from the other by increase or deficiency of technical skill and knowledge, so much as by the different ways of regarding his subject which the painter adopted at various periods. Pictures like "The Minister's Garden," better known, perhaps, by its secondary title of "A Tribute to the Memory of Oliver Goldsmith," the "Kent," the large moonlit "Pastoral," and many of the smaller works, show a purely recording habit of mind, in which the chief fact is the curiously impartial comprehensiveness of mass and detail. The second phase gives us an artist who accepts little or nothing from Nature, animate or inanimate, save certain broad aspects of sky and atmosphere; and into these, as it were, he dips his little poetical idea, and brings it out again triumphantly in the shape of a picture. Looked at carefully, with the scalpel in one's hand, many, if not most of the compositions belonging to this class will be found to have what are commonly called uninteresting and even ugly subjects. But it is beyond denial that the pictures themselves are both interesting and beautiful. They are melodies played upon a simple instrument by a hand "that waited for the heart's prompting," like the singing that we hear on some quiet summer evening, as we drift "down stream," when words neither wise nor witty in themselves become full of suggestion, from the silence and the distance through which they reach us. This is no over-strained simile, for there is truly a pictorial equivalent for muffled music in such works as "The Wet Moon," "The Silver Mist," "The Strayed," and the dark grey picture entitled "A Lament," in which Mr. Lawson embalms his regret at the disappearance of the picturesque frontage of old Chelsea, and shows us grimly the hideous engineering preparations for "laying the foundation of the Chelsea Embankment." As under the first phase the painter is almost annoyingly matter-of-fact, impartial, and universal in his selection of subject, so in the second, he carries partiality and imaginativeness to the other extreme, and looking from one to the other series of pictures, is like turning from Southey's epic of "Madoc, Prince of Wales," to Tennyson's poem of "Break, break, break." There would be comparatively little that was strange about this, were it not that apparently many of these dissimilar works were executed at one and the same time, and the only explanation which we can suggest, is, that in the smaller works Mr. Lawson was taking his pleasure, while in the larger he was toiling after an ideal of grandeur which he was never fated to reach. We shall say a word of this presently.

Meanwhile, let us note the third phase, distinctly later than the two we have named, and in some ways embracing them both. To this belong such pictures as the large landscape in the vestibule at the top of the staircase, the picture of "The Pool," exhibited at the Academy two or three years since; and all the later dark pictures, some of the Riviera, some of England, mostly with rather heavy blue skies and rolling white clouds. In this last phase, we see the painter trying to bring together truth to nature, certain conceptions of composition, and some poetical idea, to reconcile the different sides of his character, and combine them into one splendid pictorial whole. Let us say frankly that in this he never succeeded, and probably never would have succeeded, had his age rivalled that of Titian. The one picture which came nearest to such a reconciliation was that of "The Pool," in which heavy, shapeless trees stand darkly over-shadowing stagnant water, while, under their interlacing branches, we see a sunny landscape. The picture is powerful in the extreme, full of silence and suggested evil of all kinds; a pool for the Red Fisherman, if ever there was one yet. But it sacrifices too much to its power; there is no form, hardly any colour, in the whole work. The very birds which flutter across the surface of the water are ragged, and almost indistinguishable from one another. It is a dream of a pool,—a nightmare, we should have said,—but not a great painting.

The later pictures showed the failing of the artist's colour-power much more strongly. The foregrounds began to be compounds of sticky blacks and orange-browns, which, with a little dull green, formed the main portion of the scene, in order to emphasise the effect of the blue sky and cumulus clouds which overspread the whole. The truth is, that Mr. Lawson was only a colourist in a very limited sense of the word. When he really tried to imitate the glow and depth of Nature's tints, he failed completely. The hollyhocks, &c., in "The Minister's Garden" are by themselves shabbily poor in colour, the hops in the great "Kent" picture have not a trace of the real, delicate transparency of the real thing; his meadow-sweet looks as if it had been made at a bonnet-shop, and his blades of grass are as coarse in their hues as if they had been plucked from the robe of an Alhambra dancer. In all these things he was trying violent, hurried imitation of Nature and in all of them he failed. But in greater matters, or, perhaps, we should say in less individual details, he succeeded almost as invariably. The effect on a given landscape of twilight, or mist, or rain, or warm sunshine, has hardly ever been given more beautifully than in many of the pictures of which we speak. The light of the silvery sky and its reflection in the river, in the "Cheyne Walk" (1870), is a marvel of delicate beauty, and every little fleck of colour on the figures or in the falling leaves, is inserted with exquisite taste and rightness. And in all the pictures which record his impressions, his colouring is never coarse, but gently suggestive of beauty and nature. The truth about his colour faculty is that when he was not thinking of himself—or rather, of his big canvasses—he was sufficiently an artist to paint in harmony with the conceptions which he was seeking to embody, but that when he was working on a large scale, and colour became, as it were, a necessary element in the work, it was a stumbling-block to him, and he did one of two things,—either, as in the large, early works, he attempted to give it its due prominence, and failed; or, as in "The Pool" and later works, he turned his back upon it altogether. He was not a colourist, though he tinted some almost monochrome drawings exquisitely. He was not a refined, though he was a roughly accurate draughtsman; but he was a man who had in him a strange power of awakening the sympathies of those who studied his work. He was always trying to do it better and bigger than it had ever been done before, and as we have said, it is such comparative failures as those he made, which help artists to paint nobler pictures, and the public to appreciate better Art.

BOOKS.

SIBERIA IN ASIA.*

MR. SEEBOHM'S narrative of his visit to the Valley of the Yenesay is one of the most interesting books of travel it has been our good-fortune to meet with, but it is by no means easy to describe, within the narrow limits of a review. The difficulty arises from there being so much in the narrative, and also from its variety. Adventure enough to furnish forth a score of boys' books, a whole gallery of pictures for inspection by the mind's eye of those who take delight in realising the scenes through which the traveller passes, and a large amount of information about Siberian birds, which, in addition to its importance as a contribution to ornithology, is made extremely interesting to the unscientific reader by the writer's lucid, pleasant style,—these are the chief features of Mr. Seebohm's book, which is a successor to his Siberia in Europe, with, however, a long interval between the two works.

Since Captain Hall's graphic but ungrammatical narrative of his travels in the iron-hearted land of the Esquimaux, we have had no more attractive specimen of the traditional "brave man struggling with adversity" than Mr. Seebohm's story of how in 1876, Captain Wiggins, a "character" of a remarkable kind, took his Arctic steam yacht, 'Thames' (120 tons) from Sunderland to the mouth of the Obb, in the Kara Sea, hoping to ascend the river, but was obliged to run for the Yenesay, said to be the third largest river in the world; and after a tedious voyage, laid up the vessel on the Arctic Circle, half a mile up the tributary Koorayika, 1,200 miles from the mouth of the Yenesay, three months and nine days after he sailed from England. There is a bright but serious doggedness in Captain Wiggins' face (his portrait appropriately heads the narrative), which would convince anybody before reading the book that what he meant to do would get done, and whatever place he intended to go to he would surely arrive at. This is very nearly the case; he only did not bring back the 'Thames.' After a long fight for it, with ice and water, flood and sandbank, the desperate difficulties of winter, the more dangerous difficulties of summer in Arctic regions, the little steamer had to be abandoned, and there her "bones," stripped bare of sail and spar, lie derelict. It was, however, while the 'Thames' was frozen up in winter quarters, the crew living in a room in a peasant's house on the bank of the river looking down on the ship, and when Captain Wiggins had returned to England by the overland route, that Mr. Seebohm made that sturdy mariner's acquaintance, and arranged to start with him for Siberia in Asia, at five days' notice. We know how valuable were the results of the author's visit to the Valley of the Petchora, in North-East Russia, and are prepared to find that he made an equally successful raid upon the birds of Siberia in Asia, and their eggs; but the reader is in no hurry to arrive at the results, the journey of 6,000 miles is so interesting, the narrative is so bright. The author never loses sight of his birds, even when there are none, for then he tells us so; but he sees everything else as well, from Mohammedan morals to the price of meat, sketching men, manners, villages, briefly, but with great vivacity, and recognising with delight, while crossing the Steppes, small flocks of the Snow Bunting, remarkable as being the most northerly of all passerine birds in its breeding range, having been found throughout the Arctic Circle wherever land is known to exist. The hilly country beyond Perm ascending towards the Ural Mountains reminded him of the Peak of Derbyshire; the great steppes of Western Siberia of an almost boundless Salisbury Plain. The travellers regretted that they had not time to turn out of their road, so as to visit Irkutsk, "the most European town of All the Russias." It is situated in the heart of Siberia; and yet they were told that there they should find the freest thought, the highest education, the most refined civilisation, the least barbarous luxury, of any town in the vast empire. The account of the sledge journey of 3,000 miles—during which they would cross the meridian of Calcutta, 2,300 miles north of that city—pursued day and night, through every kind of weather, especially snow-storms, with three horses abreast, changed every fifteen to twenty miles, with bells tinkling to drive away the wolves, is very interesting. After they had done 2,431 miles, they rested at Yenesaish, where they found pleasant rooms, with light, elegant furniture, abundance of windows and mirrors, and roses and geraniums in pots. They also found very good company, and Mr. Seebohm picked up a young Jew, with shady antecedents and a "thick head," to do his bird-skinning for him. The Jew had "never tried" to skin birds, but he learned so quickly that he beat his master in the art in a week, but he never imbibed any other idea. They did not part good friends, and Mr. Seebohm says, with rather too wide generalisation, "One must not expect gratitude from a Russian Jew." A great part of the country through which they travelled is "so extravagantly cheap, that the ordinary incentives to industry hardly exist." Unless times have changed since 1876, what a fine place the great Steppes would be for Lord Dillon's tenants!—

* Siberia in Asia: a Visit to the Valley of the Yenesay, in East Siberia. By Henry Seebohm, Author of "Siberia in Europe." London: John Murray.

"We were able," says the author, "to buy beef at 2d. per lb., and grouse at 7d. a brace. We had a very practical demonstration that we were in a land flowing with hay and corn, in the price we paid for our horses. Up to Tyumain, the three had cost us 6d. a mile; on the Steppes the price fell to 1½d.—i.e., a ½d. a horse a mile. At one of the villages where we stopped to change horses, it was market day, and we found on inquiry that a ton of wheat might be purchased for the same amount as a hundredweight cost in England."

The stations ever so far north were beautifully clean, the journey, even though it included a race with the south wind, was eminently enjoyable. Here is a little bit about sledge-dogs; we gather from it that they are not ill-treated in Russia, for if they were, their sagacity would hardly be so trustworthy:—

"As we got further north, we found fine dogs at the stations, and occasionally we met a sledge drawn by dogs. These animals are most sagacious. A Russian traveller will hire a sledge with a team of six dogs, travel in it ten or fifteen miles to the next station, where he gives the dogs a feed, and sends them home again alone with the empty sledge. On several occasions we witnessed this. The dogs are fine fellows, a little like a Scotch shepherd's dog, but with very bushy hair. They have sharp noses, short, straight ears, and a bushy tail, curled over the back. Some are black, others white, but the handsomest variety is a grey fawn-colour."

The Valley of the Yenesay is "the paradise of House-Martins," but also the abode of official rascality. If Mr. Seebohm's experience be not exceptional, nothing that can be resorted to for the purpose of upsetting such a system is to be wondered at. At Krasnoyarsk, the wind beat the travellers, and they had to take to wheels and organise a little caravan. The last two stages of the journey were travelled with reindeer. They drove twenty, and went at a tremendous pace; "the animals seemed to fly over the snow." When they reached the winter quarters of the 'Thames,' they had done 3,240 English miles, counting from Nishni Novgorod—everything the other side of that place did not count, and yet to the untravelled reader it seems like 'the back of God speed!'—and they were once more within reach of English voices and English cooking. Then began "strolling" in the forest (on snow-shoes), and a moderate, afterwards increasing to a glorious, find of birds. The author makes his favourite topic very interesting, for he did not merely shoot and skin birds and classify eggs,—he also studied their lives and ways, and there is little of technical dryness of detail in his record of investigation. He has much to say about the glacial period, and the distribution of the various species of birds; he studied the human inhabitants of that distant region as well, and though some of the tribes are almost as poor and wretched as the people with whom the Commissioner of the Daily News in the West of Ireland has recently made us acquainted, there is some pleasant reading about the cheery and kindly Ostyaks. Here is a passage which at once puts the climate before us:—

"In the winter, double windows are absolutely necessary, to prevent the inmates of the houses from being frozen to death. The outside windows project about six inches in front of the inside ones. If the inside window reveals the poverty of the inhabitant, the outside window seemingly displays his extravagance. [Glass is very dear in the Arctic Circle.] To all appearance, it is composed of one solid pane of plate-glass, nearly three inches thick. On closer examination, this turns out to be a slab of ice, carefully frozen into the framework, with a mixture of snow and water, in place of putty."

The promise of May was a weary while about fulfilling itself, but so much the better for the reader, for he owes to that circumstance chapter ix., and it is almost as delightful as Robinson Crusoe, with a multitude of birds in place of that rather monotonous parrot, whose education, we have always thought, the shipwrecked mariner might have improved. We cannot dwell upon the breaking-up of the ice, the danger of the 'Thames,' and her "driving" with a broken rudder among the pack ice, and the floes that "began to climb up the ship's side like a snake." Concerning this mishap Mr. Seebohm says:—"No one but an Englishman would have committed the inconceivable blunder of fitting out an Arctic yacht with every precaution against ice, and leaving it with a complicated rudder, exceedingly difficult to replace, and without provision for its being unshipped." But we must quote the following description, just as the excitement was at its height:—

"The revolution in the ice took place to the accompaniment of a perfect Babel of birds. Above our heads we continually heard the 'gag-gag' of geese, and the harsh bark of swans, as flock after flock hurried past us to the Tundra. Wherever there was a little open water between the ice-floes and pack-ice, crowds of gulls were fishing as if they had not had a meal for a week, and their derisive laugh, as they quarrelled over their prey, seemed to mock our misfortunes, while the weird cries of the black-throated and red-throated divers came from the creek opposite. A flock of wild ducks also passed us, and along the shore small birds flitted from bush to bush in hitherto unknown profusion. Bramblings and white wagtails passed in pairs, shore larks in small flocks, and redpolls in large flocks, and I shot a solitary wheatear. In the midst of his troubles on board his half-wrecked steamer, Captain Wiggins seized his gun and shot a goose, which was flying over the ship, and which proved to be the Little White-fronted Goose, the species which I had missed shooting the day before."

Chapter ix. is the gem of the book. It concludes with a beautiful description of the great event of the year in these regions, like the rising of the Nile in Egypt, the annual battle between summer and winter. It raged for a fortnight on the Yenesay, and the narrative of the special correspondent on the field is wonderfully graphic and exciting, from the march up-stream of thousands of acres of ice, to the final conquest of winter, and "the retreat of the fragments of his beaten army to the triumphant music of thousands of song-birds, and amidst the waving of green leaves, and the illumination of gay flowers of every hue." No less interesting is the author's story of his summer sojourn on the Koorayika, during which he seems to have studied man, and bird, and beast, sky, land, and water, races, politics, and customs, with impartial closeness and attention. We know that the 'Thames' never got out of the Yenesay, but we read the story of Captain Wiggins' efforts to get her out, and the transfer to the 'Ibis' (a lucky purchase of Mr. Seebohm's) with no less interest. At this point arose difficulties, for which we must refer the reader to the book; he will learn their nature with some sympathy and a great deal of amusement. The result was that Mr. Seebohm returned alone to Yenesiesk, and travelled to Ekaterinburg, enriching his collections and storing up observations by which we profit largely on the way. A delightful chapter is devoted to the Tundra, a very interesting one to the state of society in Russia generally, and to official corruption in particular. Of Alexander III., the author writes with curt contempt:—"The present Emperor has not the courage to attempt to govern his country justly." With a word of praise for the illustrations, we must now leave this most interesting book, from which we have learnt that Siberia is "a magnificent country of superb forests and cornfields capable of rivalling those of Minnesota, with iron equal to that of Sweden in quality, and gold almost as abundant as that of California, to say nothing of copper, salt, and coal." That the land, whose name was once a synonym for dreary barrenness, has a great future before it, Mr. Seeböhm is convinced. He sums up his impressions in these words:—

"Siberia is, in fact, a second Canada in reserve, and the political geographer, looking into the far future, and wondering what is to become of the surplus population and capital of the English and Teutonic races when North America shall be as thickly populated as Europe, may postpone his anxieties for many centuries, to allow time for the civilisation of Siberia to reopen the problem."

GIDEON FLEYCE.*

MR. LUCY is a clever man, and there is a good deal that is clever in this novel, but we should not call the novel a good one as a whole. It has the greatest fault which the novel of a clever man can have, that, in spite of a very ingenious and sensational plot, the permanent effect produced on the reader's mind is of something hanging fire. A great deal of the social life is extremely laboured, and gives the impression that the author paused between each paragraph to think what he should write next. For instance, the sketch of the leading tradesmen, and also of the 'Long-shore men, at Saxton-on-the-Sea, is very laboured, and suggests an unsuccessful following in the footsteps of George Eliot's studies of this kind of life. Studies of this kind should not interrupt the progress of a story, unless they add very much to your appreciation of the story when resumed. Mr. Lucy's do not. We are always wanting to get to the end of them. Though no one can say that they are not the result of observation, and sometimes of close observation, yet they are not easy; they give no impression of entering naturally into the author's mode of telling his story; they appear to be pieced into it, to eke it out. Take the following, for example, which is as good a specimen of this sort of study as we can find; indeed, the best, but which none the less conveys the impression of effort:—

"The 'Longshore men took to him [Gideon Fleyce] from the very first. It is a peculiarity of the vocation of this class of citizens that they should have a good deal of leisure. To the casual observer it might appear that they earned an honest living simply by lounging about the beach with their hands deeply set in their trousers pockets, and their eyes intently fixed on the distant horizon. Here Gideon found them at whatever time chance made most convenient to himself. Early morning or late afternoon they were sure to be there, always with their hands in their pockets, and their gaze far, far at sea. Many of them wore top-boots coming high over their knees. The sou'-wester appeared indispensable to their calling, and all affected a blue woollen jersey convenient for rolling up at the hips, so that they could, without exhausting their store of energy, get their hands in their pockets. What at first struck the unaccustomed eye of Gideon was their apparent state of deadly preparation. They seemed ready to go anywhere and do anything. On the second morning of his visit to the beach he hastened his steps, lest peradventure he should find them gone, and his opportunity of improving the acquaintance lost. But there they were just the same, as ready as ever to go anywhere and do anything; but in the meanwhile, standing still and doing nothing. Gideon chatted with them in his cheery manner, talking on all topics but that of the parliamentary representation of Saxton. They also avoided that subject, but they knew very well what was in the wind, and fully appreciated the compliment paid to them by the new candidate in seeking them out thus early. Gideon did violence to his feelings by possessing himself of a tobacco pouch, which he filled at the tobacconist's in High Street with the strongest 'shag.' Also, more offensive still to his sensitive nature, he had a roll of pigtail which he was wont to produce during pauses in the conversation. These were so frequent that the pigtail was speedily absorbed by the 'Longshore men. The engrossing nature of their occupation left them little time for idle conversation, and induced sententious habits of speech. But when Long Bill, in the middle of one afternoon, broke a silence that had lasted for a quarter of an hour with the remark, 'A right haffable gent, that's what I say,' there was a grunt of approval all round. Gideon's name had not been mentioned, but every one knew who was meant. Certainly it could not be Mr. Montgomery [the sitting Member], who never came down to the beach, and had never so much as offered a man of them a pipe of tobacco." The sketch of the Saxton tradesmen is even more laborious, and so it is with the study of the Evangelical chapel in Camden Town,—Rehoboth, as it is called,—and of the tradesmen and women who attend it. Here is a sketch of Mrs. Dumfy, one of the regular attendants at Rehoboth, and her devotion to the furniture of her lodger's parlour. There is observation, and close observation, in it, but something wanting which should make the observation amuse us, instead of wearying us, as it certainly does:—

"When Mrs. Dumfy opened the door to the caller, she was a trifle more than usually unprepossessing in appearance. It was eleven o'clock in the morning, and Jack had disturbed her in the middle of the consecrated task of polishing the stumpy legs of the sofa in the best and only parlour. When Mrs. Dumfy polished the legs of a sofa, or of any other article of furniture, she put her whole soul into the furniture paste. She had a notion that continued friction, carried on at the greatest velocity possible, and persevered in for a certain number of minutes—a space of time defined by the formula 'as long as her back would hold'—was absolutely necessary to obtain the desired result. She polished the legs of a sofa as an Indian rubs sticks to get a fire, or did rub them when Fenimore Cooper was alive. Stopping short of a certain measure of friction the fire might not be kindled, and the labour had all to be gone through again. On this principle Mrs. Dumfy polished her furniture, and it was Jack's misfortune that he happened to knock at the door when she was something like midway through the process. She might have stopped to finish it, and let the caller wait; but she knew that, in such circumstances, men had a habit of rubbing their feet on the steps, or perhaps leaning against the railings or the door. Callers were to be got rid of with the least possible delay. So with a petulant groan Mrs. Dumfy left the half-polished limb, and with a duster thrown over her shoulder, and a rag smelling vilely of furniture paste in her right hand, she confronted the cavalier who had a moment earlier walked down the street glowing with anticipation."

It is just the same, to our minds, with the political sketches. We take no interest in O'Brien (and wonder, by the way, what in the world the heroine finds in him to love). The account of him and of his political friends is acute but heavy writing. Wratten and Gosley bore us. Boscobel and Petit Philpott give us no pleasure, indeed Mr. Lucy suppresses the brilliant parts of Boscobel's conversation, though assuring us that he became brilliant; and, on the whole, leaves us with the impression that Petit Philpott was at least Boscobel's equal.

The only part of the book that seems to us to have real power is the description of the relation between the usurer and his son, and the scene in which Mr. Israel Gideon deceives his son with the idea that he is going to lend him the £3,000 he wants, and instead of drawing a cheque, writes a malediction on him, for the signature of which he maliciously borrows a stamp from his victim. That is a powerful scene, and the whole of the sensational plot of which this scene is the central point, is managed with an ingenuity worthy almost of Wilkie Collins. On the whole, we cannot but think that the sensational part of this story is really the best. In all that is not sensational, there is an effort and languor which disappoint us in so clever a writer as Mr. Lucy. But the old miser is powerfully sketched, and the vulgar but far from evil-minded son, eager for wealth, like his father, but not for its own sake, rather for the advantages which it can purchase,—is drawn with a certain moderation and an amount of careful shading which seem to us to suggest that Mr. Lucy might write a much better novel of plot than he has written in the present instance, where plot is much more than eked out,—positively swelled out,—by society sketches of a cumbrous kind. For once, we prefer the sensational element in a novel, to the studies of character and life. Indeed, there is more of character itself in the old Jew and his son, than in all the rest of the tale put together. After the murder, there is a scene which suggests much too strongly the passage in The House of the Seven Gables where Hawthorne muses over his dead judge, and taunts him with not bestirring himself, though the time for his pressing engagements is flying by. Still, we prefer even that scene, and the comparison with a story of vastly greater power which it forces upon us, to the club dinner, the political manipulations of the Saxton tradesmen, and the elaborate descriptions of Saxton corruption. Mr. Lucy is a very lively writer, but his usual liveliness is replaced by forced vivacity throughout the greater part of this novel; and only in the portions of it where we expected nothing, did we find more than we had hoped.

FANNY KEMBLE ON SHAKESPEARE.*

THESE Notes are prefaced by a chapter on the Stage which ought not to be skipped, as it contains some thoughts which are happily expressed. But even before the introduction, we must have a word of praise for the outside of the book, and for the bold, dark-red type in which it is printed. A tenpenny Shakespeare is Shakespeare still, but there is a consciousness of greater delight when his thoughts are bedded on hand-made paper and clothed in a suit of Russia leather. A gentleman ought to be dressed as a gentleman, and we would say of this book that it issues from the press dressed like a quiet gentlewoman.

* Gideon Fleyce. A Novel. By Henry W. Lucy. 3 vols. London: Chatto and Windus.

* Notes upon Some of Shakespeare's Plays. By Frances Anne Kemble. London: Richard Bentley and Son. 1852.

Mrs. Kemble is fond of distinctions, which she knows how to draw, as, e.g., in the chapters on the Stage, between what is dramatic and what is theatrical. The dramatic is the real expression of the emotions of human nature. The theatrical is the imitation of this expression, and is always more or less tinged with unreality:—

"Children are always dramatic, but only theatrical when they become aware that they are objects of admiring attention. . . . The Italians, nationally and individually, are dramatic; the French are, on the contrary, theatrical; we English of the present day are neither one nor the other." (p. 4.) . . . "The combination of the power of representing passion and emotion with that of imagining or conceiving it". . . . "is essential to make a good actor." (p. 5.)

Can a good actor be also a good dramatic critic? Mrs. Kemble thinks not, and adduces the examples of Mrs. Siddons, Mdlle. Rachel and Pasta, as artists unable to criticise; and of herself, on the other hand, who, as this book shows, is no mean critic, "as one who was unable to accomplish on the stage any result worthy of her great advantages." The notes are confined to the plays of Macbeth, Henry VIII., The Tempest, and Romeo and Juliet, and evince on every page a deep discrimination of character, and at the same time a careful study of the text. We doubt whether any of our readers who are asked to inscribe in a book their favourite play, together with their favourite poet, sport, historian, &c., would select the Tempest; but our likes and dislikes depend much upon our feelings, and our feelings upon the law of association; and Mrs. Kemble explains to us (pp. 123 and 124) how she came to love The Tempest.

Mrs. Kemble's most exhaustive criticism is that on Macbeth, which is happily termed "the drama of conscience." We cannot quite agree with what is said of Lady Macbeth. That she had a harder conscience, a clearer purpose, a stronger will than her husband, we admit; but Mrs. Kemble goes farther than this, and avers (pp. 71 and 72) that never does Lady Macbeth feel remorse or repentance for what she has done. We do not think that a heart unvisited by remorse could utter the words, (Act V., scene i.), "What! will these hands ne'er be clean?" And again, "All the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand. Oh, oh, oh!" If, as Mrs. Kemble says, Lady Macbeth died of wickedness, she is the only human being who ever did so. Wickedness, no doubt, kills a great many people indirectly, for there is hardly a vice or a crime that has not some disease which is its correlative. Nevertheless, a merely wicked man who manages to flourish like a green bay-tree often lives to a good old age, and dies of a disease which has no relation to his wickedness. The contrasts drawn by Mrs. Kemble between Lady Macbeth and her husband, between Banquo and Macbeth, and between other characters which we shall have to notice further on, are very forcible. Here is a masterly example:—

"The woman's wide-eyed, bold, collected leap into the abyss makes us gulp with terror; while we watch the man's blinking, shrinking, gradual slide into it with a protracted agony akin to his own. Nothing can be more wonderfully perfect than Shakespeare's delineation of the evil nature of these two human souls,—the evil strength of the one, and the evil weakness of the other."

We have never heard of any great actor undertaking the part of Banquo, but we see in the light of Mrs. Kemble's analysis that it is as finely conceived as any part in the play. She shows well how the evil suggestions which rankle in the bosom of Macbeth glance harmlessly off the Nathaniel-like soul of his companion. We conceive that an interesting book might be written on the minor characters in Shakespeare. Even the study of a dialogue between a first, second, and third gentleman, or between two murderers, reveals to us a picture, not of puppets, but of men.

The discussion as to whether Banquo's Ghost was seen or not by Lady Macbeth is ingenious, and we are disposed to think that the conclusion arrived at is a true one. Mrs. Kemble conceives that, granting a ghost, no one, however strong in mind, could behold it unmoved. She observes (p. 66) that Shakespeare has many ghost-seers,—Horatio, Hamlet, Brutus, and Macbeth. In each case, the feeling of awe and horror manifests itself in the staring eyes, the trembling lips, the pale face of the beholder. But Lady Macbeth looks at the empty chair in which the ghost of the murdered man is sitting, and calmly says to her husband, "I tell you yet again, Banquo is buried; he cannot come out of his grave." And this thought she repeats in the last terrible scene, when trying to wash her hands clean from the blood of King Duncan. We do not know what may be our readers' conception of Lady Macbeth's person. We confess to have formed our own from the print of Mrs. Siddons. But would a tall, towering woman, with black hair and flashing eyes, be termed "dearest chuck?" One of the best dramatic readers of the present day, who has made Shakespeare his daily study, told the writer that he was convinced that Macbeth's wife was a slight, fair woman, with blue eyes, after the pattern of Lady Audley, in Miss Braddon's famous novel. Her will, being too strong for the frail body which contained it, caused the breaking-up of her vital powers so soon after she had secured the object of her ambition.

As Macbeth is the play of conscience, so Henry VIII. may be called "the play of pride," as personified in the Queen and Wolsey. Rightly does Milton call pride the "last infirmity of noble minds," for nowhere is the sin so shrouded in nobility as in the character of Katharine. But, according to Mrs. Kemble, pride of power is more easily cured than pride of birth. As she remarks (p. 72),—"So with disgrace grew her [Katharine's] pride. But Wolsey honoured himself in his station; it was to him the palpable proof of his great powers of achievement; and when he lost it, his confidence in himself must have been shaken to its foundations, and he may almost have fallen to the hopelessness of self-contempt." The remaining plays which are commented on, are those of Romeo and Juliet and The Tempest. The notes on the former are suggestions to a young actor who was about to play the part of Romeo. Here, again, we have one of Mrs. Kemble's contrasts. Romeo's is said to be the love of sentiment, and Juliet's that of passion. To us this seems a distinction without a difference. That love is often deepest and strongest which makes no outward sign, which is content to suffer, to work, nay, to be forgotten by its object. But the love of sentiment or passion betrays itself in such words and acts as are recorded both of Romeo and Juliet. We are not at all sure that if Romeo were to marry Juliet, and live, say, in Hertford Street, Mayfair, he would not be found three months after marriage playing billiards at his club, instead of sharing his wife's company.

We cannot, again, agree with all Mrs. Kemble's conclusions on the emendations of Collier's annotated folio of 1632. The interest as to the value of these notes has almost faded away, since it was discovered that more than half the emendations are identical with those of Hanmer's edition. Mr. Collier and Mrs. Kemble both appeal to common-sense as the ultimate arbiter, inasmuch as Shakespeare is the poet of common-sense; and it is on common-sense, not on the authority of competing folios, that we base our conclusions. Why, for instance, should not Miranda, in Act I., sc. ii., have had her sympathies confined to some noble creature in the boat, and then widened, as she saw the vessel breaking up, to all the poor souls in her? Again, in Prospero's twelfth speech to Miranda the passage occurs:—"Who having unto truth by telling of it [i.e., that he was Duke of Milan] made such a sinner of his memory to credit his own lie." There is no reason that we can see for altering "unto truth" into "to untruth." The meaning is obvious that Antonio, by continually lying, had become a "sinner unto truth" in such wise as to believe his own lie. It is possible, we think, thus to personify truth, but not untruth, which is a mere negation. In the fifteenth speech of Prospero, we object to the substitution of "practice" for "purpose." Prospero evidently was meant to repeat the word "purpose," just as in the Book of Jonah the word "prepare" is four times repeated. The Lord is said to prepare the great fish, the gourd, the worm, and the vehement east wind. We confess that the question whether Prospero's coat or his story put Miranda to sleep does not interest us. We are inclined to think it was the story, firstly because it is a little tedious; and secondly, because almost at every sentence Prospero asks Miranda if she is listening.

We close the book, thankful to Mrs. Kemble even for her verbal criticisms (which are the least attractive part of her work), inasmuch as they have helped us to realise more fully the marvellous imaginative power of Shakespeare. Further notes from her pen would, we are sure, be heartily welcomed by the reading public.

GEIKIE'S TEXT-BOOK OF GEOLOGY.*

THE favourite scientific text-books of one generation, before they can answer the requirements of another, need to be "greatly enlarged," to be "recast," or to be "almost entirely rewritten." But a time must come when the most strenuous efforts of author and editor fail to bring back the waning popularity of a once-valued manual. Henceforth it may take an assured place among books of reference, but it remains no longer a constant guide and companion in field and laboratory and study. Fortunate it is for students and teachers alike when a worthy successor can be found,—a successor as wide as its predecessor in range, as full in research, as happy in suggestion, as cogent in argument, and as attractive in method and in form.

It would not be an adequate expression of the high opinion we have formed of the merits of Dr. Geikie's Text-book of Geology, were we to say that it will take its place as the new class-book of this science; a work of much lower quality might have done this. But the author possesses something more than the learning and sound judgment necessary for the task which he undertook. To discover, to select, and to arrange materials constitute but the necessary foundation for his work; firmness of outline and due proportion in the different parts are as much needed, to secure a satisfactory result. But the author of the text-book before us may claim in an unusual degree other merits besides these, namely, the merits of originality of view and picturesqueness of expression. In a book for students' use, the latter quality, though of obvious importance, will not appeal only to beginners.

Perhaps the illustrations, in a volume having the scope of a natural-science text-book, demand a few special words of reference, before the scheme of the whole work is discussed. We may at once say that the illustrations—437 in number—are not merely well chosen, but in very many cases something more than adequate. Naturally, the frontispiece takes our attention at once. It represents the grand plateau and cañons of the Colorado, and a very fine drawing it is, full, indeed, of laborious detail, but every touch telling, and the complex perspective being managed with consummate skill. Dr. Geikie informs us that it is a reduction of a drawing by Mr. W. H. Holmes, and was furnished by Captain Dutton, of the United States Geological Survey. When we study this drawing, and then turn to the two diagrams by the same draughtsman on p. 923, we are able to convince ourselves that Dr. Geikie has not said a word too much in praise of Mr. Holmes's powers as a delineator of the geological structure and scenery of Western America. His pictures are certainly most remarkable examples of the union of "artistic effectiveness with almost diagrammatic geological distinctness and accuracy." But the author's own drawings, particularly those of "scenic geology," present the same elements of picturesqueness and accuracy, for we presume we are right in attributing to Dr. Geikie's own pencil such drawings as those reproduced on pages 433, 555, 642, &c. Many original sketches of another class, but from the same source, are to be found in several parts of the volume, although they are chiefly gathered into the chapter which treats of the microscopic characters of rocks; we refer to the magnified drawings from thin rock-sections.

It is now time to tell our readers something of the contents of this text-book, and something of the order which has been followed in its construction. The contents are divided into seven sections, or "books," of unequal length, varying, indeed, from twenty pages to two hundred and fifty. The seven books are further divided, more or less elaborately, into parts, sections, subsections, paragraphs, &c, according to the range and character of the subjects under treatment. Book i. is headed, "The Cosmical Aspects of Geology," a title which sufficiently explains itself. In Book ii. are discussed the materials of the earth's substance, including, firstly, the atmosphere and the ocean as its envelopes, and the solid globe, its temperature and age; then, secondly, an account of the composition of the earth's crust, or "minerals and rocks." "Geognosy" is the alternative title of this second book. So considerable is the importance of the manner in which rocks and minerals are first studied, that we may pause to note the order which Dr. Geikie here follows. Beginning with the general chemical constitution of the crust, and with rock-forming minerals, he passes on to the study of the general or macroscopic characters of rocks, and then to their minute or microscopic characters; afterwards comes classification. Here Dr. Geikie abandons arrangements drawn even in part from processes of formation, real or supposed, and relies on the broad distinction subsisting between crystalline and fragmental rocks. Still, however, considerable violence is thus done to the term "crystalline," since it is made to embrace materials which are vitreous, and therefore certainly non-crystalline. Of the further divisions, three are included under crystalline rocks, and four under the fragmental, the former being "stratified," "foliated," or "massive;" the latter being "psammities," "pelites," "tuffs" or "fragmental rocks of organic origin." The stratified rocks include chemical deposits, such as limestones, dolomites, and sinters; the foliated or schistose rocks correspond mainly to the metamorphic rocks, while the massive rocks coincide pretty nearly with the old division of igneous rocks. It is in his treatment of these massive rocks, the granites, felsites, syenites, trachytes, phonolites, &c., that we find a good example of Dr. Geikie's accurate and recent knowledge, as well as of his grasp of view. Modern petrology has of late made such a large use of new methods for the microscopical and chemical study of rock-constituents, that the danger of looking at rocks from an exclusively chemical and mineralogical point of view has been much increased. Dr. Geikie avoids such an error, while according a due amount of value to characters derived from exact chemical and mineralogical determinations. Here we may venture to point out that our author has adopted (page 193), from MM. Fouqué and Michel Lévy, the common Continental mistake of attributing to M. Thoulet the ingenious process of separating mixed minerals from one another by means of a dense liquid, in which some species float, while others sink; the process had been in use in England by means of Sonstadt's liquid, some time before M. Thoulet published his experiments, in which he recommended the ordinary solution of mercuric iodide in potassium iodide.

We cannot afford to linger long over the fascinating contents of Book iii., a most important section of the work, treating of dynamical geology, and extending over nearly 300 pages. Many of our readers who might not care to enter upon a study of palaeontological geology in Book v. or of stratigraphical geology in Book vi., would be glad to know where they might turn to find the story of the changes which are going on beneath the earth, and of those which are in progress upon its surface. Under the former heading of "Hypogene Action," volcanoes, earthquakes, secular subsidences and upheavals, and underground changes of texture, structure and composition in rocks, are considered. "Epigene," or surface action, includes the work of air, of water, and of life. Such important topics are here dwelt on as rain and the weathering of rocks; springs, rivers, lakes, glaciers, oceans, and tides, as well as the formation of soils. It is hard to say which we admire most, the skill with which so much information is compressed into so small a space, the reticence which has excluded topics and details of secondary moment, or the clearness which marks each description, calculation, or inference.

Of Books v. and vii. we have left ourselves no room to speak. They treat respectively of "Geotectonic Geology," that is, the architecture of the earth's crust, and of "Physiographical Geology;" but we must, in passing, commend the exactitude with which the many subjects included under "Structural Geology" are handled.

Books v. and vi., treating largely, as both of them do, of fossil remains, necessarily overlap. But it is remarkable to observe how little repetition there is here in the treatment of these two subjects of palaeontological and stratigraphical geology. It is worthy of note that Dr. Geikie expresses himself cautiously with regard to eozyon, and to several other subjects where there is room for genuine doubt. His attitude with regard to Sedgwick and Murchison is less pronounced than we expected. An index of subjects occupying thirty-six pages, with double columns, and an index of authorities of ten columns, are not the least meritorious features of this text-book. Some of the more definitely chemical statements of these pages need slight revision. We note a few which caught the eye in turning over half the pages of Book ii. The proportion of carbonic-acid gas in the atmosphere is overstated on p. 31. For some years past, more accurate analyses have tended to show that the accepted figure, four volumes in 10,000, should be reduced to three parts. On page 57 the impression given that such a mineral as cryolite contains mere traces of fluorine should have been avoided. In tabulating what is called the average composition of felspars, it is a mistake to carry the decimal figures to the second place. On page 85, and elsewhere in this and other sections of the book, we find no express reference to the occurrence and functions of iron pyrites in a finely-divided condition as a rock constituent. And we have failed to discover any recognition of the relation of the sulphur to the other constituents of carbonaceous rocks,—indeed, sulphur is not named as a constituent of coal in the table of analyses given on page 172. If we point out these few small defects as specimens of a class, it is in no spirit of fault-finding, but because we should be glad to remove any spot, however insignificant, from so fair a picture.

* Text-book of Geology. By Archibald Geikie, LL.D., F.R.S., Director-General of the Geological Survey. London: Macmillan and Co. 1882.

LALLANNE ON ETCHING.*

It is a curious fact that though the art of etching has received so great an impulse of late years, and that most artists of eminence have, at all events, tried their hands at the etching needle and the copper, there has been written concerning it scarcely one authoritative and exhaustive handbook. Mr. Hamerton's Etching and Etchers, though a large, handsome volume, full of valuable information and interesting illustrations, by no means supplies the want of which we speak, and is rather an essay on the scope and history of etching, than a guide to its practice. The same author's smaller work, which is professedly devoted to teaching the technique of the art, contains singularly little which is calculated to smooth the path of the student, and chiefly consists of a brief enumeration of the various methods which are employed by etchers. Besides which, Mr. Hamerton's work bears with it that suspicion of amateurishness which always accompanies the efforts of one who is not himself a thorough master of his craft to instruct students in its technical details. For Mr. Hamerton is only an etcher, as it were, incidentally, in the intervals of editing and literature; and though this would not matter if he produced work of very first-rate quality, it does matter a good deal when his etching is at best second-rate. The little book by Mr. Seymour Haden entitled "Notes on Etching" comes to us with all the authority that Mr. Hamerton's writing lacks, but by no means fulfils the purpose of a handbook. It is pleasantly if somewhat authoritatively written gossip on the craft and its professors, teeming with sharply-constructed sentences about Art and Man, and impressed throughout with a sort of transcendental practicality. There is more "stuff" in it with regard to the Art than perhaps in all that Mr. Hamerton has written, but it does not condescend to details, and it is somewhat marred throughout by being written with an evident bias against engraving, as contrasted with etching, and an endeavour to force etching upwards to a rank in the world of Art which it cannot really attain. With this exception, we are not aware that there has been any notable publication on etching of late years, which embraced the practice of the Art as well as its history, and it is therefore with considerable pleasure that we welcome the book before us, which exactly supplies what is most needed.

M. Maxime Lallanne, of whose treatise the volume is a translation, is one of the first of living French etchers, and in every sense a master of his art, down to its remotest detail. The book is badly arranged in some ways, and by no means too well translated, but it is in all essential respects a very valuable one. It omits no detail, and it deals with nearly every difficulty by which a young etcher could be puzzled. Most valuable of all, as every practical student of the art will allow, is its account of, and remedies for, all the mistakes to which beginners are liable; and this part of the work is especially full and clear, and enters into the causes as well as the remedies of the various errors.

The book has been translated by a Mr. Koehler (apparently a German resident in Boston), and is disfigured by a good many Americanisms of spelling; and the translator has added an introductory chapter and explanatory notes, which he informs us were first designed for the instruction of an American public. The reason of these appearing in the English edition is probably that the work was published from the same proof-sheets in America and England, a practice which is now becoming pretty common with some English publishers, and which has the effect of saving them expense at the cost of the public. Of course, it does not do the young English etcher any actual harm to be told to take a clean earthenware pot, glazed on the inside, with a handle to it, and to be informed that such pots are to be bought for "fifteen cents, at G. A. Miller and Co.'s, 101 Shawmut Avenue, Boston," though it is undoubtedly productive of a vague feeling of irritation; but all these little details of language, nationality, and translation do not really matter much in a work which is professedly only a text-book. Looked at for that purpose, we repeat that it is, in our opinion, not only the best, but the only good handbook of etching which is at present published in England; and it has this further advantage over previous publications,—that it has not been published under the auspices of an artist's colourman, whose wares it was bound to advertise.

It is difficult to give an illustration of M. Lallanne's instruction which shall not be tedious to the reader, but perhaps the following extract, describing the manner in which the etching-ground is laid upon the copper, will serve to give an idea of the minuteness of his instructions, and the clearness with which they are delivered. It must be premised that all the technical instruction in the work is delivered in the form of a lecture from a master-etcher to a young pupil:—

"You have here a plate, I say to him; I clean it with turpentine; then, having well wiped it with a piece of fine linen, and having still further cleaned it by rubbing it with Spanish white (or whiting), I fasten it into the vice by one of its edges*, taking care to place a tolerably thick piece of paper under the teeth of the vice, so as to protect the copper against injury. I now hold the plate with its back over this chafing-dish; but a piece of burning paper, or the flame of a spirit lamp, will do equally well. As soon as the plate is sufficiently heated† I place upon its polished surface this ball of ordinary etching-ground, wrapped in a piece of plain taffeta; the heat causes the ground to melt. If the plate is too hot, the ground commences to boil while melting; in that case, we must allow the plate to cool somewhat, as otherwise the ground will be burned. I pass the ball over the whole surface of the copper, taking care not to overcharge the plate with the ground. Then with the dabber I dab it in all directions; at first vigorously and quickly, so as to spread and equalise the layer of varnish; and finally, as the varnish cools, I apply the dabber more delicately. The appearance of inequalities and little protruding points in the ground indicates that it is laid on too thick, and the dabbing must be continued until we have obtained a perfectly homogeneous layer. This must be very thin, sufficient to resist strong biting, and yet allowing the point to draw the very finest lines, which it will be difficult to do with too much varnish."

The above is a fair specimen of M. Lallanne's instructions, and seems to us singularly minute and concise, saying all that is needed in the clearest way. With regard to the rest of the book, M. Lallanne enters at length into the various processes, the manner of treating a plate at the various stages of its progress, and gives many explanatory etchings, of which we need only say that they are well calculated to answer their purpose. There is a theory as to the relative quickness of the biting of lines which are near together and those which are far apart, upon which much of M. Lallanne's own practice depends, and which he was the first to enunciate clearly; but this is not the place to enter upon so technical a matter, and we need only, in conclusion, repeat our opinion (which is one based upon a practical knowledge of the art and its requirements) that this work is, from its own point of view, i.e., as a handbook, thoroughly useful and trustworthy.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Works of Alexander Pope. With Introductions and Notes by the Rev. W. Elwin and W. J. Courthope, M.A. Vol. IV.—Poetry, Vol. IV. With Illustrations. (J. Murray.)—The present volume of this fine edition of Pope's works contains "The Dunciad" and "Miscellaneous Poems." Of the famous satire, called by Mr. Ruskin a "monumental work," Mr. Courthope's admiration is more enthusiastic than ours. He is alive to its defects, but considers that all genuine lovers of poetry must "subordinate their sense of the faults of the poem to their appreciation of its overpowering excellence." If we were to use such language in relation to Pope, we should apply it far more readily to the "Imitations of Horace" than to "The Dunciad." These "Imitations" are, in our judgment, the poet's greatest achievement as a satirist. The "Prologue" addressed to Arbuthnot is, indeed, of the rarest excellence, and is read with delight by readers who are forced to study "The Dunciad" as a task. This elaborate satire is Pope's most laborious effort, and it presents a picture of the age, or rather of the town, invaluable for its minuteness and variety. It forms a mine of research for the student of London life and manners in the eighteenth century, and contains also enough doubtful allusions to tax the sagacity of the ablest editor. Every page, nay, almost every line needs its commentator, and Mr. Courthope says rightly that if we would

* Probably wrongly translated; anyhow, it should be "corners," instead of "edges."
† M. Lallanne here omits to say that the sufficient heat is as much as can be borne by the back of the hand.

* Etching. By Maxime Lallanne. Translated by S. R. Koehler. London: Sampson Low and Co.

do Pope full justice, we must give to understanding his work something of the pains which he spent on producing it. Whether the student will be sufficiently rewarded for such labour need not be discussed here, but we confess to thinking that neither in construction nor execution does his satire merit the almost unrivalled position awarded to it by Mr. Ruskin, or the glowing eulogy of Mr. Courthope. A poem that demands, as we have said, an interpreter for almost every couplet; a poem, too, tainted with obscenity, and describing, no doubt with consummate art, the petty doings of insignificant men; a poem sincere only in the revenge that dictated it, may be so wonderful of its kind as to excite a reader's amazement, or even his admiration, but he will fail, we think, to discover the "beauty" claimed for it by the editor. "The Dunciad" has wit, it has much masterly versification, it has one passage at least that rises to the highest level of didactic verse; but we should be inclined to say that, of all poetical qualities, it is more deficient in beauty than in any other. The text of the poem is inconsiderable in quantity, when compared with the mass of notes by Pope, Warburton, and Arbuthnot, which are inseparable from it, and with the copious annotations added by a succession of editors. These have now been largely, but not unnecessarily, increased by Mr. Courthope, whose own Notes and Introduction occupy nearly one hundred closely-printed pages. His work is admirably done. No trouble has been spared to explain perplexing passages, and the editor's lucid arrangement will serve to make the reader's pathway smoother and pleasanter. To this we may add that the volume contains a reprint of the first edition of "The Dunciad," and also the observations of Mr. Thom on the editions of the satire, reprinted from Notes and Queries. About two-thirds of the volume are occupied by "The Dunciad," the remainder consists of "Miscellaneous Pieces in Verse." Pope is not happy as a writer of occasional poems, and as a lyricist, the more ambitious his attempt, the more striking is the failure. Several of the pieces here collected, under the title of vers de société, &c., were condemned by the poet to the oblivion they merit; but Mr. Courthope observes, and no doubt with truth, that "when once the poems suppressed by Pope's literary legatees were admitted by his editors into the body of his works, it became practically impossible to exclude compositions which were known to be his."

Science without God. By H. Didon. Translated by Rosa Corder. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Seven sermons by the Dominican preacher Father Didon are here presented to the English reader in an eloquent and generally adequate translation. One word, however; "experience" is wrongly rendered by the English "experience," when "experiment" should have been employed. The constant recurrence of this mistake is very provoking. The seven discourses are headed "Positivism," "Materialism," "Atheistic Pantheism," "Scepticism," "Practical Atheism," "The Existence of God," and "The Rational Knowledge of God." A general introduction, on the relation of faith to experimental science, precedes the sermons, and occupies about one-quarter of the volume. If the preacher is not always logically convincing, if his scientific knowledge is not always equal to his religious fervour, at least he may be credited with large powers of expression and considerable breadth of view. He is not afraid to say (page 3) that "religious faith is often retarded by its alliance with the insufficient or erroneous science of the ancients." He does not obtrude upon his hearers many Roman dogmas, but deals for the most part with his subject in a way with which even Protestants will sympathise. If one desires to see how eloquent the preacher can be, let him read pages 78 to 80, the conclusion of the discourse on Positivism, a passage on the worship of humanity:—"They take this matter and this humanity, and say, Here is our God! What, this materialised humanity, going about in darkness on the surface of a planet, covered with rage, made up of misery and vice, of egotism and ferocity, is it that we must salute as God? Never! Even if humanity had all science as guide, I would not worship it; for human science is fallible. If it had all strength for its sceptre, I would not worship it, for strength is tyrannical. If humanity had every virtue, as its nimbus, I would not worship it! One can worship nothing created." In some places, we see that our teacher is a French priest (p. 103). "Let me tell you that the materialistic ideas came from the other side of the Rhine something like twenty years ago, in the form of a mist which gilded the light of science. We said to this fog from the Rhine, 'Come, and be our light!' It was welcomed by a great number of our savants. They said, 'This comes from Germany; it is beautiful, it is true.'"

The Way Thither. 2 vols. (Eliot Stock and Co.)—The author of this story has the provoking quality of exciting expectations which he does not fulfil, so that the disgust of the disappointed reader is intensified by righteous indignation. The early chapters of the first volume, which describe the school-days of the heroine, Kathleen Nugent, her brother, Trevor, and their friend, Ernest Vereker, are spirited, natural, and amusing. Kathleen's adventures at an oddly-conducted school at Chaudenville, where she meets an ardent French noble, Raoul d'Argenton, who falls hopelessly in love with her, and where she arouses the jealousy of a modern Brinvilliers, by name, G  n  vi  re de Hautenbas, have the merit of novelty, and the demerit of improbability. Kathleen foolishly promises herself to Raoul, just before her return to Ireland, and from this point the story loses its distinctive tone, and lapses into the too familiar grooves of prevalent novel-writing. Trevor Nugent, who promised better things, marries a burlesque actress, who is at the same time a vulgar and silly woman, and the author appears to object more to the burlesque actress than to her vulgarity and silliness, a want of discrimination he should have avoided. Discussions between Ernest Vereker, Kathleen, and George Mandeville on Freethought, Catholicism, and the doctrines of the English Church, bring the interest of the story to utter extinction. Vereker, the best-drawn character in the book, turns priest; Kathleen becomes common-place; and George Mandeville, who never had an individuality, is left hoping to marry Kathleen when she comes to her senses. Deficiency in localisation, sketchiness in character, and suddenness of incident do much to mar the author's evident aptitude for imaginative literature.

Elementary Chemical Arithmetic. By Sydney Lupton, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.)—The eleven hundred problems stated and solved in this volume are prefaced by several chapters, in which the numerical elements of chemical and physical properties are explained. A few pages are devoted to logarithms, and to the reduction of experimental results. Then follow the problems proper and their answers, while the volume is completed by a series of tables. The employment of such a work as this, not merely in chemical classes, but in the teaching of school arithmetic, would be very useful in ousting the absurd and useless questions too often set in examinations. The problems here given cover a wider range, and are most judiciously selected; moreover, they are very exact in form and precise in statement, avoiding old errors of expression. Something, perhaps, might have been given bearing on crystallography and on the measurement of surfaces and angles. Something more might have been said about determinations of specific gravity, and the corrections necessary to secure exactness of result. We have noted very few mistakes in the volume, and nothing of real importance.

Gabrielle de Bourdaine, by Mrs. John Kent Spender (Hurst and Blackett), is a story in three volumes, and, as its title indicates, gives the history and adventures of a girl belonging to an old French family, but who, for most part of the time with which the tale concerns itself, is living in Guernsey. She has more freedom, living alone with her father after her English mother's death, than a French girl in France would have, and she is sent to England to finish her education; yet she is bound in a thoroughly French fashion, by a family compact, to marry her cousin, the son of her father's only brother. He has been brought up as far as possible by his father in the style contemporary with the old r  gime; but his own tastes are literary and modern, and he leaves the brilliant circles of Paris with regret, to visit his countrified cousin. It is easy to imagine what complications might arise under such circumstances, and though there is nothing very striking or original in Mrs. Spender's narrative, it contains quite enough of interest to make readers who have taken up the first volume desire to finish the third. There are here and there inaccuracies which, whether those of author or printer, are an annoyance to readers, and surely might be avoided, such as "affect" for "effect," and other mistakes of that kind; and the cousin's name varies.

Stories and Episodes of Home-Mission Work (Wells Gardner and Darton), is put forth by the Society for Promoting the Employment of Additional Curates. As both the Archbishops and several of the Bishops write to commend this book, it does not seem to need other patronage. It is divided all the way through into paragraphs, each containing some fact or anecdote illustrative of the need of Christian instruction which exists, chiefly, perhaps, in our great cities, but also in our rural districts. The stories told are, many of them, very striking, and some amusing even in their pathos; but too long to quote. Their perusal will be very good for the leisurely rich, if any such are left in these bustling times. With regard to the statistics which strike one as so awful in their tale of neglect, we have been unable to discover whether the work of other Christian Churches is ignored.

His Native Land. By the Rev. A. J. Binnie, M.A. (Griffith and Farran.)—The author of this small book of travels in Palestine appeals to the deepest sympathies of the Christian in the title he has given to it, but it is matter for regret that the interest of the style does not equal that of the subject. As the author travelled under the guidance of the Messrs. Cook, he naturally followed the beaten tracks, and we can only trust that the benefit was greater to himself and his parishioners on his return, than the reading of his book can be to the public. It is very nicely got up, with pretty tail-pieces and headings, and a photograph of the Holy City. There is also a good and easily-understood map of Palestine. We are glad to hear that the Orphanage at Nazareth is prospering.

The Clergy Directory, 1883. (Bosworth and Co.)—This is the thirteenth annual issue of this useful directory and parish guide. It is not only corrected up to December 12th last, but the corrections and additions rendered necessary by circumstances taking place while the work was in the press are added in an appendix. Of equal usefulness, in different connections, are A Guide to the Medical Profession (L. Upcott Gill), and the Catholic Directory (Burns and Oates).

NEW EDITIONS.—We have received:—The Fellah. (Chatto and Windus.) By E. About, translated by Sir R. Roberts. This clever book is more reasonable reading at the present stage of the Egyptian question than at any former one.—Memoir of Sir Francis Henry Goldsmid. (Kegan Paul.)—The Mothers of Great Men. (Nimmo, Edinburgh.) By Mrs. Ellis. This is a useful book. But why has Mrs. Ellis not incorporated in her new edition a few words about the mother of Carlyle?—The third volume of P. A. Motteux's Don Quixote (Paterson, Edinburgh); and the tenth volume (Vol. III. of "The Dramatic Works") of Leslie Stephen's edition of The Works of Fielding. The respective editions to which each volume belongs have already been reviewed in the Spectator.—A second edition of Wharton's Treatise on the Conflict of Laws. (Kays, Philadelphia, U.S.)—A second edition of Final Causes, translated from the French of Paul Janet, by W. Affleck, B.D., and with a preface by R. Flint, D.D., LL.D. (Clark.)—A thirteenth edition of Fenn on the English and Foreign Funds, rewritten and brought down to the latest date, by R. L. Nash. (Effingham Wilson.)—An idea of the contents of this book may be gathered from the statement in the preface, "that it deals with the debts and resources of nations covering upwards of 34,700,000 square miles, inhabited by 1,171,000,000 people, and contributing between them some £875,000,000 a year towards their national expenditure."—A fourth edition of The Cyclopædia of Practical Quotations, by J. R. Hoyt and A. L. Ward. (Dickinson.)—The great value of this book may be gathered from the fact that the index of subjects, arranged in three columns, fills 250 royal-octavo pages. Each subject is distinguished by a letter in the index and on the page, an arrangement that facilitates reference.—A new edition of Early Influences (Rivingtons), to which Mrs. Gladstone supplies a preface.

MAGAZINES, ETC.—We have received the following for January:—Part 20 of English Etchings, the artists being N. Swain, F. E. de St. Dalmas, and P. R. Craft.—The Magazine of Art, containing an interesting illustrated article on "The Pipes of All Peoples."—Art and Letters.—Part 30 of Picturesque Palestine.—Part 3 of Greater London.—The London Quarterly Review.—The British Quarterly Review.—The Nautical Magazine.—Colburn's United Service Magazine, the price of which is now reduced to 1s.—London and Edinburgh.—The Army and Navy Magazine.—Tinsley's Magazine, containing the opening chapters of a new serial tale by Mr. John Hill.—The Gentleman's Magazine, in which Mr. Robert Buchanan commences a new romance, entitled, "The New Abelard."—Belgravia, containing the first chapters of a new serial story by Mr. Justin McCarthy.—London Society, containing the opening chapters of three new serial tales.—The Sanitary Record, which gives a curious instance of the practical service cats can render a household by being made agents for the discovery of escapes of sewer-gas.—The Folk-lore Journal.—The Antiquarian Magazine.—The Month, which opens with an article on "Primary Schools," by Cardinal Manning.—The Theatre, No. 1 of a new and much improved series. It contains photographs of Mrs. Bernard Beere and Mr. Wilson Barrett, a list of new plays produced during the year in London and the provinces, and a dramatic poem by G. R. Sims.—Time.—Chambers's Journal.—Cassell's Magazine.—Good Words, in which Mr. W. Besant commences a new story, and Mr. Irving his series of articles on "Shakespeare on the Stage and in the Study."—The Sunday Magazine, containing the opening chapters of two new tales, and the first of a series of articles on "Sunday Morning Markets in London."—The Quiver, the Sunday at Home, the Leisure Hour, the Girl's Own Paper, in all of which new serial tales are commenced.—All the Year Round.—Part 1 of Bo-Peep, a new illustrated magazine for the nursery. (Cassell and Co.)—The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.—The Atlantic Monthly, which is now published simultaneously in England and America.—The American Journal of Mathematics.—Our Continent, an American magazine, the contents of which are interesting, and the illustrations of a high class.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK.

Aleman (M.), Amusing Adventures of Guzman of Alfaraque, or 8vo (Vizetelly)	6 0
Allen (G.), Nature Studies, or 8vo (Wyman)	6 0
Bird (F. G.), American Dyer's Companion, 8vo (Low)	12 0
Bowwick (G.), Port Phillip Settlement, 8vo (Low)	21 0
Browne (W. A.), Arithmetical Examinations for Military Students (Stanford)	5 0
Bullock (O.), Our Bishops and Clergy, or 8vo (Home Words Office)	3 6
Clodd (E.), Leisure Readings, or 8vo (Wyman)	6 0
Cutliff (H. O.), Art of Trout-fishing, 18mo (Low)	3 6
Duncan (J.), Scotch Weaver, &c., or 8vo (C. K. Paul & Co.)	9 0
Furze (G. A.), Line of Communications, or 8vo (Clowes)	6 0
King (D. B.), The Irish Question, or 8vo (W. H. Allen)	3 0
Lane (E. W.), Arabian Society in the Middle Ages, or 8vo (Chatto & Windus)	6 0
Many Voices, or 8vo (C. K. Paul & Co.)	6 0
Markham (C. R.), The War between Peru and Chili, or 8vo (S. Low & Co.)	10 6
Middlemore (S. G. C.), Round a Pasada Fire, imp 16mo (Satchell)	3 0

Muir (A.), Hearthrug Faroes, or 8vo (Hogg)	6 0
Murphy (J. N.), The Chair of Peter, 8vo (C. K. Paul & Co.)	14 0
Olliphant (Mrs.), It was a Lover and his Lass, 3 vols (Hurst & Blackett)	31 6
Perrot (G.), A History of Art in Ancient Egypt, 2 vols (Chapman & Hall)	42 6
Platt (J.), Essays, Vol. 1, 8vo (Simplin & Co.)	6 0
Proctor (R. A.), Stars in their Seasons, roy 8vo (Wyman)	5 0
Slater (J. H.), Library Manual, or 8vo (Bazaar Office)	2 6
Valbesan (R. D.), The English and India, 8vo (W. H. Allen & Co.)	18 0
Zimmern (H.), The Epic of Kings, or 8vo (Unwin)	7 6

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE SPECTATOR."

	Yearly.	Half-yearly.	Quarterly.
Including postage to any Part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 6	0 16 3	0 7 2
Including postage to any of the Australasian Colonies, America, France, Germany, &c.	1 10 6	0 15 3	0 7 8
Including postage to India, China, &c.	1 12 6	0 16 3	0 8 2

ORIGINAL DESIGNS, FAST COLOURS.
From 9d per yard.

HINDLEY'S CHINTZES.

WALL PAPERS AND CURTAIN STUFFS.
O. HINDLEY and SONS,
280 to 284 104 OXFORD STREET, W.

LIBERTY'S ART FABRICS.

LIBERTY'S ART CURTAINS, CHINTZ AND UPHOLSTERY STUFFS, NOVEL IDEAS IN LADIES' WINTER COSTUME AND TOILETTE FABRICS. LIBERTY'S COLOURS. EASTERN AND EUROPEAN DESIGNS. PURE FINISH, INEXPENSIVE MATERIALS. East India House, & Cheesemore House, } REGENT STREET, W.

ALL PATTERNS POST FREE.

APOLLINARIS.

THE QUEEN OF
TABLE WATERS."

"EARL SPENCER, K.G., Pres. International Med. Exhibition, August, 1881, referred to APOLLINARIS as a TYPICAL BEVERAGE, APPROVED by the FACULTY." Sanitary Record, March, 1882.

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

ONE-FOURTH of those suffering from blindness or dimness of sight can trace their calamity to the use of common spectacles or lenses imperfectly adapted to the sight. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, PERSONALLY adapts his Improved Spectacles at his residence, 3 Endsleigh Gardens, Euston Square, London, daily (Saturdays excepted), ten to four. Mr. JULIUS BENEDET writes:—"I have tried the principal opticians in London without success, but your spectacles suit me admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, late Surgeon-Major, W.R.M., writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age, 82. I can now read the smallest print, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Similar testimonials from John Lowe, Esq., M.D., J. P. Lynn, Physician to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales; Ven. Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Lieut.-Gen. Macmillan, Brestwood; the Rev. Mother Abbess, S. Mary's Abbey, Hendon, and hundreds of others. Mr. Laurance's Pamphlet, "Spectacles, their Use and Abuse," post free.

SPECULATION AND INVESTMENT IN STOCKS AND SHARES, WITH A MINIMUM RISK.

Explanatory Book, just published, gratis and post free on application.

Operators in Stock-Exchange Securities should test this System, by which LARGE PROFITS are realised, and the possibility of Loss is reduced to a Minimum.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Civil Service Gazette.—"The method recommended by Messrs. Gutteridge is easy to comprehend, and safe."—English Churchman.—"Messrs. Gutteridge deserve the best thanks of investors and speculators."—Society.—"I commend Messrs. Gutteridge's accounts of last year's workings to the study of capitalists."—Manchester Courier.—"The examples cited so completely demonstrate its advantages, that the plan will doubtless be generally adopted."—Figure.—"Their advice is worthy of attention; the book is well worth perusing, and is very instructive."

Special Weekly Circular and Report sent regularly, on application.

W. GUTTERIDGE and CO., Sworn Brokers,
Drapers' Gardens, Throgmorton Street, E.C.

MORSON'S PREPARATIONS OF PEPSINE Highly recommended by the Medical Profession for INDIGESTION.

As Wine, in Bottles, at 3s, 5s, and 9s;
Lozenges, 2s 6d and 4s 6d; Globules, 2s,
3s 6d, and 6s 6d; and Powder, in 1 oz. Bottles, at 4s each.

SOLD BY ALL CHEMISTS.

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name, MORSON & SON, Southampton Row, Russell Square, London.

ON THE FUTURE OF ELECTRIC LIGHTING. With a Sketch Plan showing the Lane-Fox System of Electrical Distribution. By ST. GEORGE LANE-FOX, Esq. A Lecture delivered at the Royal United Service Institution. 6d; by post, 7d.

London: W. MITCHELL and Co., 39 Charing Cross.

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,847.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1883. [REGISTERED FOR } PRICE.....6d.
TRANSMISSION ABROAD. } BY POST, 6d.]

THE WEEK	69	Sir E. Strachey on Ritualism	81
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		The Bordenley Patronage	81
Prince Napoleon's Manifesto, and		Consecrated Ground	81
its Consequences	72	Mr. Denning and the Church	82
The Latest Plan for Egypt	73	Missions in Japan	82
What the Tories Threaten	74	The Late Mr. Bunney	82
Colonial Envoys	75	BOOKS—
The Irish Police	75	Mr. Craik's Life of Swift	82
The Lyons Trials	76	Mr. Thom's Sermons	84
Mr. Chamberlain on Free Schools	77	English and Spanish Origins in
The Use of Inquests	78	North America	86
M. Renan	79	Helen of Troy	87
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		Kept in the Dark	88
Greek Feeling about Mr. Gladstone	81	CURRENT LITERATURE	89
The Miles Platting Case	81	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	90
		ADVERTISEMENTS	91-100

* * * The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NOTICE.—With this week's number of the SPECTATOR are issued (gratis) the Index and Title-page for the Volume for 1882.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

It is our intention occasionally to issue gratis with the SPECTATOR Special Literary Supplements, the outside pages of which will be devoted to Advertisements. The Fourth of these Supplements will be issued with the SPECTATOR for February 17th; and Advertisements for it should reach the Publishing Office not later than noon on the Wednesday preceding that date.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

PARIS has been agitated by a bizarre incident. On Monday, Prince Jerome Napoléon, moved, it is believed, by a fear lest the Comte de Chambord should anticipate him, placarded the city with a manifesto. In it he announces that "France languishes," the "Executive Power is impotent," the Chamber "without guidance, and without decision." After the twelve years' experience of a Parliamentary Republic, France is without a Government. "The Army, the basis of our greatness, is given over to the arrogance of incompetent men." The Civil Servants are "the slaves of the paltriest election interests." "The finances are squandered." "Religion, attacked by a persecuting Atheism, is not protected." The "social questions vital for our Democracy are neglected." Foreign policy "is at the service of private speculators in Tunis," and "craven and inept in Egypt." The cause of all this is the Constitution which entrusts France to 800 Deputies and Senators, which has never been voted by the people, and under which the head of the State is not nominated by a plébiscite. "Heir of Napoleon I. and of Napoleon III., I am the only living man whose name has mustered 7,000,000 suffrages." They "have tried to stir up my sons against me;" but they reject these efforts, and "abdication is desertion." Frenchmen, "remember the words of Napoleon, 'All that is done without the people is illegal.'" The manifesto has aroused no enthusiasm anywhere. The Prince is distrusted and despised, and while the Republicans ridicule him, the Bonapartists, who still seat fifty Members in the Chamber, almost universally follow his son, Victor. M. de Cassagnac even taunts Prince Jerome with personal cowardice.

The French Government and the Chamber appear to have been both annoyed and alarmed by this manifesto. The former ordered the arrest of Prince Jerome, which was carried out without difficulty, and he was lodged in the Conciergerie, to await a trial, which, according to French lawyers, will probably result in an acquittal. The Government, when interrogated in the Chamber by M. Jolibois, one of the five or six who out of the fifty Bonapartist Deputies adhere to the Prince, declared that they had acted according to law, and that one sentence, at least, in the manifesto was distinctly illegal. The Chamber, however, was not satisfied, and on the motion of M. Floquet voted urgency for a Bill declaring that "the French territory, Algeria, and the Colonies are prohibited to all members of families which have reigned in France." As this Bill would expel Prince Victor Bonaparte, the real candidate of the Imperialists, the Duc d'Aumale—against whom it is believed to be levelled—and all the other Orleans Princes, it was strongly denounced; and there was, of course, a scene. The Duke de la Rochefoucauld-Bisaccia, as usual, called the Comte de Chambord "the King," and on being censured by the President, asked what synonym could be found for "the descendant of the Kings of France." "That one," retorted M. Brisson, smiling, and by the mot terminating the dispute. The Monarchists, however, could only rally 112 votes to 328, and urgency was voted.

To the credit of the French Press, it almost unanimously denounces M. Floquet's proposal, which is in principle exactly equivalent to a Bill of Attainder against amnestied suspects, and is therefore a gross breach of faith. The Government, however, has resolved to demand power to exile all Princes, and in order to make the Bill popular, has inserted in it clauses making the public exhibition of religious emblems summarily punishable. This astounding proposition, it is true, as yet (Friday) rests only on the authority of the Times' correspondent; but when Orleanists are concerned, he is well informed, and it certainly would never have entered a human brain to invent such a statement. The proposal involves direct religious persecution of the worst kind, and will rouse all men in France of the old faith into a fury of fanaticism. They will accept Prince Victor, or the Comte de Paris, or anybody, sooner than a persecuting Republic. We must wait for confirmation of the statement, and for the vote of the Chamber; but if it is true, and if the Bill passes, it will no longer be possible for the warmest friends of the Republic to acquit her of the charge of deliberate and avowed religious tyranny. Autos da fe are equally crimes, whether the victims be Freethinkers or Catholic believers.

Mr. J. K. Cross, M.P. for Bolton, has been made Under-Secretary for India; and Mr. Henry Brand, M.P., has accepted the work of Lieutenant-General Sir John Adye (who was not in Parliament) as Surveyor-General of the Ordnance. We have announced Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice's appointment as Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the room of Sir Charles Dilke, before. It is curious how great a weight the aristocracy have obtained in this "dangerous and destructive" Government. Three of the five Chief Secretaries of State are in the House of Lords, as well as the First Lord of the Admiralty; the head of the War Office is heir to the richest dukedom in the kingdom; one-half of the Cabinet are Members of the House of Peers; the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs is the son of a Marquis; the Under-Secretary for the Colonies is the son of the Earl of Shaftesbury; the Surveyor-General of the Ordnance is heir to the ancient barony of Dacre; and the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury is the brother of a Duke. Certainly, no one can complain that the aristocracy of this country is ignored in the present Administration. All the more do we rejoice to recognise the appointment of Mr. J. K. Cross, a good speaker, a thoroughly able economist, and a Commoner of unquestionable capacity, to the office of Under-Secretary of State for India. It certainly ought not to weigh against a man, that he happens to belong to a distinguished family; but it should not, we think, weigh too much in his favour.

At the Colonial Office, on Wednesday, there was a ceremonial at once novel and significant. Lord Derby on that day received the Agents accredited to the Governments of seven great, self-governing Colonial Dependencies,—namely, the Dominion of Canada, South Australia, New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Victoria, and the Cape of Good Hope,—when Sir Alexander Galt, the Commissioner of the Government of the Canadian Dominion, addressed Lord Derby, in the name of all these Governments, congratulating him on his acceptance of the Seals of the Colonial Office, and his resumption of the guidance of a Department of State usefully discharged by him under a former Administration,—a reference, no doubt, skilfully introduced to indicate that our Colonial Dependencies ignore our political distinctions, and regard Lord Derby with equal favour, whether he serves a Conservative or a Liberal Government. Sir Alexander Galt then went on to express the hearty attachment of these great communities to the Empire and the Sovereign, their earnest wish for our prosperity, and their anxious desire to maintain the tie between the mother-country and themselves. This formal interview was welcomed as evincing a growing sense of the importance of the Colonial Empire, and of the reasons for giving a better formulated position to the accredited Agents of the Colonial Governments, and Sir A. Galt touched upon the advantageous result of bestowing on the Colonies independent popular Governments. Finally, he expressed for all the Colonies the profound conviction that Lord Derby would give the same consideration to the interests of the Colonies which they had been recently accustomed to receive. Lord Derby made a suitable reply, magnifying the Colonies and the pride of the country in them, and expressing the belief that every British Government alike would show the same deference to the views of the various portions of our Colonial Empire. We have elsewhere expressed our conviction that some formal position, akin to that of recognised Ambassadors or Envoys, should be accorded to these Colonial Agents, for this would at once enhance their dignity, and help the British Government adequately to realise it.

We would call the special attention of our readers to an article discussing the trial of the French Anarchists at Lyons. Our contributor was present during the whole proceedings, and his remarks will be found curiously instructive as to the social danger in France. It is impossible to doubt that Nihilism, as it is called here, has become in France a kind of Faith, wholly independent of reason, and has clutched men who would seem to be armoured against it both by education and by character. That phenomenon has been repeatedly witnessed in Asia, Sufeeism, for example, which is Nihilism unapplied to politics, having repeatedly made converts of the best Persians and Indians—Akbar, it is difficult to doubt, was one, as were most of the Abbases Khalifs—but it is new in the West. An educated and self-devoted European like M. Gauthier, who believes that there neither is nor ought to be any religion, any morality, any Government, or any law, is an evidence of possibilities in the human mind which have scarcely yet been studied. If the sect spread, we scarcely see how the great principle of religious tolerance could in such a case be enforced. The world would fall into a not unjustified panic.

We English know that the Government is struggling to avoid a Protectorate of Egypt, but we can hardly wonder that the French journalists, irritated by the non-intervention policy of their own Chamber, find it difficult to believe in British disinterestedness. The Khedive has this week formally, by decree, abolished the Dual Control, and is about to appoint the English Controller, Sir A. Colvin, sole "Financial Adviser" to the Ministry. Sir Evelyn Wood, an Englishman, has been gazetted Serdar or Generalissimo; and Baker Pasha, also an Englishman, has been made Commandant of Gendarmerie. The European officers of the Army are to be English, and the Khedive is guarded in his palace by Englishmen, who take the most extreme, and we fear necessary, precautions against his assassination. The French, seeing all this, exclaim that the English intend to dominate without responsibility, and that the Khedive is nothing but Lord Granville's vassal. It is not so, as we endeavour to show elsewhere, for the English authority rests on nothing but a garrison, soon to be withdrawn; but it is unwise to be angry with Frenchmen for thinking Lord Granville very subtle. He certainly has the art of looking as if he had the reins in his hand, though in our judgment he forgets that reins will not prevent horses from jibbing. Where is the whip?

On Saturday last there was an ominous scene in Constantinople, described, one perceives, by eye-witnesses at "Yarna," "Athens," and such places. The Sultan's Albanian guards, being white, are jealous of the Negro guards, who are black, but are kept one floor nearer to the Sultan's person. A quarrel arose about a girl, or some drink, or a cigar-light—accounts differ—and a Negro sentry bayoneted an Albanian. Each set of soldiers sided with its colour, the battle became general, and from thirty to a hundred men were killed under the harem windows. The shrieks of the ladies warned the Sultan, and Osman Pasha, hastily summoned with some Ottoman troops, suppressed the affray and arrested the ringleaders. The Sultan, who has quarrelled with the Circassians, now distrusts both Albanians and Negroes, and as he cannot well employ Greek sailors, the only isolated force remaining, lives in a misery which threatens his reason. The incident involves a breach of the personal respect always shown to the Palace, and shows that discipline is dying away, even in the pampered guards. The garrison the Sultan has ceased to trust, not unreasonably, if, as alleged in these accounts, they neither are paid, nor can be. Turkish soldiers get along without pay for a time very easily, but if the situation continues too long, the military mind decides that the Sultan is not competent to rule. We never remember to have seen the materials for a conflagration so dry as they are in Constantinople.

The Germans are still indignant that the Alsace-Lorrainers do not love them. Marshal von Manteuffel, the Governor, has addressed to the members of the Provincial Committee a speech, in which he told them that the restoration of constitutional rights, i.e., provincial self-government, depended on their cordial acceptance of the German Empire. They had not accepted it yet. In the very last Session, their representatives in the Reichstag had moved the abolition of the law which makes German the only language of official intercourse. One of the Deputies elected had even been a man who sighed for "protestation and action," which meant war. Well, "He should like again to experience the elevated feeling of commanding in a pitched battle, knowing that the balls of the enemy are every moment summoning men before the judgment-seat of God, and knowing that on the orders one gives depends the issue of the fight." He had studied French war too deeply not to respect the French Army, but he knew also the German Army; and, "If this war is forced upon us, hundreds of thousands of German women, like the ancient Spartans, will call to their sons to return with their shields, or on them." Germany, it is clear, will not suffer for want of plain-speaking, or of Generals who feel "the triumph and the vanity, the rapture of the strife;" but for all that, her cultivated soldiers should read history right. Athens could not conquer Sparta,—but which lived? Who forgets Athens, or knows or cares where Sparta was?

The extreme alarm of the American Protectionists at the condition of the National Treasury is well illustrated by a Bill reported to the House of Representatives, which will, it is said, be passed. The Protectionists believe that if the present huge surplus continues, the Debt will be paid off, and then the Tariffs must be reduced. They are, therefore, seeking for any popular means of waste, and have actually proposed a grant of £2,000,000 a year for five years in aid of education, the money to be distributed to the States in proportion to the illiteracy of the people. As Congress has nothing to do with education outside the District of Columbia, this grant-in-aid is outside all precedent, and commences a most dangerous system. The States are relieved of their own burdens, and, in fact, taught that if they fail, the nation will make up their deficiencies. It is difficult to believe that the Senate will pass such a Bill; but the wish to deplete the Treasury without lowering duties is sincere and is shared by the moneyed classes, who are afraid that if the Debt is paid off, the National Banks must be reorganised. There will be no Bonds for them to hold against their paper issues.

The Coroner's Jury assembled at Hounslow to inquire into the suicide of Dr. Edwardes has arrived at an unusual verdict,—"That on the 27th day of December, William Whitfield Edwardes did die from the mortal effects of prussic acid, administered by his own hand during temporary insanity; and they desired to express their opinion emphatically that he was driven to his death by the pressure brought to bear by his partner, Dr. Michael Whitmarsh, using the false charge of Mrs. Bignell as a means to drive him to a dishonourable dissolution of partnership." The verdict has been accepted by the London journals as just, and is undoubtedly in accordance with the weight of evidence; but considering that it not only condemns, but executes Dr. Whitmarsh, who is fined in his whole practice, and crushes Mrs. Bignell, and all this on evidence given in a Court filled to suffocation with an angry mob, we cannot rejoice in the precedent. Substantial justice may have been done, but had Edwardes been a suspected man and Whitmarsh unpopular, justice would have been delayed for very useful, though formal, safeguards. Dr. Whitmarsh, we presume, will try an action for libel against some one who printed Dr. Edwardes's letter before it was produced in evidence.

A very formidable strike is occurring on the Caledonian Railway. The men allege that they are worked to death, being frequently kept on duty eighteen and twenty hours at a stretch, and paid for overtime only as ordinary time. They therefore demand a nine hours' stint, extra pay for overtime, and double pay for Sunday labour. The last demand is absurd, as if the men object on religious grounds, they should not work; and if on social grounds, they should be content with the overtime rate. Nine hours, too, is a short stint. Let them make the day ten hours, and demand overtime pay for work beyond that and for Sunday labour, and the whole public will be with them. The whole of the men will, it is believed, be "out" to-day; but the Directors declare they will not yield, partly because the demands are unreasonable, and partly because they were not sent in through the heads of departments,—the last being mere dignified nonsense. We recommend the Directors to offer fair terms of compromise, before a great accident happens, or they will find the juries' verdicts affect their dividends. The public are sick of the over-working of Railway servants, who, if they fall asleep, are liable to criminal penalties. We have known ourselves of pointsmen, not on the Caledonian, working twenty hours a day, at points where a pull at a wrong lever would cost fifty lives.

Mr. Mundella made a remarkable speech at Birmingham on Monday, in opening a new Board School there, on the rapid progress of the compulsory-education principle in England. Fifteen years ago, he had been present at a great conference in Manchester, when the compulsory principle was advocated and carried, almost to the consternation of the political magnates present; and yet, within three years of that time, the Education Act containing the compulsory principle—doubtless, in a permissive or tentative form—had been carried, and since that time the permission had been taken advantage of, so that compulsion now prevailed throughout Great Britain. It was everywhere the parents who demanded compulsion, while the employers and magistrates resisted it. The reason, no doubt, is that parents are apt to look on their children chiefly as human beings, while employers and magistrates look upon them chiefly as model labour-machines, in which it does not do to sink too much capital. Mr. Chamberlain, who spoke after Mr. Mundella, gave a broad hint that he should like to see the conflict between the Denominational School and the Board-School system reopened, if only that the question of free schools, which would be the consequence of the complete victory of the Board-School system, might be adequately discussed. In America, the Free-school system was the only one tolerated, and English parents would be likely, Mr. Chamberlain held, to follow the American precedent. Perhaps, as a matter of mere convenience, that may one day be so; though it would be easy to save the masters the trouble and anxiety of fee-collecting, and to assign the collection of fees to smaller officials. But there is no more just reason why a man with a small family or no family should pay as much for education as a man with a large family, than there is why a man with a small family or no family should pay as much for the clothing of the local children as a man with a large family is obliged to pay.

In a speech on Tuesday, Mr. Chamberlain went further, and advocated, for Birmingham at least, a perfectly free middle-class education. Why not go on, and advocate a perfectly free University education for all classes, and a perfectly free technical education too,—a perfectly free access to the Bar, the Church, the medical, engineering, scientific, artistic, and other professions, including the Diplomatic Service and all branches of the Civil Service? If legislation could do it, we do not doubt there are persons who would be in favour of providing out of the rates for the proper training of all branches of human energy; and if only a sufficient number of ratepayers could be counted upon under those circumstances, the matter might be managed. But there lies the difficulty. Even Mr. Chamberlain will hesitate before proposing to make everybody contribute equally to the support of the community at large.

Sir Richard Cross delivered an attack on the Government, at Southport, last Wednesday, which was neither more nor less remarkable than the average of such speeches. He was very fair and moderate, and rather conventional in tone. He made a good deal of the Duke of Argyll's, Mr. Forster's, and Mr.

Bright's resignations,—a good deal of the defeat inflicted on the Government on the Bradlaugh question,—a good deal of what he called the vacillation in regard to Egypt,—and a good deal of the tyranny of the Rules of Procedure adopted for the Commons. Sir Richard Cross then went on to demand that the Reform scheme of the Government should be presented as a whole, before the House should be asked to agree to the new County Franchise; and concluded by saying that the Conservative leaders had been hampered by the war in Egypt and the anarchy in Ireland, because it would not do to weaken the Government too much in the face of these difficulties, but that now, at least, they would be able to speak out. With Sir Stafford Northcote fairly "unmuzzled," the Liberal Administration will be almost as panic-struck as was the bull, when the lamb declared that he was becoming "quite fierce."

Mr. Brand, the new Surveyor-General of the Ordnance, writes to last Saturday's Times to protest against the disfranchisement of all property-owners, as owners, under the County Franchise Bill,—a course which had been sketched out as not improbable in the recent speech of the Attorney-General at Bridgewater; and he suggests instead that all the rates should be divided between occupiers and owners, and that all ratepayers, whether ratepayers on property or ratepayers on occupation holdings, shall have a vote for the property or holding on which they are rated. In this way, non-resident owners in the boroughs would obtain votes for the boroughs in which they have property, as well as occupiers in the counties votes for the counties in which they reside, the franchise in each case depending on the payment of rates. For our own parts, we should be inclined to approve this suggestion. There is no reason why the possession of property should not be regarded as constituting a political qualification at least as good as the residential qualification, and the more variety of qualification we have,—so long as the qualification be a thoroughly popular one,—the more truly representative our House of Commons will be.

The new Bishop of Truro is to be the Rev. G. H. Wilkinson, the Vicar of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, a man of great organising power, and very popular as a preacher, who was Examining Chaplain to Dr. Benson (the Primate Designate), in the diocese over which he is now to preside. The new Bishop of Llandaff is to be the Venerable Archdeacon Lewis, Archdeacon of St. David's, of whom we know nothing very distinctive, except that he signed the Dean of St. Paul's memorial in favour of toleration in matters of Ritual, and that he is said to be an alarmist Conservative in politics.

Canon Blakeney, Vicar of Sheffield and Canon of York, with fifty-two clergymen of the same diocese, have written to the Bishop of Manchester, congratulating him on the course he has taken in relation to the Miles Platting case, and declaring that, in their opinion, "the hopes and welfare of our national Zion" rest, in a great measure, on the position assumed by Bishop Fraser in this matter. The Bishop replies, of course, that he is gratified by this proof of confidence, and that what he has done he has done "with no partisan motive, but in discharge of what I deem to be my duty as a Bishop, to maintain the supreme authority of law in the regulation of public worship." Of course, if Dr. Fraser regards it as his duty as a Bishop "to maintain the supreme authority of law" in all cases in which he has the power to maintain it, there is no more to be said, except that he has not always so regarded it, and has, in his legal discretion under the law, passed over—deliberately, we suppose—very many infractions of the ecclesiastical law, as lately expounded by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which he might easily have punished or put down. The late Archbishop of Canterbury certainly did not think it his duty to "maintain the supreme authority of law in the regulation of public worship," when on his death-bed he suggested a charitable evasion of that law. But, doubtless, the Bishop of Manchester, Canon Blakeney, and the fifty-two clergymen take a higher view of the moral authority of ecclesiastical law, as at present laid down, than the late Archbishop of Canterbury. We only wish that these great sticklers for law would be precise in their own obedience to it. Dr. Fraser's own ecclesiastical costume is not, we understand, that which the elaborate decisions of the tribunal which he so profoundly respects has designated for him as the right one.

Bank Rate, 5 per cent.
Consols were on Friday 101½ to 101¾.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S MANIFESTO, AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

NOTHING is so puzzling to observers as the want of political courage in France, except the rashness with which governing Frenchmen who declare themselves devoted to order sometimes act. Prince Jerome Napoleon, the eldest, ablest, and most discredited of the Bonaparte family, heard, it appears, shortly after Gambetta's death, that the Comte de Chambord intended to issue a Manifesto, once more claiming the Crown of France as his by hereditary right. The Manifesto would have exercised no influence on French opinion, which has long since settled itself against the Legitimist claim, but in some unintelligible way the prospect of its appearance irritated Prince Jerome. He appears to have imagined that after the death of Gambetta, Conservative feeling in France would turn towards a Monarchy, and that the first Pretender who claimed the Throne would enjoy a preference with the people. He, therefore, placarded Paris with an address, which reads exactly like a clever newspaper article against the Republic. Part of it is true, part false, and all exaggerated. He denounces the lavish expenditure, the feeble foreign policy, the hostility to religion, the incompetence of the military administration, the tendency to job civil appointments, and the neglect of the sufferings of the democracy; and asserts that the cause of these evils is the existence of a Republic which has never been sanctioned by a plébiscite, and in which the head of the State is not elected by a mass vote. He calls on the people, therefore, to "institute authority," and describes himself as the only person in France for whose name 7,000,000 suffrages have been given. That is all. The intention, of course, is to invite France to substitute the Empire for the Republic, and to make the Prince an Emperor; but this is nowhere stated, and it is quite possible that the Prince thought his manifesto legal. At all events, if he did not, as he has few followers, no party in the Chambers, and no soldiers, his placard was merely a blunder, which could harm no one but himself. French politicians, however, cannot forget that thirteen years ago the Napoleons were reigning, and the Republicans took up the proclamation as a challenge. The Government discussed the affair in Cabinet Council, and ordered the arrest of the Prince; while the Chamber, by 328 to 112, voted urgency for a proposal, made by M. Floquet, that French territory, Algeria, and the Colonies should be prohibited to all descendants of the Houses which have reigned in France. In other words, the Government placed an unpopular Pretender in the position of a martyr, and the Chamber declared its readiness to expel some of the worthiest citizens of France for the crime of having been born.

The morning brought reflection, but no wisdom. M. Grévy it is confidently affirmed, with his usual cold sagacity, urged on his Ministers the absurdity of the arrest, and, indeed, of the whole proceedings; but after a violent conflict of argument, the Cabinet came to a resolution which, unless the Times' correspondent has invented a libel on them out of his own head, is worse than fatuous. They have resolved to oppose M. Floquet's motion, but to give themselves the power of expelling all Princes, and to take advantage of the popular excitement to strike a new and exasperating blow at the Roman Catholic Church, still, be it remembered, the legally established Church of France. It seems absolutely incredible, but the Times' correspondent declares that the following is the substance of the Government Bill to be brought forward next Tuesday:—"The exhibition of religious emblems is punishable summarily; likewise all placards, cries, or incitements of a seditious character and tending to the overthrow of the existing Government. The Executive is entitled to forbid the residence in the Republic's territory of any descendant of Houses which have reigned over France who indulges in manœuvres calculated to disturb the public peace." This is a return to the days of the old Revolution. As to the clause about "incitements," we care nothing, as every Government passes such laws, and trusts either to itself or to juries to moderate their effects in actual working; but the decree against the Prince is radically unjust, and the decree against the Church directly and violently oppressive. We do not mean to assert that Pretenders may not, in the interest of a community, be exiled, or that their exile is, under no circumstances, a protection to the State. Men who threaten to assail a Constitution by force may be justifiably banished, and exile has been shown in our own history to be fatal to Pretenders. It would have been impossible to allow "Prince Charlie" to reside in Scotland, and it was in great measure owing to the absence of its chiefs that the Jacobite party in England died away. At all events, with the Arabi trial still in our ears, it does not lie in our mouths to condemn banishment, as if it were a cruel punishment for a political offence which cannot be regularly tried. If the Republic had continued the Napoleonic law, we should have regarded its policy as justifiable, though at once timid and harsh; but it did not. The Orleanist Princes were legally amnestied, readmitted, invested with commissions in the Army, restored to their fortunes by statute, assured, if Governments and Parliaments can assure anybody of anything, that so long as they continued peaceful citizens, they should remain unmolested. They have continued peaceful, and, considering their rank in Europe as Princes of the Spanish Blood Royal, rather obscure citizens, intent on a quiet, though stately life, marked principally by the careful management of their property. There may, by conceivable possibility, be one exception to this rule; but grant even that Parisian gossip is well founded, that the Duc d'Aumale has aspired to be the Louis Philippe of his House, that he did plot with Chanzy, and that he did contemplate using his military rank against the Republic, those are reasons for exiling him, not for proscribing all the Princes who have adhered to their engagements. Nobody even alleges that they are plotting, or conspiring, or doing anything except giving parties to their friends, and to proscribe them after they have been invited back to France is gross injustice and oppression. We write without a trace of that arrière pensée, that "feeling" for the Orleanists as representatives of limited monarchy, which is so frequently found in England. We dislike Princes who use the reputation of a historic house to undermine its head, and regard the Orleans family as tainted with a bourgeois hankering for fortune, place, and power. But no historic estimate of that kind has any place, when they claim common justice as citizens and Frenchmen. They have been amnestied, and until they have broken the tacit conditions of their amnesty, punishment is breach of faith. We reject altogether the argument that they are not to be exiled, but only made liable to exile, as we would an argument that a threatening letter is not an offence, because it is not a bullet. The liability is an unjust oppression, though a less one than exile. The Princes' clear right is to be citizens, more especially in a country where, if they aspire to be more than citizens, an Act decreeing their arrest can be proposed, passed, and executed in three hours.

The attack on the Princes is, however, wise, compared with the new attack on the Church, which, unless intended to secure the rejection of the whole Bill by the Senate, suggests that the French Cabinet have lost their heads. That a people which changes its creed and comes to regard images as idols should order images to be thrown down, as the Puritans and the Scotch Protestants did, we can understand; but that a people which has not changed its nominal creed, or has adopted the dogma of contempt for all creeds, should outrage the remnant who believe, by removing, through policemen, the emblems of that creed, is to us hardly consistent with ordinary reason. The Duclerc Cabinet actually proposes to make it an offence that a cross, or an image of the Virgin, or the figure of a child with a halo, should be placed outside a church, or a house, or a grave; and this in a Roman Catholic country, where this very Government is paying 50,000 priests to teach weekly the beneficial effects of reverence towards such emblems, and in which ten millions of women, at least, heartily believe that teaching. Apart from the morality of the order, which we deny, as a direct interference with the first right of the private conscience—the right to draw nearer to God in its own way—what is the sense of it? What harm do the emblems do, any more than the towering figure of the Virgin which dominates Millhill, the grassy village north of London? They are not new emblems. They excite no party passion. Their removal will be attended over half France with scenes of violent tumult, with passionate protests, with possibly open riots against the Prefects and the Gendarmerie. For those who disbelieve in the sanctity of the emblems, nothing will have been accomplished, while those who believe in it will have suffered one of the most cruel of outrages. There are villages in the South where the people will feel when the order is executed as if they themselves had been forcibly made blasphemers, and will be distinctly worse men and women in consequence. France will be filled with disorder, in order that passionate opponents of religion—for the iconoclasts in France are not attacking a creed, but religion in the abstract—may vote for a Government which, in sanctioning the tumult, gives up finally its own moral defence against persecution in the future. How is it possible for a Minister who orders a Virgin to be pulled down from a Catholic cathedral or a doorway, to object to the Catholics, if hereafter they make the publication of a Free-thinking book a penal offence? The one is as much an emblem as the other, with this difference, that the book preaches and the image does not. We are scarcely able to credit that men hitherto claiming repute as Moderates can contemplate such an act; but if they do, we have no hesitation in forecasting their political destiny. The dishonest will give place to the sincere, and the sincere on that subject are the Ultra-Extremists, who genuinely hate religion, and are quite prepared, if impeded by those less violent than themselves, to send them to the guillotine. The Girondists are paving the way for the Mountain, and even the Mountain in our day is not the most furious of parties. The extraordinary man who is now under trial at Lyons, priest of a faith we deem monstrous, but still priest rather than mere agitator, may well ask why he is imprisoned for doctrine which is only a shade more intolerant than that of the men who prosecute him, and is directed against the same enemy,—Religion.

THE LATEST PLAN FOR EGYPT.

THE scheme of the British Government for the reorganisation of Egypt is gradually taking shape, and though we are unable to believe in its success, it is a consistent, and from a certain point of view, an able one. There is very little revealed in the Note to the Powers, or in M. Duclerc's speech to the Chamber, or in the French Yellow Book which we did not know before; indeed, nothing, except that France really expected to maintain the Dual Control; but there is a great deal in the Times' account of the new arrangements for governing Egypt. Judging from internal evidence and our own information, we believe that account to be correct; and if it is correct, the form which the Egyptian Government shall assume has been definitely resolved on. It is to be a Government resembling that of India, with two most important exceptions. There is to be no legal control from England, and there is to be a popular Deliberative Assembly. The Khedive, to begin with, under this scheme occupies the position of the Viceroy of India. All Acts will be passed in his name. He will be the Head of the Executive, will possess all patronage, will appoint and dismiss all Ministers, and may give, proprio motu, any legal executive order. He will work through Ministers, who will form a Cabinet; but they will be responsible to him, and must, in the last resort, either take his orders, resign, or be dismissed. His legislative power is, however, taken away, and transferred to a Legislative Council, in which he will appoint seven members; while seven more will be selected by the people, through some as yet undescribed system of double election. Behind and outside this body will be a Popular Council of forty-four elected members, who will be convened at indefinite periods and for restricted purposes; but will possess full rights of discussion and representation, though they will be unable to act until they have convinced the Khedive and the Legislative Council.

If the materials for popular government existed in Egypt in the degree in which, for example, they probably exist in Russia, and if the Ministers could be trusted to seek the welfare of the country according to Western ideas, this would be an excellent intermediate scheme. The irresponsible, silent, self-willed despotism, whether of the Khedive or of his Minister, is ended. All power is, no doubt, in the last resort left to the Government, which has only to secure one vote from among the seven elected Councillors to be autocratic; but the power must be exercised, as far as legislation is concerned, through a public body, after public discussion, and with all the slowness and consideration produced by debate. If the Council were a good one, the laws would probably be good, for experience shows that no man, however self-willed, will face such a body with a palpably unjust law, or one framed entirely in his personal interests. He might issue a monstrous decree, but a monstrous proposal which is to be discussed, and published, and argued about, in anticipation of the final vote, invariably proves too much for him, and despotism is changed, at the worst, into ascendancy. Moreover, behind the Legislature stands the Popular Council, and if that is fairly elected and summoned pretty often, and left as independent, say, as a Great Divan in Turkey would be, to say its mind, it will be, although legally powerless, an excellent embodiment of public opinion, which has real powers, even in the East, though they are not formulated. On questions deeply interesting to the people, such as tenure, the conscription, punishment for revenue offences, or the debtor and creditor laws, such a Council would have a distinct opinion, which must be attended to, under pain of certain unpopularity and possible insurrection. Moreover, being so listened to, it would, as the people grew more intelligent, gradually make its advice authoritative, and form a party for itself in the State, and insist on a legal position and legal rights, as an experienced and competent Representative Body. This is what Lord Dufferin evidently hopes will happen, and what those Englishmen who think that popular government can be made universal will think is sure to happen in the long-run.

The scheme is most sincere, and is a final answer to those who believe that the British Government, in demanding Egypt for the Egyptians, is only playing a part, and intends for all time to make of the local organisation a mere instrument. Lord Granville cannot secretly pull the strings of this Legislature, still less of this popular though deliberative Assembly. If that is his intention, he is only raising up obstacles to be overcome, and had much better have left the Khedive in the position of the Governor of a Crown Colony, with a paid majority, and no popular body at all. But then, is there not in this very independence a cause of certain failure? Just so far as the Egyptian Government is independent will it be Egyptian. Where is the evidence that an Egyptian Legislature will do any of the things Great Britain desires to see done? The Council will consist of seven Ministers and seven district Notables, whose importance depends upon their direct power over the villagers. A large majority must be Mussulmans, unwilling to depart from the Sacred Law,—that is, unwilling to treat all classes as entitled to equal justice; a smaller majority must be officials, accustomed to desire power for their class; and a majority must be men whose interest is the exaction of large rents or taxes from the peasantry by violence. Why should they be expected to terminate the real abuses of Egypt? If left free, will they put down slavery? Certainly not, for they are ordinary Mahomedans, not impressed, as the Khedive is, with a fear of European opinion. Will they strike savagely, as a good Khedive might, at official bribery? Certainly not, for they will all profit by it, as they did under the Control. Will they make the infliction of the courbash without order from a regular Court penal? Certainly not; for they will all believe, as Riaz Pasha and every other great Mahomedan Egyptian believes, that without the whip neither taxes nor rents will ever be collected. The Legislative Council, as an instrument for securing Western progress, stands condemned by its constitution, while as a check on the Ministers it will be nearly powerless. It is the Executive which has always oppressed the Egyptian people, and it will be left unfettered, except by a body which can entertain no law not sent down from the Ministry, yet which is not bound to pass any law, if it thinks the Ministers, though they promise it under foreign dictation, secretly dislike it. The external momentum towards good government is positively diminished, for the Khedive must obey, while the Council need not, and the internal momentum will not exist. Lord Dufferin reasons as if the Councillors would be English gentlemen, who would resist oppression and refuse to vote injustice; but his Council will rather resemble the Senate of a Slave State when legislating for Blacks. No doubt, the Popular Council might, if it could act, condemn the oppression; and its condemnation would have an effect, possibly greater than we Westerners habitually believe. But not to mention that it may be and will be packed till it is as bad as the old Notables, the Ministry will soon find excuses for not calling it, or confining its discussions to unimportant issues. Egypt does not possess four-and-forty Hampdens, or three-and-twenty either.

For be it recollected, the influence which keeps Governments in our Crown Colonies pure and active, the responsibility of all concerned to the Government at home, will be almost entirely absent. There is no trace, that we can see, in any scheme yet published of any provision for a British Resident, or any Convention which shall secure to the British Government a right of separate interference, even by advice. The moment the British troops depart, the Khedive's Government will cease to be bound to attend to British advice, or even to listen to it, and will have every inducement to take its own way. It will be pressed every day by the Foreign Consul-General to take its own way. It will be threatened every day by the Sultan's representative, if it takes the English way. It will every day feel more bitterly that English supervision which, directed as it is to protect his subjects, is felt even by an Indian Prince who has been trained to it, and who is bound by treaty to submit to it, to be so galling and unnecessary. The Khedive may yield to it, because he is a submissive man, perplexed with his want of foothold, and anxious for his throne; but his stronger Ministers, as we saw in Riaz's case, will not submit, his Legislative Council will constantly protest, and his Popular Council is not unlikely to make of "foreign dictation" the first of grievances. Suppose all three, weary of an effort in the object of which they do not sympathise, fall back on the old ways, and the easy method of governing by the lash and getting fortunes by whipping peasants. Is Sir Evelyn Wood, who has just been appointed Serdar of Egypt—the old French "Constable" is the nearest equivalent—to order the Native Army to arrest the Khedive, or to march on the Legislative Council, or what? Legally, England will have no ground of complaint, no foothold, no right of intervention, such as she obtained this time from the Khedive's summons, and the international character of the Dual Control. She will have to invade without a pretext, or to acknowledge failure. The Bondholders may be secured by treaty, and the Suez Canal by international law, but the people of Egypt are given up to their old oppressors under new names, without even the trifling protection which they derived from the conviction of the Controllers that if they were not squeezed so much the State revenue would be more regularly paid. That is not a result which we can heartily support, for though it frees Great Britain from any charge of ambition, it also liberates her from any responsibility to the people whom she has helped to tax, and whose interests she stands avowedly pledged to protect.

WHAT THE TORIES THREATEN.

THE Quarterly Review is in very low spirits. Again and again it warns the Tories that there is no evidence at all of any substantial loss of Liberal power in the country. Of course, it does not refuse altogether to feed the hopes of Conservatives on such scraps of comfort as the favourable bye-elections have supplied. But it refers gloomily to Liverpool, as indicating, at all events, very inadequate organisation on the part of the Conservatives, and still more gloomily to Mr. Gladstone's undiminished hold on the confidence of the British electorate. To set-off against this discouragement, the Quarterly, of course, has the old but rather worn-out pleasure of assailing Mr. Gladstone for doing what he had formerly denied his intention of doing, and of descanting with moody disgust on the achievements and political iniquities of Mr. Chamberlain. But the Reviewer is evidently aware that both these pleasures are beginning to pall on the Conservative party, and that something more distinctive than invectives of this sort, of which their late leader, Lord Beaconsfield, both carefully earned and duly received his full share, without being greatly injured by them as a political leader, is needed to put the best heart into their party.

Accordingly, the Quarterly Review takes up the subject of the County Franchise as the one on which it will be easiest to undermine the Liberal position, and shadows forth its impressions as to the true Tory line. As these impressions have a very distinct bearing on the question that has been raised concerning the single or double mode of dealing with the County Franchise and the Redistribution of Seats, we will deal with them in relation to that issue. The Quarterly Review repeats, then, in a very emphatic way, the absurd mistake to which we have formerly referred, that the House of Commons refused to listen to the Reform Bill of 1866 because the Redistribution measure was not amalgamated with the Franchise measure,—a statement entirely contrary to the fact, for this issue was joined, and on this issue the Conservatives were distinctly beaten,—and it indicates that any attempt to separate the two into perfectly distinct, though logically connected changes, would be defeated at once. Now, of course, we have never denied that the Tories have absolute power to defeat the County Franchise Bill in the House of Lords if they please, nor that they will please so to defeat it, if they think that by that means they shall appeal to the country with a better chance of success than they would have if they waited for the Redistribution Bill. But for us the true question is whether they will think so or not, and whether if they should happen to think so, they will judge wisely. Little as we understand the inner mind of the Conservative leaders, we hold that there is really very great doubt of their deciding to join issue on the Franchise measure taken alone; and we hold very strongly that if they do decide to do so, they will make a great blunder, which will result in nothing but profit to the Liberals at the next General Election. Moreover, the light thrown by the Quarterly Review on the nature of this political issue tells directly on the merits of the question.

No one is more eager than the Quarterly Reviewer to insist,—as Lord Beaconsfield long ago insisted,—that the extension of household franchise to the counties ought to imply a very great increase of the political weight of the counties in the representative Chamber. At present, it is reasonable to assert that, important as the counties are in consequence of their large population, yet that since only a proportion of that population is really represented by the county vote, the counties ought not to be represented in the House of Commons in anything like the ratio of their population; but that, so soon as the county electorates are placed in the same relation to the county populations in which the borough electorates already stand to the borough populations, this anomaly ought to cease. It will then become a fair contention that you should represent both counties and boroughs with very much the same measure of regard to their population,—not, indeed, necessarily by equal electoral districts, but on reasonably equal principles,—whether that be done by a logical scheme, or by the method which this country has usually preferred, the extension of the historical method, and the balance of varieties of method adopted in dealing with the boroughs,—London, for instance, is never likely to be accorded its full weight measured by population while the historical method lasts at all,—by similar and something like symmetrically conceived varieties of method in dealing with the counties. This we all admit. But the main issue for the moment is this,—Would the passage of a County Franchise Bill alone,—supposing the Redistribution Bill to be wrecked in the Lords,—do injustice to the Liberal or to the Tory party? Is the Tory claim for new political weight for the counties, a claim founded on a sincere belief that the strength of the Tories will continue to lie in the counties after the redistribution of power has been effected, but may, for the moment, be greatly reduced in the counties by the Franchise Bill taken alone? In one word, would the rejection of the Franchise Bill on the ground that a gross political injustice would be done by passing it without giving the counties a greater relative political weight, be a claim which it lies in Tory mouths to urge, or rather a claim which it lies in Liberal mouths to urge? The importance of this question is obvious. If it lies with the Liberals to urge it, the Liberals may fairly say, 'We shall gain more by a fair Redistribution Bill than we shall by the Franchise Bill alone; but we are willing to take a part of our claims if we can get it, without a dissolution, because we perfectly well know that you won't let us take the whole without a dissolution.' If, however, the Tories really believe that the County Franchise Bill taken alone would diminish their power, while the Franchise Bill with a fair Redistribution Bill would either increase it or diminish it much less, they would have a very good reply. They would say, 'No, if you get your Franchise Bill alone, we should suffer much more than if you got your whole measure, such as you admit that it ought to be; therefore we will not pass your Franchise Bill alone, but will appeal to the country against your unfair attempt to get it alone.' Now, do the Tories say this? Of course, they wish to keep the power of rejecting the Franchise Bill in the Peers; but do they venture to say distinctly that the Franchise instalment would injure them much more than the whole Bill for which they have a right to contend? On the contrary, they imply, and imply most clearly, that what they fear is not the Franchise Bill taken alone, but the mere working of the principle of basing representation on household franchise without some trimming of the balance by a direct transfer of political power to property as such. Here is the Quarterly Reviewer's statesmanship:—"In any case, and happen what may, the extension of household suffrage throughout the kingdom must immensely reduce the political power attaching to the ownership of property, and there are, perhaps, few reasonable men who would desire to make total disfranchisement the penalty of such ownership. From very ancient times, the claims of property to representation have been admitted. Under the old constitutional system, the freeholder alone voted in the county for the knight of the shire; and the burgage tenant, or the payer of scot and lot, or even the potwalloper, or all three, voted for the burgess in the borough. By the proposed 'assimilation' of the borough and county franchise, every householder would have a vote, and every freeholder should have one also; but it was thought right formerly that, in order to deal fairly with all parties, they should vote separately, so there might be no injustice in advancing the same claim now. It might be decided that freeholders should have the right to return two members for each county, and in that case the total county representation would, of course, be very largely reduced, but no substantial injustice would be done. One effect of such an alteration would undeniably be greatly to diminish the expense of county elections, now so much complained of, and there would still be a class of members for the counties whose opinions, though not perhaps always identical with those of their borough colleagues, would have a fair claim to attention, and would represent a very strong and valuable element in English political life."

Now, what does that mean? It means plainly enough that if the Tories reject the Franchise Bill taken alone, it will be because they want to get an equivalent in the shape of a direct proprietary representation in the House of Commons; in other words, because they expect to suffer both by the Franchise Bill and by the Redistribution Bill, unless the Redistribution Bill goes on what would for this generation be an entirely fresh principle of constituting a separate proprietary electorate in which property alone should weigh. The Quarterly Review does not pretend for a moment that the Franchise Bill would injure the Tories more than a Franchise Bill coupled with a Redistribution Bill based more or less on the principle of population; but he contends that it would injure the Tories more than a Franchise Bill, coupled with a Redistribution Bill of which one very considerable element should be based on the possession of property taken alone. Now, that shows the Tory hand. The Tories would really go to the country, if they dissolved on the Franchise Bill, not because they regarded the counties as insufficiently represented on the basis of household suffrage, but because they wished to get the counties represented on the basis of proprietary interests, and proprietary interests taken alone. Is that a course that the country would be likely to endorse? Does any one suppose that the Tories would really venture to dissolve on the allegation that without a purely proprietary element in the redistributed constituencies, reform would be an injustice and a mischief, and not in accordance with the principles accepted by the constituencies in 1880? We are more than ever convinced by the Tory organ that there is absolutely no case for saying that the Franchise Bill, taken alone, would injure the interests of the Tory party, more seriously than a complete measure. It would be only an instalment of what the Liberals ask for, but the Liberals do no injustice to the Tories by taking in advance a small instalment of their demand. What the Tories want is something quite different,—a total reconstitution of the basis of the County Franchise,—and they will hardly venture to appeal to the country to endorse that demand.

COLONIAL ENVOYS.

THE little ceremonial of Wednesday at the Colonial Office is, we hope, the first step towards a new relation between the Home Government and our Colonies,—a relation which ought to supplement and, on the whole, improve that already established through the Agency of the Colonial Governors. Lord Derby's reception of the Agents-General of our self-governing Colonies probably means, and in any case, we think, ought to mean, that in future these Agents are to be accorded a formal position as Envoys of their respective Governments, and that their position is to be granted some at least of the formal honours attached to the Ministers of foreign Governments. The need of such a recognition appears to us to be really established. To a very considerable extent, the self-governing Colonies are,—not, indeed, foreign to us, the hope is that they never need be so,—but as independent of our policy as foreign countries themselves. We allow them, and rightly allow them, to tax our manufactures, and to ignore the commercial interests of this country as they please. We ask them for no help in war, though they sometimes offer it, and though we should be bound to give them help, if they needed it. We often sanction their laws, even when they decide important questions of policy, or even morality, in a sense adverse to that which receives the approval of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The reason that the Colonies are so loyal to us is that we have abdicated all serious attempts to control their domestic policy, except in cases where they voluntarily come to us for our arbitration. Under these circumstances, it is no longer sufficient to communicate with them through a Governor who does not in any sense represent them, and who is not dependent on their approbation. As a matter of fact, it has not unfrequently happened that the Colonial Secretary and the Cabinet have been seriously misled as to the public feeling in a colony by the despatches of the Governor. It is true, of course, that the British Governor is in constant communication with his Colonial Cabinet, and is bound to act generally on their advice. But it is also true that he very often finds that advice extremely unpalatable to himself, and that, as a natural consequence, it suffers some unconscious perversion in passing through his mind, so that when it reaches our Colonial Office, it conveys a very different impression from that which the responsible Government of the Colony would have desired to convey. It is very much better that the Colonial Governments should have a completely independent mode of representing their views to this Government, by the agency of men who have lived their lives in sympathy with the local Ministers, and who feel bound to the Ministers by the bonds of interest as well as the bonds of sympathy, so that there may be no false colouring due to the unconscious prepossessions of the medium through which the policy of the Colony is transmitted.

It may be objected, indeed, that to accord such a recognition as this to the Envoys of the Colonies will diminish the importance and influence of the Colonial Governors, who are the permanent representatives of the Crown on the spot. We do not think so. We believe that it will, in the end, add to the importance of these Governors,—for nothing will tend more decidedly to increase their weight than the knowledge that all their despatches, public and private, will be checked at home by comparison with the statements of the Colonial Envoys, and will depend for their estimation mainly on being more statesmanlike, weightier in tone, fuller of knowledge of every side of a question, than the statements of the Colonial Envoys themselves. Our Colonial Governors have far oftener blundered, through their too obvious bias towards that side of the question which they believed to be pleasing to the Colonial Office, than through any other kind of error. The motive for such a bias will be in large measure removed by the clear knowledge that this bias would be not only discovered, but rendered so obvious as to do mischief to the cause they have at heart, so soon as the statements of the Colonial Agents had been fully heard. The consequence, we believe, will be that, though the Governors will still, of course, see the policy of our Colonies more from the point of view of the Home Government than the Colonial Envoys can do, they will yet take pains to avoid all partiality of statement, and send home much more really trustworthy criticisms on Colonial affairs than they have sent home up to this time.

The object of English statesmen,—as well, we believe, Conservative as Liberal,—has now long been to bring about so cordial a feeling between the Mother-country and the self-governed Colonies as will amount to a virtual alliance,—not necessarily very onerous or active, but always hearty, and always containing the contingency of an active alliance, under any critical circumstances,—between the United Kingdom and these distant branches of the Empire. The various plans for a common Federal representation of the Mother-country and the Colonies are all pure dreams, involving difficulties far too vast to be surmounted. But there is every reason to hope that a provisional alliance between England and her self-governed Colonies, strong enough not only to defeat all hopes of detaching any one of our Colonies from us, but to secure us a very considerable additional strength in time of urgent need, may be easily brought about; and we are quite sure that nothing will tend more effectually to this result than the frank recognition of them as, to a considerable extent, independent Governments, with interests different from, though not opposed to, our own, and a frank deference for all the representations which these more or less independent Governments choose to make to our own. Lord Derby has initiated his new Colonial Administration with a very important step, taken in the most dignified and impressive way.

THE IRISH POLICE.

IT is one of the many misfortunes of the British Government in Ireland, that it is compelled to make the Police such an active agent in the Administration. Nearly invisible in England and unnoticed in Scotland, the Police in Ireland is as ubiquitous as in a Continental State, is employed for political purposes quite as much as for protection, and is, therefore, regarded by the people as an instrument wielded against them by a hostile Government. That view of them, moreover, is, with the exception of the word "hostile," strictly true. The main cause of crime in Ireland being disaffection, and the chief manifestation of it political assassination and agrarian outrage, the Government is simply compelled to use the Police as combatants in the war with agitators and incendiaries, and to carry on that war in a style which, though perfectly familiar to the Continent, is in this country considered detestable. It is impossible to allow individuals to be threatened for taking farms, or assassinating Societies to remain unexposed, or outrages to pass unpunished, and therefore, as the population will not prosecute or give evidence, the Police are compelled to make wholesale arrests, to organise raids on suspected houses, to search suspected places, and to make preventive captures, which, to people living under a Government which in England does none of these things, are intolerably irritating. They were so to the British people when under Sidmouth's régime they were done here. The Irish Police do their duty, for the most part, admirably; but, conscious as they are of popular hatred, baffled at every turn by passive resistance, and loaded with insult, which they, being Irishmen, feel as the more stolid Englishmen would not, it is inevitable that they should grow brusque and harsh, should do their duty without sympathy, and should always be ready to enforce the letter of the law. Put an English constable in a parish where nobody will tell him anything, or be seen speaking to him, or help him in any way, and see what he will be like in a month. And we cannot doubt, in spite of many official statements, all perfectly sincere, but still based upon the reports of threatened Magistrates and ulcerated Inspectors, that the Police do occasionally feel the desire to make themselves formidable, do now and then assume insult to themselves as a breach of law, and do regard prominent opponents, such as editors of the extreme papers, with a feeling with which policemen in England do not regard even burglars or foot-pads. Saints may love those who describe them as "brutal janissaries," but policemen will not. We do not believe one-half of the indictment published by Mr. F. H. O'Donnell in the Times of Tuesday, for he evidently trusts in reports from local prints, which, when discussed in Parliament, are constantly found to be either inaccurate, or coloured by political hatred; but some of his stories must be partially true. The story of the boy who was arrested for lolling out his tongue at the Viceroy "in a threatening manner" can hardly be a pure invention, or that of the possibly accidental indignities inflicted on untried editors charged with intimidation. In fact, to experienced men, no evidence whatever of such occurrences is required. Irish Policemen are human beings, and it is not in human nature for a body of ordinary men, hated by a whole population, isolated from all companionship, and exposed hourly not only to personal danger, but to abuse of a peculiarly intolerable kind—abuse conveying a charge of treachery to the country—not to grow every now and then savage and morose. Soldiers certainly do; and soldiers so situated are apt to be better-tempered than policemen, and to regard everything but assassination as accidents of the campaign, while they are not employed in the arrests and searches which bring the police into direct personal contact with their foes. You do not love the man who kicks you for doing what he himself acknowledges to be your duty. That the Castle, as at present organised, does its very best to prevent all unnecessary violence, we are convinced. In the case of the boy, Mr. O'Donnell himself admits that Lord Spencer at once interfered, and Mr. Trevelyan has set conciliation to himself as an end, besides being by character, as Irishmen admit, one of the most sympathetic of men; but the responsible Chiefs cannot be everywhere, and we are utterly unable to believe that with an irritated people and an insulted Police, "hard cases" never occur, or that the people are always unreasonable in their complaints, exaggerated as they may be. There are just complaints enough in England.

The worst of it all is that no remedy is perceptible. If the control of the Police in Ireland were entrusted to local bodies, outrage for popular ends would never be prevented or punished. Even in England, it is sometimes essential to supersede, practically or formally, the local authorities; while throughout the Continent, Parliaments elected by universal suffrage have refused to hand over to great municipalities the duty of maintaining order. It is very doubtful if Parliament would venture upon such a step in London, and in Dublin it would be an abnegation of duty which all propertied citizens would condemn. If it were possible, that would be the solution which would most relieve England; but it is not possible. Nor can we see how the area of Police work is to be restricted. If Mr. O'Donnell were governing Ireland to-morrow, and found himself threatened by assassinating Societies, and detested by the lower classes, and abandoned by the respectable population—for that is the situation in disaffected districts—he would be compelled to use his police, to rely on informers, to make razzias for the sake of obtaining evidence, or to let society go to pieces. He would have no alternative, and being an Irishman, would probably act with a sternness and disregard of law from which the Englishman in Ireland is debarred, alike by policy, and by his own feeling that he is, after all, without the sanction of the people whom he governs. A native Government in Ireland situated like the British would do precisely the same things, suffer from the same obstacles, and, if we may judge from the conduct of all the secret tribunals in Ireland, be far more ready to shed blood. Nor can we hope anything from changes in individuals. The Irish Extremists themselves say Lord Spencer, Mr. Trevelyan, and Mr. Hamilton are as good as Englishmen can be, and would rather be governed by them than by Irishmen penetrated with English feeling. The Stipendiaries are mostly Irishmen, and are made rigid by their position, which is that of men with no foothold but the Law. The Police are all Irishmen, sympathise on many points profoundly with the people, and are made harsh, when they are harsh, chiefly by the sense of undeserved popular hate. An easier police, when let alone, is not to be found in Europe, or one less martinet. We can think of no cure for the situation and its consequences, except a sleepless supervision, which is already kept up by men determined to avoid oppression, but which might possibly be made even more effective by more inspection of the best kind, and by stricter instructions to avoid every arrest and occasion of collision not directly authorised by superior authority. Even then much would remain to be done, the truth of the matter being that the best-selected, best-disciplined, and best-directed police cannot be made agreeable, except by the sense that, as regards all well-doers, it is living among friends. The London Police is the best mannered and least hated in the world; but the London Police, when mobbed—as, for instance, in a student row, or a café outbreak—hits very hard, hits sometimes the wrong men, and occasionally delivers testimony which Magistrates have to sift. The circumstances which in London are occasional are in Ireland chronic, and are bitterly aggravated by the fact that in Ireland, when the Police do their duty, they are censured by a section of Irish Members as savagely as when they exceed it, and are held by most of their countrymen to be equally deserving of detestation. It is not because they are acting illegally that in some districts of Ireland the Police are refused carriage for money, that in others they are regarded as lepers, and that in Dublin a report of a plot for assassinating active policemen seems so natural that nobody discredits it. There is nothing to be done, except to go on patiently, and steadily punish every excess of zeal, and wait for the hour when Irishmen, taught by bitter experience, shall recognise the limits of the possible. Perhaps it will never come.

THE LYONS TRIALS.

THE Trial of Prince Krapotkine and the fifty-two "Anarchists," though undoubtedly suggested by the "manifestations" at Montceau les Mines, and the dynamite explosions at the Café Bellecour in Lyons, had no ostensible relation to either of those events. Montceau is a long way from Lyons, and it has never been ascertained whether the attempt to blow up the Café Bellecour (which resulted in at least one death) was prompted by private vengeance or contrived by anarchist plotters. The prosecution was instituted by order of the Minister of the Interior, under a law passed in 1872 for the suppression of the "International Association of Workmen," whereby a Correctional Court, composed of three Judges, is empowered to try, without jury, persons accused of belonging to that Society; and if found guilty, award them sentences of from two to five years' imprisonment. "Extenuating circumstances" would, we believe, enable the Court to pronounce somewhat milder penalties. But the old International became defunct years ago, and the efforts of the President of the Tribunal and the Procureur of the Republic were directed to proving that the Fédération Lyonnaise and the Fédération Jurassienne, to which most of the accused belonged, were the old thing revived under a new name. Direct evidence not always being forthcoming, the prosecution sought to infer the prisoners' connection with one or other of these Societies by questioning them touching their opinions, the meetings they attended, the papers to which they contributed or subscribed. It was, in short, to use a French phrase, a procès de tendance. The President (who, like all French Judges, sided with the prosecution) seemed more anxious to prove that the prisoners held anarchic views than that they were affiliated to Socialist Societies, and the Procureur demanded an exemplary punishment for Prince Krapotkine, on the ground that the latter is the father of this latest development of Socialism.

The inclusion of Prince Krapotkine in the prosecution is as remarkable as the exclusion from it of M. Élisée Reclus, his friend and intimate. The one has been no less bold than the other in the propagation of Anarchist principles; they belong to the same Societies, write in the same papers, and the name of the celebrated geographer was as frequently mentioned during the proceedings as the name of the notorious Nihilist. It is an open secret that M. Reclus owes his immunity from arrest solely to the fact that the Government feared that the prosecution of so eminent a Frenchman might provoke an inconvenient agitation. This was stated in open court by Dr. Gauthier, one of the prisoners, without drawing any contradiction from the Tribunal or the Procureur.

The most striking features at the trials were the defiant attitude of the accused, and the boldness of their declarations. Many of them went beyond the Judge's question, and seemed to glory in committing themselves. One man, a weaver of the name of Saulaville, when asked if he had not belonged to the Fédération Lyonnaise, answered in the negative. Desiring, he said, to preserve his "liberty of action," he had purposely refrained from joining that or any other society; but he wished it to be understood that he fully approved of all that his fellow-anarchists had said, and of the means of action which they advocated. Another, when asked if he had not publicly expressed approval of the "manifestations" at Montceau (which consisted, it will be remembered, in blowing up churches with dynamite), after denying the imputation, observed that he would repair the omission by then and there saying that he did most heartily approve of them. Several gloried in the fact that they had taken part in presenting a pistol of honour to Fourier, a workman who, during a strike at Lyons, had made an unsuccessful attempt to shoot a patron (master). Bernard, a locksmith, wound up an eloquent speech by declaring that, when the people descended into the streets, "he would be there." Gauthier, by far the ablest anarchist of the Lyons group, capped his companion's speech by saying that, when that day came, Gauthier, the Doctor of Law, would be found fighting side by side with the locksmith Bernard.

Gauthier is a handsome, dark-complexioned man, of twenty-seven, a distinguished University graduate, an advocate, and a docteur-en-droit. He possesses a voice of silvery sweetness, and spoke with an eloquence which visibly moved even the Tribunal and the Bar. His French is of marvellous purity and strength, and he is said to be the author of the "Joint Declaration of Anarchist Principles" which was effectively read, between the examinations and the defence, by Napoléon Tissand, a young man of Dantonian aspect, with black, dishevelled hair. This declaration is probably the most extraordinary document to which forty-seven men, presumably sane, ever appended their signatures. In the new society for which they are preparing the way, there will be neither private property nor public law, neither Governments nor institutions. All human relations will be based on a system of "free contracts, revocable at pleasure" (sic), and everybody will be at full liberty to exercise his faculties and gratify his desires! That men like Krapotkine, Reclus, and Gauthier should hold views of which this is the latest and authoritative expression, simply shows that Anarchy is not a set of principles susceptible of discussion, but a faith, to be accepted or rejected, and that its devotees are as credulous and fanatical as the most bigoted believers in the creeds which Anarchists denounce as superstitions, and seek to suppress.

There are circumstances in the life of Prince Krapotkine, as, we believe, in the life of Élisée Reclus, which in some measure account for his hatred of Governments and his despair of reform, save by the overturn of all things. At the same time, it is quite evident that, unless their utterances had found a responsive echo in France, they would have had no following, and that the prosecution in which one of them is involved, and from which the other narrowly escaped, would never have been instituted. Socialism is no new thing; its increasing prevalence on the Continent arises, probably, in equal measure from the decay of religious belief, a growing conviction on the part of the wage-earning classes that they are unfairly excluded by the rich from a share in the good things of life—ease, leisure, and amusement—intensified by the feeling, the misery of which can only be understood by those who have experienced it, that between their families and starvation there is only the labour of their hands. Anarchism is the ne plus ultra of Socialism, and in France it may be regarded as a fierce, unreasoning protest against the over-government and restrictions on personal liberty which still prevail to a much greater extent than most Englishmen have any idea of. There are said to be a million office-holders in France, nearly every one of whom considers himself, by virtue of his position, entitled to treat the public with contumely and contempt. The police have just as much power under the Republic as they had under the Empire, and the system of keeping prisoners au secret, trying to entangle them in their talk, and, while presumably innocent, treating them as guilty, must be constantly sowing a portentous crop of hatreds. Even this trial afforded several instances of petty tyranny. The prisoners, being so placed that they could not hear the examinations, made the reasonable request that, with a view to their defence, they might be allowed to see the newspapers containing reports of the proceedings. This request was at once granted by the Court, but the Prefect, their legal custodian, absolutely refused to give it effect. He refused, in like manner, to let them see their wives, friends, or legal advisers. M. Perraudin, Commissioner of Police, gave evidence of what had passed at various Anarchist meetings. When asked how he had procured his information, he said he had obtained it from his subordinates; but he declined either to produce them or give their names, and in this refusal he was supported by the Court. On one occasion, the captain in command of the soldiers who garrisoned the salle des pas perdus informed the prisoners that he had "arranged" some of their friends of the Paris Commune, and if he might have his way, he would "arrange" them in like manner. For this outrage he was rightly punished with thirty days' arrest.

If these things can be done under the Republic, what must have been the state of affairs under the Empire?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN ON FREE SCHOOLS.

IT will not be Mr. Chamberlain's fault, if Free Schools do not soon become a burning question. In his speech at Birmingham, on Monday, he did his best to fire the train. A Minister of the Crown does not upbraid the working-classes with their indifference to their own interests, unless he is genuinely anxious that they should keep a sharper look-out after them, and this is precisely the line which Mr. Chamberlain took. "I marvel," he said, "at the patience with which Englishmen bear an infliction which has been abolished long ago in the United States of America, which hardly exists at the present time in a single English colony, and which has been removed in almost every Continental country." Perhaps the patience of Englishmen will even now not be broken down by having to pay twopence a week for a child's schooling; but when they learn that a Cabinet Minister thinks them fools for not at once throwing off the burden, they may feel a sudden irksomeness in what they have hitherto taken so calmly. At all events, Mr. Chamberlain must have the matter very much at heart, or he would not call upon the working-classes to insist upon either the rates or the taxes being additionally charged for their sole benefit. It is worth while to look a little closely into the reasons he assigns for his eagerness, in order to determine whether they are sufficient to explain it.

First of all, let us take the comparison which Mr. Chamberlain institutes between Elementary Schools in this country and in the United States. There is, we imagine, this vital difference between the two cases. The American Common Schools are, in fact, as well as in name, the schools to which the great mass of the population send their children. If this were so in England, the theoretical objection to Free Schools would in a great measure disappear. If a whole community give their children the same education, it becomes a small matter how they arrange to pay for it. Every family comes in for its share of the benefit, and if it is found more convenient to pay for it by levying a rate universally than by charging fees universally, the worst that can be said of the plan is that it bears hardly on childless couples, and on bachelors and spinsters who happen to live in houses of their own, or to be in any other way subject to local taxation. It is altogether different when, as in England, one class sends its children to the Elementary Schools, and the other classes send their children to schools which they pay for themselves. In this case, the community rates itself, not for the benefit of all its members, but for the benefit of a particular class—a very large and important class, no doubt, and one which, under actual circumstances, may fairly expect a very large subsidy towards the cost of its education—but still, only one class out of many, and one not possessing any exclusive title to saddle the State with expenses, whether in the matter of education, or of any other good thing for which money has to be paid. Mr. Chamberlain had this difficulty put to him by Mr. Mundella. Was there not, he asked, just as much reason in a cry for free gas as in a cry for free schools? Mr. Chamberlain answered, as advocates who do not see their way out of a difficulty are accustomed to answer, by drawing a distinction. Private lighting, he said, is paid for by individuals, and private education ought to be paid for by individuals also. But public lighting is paid for by the community; and public education, so far as it is prescribed by law, ought equally to be paid for by the community. But this analogy does not really touch the objection. Street lighting, like the common schools in America, is provided for all and paid for by all. Elementary schools in England are, as a matter of fact, provided for a class. It does not follow that they ought to be entirely paid for by that class, because they are provided, to a great extent, in the interest, though not for the use, of the whole community. The State is known to suffer by individual ignorance; that, no doubt, is a reason why the State should pay for removing that ignorance. But then the individual gains by the acquisition of knowledge; that is equally a reason why the individual should pay for that acquisition. The existing system is a fair, and, as regards the State, a generous, compromise between these two views. The community pays by far the largest part of the cost of elementary education, but it insists that, wherever he has the power to do so, the parent should pay a fractional share.

Mr. Chamberlain further argues that, by depriving parents of the opportunity of making money out of the labour of their children, we have imposed on them as great a sacrifice as we are entitled to do, and that the community which has established this system, in the interest of all, ought to pay for it. This is the same fallacy over again. The community, in the interest of all, compels parents to make a certain sacrifice in the interest of their children. It is not the community only that gains by the extension of education; the individual child gains at least as much. Yes, Mr. Chamberlain may be supposed to say, the individual child, but not the individual parent. What the community does is to make parents forego their children's earnings, not for their own sakes, but for the sake of the children; and when the State, in its own interest, imposes on A a sacrifice for the advantage of B, it is bound not to leave A to bear any part of the cost. If there were no special tie between parent and child, this would be fair reasoning. When a man is ordered by law to do for the good of the community something which, but for the law, he would have been under no obligation to do, he ought to be repaid all the expenses that he is put to. If, for example, in a time of distress, employers were ordered to feed all their workmen, as the most convenient way of keeping them alive, they would have a just claim on the community for the amount they had had to spend in carrying out this direction. But the law does order parents to feed their children, and punishes them if, having the means, they omit to feed them. According to Mr. Chamberlain's analogy, this is unjust. In depriving parents of the opportunity of saving money by withholding food from their children, we have imposed upon them as great a sacrifice as we are entitled to do, and the community which has established this system in the interest of all, ought to pay for it. Probably, Mr. Chamberlain would say that as parents are under a moral as well as a legal obligation not to let their children starve, we are not bound to repay them the money spent in the discharge of this obligation, except in cases where they have not the means to fulfil it at their own cost. But is not a parent equally bound not to let his children grow up in complete ignorance, and if so, ought not the cost of their education equally to come out of his pocket, except when his poverty does not allow him to obey the law? As regards the working-classes, it is evident that they could not, if they would, bear the whole expense of providing schools and teachers for their children. If the community did not, in some shape or other, interfere, the greater number of these children would go entirely uneducated. It is so much to the interest of the State that this should not happen, that it may with perfect consistency take a large part of the burden upon itself. But to take the whole would be to ignore the essential fact that a parent owes to his child duties which he does not owe to the world at large.

Mr. Chamberlain's theoretical defence of Free Schools thus turns out to be altogether worthless. Let us see whether he is more successful in his practical defence of them. In this part of his subject, he seems to rely on two arguments. The collection of school fees inflicts a heavy burden on the teachers, and it makes compulsion unpopular. The first of these objections is not without force, but it points not to the abolition of fees, but to a change in the mode of collecting them. A teacher's time, says Mr. Chamberlain, is something too valuable to be wasted in the collection of twopences. Then let some one whose time is less valuable be employed in the collection of twopences. Let school fees be got in by a fee-collector, just as rents are got in by a rent-collector, or rates by a rate-collector. It is not an office which demands any special intellectual qualities, and a teacher must be but a poor hand at his trade, if he is not fit to do better things than extract school fees out of unwilling parents. But this fact is no more a reason for abolishing fees than the fact that, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to collect the Income-tax, as well as impose it, there would be a still greater waste of brain-power. But the remedy would be to appoint tax-collectors, not to abolish the Income-tax, and so the remedy for the waste of brain-power in making elementary teachers collect school fees is to be found in the transfer of the duty to inferior hands, not in the abolition of school fees. As regards the alleged connection between school fees and the unpopularity of compulsion, Mr. Chamberlain has himself urged that the real sacrifice laid upon the parent is the loss of his child's earnings; and so long as he is made to bear this loss, he will dislike compulsion. This part of Mr. Chamberlain's reasoning is so weak, that it is difficult not to suspect that his real motive for being thus eager for the establishment of free schools is one which he does not as yet think it expedient to proclaim. Free Schools and Voluntary Schools cannot, except in very rare instances, exist side by side; and in this impossibility, the explanation of Mr. Chamberlain's crusade against school fees may probably be found.

THE USE OF INQUESTS.

THE Daily News is quite right, from its point of view, in its onslaught upon Coroners for allowing such inquiries as the one now proceeding at Hounslow; but it is quite wrong, from another, and, we think, broader point. It assumes that the Coroner's function is to ascertain the cause of a sudden and unexplained death; and, so assuming, argues that Dr. Diplock, in virtually trying the late Dr. Edwardes on a charge of indecent assault, is stepping altogether outside his province. Undoubtedly, upon that assumption, the case is a very gross one. No human being doubts that Dr. Edwardes killed himself, or that his reason for killing himself was a dread of the consequences of a charge brought against him by a female patient, and supported by his partner, Dr. Whitmarsh. Not only, moreover, is the moral conviction of the Coroner, and the jury, and the public complete, but the legal evidence is all that could be wished, and an unimpeachable verdict could have been returned on the first day. Witnesses whose testimony is unimpeached saw every step of Dr. Edwardes' path, and he himself admitted, in a letter written just before death, his intention of committing suicide. If, therefore, a decision as to the cause of death is all that is required, Dr. Diplock, in trying to ascertain whether Dr. Edwardes was scoundrel or victim, in summoning Mrs. Bignell, and, above all, in examining Dr. Whitmarsh, travelled into matters altogether beyond his province, and might even be charged with pandering to the love of gossip which exists throughout every grade of English society. It is an odd amusement, no doubt, for a Coroner, who is paid by the job, who, in a district like Dr. Diplock's, is always in a hurry, who loses valuable time with every extension of his inquiry, and who has no promotion to hope for; but still, on the assumption, that is the most reasonable explanation of the proceedings. But then, is that assumption precisely true? We are under the impression that the business of a Coroner, in cases of suicide, at all events, is somewhat wider than this theory concedes. He has to make inquisition, not only into the cause of death, but into a crime; to decide whether the deceased was guilty of self-murder, or was, as a lunatic, irresponsible to the laws. In the former case, he is bound to ask the jury for a verdict which formerly carried penalties once thought most grave, and which still involves deep moral reprobation, and, therefore, to ascertain in the fullest way all facts bearing upon the probable condition of mind of the deceased person. One of those facts, and the most important in the Hounslow case, is the kind of provocation Dr. Edwardes had received. If he had been guilty of an indecent assault, and had killed himself to escape a prosecution, then he was merely a criminal escaping by a second crime from the justice he had himself provoked—was, that is, a sane, though cowardly, human being—and the verdict ought to be one of Felo de se. If, on the other hand, he was a man suddenly and falsely accused of an offence peculiarly fatal to a doctor's prospects, abandoned by his partner, and with reason to suspect that he was the victim of an atrocious conspiracy, then it was natural that, under the influence of alarm, grief, and rage, he should temporarily lose his reason. Guilty men, no doubt, sometimes commit self-murder; but suicide, as a rule, is an escape from injustice, real or imaginary, and not from the law. It is true that juries now rarely return verdicts of Felo de se, and that the penalties which in a superstitious age appeared wise have been abolished; but the change has in no way affected the Coroner's duty. He has still to find out whether the deceased was a criminal or not, and cannot do it without knowing whether he had or had not been guilty of the offence the charge of which, it is argued in the court, may have upset his reason. He may be said to be trying the character of the dead, but that is precisely what he is bound to do, his character being essential evidence, not as to the method of his death, but as to the mental condition under which he chose that method. If it were not so, what is the object of inquiring, as every Coroner does, into the suicide's pecuniary affairs, into the letters he recently received, into everything in his history—including, in hundreds of cases, his hereditary descent—which may throw light upon the possibility that he was insane? Juries now assume that possibility to be a certainty in a way which speaks as strongly for their charity as for their unscrupulousness, but their reckless kindness does not affect the Coroner's legal function.

Indeed, we are not sure that a Coroner who was also a bit of an antiquarian might not defend himself for a far-reaching inquiry by another argument altogether. Is it quite certain that the privilege which Coroners' Juries have always assumed of distributing blame altogether outside the range of legal penalties, is not their right? They have certainly done it for ages, just as Grand Juries have "presented" all manner of nuisances; and, so long as the law of Deodand existed, were enabled sometimes to do it in a very effective and judicial way. They could and did levy a fine on the inanimate instrument of death, which its owner had to pay, and which was constantly inflicted so as to punish negligence, malice, or drunkenness, not punishable in any other way. If a gentleman drove over a child, and had not taken sufficient care, or shown sufficient sympathy, a "deodand" was always levied on the vehicle, which the owner was compelled to pay. As the deodand was optional with the Court, it was always considered in the neighbourhood that "So-and-So" had been fined for his conduct, which "sarved him right, for sure." The practice led to such abuses, and was so absurdly stretched, that the custom, which probably arose, as its name suggests, from the wish to levy a sum to be "given to God" in masses for the dead, was abolished on September 1st, 1846, but its existence shows that the idea of the Coroner's function was originally much wider than the Daily News suggests. Even now, if an unhappy girl commits suicide to escape shame, the jury invariably ascertains the seducer's name, and almost as invariably adds to its verdict some expression of severe personal censure. Why not? The best justification for the existence of an office which otherwise could be filled by a police-inspector is that the Inquest assures the people that nobody, however humble, can die "like a dog," that a violent death will be accounted for on sworn evidence, that there will be no suppression of the facts, and that the true reason for death will be discovered, even if the inquiry range far afield. Coroners are very often fussy, and still more often hurried and indifferent; but without them, the suspicions of foul play—now so rare in England, except where foul play has been practised—would be rife in every neighbourhood. There is a readiness in this country to credit charges of murder, and especially of the murder of children, which recalls the middle-ages, and proceeds, we do not doubt, from much the same cause,—the suspiciousness of ignorance. The Coroner's Court is full of gossip, but it is sifted gossip, and it is much better that gossip should be sifted there than that it should float about unsifted, to poison a whole countryside. The scene at Hounslow is most discreditable to the Hounslow people, who, when the first excitement was over, ought to have remembered that they were not appointed judges or jurors, or executioners either; but imagine, without an inquiry, the position of Dr. Whitmarsh and Mrs. Bignell! They might have been as innocent as doves, for a mob never gets at the whole truth, yet the one might be fined in his whole practice and prospects, and the other in every relic of character, by public opinion alone. Coroners, no doubt, defer to the public too much, as is natural, considering that they are the only elected Judges in England, and have to carry with them their jurors, who are always full of the public view of the case and of their own momentary importance; but, as a rule, when the verdict is reached, the facts are fairly understood, and the neighbourhood content. Coroners' Juries are constantly ridiculed, but they are very seldom blamed. The popular content may not be a result which would be worth the time of a High Court, and a heavy Bar, and a cloud of witnesses; but it is worth the time of that very irregular, but very efficient, little tribunal, a Coroner's Court, which constantly, with its gossippy way, sweeps away a rumour which otherwise would be miasmatic.

M. RENAN.

THERE is hardly so curious a study among the many curious autobiographical studies to be found in English literature, as that which M. Renan has recently given to the world in the Revue des Deux Mondes, under the title of "Memories of Infancy and Youth." It is much franker, if we remember Gibbon's autobiography accurately, than that of Gibbon, though it has a somewhat similar ring of calm self-complacency. Of course, there is nothing in M. Renan of Gibbon's old-fashioned pomp. Renan is, as he says, a man of his age, and the culture of his age ridicules the pomp of manner which the culture of Gibbon's age admired, though, by the way, there is a little of the same stiltedness in the records remaining from Renan's youth. The letter to his Director, in which he avowed his doubts and his inability to return to Saint Sulpice, has the air of a somewhat pompous young man. In it he magnificently reproaches God for having brought him into such straits, and takes credit to himself for the generous confidence which, in spite of this ill-treatment, he still placed,—though he did not continue to place it very long,—in God's providence and government. There is a note of grandiosity in this:—"In fact, Monsieur, when I contemplate the inextricable thread in which God has entangled me during the sleep of my reason and my liberty, at a time when I was following docilely the path which he traced before me, desolating thoughts spring up in my soul. . . . I have never doubted that a wise and good Providence guides the universe, guides me to conduct me to my goal. Nevertheless, it is not without effort that I have been able to give a formal contradiction to apparent facts. I often tell myself that common good-sense is hardly capable of appreciating the government of Providence, whether it be of humanity, or of the universe, or of the individual. The isolated consideration of facts would never lead one into optimism. It needs some courage to make this generous admission to God, in spite of experience. I hope never to hesitate on this point, and whatever may be the evils which Providence still reserves for me, I shall always believe that he leads me to my greatest possible good, by way of the least possible evil." However, this generous admission was not persevered in for any very long time. M. Renan had hardly emancipated himself from the rule of the Seminary, when he withdrew his confidence from Providence. With his belief in verbal inspiration, the whole of his theological creed collapsed at once. For him, everything appears to have depended on his power of retaining his belief that the Book of Judith was not a physical impossibility; that the second part of Isaiah was written by the same prophet who wrote the first part; that the Fourth Gospel is never in the smallest contradiction with the first three, nor any of these last with each other. So soon as this belief went, all belief went; and this though, so far as we know, the Roman Catholic Church has never yet defined the meaning it attaches to the word "inspiration," or the amount of those finite and human misconceptions the traces of which may be permitted to remain embodied amidst the evidences of an overruling divinity. Doubtless, the Protestant Church has always inclined to a much greater liberality in this matter than the great majority of Roman Catholic divines. Still, there seems to be very little excuse in the actual decisions of the Roman Church for M. Renan's eagerness—we may almost call it—to stake everything on the question of the verbal infallibility of Scripture. Yet he repeats again and again in these recollections of his youth that to detect Scripture in a single minute error was enough for him. "Let us assume that amidst the thousand skirmishes in which criticism and the apology of the orthodox faith have engaged, there have been some in which, by accident and contrary to appearances, the orthodox side is right; it is impossible that it is right a thousand times in its wager, and it is enough that it should be wrong in but a single instance for the thesis of inspiration to be annihilated." Of course if the Roman Church had ever committed itself absolutely to the rigid accuracy of every number and every human phrase in Scripture, clear evidence of a single error would be enough to extinguish belief in the infallibility of that Church. But the Roman theologians utterly deny that this is so, and at all events, M. Renan knew perfectly well that in other Christian communions there is ample liberty of criticism of the human documents in which revelation is embodied, and ample freedom to combine this liberty of criticism with a profound belief in the reality of that revelation. But in truth, if we may trust his account of himself, that opinion which he describes as being formed "by a sort of impersonal concretion outside oneself, of which one is in some manner nothing but the spectator," was at work almost immediately after his exit from the Catholic Church, forming itself into the most polished concrete of absolute sceptical impenetrability to supernatural influence imaginable by man. Supernatural influence has, indeed, no existence for M. Renan, except as a dream of the past, which stimulates more than anything else the play of his good-humoured irony and his genial contempt. It is true that he speaks of his first impressions of life after giving up Christianity as very desolate impressions,—impressions of a world from which all that was great had vanished away; but even this portion of his reminiscences does not convey to us any very deep feeling of reality. One gathers rather that it was the giving-way of the ecclesiastical framework of life that M. Renan missed, much more than his faith itself. "Like an enchanted circle," he says, "Catholicism embraces the whole life with so much force that, when one is deprived of it, everything seems fade and sad. I felt terribly like an exile (dépayé). The universe produced on me the effect of a dry, cold desert. From the moment that Christianity ceased to be the truth, the rest appeared to me frivolous, and hardly worth taking an interest in. The collapse of my life upon itself left me with a feeling of vacuity, like that which follows a fever or a disappointed love. The struggle which had entirely occupied me had been so intense that I now found everything narrow and contemptible. The world seemed to me mediocre and poor in virtue. What I saw appeared to me a fall, a decadence; I regarded myself as lost in an ant-hill of pigmies." That suggests to us more of the dejection which attends the loss of the sense of a mighty organisation behind one, than the loss of a mighty companionship within one. And, indeed, there is no evidence at all in these reminiscences that M. Renan ever did lose this conviction, or, indeed, that he ever held it as more than a creed vouched for by the highest dogmatic authority. It is true, he says in one place, "The idea that in abandoning the Church, I should remain faithful to Jesus, got full control of me; and if I had been capable of a belief in apparitions, I should certainly have seen Jesus saying to me, 'Abandon me, in order to be my disciple.'" But, as a matter of fact, whatever, as M. Renan so quaintly says, he might or might not have seen, if he had been "capable of" a particular belief,—which we take the liberty of remarking that he no more knows, than any of us know what we might see, if we thought something different from what we do think,—there is nothing approaching to the attitude of discipleship towards Christ visible either in this or any other of his writings known to the world. On the contrary, what one feels is that from the moment when he abandoned Christianity, M. Renan took Christ under his historical patronage, and made a sort of vow to himself to be a generous sceptic, courteous and benignant to his old Roman-Catholic masters, full of gracious sentiment to his former Lord, and constant to maintain the fascinating character of the childish faith which he had deliberately renounced. Unlike Gibbon, M. Renan would mingle suavity with all his scepticism, thereby, as he well knew, making it all the more effective. The scorn which is really kindly and appreciative, tells much more effectively than the scorn which is purely contemptuous. When you can afford frankly to praise,—as you praise a child,—there is no danger of your returning to adore. M. Renan certainly misled himself, if he supposed, as he tells us, that the papers, even of his earliest sceptical period, were in any sense Christian. No doubt, they expressed "a lively liking [goût] for the Evangelical ideal, and for the character of the Founder of Christianity," just as they also expressed a lively liking for the fathers of Saint Sulpice. So Wordsworth had undoubtedly a lively liking for the little girl at Goodrich Castle, who spoke of her dead brother and sister as still belonging to the little family of which she herself was the joy, and as lying under the grass to listen while she sat and sang to them. But the whole spirit of M. Renan's reminiscences, as well as of his better known writings, belies the notion that he ever carried a Christianity of any sort out of his Roman Catholicism. From the time he left the Roman Church, he lived apparently under a sort of honourable understanding with himself, that he would be tender and gentle and generous in his recognition of the better aspects of the religion he had thrown off. But every trace of obedience to it, of reverence for it, of inward piety towards it, disappeared finally from the moment when he escaped into the shade,—as he reminds himself that chrysalises do when they are about to assume the form of a butterfly,—to cast off his soutane, and take the dress of a layman.

Nothing is so disagreeable in these reminiscences as Renan's account of the change which his scepticism gradually made in his estimate of moral conduct. It is not, indeed, always easy to say when M. Renan is talking seriously, and when he is talking in a tone of deliberate badinage. He has a large fund of mild humour, and does not scruple to avail himself of it to mystify his readers. When, for instance, he tells us of his publisher's first visit to him, and of that imposing stamped agreement which M. Lévy brought with him, the very sight of which prevented M. Renan from making the few suggestions which were in his mind to obtrude, lest so beautiful a sheet of paper should be lost, he is no more serious than when he tells us how he had to renounce travelling by omnibus, because the conductors had ceased to regard him as a passenger of whom any account need be taken. Possibly he is not quite serious when he explains how pleasant it is in the East to go accompanied by an armed man whom one positively forbids to use his arms, or how much he should like to have the power of life and death over every one, in order not to use it; or how he should delight to keep slaves, solely in order to pet them and make them adore him. But if he is not serious when he tells us that after being emancipated from Christianity, he continued to live a strictly moral life only because no man should allow himself more than one breach of social convenances at the same time, and that, therefore, and therefore only, he can boast of having been loved only by four women, his mother, his sister, his wife, and his daughter; or again, when he says that he soon discovered the vanity of the virtue of chastity, "as of all others," and recognised especially that Nature does not in any way "attach any importance to man being chaste;" when he assures us that there is "something ridiculous in being virtuous, when one is not obliged to be so by any professional obligation;" that "the priest, recognising it as his object in life to be chaste, just as the soldier recognises it as his to be brave, is almost the only one who can, without ridicule, hold to the principles concerning which morality and fashion indulge themselves in such strange combats;" if M. Renan is not serious, we say, in all this part of his autobiography, we can only express our opinion that the net result is very nearly as bad as if he is. To write in this fashion, with the wish to mystify the world, and make every one believe that morality, like religion, is mere matter for badinage, is at least as bad as holding specifically that unprofessional virtue is rather ridiculous than otherwise. M. Renan says that a good deal of his gentleness is probably due to a bottom of indifference,—and, on the whole, we agree with him. Complacency with himself, a sentiment of kindness to the world at large, a deeply-rooted horror of the selfishness of exclusive friendships, a vague feeling of gratitude to some one, "without exactly knowing to whom I ought to be grateful,"—this last naturally enough, as M. Renan is deeply convinced that there is no appreciable trace of the action of any Will in the world superior to that of man,—such is the stock of moral virtues of which M. Renan has made salvage, after the wreck of his faith. In fine, they do not leave us with any very deep respect for this smooth, humorous, learned, industrious, imaginative man, who has slipped so easily along the "charming promenade" of his extremely sentimental existence.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

GREEK FEELING TOWARDS MR. GLADSTONE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have recently returned from a visit to Greece, and should like to record what I have gathered of the feeling of that country towards England. I was travelling with three friends, and previous to our leaving Athens on a short tour, Mr. Tricoupis kindly gave notice of our coming to the places lying in our way, adding that one of the party was a relation of Mr. Gladstone. The result was that in several of the towns and villages, Nauplia, Argos, Corinth, Krissa, Cirra, Delphi, and Arachova, we were received with an enthusiasm which fairly startled us. Much of it, doubtless, was shown in honour of Mr. Gladstone; but the local authorities took the opportunity of presenting addresses, which contained the warmest expressions of cordiality and gratitude towards England. They spoke of themselves as indebted to England for their freedom, their territory, and their prospects of development. In many cases, they had put themselves to much inconvenience to do us honour, sparing no effort to organise such a reception as they thought the occasion demanded. Indeed, it would be difficult to convey to others the impression we took away of a hearty and wide-spread friendliness existing among the Greeks towards England; but I thought myself bound in fairness to them to make some public mention of these facts, on reaching home.—I am, Sir, &c., Eton College, January 8th.

E. LYTTELTON.

THE MILES PLATTING CASE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—With no wish uselessly to prolong this correspondence, or quibble about trifles, may I say a few further words? I must, I think, be expressing the feelings of many of the laity of the Church of England, when I say that her present position is painfully humiliating. Comparing her noble potentiality with—in spite of all the unseen leaven of her earnest, widespread work—her present almost comparative impotence, am I wrong, when I say that many have been quietly, but not unconcernedly, looking on at her intestine struggles the last few years, and caring very little intrinsically for the comparative trivialities which have caused so much disturbance, have yet seen in them the germs of a vis viva, which, once set free, would renew her strength, and send the pulsations of a nobler life through her veins?

Thus, with no feelings of intolerance, but great sympathy with both sides, and without desire to deepen any soreness of feeling, or alienation of spirit, from our common Church, I, and perhaps many fellow-Churchmen, see in the course Bishop Jackson has followed, and Bishop Fraser has been blamed for not taking, a disappointment of our hopes that no patched peace would result—no hypodermic injection of Episcopal morphia be given, as it were—but that in greater earnestness, born of her greater need, the present difficulties and weakness of the Church would be bravely met, and resolutely overcome.

In this, I believe—not consciously with any bigotry or blindness of heart, but with devotion to the Church's ideal of the position she claims to occupy, but does not—may be found some of the approval which has been accorded to the Bishop of Manchester's conduct, and some of the regret which has followed that of the Bishop of London.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Hanley, Staffordshire, January 14th. FREDERICK HAIGH.

[Mr. Haigh appears to be very much in earnest, but not a little mysterious or obscure.—Ed. Spectator.]

SIR E. STRACHEY ON RITUALISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Allow me to question the accuracy of the terms used by Sir Edward Strachey. He speaks of a "reconstitution" of the National Church as the aim of the Ritualists, and instances the Mass and Auricular Confession as the doctrines which they are bringing back. If Sir Edward will look into his Prayer-book, he will find that a certain order of men is set apart to whom is confided the exclusive right of celebrating the Lord's Supper and pronouncing Absolution. Whether or no we use the terms, the whole principle of the Mass and Auricular Confession is involved in this provision. If you take it away—and a short Act of Parliament, providing that henceforth all ministers shall be ordained according to the form provided for the Ordering of Deacons, and not otherwise, would take it away—you will "re-constitute" the National Church. Whether you would then "comprehend the Nonconformists," seeing that they do not wish to be comprehended, is an open question. But I altogether protest against the application of the term "progress" to a move in this direction. To a large body of Churchmen, it would be a "retrogression" to the time before the Day of Pentecost.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A. H. W.

THE BORDESLEY PATRONAGE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Coker Adams has probably trusted to the "Clergy List" in his correction of my presumed error. There is, however, no doubt that the present patronage at Bordesley rests with the Trustees, from one of whom my information as to the fact was directly received.—I am, Sir, &c.,

F. SIMCOX LEA.

Tedstone Delamere Rectory, Worcester, January 15th.

CONSECRATED GROUND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me, as a perplexed Nonconformist, to ask through your columns a question about "consecrated ground?" What is the reason why in these days pious and intelligent Churchmen attach apparently such importance to the consecration of the mere soil of their graveyards? Of old, in ages of strife and violence, the awe which surrounded consecrated things and places protected them from violation, and the cause of order and civilisation was largely served by it. There can be no doubt, too, that consecration was supposed to be a protection against the demons, to whose ravages we poor outcasts beyond the sacred pale were held to be peculiarly obnoxious. It would be an insult to suppose that this superstition survives in the pious and intelligent persons to whom I refer. But I should be thankful for information as to the real advantages which they are supposed to gain. Do they imagine that those whose remains lie in consecrated ground enjoy any privileges which we poor exiles miss, who lie in the profane ground on the other side of the path? Do Churchmen who are buried at sea rest uneasily in the depths? Once, we Nonconformists used to be consigned by charitable Churchmen to the "uncovenanted mercies of God." The uncharitable and the weak brethren of the high Ritual school would not allow us so much. But we always felt, with much composure, that we had a rich portion even in the uncovenanted mercies of a God who is love. But we hear little of these uncovenanted mercies now. Let us hope that they have passed, not from Churchmen's lips only, but from their minds and hearts.

It is time that the fiction of "consecrated earth" should follow them,—as if Christ had not consecrated every clod. It is strange, indeed, that Christian Churchmen should be so eager thus to entrench their graves from chance contact with the body of a Christian Nonconformist, when a chance tomb in a garden was the scene both of the burial and the resurrection of their Lord. I am persuaded that Churchmen do not fully appreciate the measure in which, by persisting in attaching these utterly unsubstantial, and, I might add cruel, distinctions to Christianity, they cause the infidel to blaspheme, and hinder the work of Christ's Gospel in the world.—I am, Sir, &c., J. BALDWIN BROWN.

[Is it true, that most Churchmen are eager "to entrench their graves from chance contact with the body of a Christian Nonconformist?" We imagined that "most Churchmen" were in favour of the Burial Act, which gives Nonconformists the right of burying in Churchyards, even using their own service.—Ed. Spectator.]

MR. DENING AND CHURCH MISSIONS IN JAPAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You so often express interest in Asiatic affairs, that you will probably not object to inform your readers of an event which promises well for Christianity in Japan, and in Buddhist countries generally. A distinguished Missionary of the Church Missionary Society has just been ejected from his office in Hakodade, in consequence of his open refusal to teach Christianity any longer on the doctrinal basis of the lower Evangelical School, which holds that mankind is born under the curse of an hereditary immortality of sin and misery, through Adam's transgression, and that the unsaved part of mankind is destined to everlasting torment in hell, their natural immortality securing the eternity of the infliction. Mr. Dening, chiefly as the result of Biblical study under the condition of close contact with the educated classes of Japan, has come to think that Christianity has for its object, in the Divine Incarnation, to bestow renewal of character and immortal life on all of mankind who do not reject the proffered boon, the ultimate issue of wilful and persistent rejection being, in fact, that awful nirvana, or dissolution of individual existence, which Scripture threatens, under the name of "everlasting destruction." The effect of these persuasions is not to shake, but to confirm, men's faith in the main doctrines of orthodox Christianity, both on their formidable and gracious sides.

But the Directors of the Church Missionary Society, summoning Mr. Dening to England, have just determined, on the 8th instant, after allowing him one interview with the Ecclesiastical (or Clerical) Sub-Committee, to "disconnect" him from their service forthwith, without granting even a hearing by the General Committee, because contrary to their custom. Even the Sanhedrim did not stone Stephen until they had heard him, much less did they resolve to put an end to his mission on the recommendation of a Rabbinical sub-committee. However, the deed is done, and January 8th will be a red-letter day in the Missionary calendar of Asia, for the work then performed will precipitate the inevitable reconstruction of the Sectarian Missionary Societies. From the whole world of thinking Christendom and Heathendom will arise, let us hope, a speedy demand for the modification of these organisations, which, notwithstanding their many eminent merits, entrust the central control over the business of teaching Christianity to Asia, with its 800,000,000 of souls, to Boards ("I speak as a man") who seem to be incapable of understanding Buddhism, or of presenting the Gospel in a quite credible and Scriptural form to the human race. The London Missionary Society is already exceptionally tolerant.

The qualifications of Mr. Dening add a peculiar emphasis to the resolve of the Church Missionary Society, since they would scarcely, except under the fixed determination that all their Missionaries shall teach the doctrine of endless torment to the Buddhists (one-third of the human race), have sacrificed so valuable a Missioner. Mr. Dening's dismissal means this, or it means nothing. He has obtained by ten years' practice an unusual command of the literary language of Japan, and has translated such books as Canon Mozley's "Lectures on Miracles" into the dialect of the upper classes of scholars, besides commanding the popular ear by a fluent use of the vernacular. There seems to be a general agreement that an abler and more hard-working Missionary is not found on the roll of this Society.

Now comes the question,—Shall the holding and teaching of such beliefs as Mr. Dening's any longer be regarded as penal? Nearly all England will reply to the Church Missionary Society, that they shall not be so regarded. The interests of Christianity in Asia are at stake. If the doctrinal programme of this Committee be insisted on, the Buddhists will cry again, as they did formerly to Xavier, "Give us our own nirvana rather, as the summum bonum." And they will reject Christ, the life of the world, and receive Herbert Spencer instead.

A strong Church of England Committee is being formed at Cambridge, founded on the simple demand for toleration of such beliefs as Mr. Dening's, with a view of collecting funds to enable him to resume his interrupted work in Japan. It is certain that there is not one word in the authorised standards of the Church of England forbidding him to hold his interpretations of Holy Scripture; and the Bishops at home are believed to be unanimously in favour of comprehension. Surely this is a case, all things considered, at least as urgently demanding toleration as the Ritualistic variations of Miles Plating. I am glad, therefore, to know that gentlemen so distinguished as Professor Stokes, the Dean of Peterborough, Dr. Swainson, Master of Christ's College, the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, and others, intend to give the movement for toleration a decided support.—I am, Sir, &c.,

EDWARD WHITE.

35 Carleton Road, Tufnell Park, London, N., January 15th.

THE LATE MR. BUNNEY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You have referred more than once in your columns to the recent death of Mr. Bunney, the painter of Mr. Ruskin's large picture of "St. Mark's, Venice," now at the Venice Exhibition. Will you allow me to mention that some of his friends are collecting a sum of money to be presented to his widow, as a gift expressive of their sympathy for her, and of the value they set upon the kind of work to which his life was devoted? Mr. Ruskin has given £50, and the P.R.A. is also a contributor. To any of your readers who may wish to have them, I shall be glad to send further particulars. Mrs. Bunney, I may add, has now sent to England the greater part of the drawings and sketches of Venice left by her husband. These are at 148 New Bond Street.—I am, Sir, &c., R. B. LITCHFIELD.

4 Bryanston Street, Portman Square, January 15th.

BOOKS.

MR. CRAIK'S LIFE OF SWIFT.*

SEVEN years have gone by since the publication of the first volume of Forster's Life of Swift called for comment in this journal. That biography carried us over the most important period of his career. At the close of it, Swift, then about forty-five years old, was in the pride of his intellect and strength. His genius did not come to maturity very early, and had he died at twenty-seven, his name in our day would be unknown. When three years older, however, he vindicated his claim to humour by The Battle of the Books, and before he was forty he published The Tale of a Tub, which seems to have been slowly maturing for some years. This great satire, as shameless as it is brilliant, and which amazed Swift in his old age for the intellect it displayed, appeared in 1704. Though published anonymously, the authorship was not unknown, and had the writer's purpose been to destroy his prospects in the Church, he could not have achieved his purpose more effectually. We shall have more to say about this presently. Meanwhile, following the contents of Mr. Forster's volume, we are carried to the time when Swift, a born politician, deserted the Whigs for the Tories, and made so striking a figure in London as the associate of Harley and St. John. The book, therefore, includes what the reader will regard as the most interesting period of his life, since it was at this time the "Journal to Stella" was written, and the acquaintance formed with Hester Vanhomrigh, destined hereafter to be so tragical. There are obvious faults in Mr. Forster's narrative, faults of arrangement, and, to our thinking, errors of judgment; but the interest of the story was great, and it is impossible not to regret that the hand that commenced it was unable to bring it to a conclusion.

Mr. Craik has many estimable qualities as a biographer. He, too, like his predecessor, presents his subject on the best side, and passes lightly over the traits which make Swift's character so perplexing, and at times so offensive. He wastes no words, loses no important points, and expresses his opinions clearly, though not always in the purest English. We do not say the defects of style are glaring. This indeed is far from being the case, but what strikes us throughout is a certain heaviness of movement, a want of the elasticity and the brightness of touch which serve to carry a reader over old ground with the heartiest goodwill. The author's judgment may be sounder in a few instances than Mr. Forster's—in many important cases, we differ strongly from both,—but his pages, unlike Forster's, are sometimes just a little dull. A fault like this is like a foggy atmosphere. You cannot put your hand upon it, but you feel its depressing influence.

To write a really satisfactory life of Swift is one of the hardest tasks in literature. In many respects, Mr. Craik is extremely fortunate. He has had access to all the materials collected by

* The Life of Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin. By Henry Craik, M.A. With Portrait. London: J. Murray. 1882.

Mr. Forster; various unpublished letters and manuscripts have been placed in his hands, and Mr. Elwin, "whose learning, great as it is, is not greater than the generosity with which he comes to the help of others working in the same field," has not only placed at the writer's disposal the results of his own research, but "has given invaluable advice and aid in regard to some of the most serious difficulties of Swift's life." And, as far as we are able to judge, the biographer has spared no pains in working out his subject. The investigation has been thorough, and the result, so far as concerns the knowledge of facts, is entirely satisfactory. Swift's life, however, is full of perplexity, and in such cases we do not always find that Mr. Craik's investigations make the dark places lighter. We are asked at the outset to sympathise with Swift, and admit readily that a biographer unable to do so is in a large measure unfitted for his task, and that the reader should be also ready to take account of the Dean's circumstances, and still more of the morbid nature that made those circumstances intolerable. On this point, Mr. Craik writes with good sense, though possibly with too much readiness to condone the faults of his hero:—

"If we cannot condone much to the child born and nurtured in dependence, taken from his mother's care before he could know its value; educated under the eye of a stern and grudging uncle; to one whose opening career was broken by the troubles of his country, and whose spirit, to the last degree passionate and impetuous, was harnessed to the methodical routine of a timid and somewhat pedantic master, unfit to take the measure of Swift's powers, but disposed to look upon their occasional assertion as the unwarranted, although, perhaps, excusable eccentricities of an ill-trained youth; if to all this, and to the fact that the very strength and unruliness of his powers were a source of uneasiness and of foreboding to Swift, we are not prepared to excuse much, then the biography of Swift must bring to us not a strain of vivid human interest, but the perpetual irritation that powers, always great, but often restless, morbid, and undisciplined, must produce."

To this the writer adds that, in addition to his other trials, Swift had ever before him the foreboding of mental darkness.

There was another man of robust genius in that eighteenth century who suffered constantly from the same foreboding, whose bodily condition through many years produced a deplorable melancholy, and whose fight with fortune was more protracted and more severe than Swift's. Johnson had not even a "stern and grudging uncle" to start him on the road of life—a very unjust estimate, we think, of Godwin—nor another uncle, upon Godwin's failure, to carry on the same liberality; neither had he a patron like Temple, who, whatever his faults may have been, was the means of bringing Swift at an early age into contact with public men and public affairs. Johnson was as proud a man as Swift, and had far more indignities to suffer; but he never lost his self-respect, never acted so that the reader of his life can say, as he must say of the Dean of St. Patrick's, that half his troubles were of his own making. Sympathy, therefore, may be left for Swift, who, like Johnson, had a deep well of feeling in his nature; but it will not be one-sided sympathy, and there are passages in his eccentric life which it is impossible to treat with the leniency demanded by Mr. Craik.

We are not disposed to blame Swift with extreme severity for forsaking the Whigs for the Tories, though the time of his doing so was unfortunate. He had been fed on promises that were not kept, and, after doing for the party what no other living man could have done, was left out in the cold when Somers was Lord President, and the Whigs' power at its height. It was not, however, until the fall came that Swift openly deserted the camp, and passed over to Harley and St. John. On September 7th, 1710, he arrived in London, and was heartily welcomed by the Whigs. The elections began in October, and it was evident everywhere that the Tories would win the day. On the 4th of the month, Swift was introduced to Harley; on the 7th, he was treated like an old friend, asked to dinner, and called by his Christian name. Harley had found a master, and Swift a friend. It is unlikely that, if the Whigs had given Swift the Bishopric he asked for, he would have crossed over to their opponents; and still less likely, had he gained the object of his mission. He had been sent to London long before, by his clerical brethren in Ireland, to obtain the remission of First Fruits and Tithes, that had been granted to the English, and had received nothing but empty words. Since the Whigs had failed him, he would now try the Tories. The new position seems to have been accepted with the heartiest good-will, and Swift exerted his wonderful art as a pamphleteer to decry Marlborough and the war. For temporary purposes, he was a dangerous antagonist. No one living had his humour, his terseness of expression, his skill in demolishing a foe. And we may add that, when resolved to carry his point, not a scribbler in Grub Street surpassed Swift in mendacity. Personalities were his weapons in prose, as they were Pope's in verse. What he had to do was to make his foes ridiculous, knowing that ridicule may win the day, when argument fails. "I do not love," he says, "to see personal resentment mix with public affairs;" but personal feeling, however misapplied, is better than the spurious indignation devised for party purposes. Swift called himself a High-Church Whig, a creed as anomalous as that of a Tory-Democrat; and his politics were never dissociated from his position as a clergyman. At heart, he was thoroughly sincere in his defence of the Church, though his methods of defending it were tortuous; and in joining the Tories, he was moved, we think, partly by ambition, partly by resentment, but chiefly by the fear that, according to the cry so common in Anne's reign, the Church was in danger. It was not Christianity, but religion by Act of Parliament, that Swift defended. Dissent was hateful to him, scandal was to be avoided, and outward forms respected. If Martin cannot possess the whole kingdom as God and Nature intended, sectaries like Peter and Jack must not be suffered to flaunt their claims too publicly. Mr. Craik, by the way, in estimating the Tale of a Tub, disagrees with Swift's previous biographers in regarding the account of these three typical characters, not only as the most offensive part of the tale, in which most readers will agree with him, but also as the weakest. He is right when he adds:—

"The most sacred mysteries of Christianity are treated with a callous indifference, of whose effect Swift was probably utterly unconscious. In writing the Tale of a Tub, Swift clearly gave himself a freedom in regard to religious matters which he never afterwards assumed. He never of set purpose adopted the tone of the sceptic, and such natural scepticism as was inherent in him he afterwards tamed into silence. But in the Tale of a Tub he treated religious matters not freely only, but with what to ordinary minds appears irreverence. This absolute unconsciousness of the effect of his own words, this impervious insensibility in uttering things from which most men would recoil, is seen still more notably at a later period of Swift's life, in that coarseness, at once so noisome and apathetic, which has left on his later pages a stain of another kind. The same characteristic, which it is difficult to disconnect from the forebodings of mental disease that cast a shadow on his life, now led him to stir to exasperation, and yet all unconsciously, the religious sentiments of those whose Church he desired to defend. But he neither weighed the consequences, nor could he afterwards understand the sensation that he caused."

When Mr. Craik goes on to say that undue weight was given by Swift's critics "to the scattered pages that seemed to treat too lightly of religious symbols," he apparently forgets his admission that the most sacred mysteries of Christianity are treated with a callous indifference.

From this topic let us pass to one which must always have the greatest interest in the story of Swift's life. Yet it might be unreasonable to take up once more a subject so familiar as the loves of Vanessa and Stella, were it not that Mr. Craik has, we conceive, formed an unjust view of Hester Vanhomrigh, and a novel, but wholly inadequate, view of the "mysterious and undefined bond" that existed between Stella and Swift. Let us take the Vanessa story first. It is the shortest and most tragical. She was a strikingly beautiful girl of seventeen when she first met Swift, at her mother's house, a man old enough to be her father. At that very time, Esther Johnson was paying her last visit to London, but to quote Mr. Forster's words:—"Swift had not named to her these new acquaintances. She was ignorant of them and of their mode of life, or the company they kept, when Swift mentioned them to her, nearly three years later." To this we may add, that though afterwards, in his "Journal to Stella," Swift often alludes to "Mrs. Van.," there is, considering the writer's loquacity upon other subjects, a mysterious silence about the daughter. That Swift, who claimed her as a pupil, as he had before claimed Stella, flirted with Vanessa after his fashion, we have no doubt whatever. The girl had intellect, passion, ambition, and Swift, the companion of statesmen and well known as a wit, might readily make an impression on such a nature. It was for him to see the danger, not for her; for him to guard against it, before precautions were too late. As far as we are able to judge, he did nothing of the kind. We acquit Swift, as his biographer asks us to do, of "a vulgar and thoughtless infidelity." They are not terms to apply to one whose love was of too strange a character to be compared with the affections or follies of ordinary men. He had not forgotten the poor, lonely Stella, he had only found a more immediate attraction in the society and tuition of Vanessa. He was conscious, too, as Scott has pointed out, that the attachment to the younger pupil was of a nature that could not be gratifying to her predecessor. No one can read the story without seeing that what Mr. Craik calls "the tangle of circumstance" in the Vanessa affair was woven by Swift himself. He had played with the girl's feelings in London, acting as her mentor, and using those little arts which indicate the closest intimacy; and when, eventually, she followed him to Dublin, the friendship, to quote Mr. Craik's words, "was suffered to drift on, but all outward signs of it were most carefully dissembled." Yet, according to current report, when Vanessa retired from Dublin to her property near Celbridge, the Dean often visited the poor woman in this retirement, when he would read or write verses in her company. Swift's conduct in this affair is blamed as foolish, but not unnatural. He should have crushed Vanessa's friendship at once, we are told, but did not, because it flattered his weakest side. "It had begun in literary guidance; it was strengthened by flattery; it lived on a cold and almost stern repression, fed by confidences as to literary schemes, and by occasional literary compliments; but it never came to have a real hold over Swift's heart." The point of all the writer's argument comes to this: Swift is blamed for irresolution, blamed, too, for his most unfortunate poem; but, on the whole, forgetful of the Dean's age and power of fascination, forgetful of Vanessa's susceptible age when the first seeds of love were sown, Swift is excused, and the principal blame thrown upon his victim. We think the view a mistaken one. And Mr. Craik's story of Stella seems to us almost equally unsatisfactory. Our space will not allow us to follow it. We believe, with the biographer, that there are strong grounds for accepting the report of a secret marriage, but the reason assigned for it is astounding. We all know the surmises broached by former writers on the subject, and have felt that Swift may have been more unfortunate than culpable. But Mr. Craik's most prominent suggestion, if it be a true one, leaves the Dean utterly without excuse. He admits that no woman's constancy could have stood a harder trial; that Stella's good name was in danger; that the mere marriage ceremony which, altering nothing in their lives, left them apart as before, was a mockery; and that her only hope in accepting Swift's conditions "must have been that some day, if posterity should suspect her honour, the eventual announcement of her marriage might prove its suspicions baseless."

And admitting all this, Mr. Craik adds, by way of explaining Swift's conduct, and apparently excusing it,—

"What, then, were the motives that prompted, on Swift's side, a compromise so strange, and in what mood did each accept it? Swift had doubtless at one time looked on Stella as his future wife. But such thoughts had now passed away. Disappointment was pressing heavily on him. Defeat had just befallen him, and he had not yet recast his weapons for a new fight, or roused his genius to new efforts. His friends were at a distance, some of them scattered in exile. He felt himself thrust, perhaps permanently, into obscurity. It was scarcely wonderful that thoughts which might have been cherished in other days, when his hopes were high, should now grow dim and fade. He had striven, too, for pecuniary independence, as a means by which he might make himself free in action; and the fruit of his long efforts was a burden of debt. We have seen how, prompted by the memory of his early days, and the endless embarrassments with which scanty means torture a proud man, Swift had fixed for himself, with almost morbid pertinacity, a rigid rule of parsimony. That parsimony involved no sordid avarice, because at this very time he was sinking some of his means in a gift to his parish. But it determined him never to entangle either himself, or one dear to him, in the endless petty cares of domestic poverty."

The suggestion that poverty was the cause that led Swift to inflict an intolerable wrong upon the woman whom he loved strikes us as ludicrous, and is almost answered by the fact that at his death he left behind him several thousand pounds. And what was his "burden of debt," when he returned to Ireland in 1714? According to his reckoning, £1,000 would have covered it all—his income was £700 or £800 a year—and Stella, whose wise economy was as remarkable as her gracious liberality, would have laughed at any pecuniary sacrifice to relieve a temporary embarrassment. Had she not sacrificed her life to Swift, given up to him her happiness, risked for him her reputation? The mysteriousness of Swift's conduct to Vanessa and to Stella is not made plainer by Mr. Craik; and, on the whole, we think Sir Walter Scott formed a saner view of the subject than more recent biographers.

In his eighteenth and final chapter, Mr. Craik gives an estimate of Swift's character. The Dean had many noble and attaching qualities. If he loved power, he liked to exercise it for the good of others; if he insulted acquaintances and was a good hater, he was a warm and constant friend; he did good by stealth, and in acts of charity spared no personal labour; he exacted much from dependants, but he gave much in return; he was, however, a mass of contradictions, and while one action excites admiration, another instantly calls for loathing and disgust. In religious matters, he was at once the narrowest of bigots and the most zealous of Churchmen. Mr. Craik thinks his mission was to preach against cant, and that his nature was in the highest sense religious; but of devout feeling there is not, we believe, a trace in Swift's writings, nor an indication in his life, and he regarded all religious earnestness as cant. His writings are not tainted with impurity, but in language they are inexpressibly nasty, and in their persistent effort to degrade human nature must be pronounced grossly immoral. It is his consummate humour that preserves Swift's name from corruption. The world forgives much to its humourists, and in this line the author of Gulliver's Travels is not to be surpassed.

Mr. Craik deserves the thanks of the public for the careful manner in which he has achieved a highly difficult task. If we frequently find reason to differ from him the disagreement is probably inevitable, for Swift's life abounds with doubtful points, and his biographer has endeavoured in all cases to form an independent judgment.

MR. THOM'S SERMONS.*

THIS volume is very unlike nineteen out of every score, perhaps we might safely indicate a much larger proportion, of the volumes of sermons that issue from the press, for its contents are evidently the production of a mind that has lived a long life in meditation rarely remitted for any considerable period, on the things of the religious life. You cannot open the volume anywhere without meeting with proof that the atmosphere of Christianity has saturated the mind of the writer, and moulded his thought into sympathy with itself. Mr. Thom is well known as a minister who does not belong to any of the orthodox Churches, but it would be very difficult to find amongst those who do belong to one or other of those Churches, so profound a grasp of the spiritual aspects of Christianity, and so living a delineation of them. There is no sign in this volume that the destructive criticism of any of the negative schools of theology or exegesis, has exerted any material influence over Mr. Thom's mind. He finds in St. John's Gospel some of the most striking of his Christian lessons, and never appears to suggest the smallest doubt of its authenticity or truth. It is most likely that if we had here any discussion by Mr. Thom of those intellectual assumptions which underlie our belief in Christ, and without the steady grasp of which the moral authority which Christ exerts over us would be sure gradually to fade away, we should differ from him widely. But this sort of analysis is not within the scope of his present volume, which is devoted wholly to the delineation of the Christian temper and life,—not to any analysis of the basis of conviction which must more or less form itself within that Christian temper and life, if these are to hold their own against a host of objections both practical and intellectual;—and as the life itself is, after all, the chief end, and the creed which must grow or wither with it, mainly the means, we cannot deny that Mr. Thom's volume keeps before us the final cause of revelation, while ignoring, in any dogmatic sense, theology itself.

It is impossible, in any strict sense, to review such a book, or to give anything more than occasional specimens of the insight and help which it contains. But this we may promise our readers, that if they are struck with any of the passages we may cite, they will find other passages as striking in almost every page. Let us, as critics, begin with a sermon on the faults and duties of critics, which is full of striking comment, all growing out of the very spirit of our Lord. Mr. Thom is very little satisfied with the tendency of the present day to extract from everybody their opinion of everybody else, simply for the sake of gratifying the curiosity of the rest of the world. He would probably warn the American "interviewer," for instance, that by eliciting so many opinions which would not otherwise be given on the condition of American or European society, he often does more to precipitate the formation of a false public opinion, than to crystallize the tendencies of one that is sound, natural, and healthy:—

* Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ. Discourses by John Hamilton Thom. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1883.

"Contrasted with this judging spirit, there is a happy, genial, modest, receptive frame of mind, open to all influences that come—not slighting what a man is, because of something else that he is not. It takes whatever of good any one can give, without the spiteful return of defining the other good things that he has not, and cannot give. It is open to men as it is to God—ready to entertain angels unawares—thankful for such benignant influence as they have the power of breathing—willing to receive of everybody's fullness, eager to judge no one. Unfortunately, to this mellow, grateful, and gracious cast of mind, the tone and temper of common society is constantly applying an irritating treatment. This calm, candid, uncritical, thankfully receptive frame, a man cannot preserve without setting his face against a multitude of questioners. We are daily tempted and solicited into rash and self-fettering judgments. The mental interests of society are too few to suffer personal character and faculty to remain uncanvassed. Conversation runs on persons rather than on things, and you are directly asked for an opinion. Great evils come out of such questions. In the first place, you may have no opinion, nor be entitled to have one. Your opinions of men slowly and silently grow up in you; and scarcely has this process begun when you are suddenly asked to define them. Yet it is probable, such are our habits, that you will not have the simplicity to resist the snare. You will be hurried into precipitate judgment—mere first impressions will be hardened into permanent conclusions—you will presumptuously speak of the deep inner nature or unknown capacity of a man from slight and insufficient hints—you will commit yourself to some defined view of him, and never again have the free privilege of open, candid, receptive intercourse unbiassed by your own rash judgment. There is a rudeness and irreverence of nature in thus assuming to judge any man. It is a barren attitude. When we have once judged a man, we have as it were closed his access to us at all unexpected avenues. We are pledged to one view of him—he is no more an infinite possibility to us—we have measured him, calculated our expectations from him, and never more can look to him with the freshness and reverence of an undefined hope."

What critic can read that passage, and not remember with a pang the many hasty sentences which he has passed on others,—some of them sentences which very mischievously prepossessed the world against men of great moral and intellectual resource, whose usefulness was thereby materially injured; but much oftener, probably, sentences which have prepossessed the critic's own mind against light and help which might otherwise have entered it? At the same time, we think that Mr. Thom's last sentence somewhat exaggerates the influence of premature judgments over minds of any candour. More and more, as we hope, are critics to be found who are not ashamed to take back their false prejudgments, and to admit, with something even of penitent enthusiasm, the greatness of their error, in having sometime underrated a man of power. The logic of critics is no more inflexible than the logic of common life. Criticism would be a fatal pursuit, indeed, if it were so. Still, as Mr. Thom says, it is very much to be desired that we should cultivate the simplicity which refuses to be dragged into hasty judgments. "The habit of society in these things is, in fact, a constant subornation of rash judgments and an irreverent temper. To look upon ourselves as standards of measure is to cherish smallness, presumption, and contempt." Fortunately, there is nothing with which the better criticism of the day is more deeply imbued than the spirit of self-distrust,—the desire to find any trace of what is above the critic, and not to dwell too exclusively on what seems below him.

Let us pass next to the very fine sermon on "Circumstance, 'the unspiritual god,'" as Byron called it, though it was a god to which Byron sacrificed as much as any poet who ever lived. It would be difficult to expose the falsehood of this worship with more subtle moderation than Mr. Thom displays in the following passage:—

"Reliance on Circumstance, on 'the unspiritual god,' has for its natural fellow the common system of excuses which finds the explanation of evil in the element of temptation. But temptation is an occasion, not a cause, and no more an occasion for shameful transgression than for magnanimous duty. Since the first man said, 'It was the woman did it,' the men of Adam's mould have not been ashamed to acknowledge that, when tempted, in their own soul was no virtue, in their own will no resistance. If temptations justify sin, then the spiritual life, and Christianity, and man's strength in God, are words that signify nothing; for no man could sin if no man was tempted, and only in resistance to the tempter can the spirit's allegiance have existence or exercise. A Christian man, indeed, when most strict with himself, will yet be tender to another, not knowing all the case; but what if our tenderness relax that other's strength,—though it is not tenderness, but only looseness and remissness, that will have this effect. Let our tenderness spring freely from our justice, our humility, our self-knowledge, our generous insight, but never from a relaxed holiness, an ungodly concession to the might of Circumstance. No reasonable man will deny that Circumstance ought to be considered, and wisely marshalled, and tenderly dealt with,—but every spiritual man will deny that it ought to rule, or that it ever can belong the right to thrive and justify. It was not denied that man lives by bread, when it was declared that he lives not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God, by every inspiration from on high, every holy prompting, every exalting hope, every sense of responsibility to the Source of our being, and that from these is drawn an order of strength that comes not from food or wine. 'I have meat to eat that ye know not of.' The same spirit of outward dependence is shown in the undue importance attached to what is called Experience. It would appear a general belief that all valuable wisdom comes from an extensive acquaintance with men and things, and knowledge of life as it is more to be trusted than the great primal teachers, the authoritative voices in our nature, the original shapings and directions of our being, the whispers and leadings of God. 'The wisdom that is from above,' the wisdom from within, is a fountain of goodness, 'full of mercy and of all good fruits.' It would not be untrue to say, that in all essential things Experience is the teacher only of fools, of those who have gone astray through turning a deaf ear to the voice of a prior and more legitimate teacher. There are invaluable lessons of life—much skill, much helpfulness, knowledge of where the need is and sympathy should be—which Experience alone can supply; but alas for him who has got his virtues from his experience of life, for then his first experiences must have been of wrong-doing, and his later experience but the corrector of errors, or of vices, through penal consequences. To our spiritual being the experience of life is not the fountain of right, the source of law, though it ever confirms and seals with its testimony the teachings of nature and of God. In these fundamental things, he who, constrained by experience, at last 'comes to himself,' has first fled from himself; he who, coerced by trouble, reduced to the coarse and bitter husks of a wasted life, says at last, 'I will arise, and go to my Father,' has first known, and been obdurate to, his father's voice. That 'Honesty is the best Policy' is a teaching of experience; but it was well said, that he who has waited for this experience to teach him honesty, or who is honest only in the faith of this experience, the first began his course in knavery, and the second remains a knave at heart. It is not knowledge of the world that makes a child's heart shrink from meanness, falsehood, dishonour; this wisdom is not borrowed from experience, but that which shapes experience when it is best shaped. It would be dangerous error to inculcate on the young, as a lesson in modesty, such deference to older experience as might weaken their reliance on the primal teachings of God. In no way has spiritual life been so much dwarfed, severed from its feeding spring, as by the substitution of the wisdom of man for the fresh inspirations of God. In truth, in the highest things experience of life is not our guide, but rather the touchstone of our weakness, for we all degenerate, if not from the attainments, certainly from the ideals of our youth. The best man is worse than his thought; and the worst has not extinguished the inciting light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Experience is a mighty helper, but sometimes a timid counsellor, an unspiritual leader."

It would be difficult to preach a more weighty lesson, even to the politician, than is contained in this sermon on the dangers of trusting to circumstance alone for the regeneration of human society. But not even in such sermons as this do we find Mr. Thom at his highest. The kind of subject on which he speaks with the most wisdom and the most power is such a one as the singular absence of joy from the religious life of the world. The sermon on "Spiritual Counterparts to Temptation and Despondency," in which Mr. Thom insists that Christ's life was, in its essence, not so much the life of sorrow, as the life which taught what joy there was in the heart of sorrow truly borne; not so much the life of affliction, as the life of power elicited from affliction; not so much the life of humiliation, the life of the Cross, as the life of him who could transmute humiliation and the Cross into the symbol of glory and triumph,—will give our readers the best conception of Mr. Thom's unique power as a Christian preacher. We will give a single passage:—

"The world is full, not of suffering only, nor of sympathy with suffering—for these are from God and for good—but of a much worse thing—of depression, of fear, of sighing and lamentation, of the weakness and the piteousness of suffering. Even sympathy has so narrowed its meaning, that it hardly conveys any other idea than that of sensibility to another's sorrow; and to rejoice with those who rejoice is considered the part rather of constitutional good-heartedness, of natural than of spiritual fellowship. Men will detail their small troubles as if there was no sin in adding to the burdens of existence, no shame or selfishness in needlessly saddening the hearts of the tender; or if they do not speak, they carry into public the air of their most private cares; their sad countenances proclaim their woes, and present silent petitions for compassion. . . . But it is said that Christ was characteristically a Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief. Yes; but interpret this aright. He was a Man of Sorrows in no sense which implies that fear, or distrust, or spiritual lassitude had entered into him. A good man will bear all men's griefs, until he has borne them away. Sorrows, disappointments, were around him, moulding him on all sides, the element in which his strength was made, his life lived; but love, faith, hope, the joy of the soul in God, were the inspirations from which they came, and to which they rose. It is entirely a false impression that the designation, a Man of Sorrows—one indeed of no authoritative application to the individual person of Christ—describes the hue of his sentiments. It is spiritually impossible that one who led his life of love and prayer should ever be long out of God's clear sunlight: and if we search his history, there is nothing more evident than that gloom or asceticism made no part of the temper of his soul. We remember the reproach, whence it came, and how it was met. The Son of Man is come eating and drinking; why do the disciples of John fast often and make prayers, and likewise the disciples of the Pharisees; but thine eat and drink? And he said unto them: 'Why should the children of the bride-chamber fast while the Bridegroom is with them?" There is, indeed, ever some sadness in all aspiration that has not yet attained; but he who was made perfect by suffering never could succumb to suffering, nor permit the sense of it to be dominant in his nature. We hear twice, perhaps three times, in all that tasked life, of a cloud passing over his mind, floating between him and God, and each time no sooner is mention of it made than we are introduced to the fountains of his strength, and behold him taking instant refuge with the Source of Peace. In the most suffering moments of his life, suffering never gives the direction to his feelings, nor suggests his thoughts. When he is departing from the Temple for the last time, the Rejected for ever, he sees the widow with her mite—the beauty of the offering takes possession of his heart, and instead of mourning for himself, he is blessing her. At the Last Supper no word of sorrow is breathed by him—no fear but for the imperfect fidelity of those whom, on the morrow, he was to leave to their own strength—whilst the sorrow of the disciples is gently reproved as far from the occasion: "Let not your hearts be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me." "Peace I leave with you: my peace I give unto you." "If you loved me ye would rejoice, because I go unto my Father." Whilst bearing his own cross, there is solicitude for others, but peace for himself: "Women of Jerusalem! weep not for me; weep for yourselves and for your children;" and on the cross itself all suffering leads to the suggestions of mercy, the prayer of forgiveness, the last directions of love, the consciousness of being perfectly safe in the hands of God. When, then, we call Christ the Man of Sorrows, let us remember what we mean: that he was one whose spiritual nature suffering never ruled—whose peace, hope, and love sorrow could perfect, but could not disturb—not a dejected and pensive, but a strong and untroubled man, full of the spirit of Power and of God. He passed through the fullness of sorrow as he passed through the fullness of temptation, and had the brightness of his spiritual love dimmed by neither."

Nor is this fine sermon by any means unique in this volume. There are half-a-dozen, at least, on the same level of power and truth; indeed, it is difficult to open the volume anywhere without lighting on the traces of a powerful intellect, as fully imbued with the spirit of Christ, and as keenly critical of the Christian deficiencies of the age with which it is the preacher's duty to deal, as could be found among some of the greatest preachers of the past.

ENGLISH AND SPANISH ORIGINS IN NORTH AMERICA.*

THE contrast between these two works, or rather between these instalments of two important works, is a remarkable instance of like drawing to like,—a natural affinity between an author and his subject. When the enterprises which Mr. Doyle and Mr. H. H. Bancroft have commenced are completed and are floating on the sea of public opinion, they will present the different appearances of the manageable and serviceable craft with which Drake made himself the terror of the Spanish Main, and the huge and unwieldy 'Santissima' he dodged and worried till it lay a helpless victim before him. Mr. Doyle's book at once suggests the literary English workman of the best and most reliable class. It is solid, modest, well arranged, grave in tone, yet as free from sentimentality as it is from literary padding. After a short preface in which he states his hopes and intentions, and a very useful table of contents, he sets to work at once with the true Englishman's delight for grappling with the concrete interests of life. "The aim of this book," he says, "is to describe and explain the process by which a few scattered colonies along the Atlantic seaboard grew into that vast Confederate Republic, the United States of America." Mr. Bancroft's work, on the other hand, recalls nothing so readily as the elaborate preparations made by Philip of Spain to fit out the Armada. In a formidable preface, he takes off his coat somewhat after the deliberate manner of Mr. Augustus Snodgrass, and loudly tells his readers that "he is going to begin." He speaks very fully and candidly of his labours in collecting his materials, which have, indeed, been enormous; and moralises on life in general, and the art of writing history in particular. This preface is followed by a table of contents, and nearly fifty pages of authorities. When at last Mr. Bancroft sets sail, it is in this fashion,—“How stood this ever-changing world four hundred years ago? Already, Asia was prematurely old. Ships skirted Africa; but save the Northern sea-board, to all but Heaven the continent was as dark as its stolid inhabitants. America was in swaddlings, knowing not its own existence, and known of none; Europe was an aged youth, bearing the world-disturbing torch which still shed a dim, fitful light and malignant odour. Societies were held together by loyalty and superstition; kingcraft and priestcraft; not by that co-operation which springs from the common interests of the people. Accursed were all things real. . . . Under the shifting sands of progress truth incubates, and the hatched ideas fashion for themselves a great mind in which they may find lodgment; fashion for themselves a tongue by which to speak; fashion for themselves a lever by which to move the world." We are far, indeed, from disparaging Mr. Bancroft, or from denying his truly marvellous industry, of which we have had proofs before now. He has good reason for his self-confidence, which, besides, must be a great help and stimulus towards the accomplishing of such a herculean task as he has set himself. All the same, we must say that his style looks like that of a picturesque Spanish Don who had gone through a course of Carlyle and Emerson in his youth.

In his present volume, Mr. Doyle has really only begun his work. It contains the early history of Virginia, Maryland, and the two Carolinas. The story of New England and of the other colonies Mr. Doyle proposes to give in two additional volumes, but we should suppose they will not prove sufficient for the purpose. So far as he has gone, however, he deserves nothing but praise. It is a genuine pleasure, and rare as it is genuine, to read a work of a historical character which, like this, carries sincerity and modesty in every page of it, which is serious without being dull, and animated without showing partisanship. Hallam himself is not more impartial than Mr. Doyle, who, having to write of Cavalier and Roundhead, Anglican and Nonconformist, Indian and white man, deals out justice, and frequently swingeing damages, to each alike; who seems to hate nothing and nobody, unless, indeed, it be that "anointed pedant," James I. Not that there is wanting in Mr. Doyle a vein of true sentiment, although it must be said that there is but little to call it forth in the history of Virginia, which resembles nothing so much as the history of a great business concern or Co-operative Store. When he gets hold of a man worth drawing at all he draws him well, such as the celebrated Captain John Smith, whom we are glad to say he rehabilitates; Delaware, Dale, the unscrupulous and shifty Argyll, the "robust" Berkeley, the second and important Lord Baltimore the "Proprietor" of Maryland, and above all, Francis Nicholson, the real founder, in our opinion, of whatever greatness can be associated with Virginian statesmanship. Mr. Doyle's account, too, of the early English expeditions to America, his narrative of the doings of Cabot and Raleigh and Gilbert, and of the difficulties of the English settlers with French and Spanish rivals, are very agreeable reading. Compare the following with Macaulay:—"Gilbert, like Stukeley, was a member of an old Devonshire family. His ancestral home yet stands, stately in its decay. The Atlantic gales roared round its watch-tower, and from the neighbouring hills Gilbert must have looked down on the noble harbour of Tor Bay. All the land around is lovely, with the peculiar beauty of the West,—neither stern nor languid, a beauty which neither awes nor enervates. It would be hard to find a spot richer in romantic influences, more fit to train up a child in those dreamy hopes which allured the seamen of the age."

The early story of Virginia—Maryland is little more than a duodecimo edition of Virginia, with the really unimportant episode of the Baltimore Proprietorship superadded—is a singularly unromantic one. They bought, they sold, they planted, they builded,—that is really all, from the days of Richard Hakluyt and John Smith to those of Nicholson and Andros. The planters had no time to think of anything but land and tobacco. Their dealings with the Indians depended entirely upon material considerations. Their religion, their politics, their system of law, they can hardly be said to have thought out for themselves,—they were content to borrow them. It cannot be allowed altogether that the far-reaching politico-religious struggle in England which produced first the Commonwealth, and then the Restoration, had absolutely no effect on the Virginians; if it did nothing else, it affected the character of the men who were sent out to them as Governors. But they did not think either King or Parliament worth fighting for. In his ninth chapter, indeed, Mr. Doyle tells the story of a curious little civil war which broke out in Virginia after the Restoration, and which was really a personal struggle between Governor Berkeley and a singular adventurer, Nathaniel Bacon, who seems to have been a kind of Jefferson Davis before his time, dreaming of a confederation between Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas. But the movement had no deep significance, political or other, and it came to little. Even the slave-trade—there is nothing more masterly in Mr. Doyle's work than his concluding account of the growth of this nefarious traffic in the Gulf States, with its disastrous social, political, and moral results—was due to the material necessities of the settlers in the Carolinas, or what they thought to be such. "Slavery came in," says Mr. Doyle, "as the one means by which the capitalist could assert his superiority over the man who owned nothing but his own labour." The "paper constitution" character of early Virginia is indicated in a very striking way by its first military and civil code, the basis of which was the atrocious military law in force in the Netherlands at the time. Among its provisions was one ordaining "that any man who should unworthily demean himself unto any preacher or minister of God's Word," or fail "to hold them in all reverent regard and dutiful entreaty," should be openly whipped three times, and after each whipping should publicly acknowledge his crime. The clergy were also empowered to examine all new-comers to the colony in their religion, and if any one fell short of the standard required, he was to come as often as his minister desired to be catechised and instructed, "To refuse to attend was, if persisted in, a capital crime." The fitness of such a code for Virginia is shown by the naïve remark of Mr. Doyle,—"It is consolatory to think that, in all likelihood, the absence of the clergy rendered this clause a dead-letter!"

* The English in America: Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas. By J. A. Doyle, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. London: Longmans, Green, and Co. 1882.

The History of the Pacific States of North America. By Herbert Howe Bancroft. Vol. I., "Central America," 1501-1530. London: Trübner and Co. 1882.

As we have already said, the most notable figure in Virginian history, after the early settlers, is Francis Nicholson, who, about the time of the Revolution of 1688, became Lieutenant-Governor of the colony. He was trained in the worst school of public and private morals England has ever seen, in the Whitehall of the second Charles. Yet Mr. Doyle is able to testify, "It is no small praise of a public man trained in such a school, to say that he was guiltless of all attacks on private rights, that he was clean-handed as a governor and a judge, and that he was honestly and laboriously attentive to the welfare of those under his rule. Nicholson, too, stands out as something more than an efficient and upright administrator. To him, more than to any one man of that age, belongs the credit of clearly seeing and setting forth that policy which the two next generations of statesmen adopted towards the colonies." As soon as he appeared on the scene, he saw that the original founders of the colony were mistaken in their hopes of establishing "a self-supporting community, with varied forms of productive industry." Soil and climate had settled that Virginia was to be emphatically a tobacco-producing colony, and therefore he considered that the most statesmanlike course for the Home Government to pursue towards the colony was to encourage the production of tobacco. He wrote home to this effect in vigorous despatches, which appear in the Colonial papers referring to Virginia, about the year 1690, and which Mr. Doyle says are, even in style, far above most of the documents which bear on his subject. Nicholson was, further, a vigorous advocate of a defensive confederation of the Colonies, to meet the danger of French encroachment. But, above all things, he was sagacious enough to throw himself heartily into the work of religious and educational reform, being much aided in his efforts by James Blair, an energetic Scotchman with an Anglican training, who, Mr. Doyle says, "might be not inaptly described as a colonial Burnet." They were ultimately able to establish a college in Virginia. That it did not come to much simply proves that Nicholson was considerably in advance of his time. Subsequently, we find him turning up in Maryland as its Governor, "grasping at once the true principles on which the commercial prosperity of the colony should rest, stirring up a torpid community into some zeal for education and religion, and at the same time throwing a vigilant and comprehensive glance on the whole body of the colonies, and missing no feature which bore either on their own welfare or their utility to the Crown." Nicholson's career as a reformer was much interrupted, and he was bitterly attacked while he was in Maryland—Mr. Doyle pays but slight attention to the scandalous reports spread about his private life—but he managed to establish a system of free schools. Finally, he was despatched to South Carolina as Governor, at a critical period in its history, and presided over its peaceful settlement as a Crown colony. In his subsequent volumes, Mr. Doyle will necessarily give us portraits of much more heroic figures than Francis Nicholson; but of few men so versatile, so energetic in administration, or taking so comprehensive a view of colonial statesmanship.

The time has not yet come for offering anything like an adequate criticism of Mr. H. H. Bancroft's work. It is to consist of twenty-five volumes, averaging about 700 pages each. Of these, three are to be devoted to the history of Central America, and the first, now before us, deals with a period of about thirty years from 1501 to 1530. Still, as it narrates the adventures of Columbus, and the discovery and settlement of Darien, Honduras, Nicaragua and Guatemala under the Spaniards, and as Cortes, Alvarado, and Vasco Nunez figure in it, it traverses tolerably familiar and very volcanic ground. In this volume a good deal of Mr. Bancroft's space is taken up with introductory and controversial matter; and certainly his first chapter, on "Spain and Civilisation at the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century," is unconscionably long, and burdened with digressions. There is, however, no doubt as to the extent of his reading; and his style, in spite of the peculiarities we have already noticed, is not without its attractions. The most remarkable character that appears in this volume, with the exception of Cortes, is Pedrarias Davila, who governed both Darien and Nicaragua, but who is best known for his judicial murder of Vasco Nunez. Surely, of all the truculent Spanish adventurers of his time, Pedrarias must have been at once the most remorselessly unscrupulous and fanatically Catholic; and not without reason does Mr. Bancroft style him the "Timur of the Indies." Imagine a man who is credited with having caused the deaths of two millions of Indians, dying in his bed, at the age of ninety, in the odour of sanctity, and at peace with himself!

HELEN OF TROY.*

MR. LANG, as was to be expected of him, has written a refined, scholarly, and agreeable poem, which cannot be better described than in his own words:—"In this story in rhyme of the fortunes of Helen, the theory that she was an unwilling victim of the Gods has been preferred. Many of the descriptions of manners are versified from the Iliad and the Odyssey. The description of the events after the death of Hector, and the account of the sack of Troy, is chiefly borrowed from Quintus Smyrnaeus." Mr. Lang abounds in pleasant, if not very original qualities, through three hundred and five rhymed stanzas of eight lines, and his Helen is a lady who would not be out of place at school-room tea in the best-guarded English family, particularly if the family were sufficiently trained in the art of the day, and in that curious renaissance of the renaissance paganism to which cling shreds of mediæval style. That man is indeed brave, however well equipped with scholarship, who approaches the mystery of Helen, and lays hands on the ark wherein the Greek conception of incarnate Beauty is enshrined. Every literary epoch has had its prophet of Helen, and though Mr. Lang disclaims any purpose but that of versifying the Homeric account of her, and though he is modest and wise in his simple expression of the more ancient legends of her, he still remains, to our mind, like a man who takes the horn of Roland to play an air from Patience, or the sword of Achilles to cut a posy of meadow flowers. For the story of Helen is of large and of increasing significance; and there is a certain incongruity in the romantic and mediæval treatment of it in our time when men ask,—What is Beauty? with as much anxious despondency as they do,—What is Truth?

Mr. Lang gives us a masque in which figures of the fifteenth century copy the attitudes and assume the parts hallowed to the imagination by the frieze of the Parthenon and the Homeric poems. If we can condone this, and it is no new presumption in literature, we may allow that Mr. Lang has done well, according to the standard of the day. He does not sin against taste in pretended worship of humanity, or disfigure the Greek legend by modern additions of vice. Nor has he cumbered the smooth flow of his verse by moral or immoral speculations, or psychological questioning of the motives of Paris or Menelaus. Perhaps the divinities who shape Helen's life and the events of the Trojan war are insufficiently divine, and come and go in too pastoral and idyllic a fashion, but there is a charm in mere suavity for readers sated with verbal tricks and pseudo-originality. Mr. Lang's effects and stage properties are as accurately arranged as they could be at the Lyceum. It is curious how he reflects the manner of one or two of our very refined painters, who even when most sincerely and learnedly classical, in fact cannot get rid of mediæval feeling, ignoring this deep-lying difference between the classical and the mediæval styles, that the sentiment of the middle ages presupposed the harmonies of creation and a beneficent Ruler, while the Homeric mortal was the isolated victim of superhuman antagonisms, never free of land or sea, and never master of Nature. However well Mr. Lang describes the home of Menelaus, however true he is to the Greek conception of Aphrodite's cruelty, when Aphrodite tells Helen,—

* Helen of Troy. By A. Lang. London: George Bell and Sons. 1882.

"Thou art the toy of Gods, an instrument
Wherewith all mortals shall be plagued or blest,
Even at my pleasure; yea, thou shalt be bent
This way and that, howe'er it like me best,"

the attitude of the Argive Queen is as little Greek as a pre-Raphaelite picture, when she awaits the coming of Paris:—

"And Helen sat her down upon the grass,
And plucked the little daisies, white and red,
And toss'd them where the running waters pass,
To watch them racing from the fountain-head,
And whirled about where little streams dispersed;
And still with many birds the garden rang,
And marry, marry, in their song they said,—
Or so do maids interpret that they sung."

The flight of Paris and Helen,

"Across the great green plain unharvested," is full of Odyssean feeling; and here Mr. Lang's scholarship is seen in its best aspect, and we are not bewildered as where he more particularly describes the daughter of Zeus, the Greek Eve, the goal of men's desire, but the gate of death to many heroes. In the story of Ceneone and the death of her son Corythus, murdered by his father, Paris, Mr. Lang is not hampered by the thoughts and longings of three thousand years which have gathered round Helen, and he succeeds better than when he affects to follow the literal simplicity of the myth of Helen's empire, assured as it was by her betrayal of her husband. For it is not given to Mr. Lang's genius to make us feel towards her as did the heroes of the Iliad and the Odyssey, and we remain dissatisfied when he makes her speak the words which Homer puts into her mouth; and yet he admires and quotes Marlowe's passionate echo of renaissance worship, and cannot ignore Goethe's claim for her of æsthetic sovereignty and of a high altar in the temple of sociology. Ceneone, the mountain nymph, is a more practicable subject for minor artists. Her passion ebbs and flows within the skirts of Ida, and is not the motive of the Achæan storm that raged round the god-built walls of Ilios. Only the sculptor of the Louvre Venus, or perhaps Leonardo da Vinci, could set Helen before us, example as she is both of Aphrodite's power and of the power of the human conscience, which conflicting, make beauty tragic. The betrayal and grief of Ceneone are purely human, compared with the tragedy of Helen, who fails under the weight of divine gifts,—the mortal crushed by the immortal. We can quite understand the shrewish rage of the river-nymph when she wrote on her birchen scroll to her great rival, much as Peg Woffington might have written to Kitty Clive,—

"Oh, thou that on those hidden runes doth look,
Hast thou forgotten quite thine ancient sin,
Thy Lord, thy lofty palace, and thy kin,
Even as thy Love forgets the words he spoke,
The strong oath broken one weak heart to win,
The lips that kissed him, and the heart that broke?
Nay, but methinks thou shalt not quite forget
The curse wherewith I curse thee till I die;
The tears that on the wood-nymph's cheeks are wet
Shall burn thy hateful beauty deathlessly.
Nor shall God raise up seed to thee; but I
Have borne thy love this messenger: my son,
Who yet shall make him glad, for Time goes by,
And soon shall thine enchantments all be done."

Our readers will remark the discord of the Biblical note struck by Ceneone, but it is difficult to avoid incongruity and at the same time use archaisms as freely as does Mr. Lang, whose "archer wights" "hurl" into the night, who writes of a bear "that in these rocks did wonn," whose Trojans "fell on slumber in the night." There is, in truth, no ground for any severe criticism, or any enthusiastic praise, as we pass from stanza to stanza of what is, to any real presentment of the personages concerned, as a charmingly mellowed mediæval tapestry is to actual men and women of any age. There is a good deal to please a curious taste, there are small literary excitements when Mr. Lang comes in direct competition with Mr. Tennyson, as in his account of the vision of Paris on Mount Ida, or when the prompting of Chaucer becomes very audible. The conception of the three Goddesses is mediæval throughout, and while the moral element and the "composition of place" and description of person are made the most of, the action of Fate and of the half-vengeful, half-sportive Powers who willed the woes that were to follow, is not felt. Aphrodite inspires no awe, and therefore, take what view Mr. Lang likes, his Helen remains unexcused, and her remorse is the remorse of a modern sinner, who blames a vague Providence for her misfortunes, even while she repents. In vain does Mr. Lang use his scholarship in ingenious adaptation of Homeric incidents, and descriptions, and epithets; in vain does he, so to speak, make a stepping-stone across the centuries by use of early English idioms; his effort to perfect his mise-en-scène impairs the deeper-lying dramatic appeal to our human sympathy with the men and women of the immortal story. We prefer Mr. Lang's notes wherein he discusses the materials he has used, and translates in simple language the passages of the Iliad and Odyssey in which Helen appears, to his poetical presentment of her. Compare, for instance, the Helen embroidering on tapestry the adventures of the siege, the battles of horse-taming Trojans, and bronze-clad Achæans, and the Helen—nearly related to Mr. Tennyson's "Lady of Shalott"—who,— " fared before a mighty loom,

And sang, and cast her shuttle wrought of gold,
And forth unto the utmost secret room
The wave of her wild melody was roll'd;
And still she fashion'd marvels manifold,
Strange shapes of fish and serpent, bear and swan,
The loves of the immortal Gods of old,
Wherefrom the peoples of the world began."

Here and there occur vigorous stanzas and excellent lines, which, however, too often dissatisfy the ear for want of an expected pause. The death of Corythus is dramatic, as is the sudden appearance of the Greek Fleet, even as Ceneone spoke her curse, and ended:—

" Oh, ye foolish people, deaf and blind,
What death is coming on you from the sea!
Then all men turned, and lo, upon the lee
Of Tenedos, beneath the driving rain,
The countless Argive ships were racing free,
The wind and oarsmen speeding them again."

But continually we are checked in admiration by some warp of taste, perhaps most so near the end, when, to use Mr. Lang's words, he writes how "Menelaus would have let stone Helen, but Aphrodite saved her, and made them at one again; and how they came home to Lacedæmon, and of their translation to Elysium," where Helen became "a saint in Heathendom." Mr. Lang gets over the difficulty of explaining, what the stern Greeks left unexplained, the escape of Helen when Troy was sacked, by a reference to the escape of the sinner brought before our Lord, and His words are put into the mouth of Menelaus, who, indeed, does not forgive, but exclaims, with Old-Testament adjuration,—

"Nay, as mine own soul liveth, there is one That will not set thy barren beauty free,"—

yet is stayed in his vengeance by the spell of Aphrodite; a situation not managed with much dignity by the English poet, who fails when he would paint the transition of passion from hate to desire.

We have chiefly tried in these remarks to justify our disappointment that so finished a scholar and so pleasant a poet as Mr. Lang dallies with the prevalent fashion, which uses the most fruitful and profound legends of the Aryan past as subject for verse that is hardly poetry. If dilettantism is to level down all intellectual heights to please the demand for neat cloth-covers and easy reading, no doubt there will be soon abundant "ghosts" to "squeeze" the Helens and give "artistic finish" to the manufactured reproductions of our great forefathers' work. We do not liken Mr. Lang to such as these, but he paves the way for them, and is but one of several who seem in a conspiracy to simplify what can and should never be simple, and to blind us to the revelations of the starry night of the past by the veil of ingenious but very local light.

KEPT IN THE DARK.*

THOUGH Kept in the Dark is one of the least important of Mr. Trollope's works, the fact that it is probably almost the last he has written must invest it with a particular and regretful interest in the eyes of all readers. It is a simple little story, with few characters and few events, but full of truth and touches of nature, like all his writings. The incident is so slight, that if the heroine had not put off a little too long the telling her husband of a former engagement, or if he had only heard of it from general report, like any one else, there would have been no story at all. Cecilia Holt lived with her mother in the cathedral town of Exeter, and though it was at the Deanery that she met with the man who acquired a strong influence for ill on her future life, the book has, like most of Mr. Trollope's later works, little of the clerical element or of cathedral society in it. Mr. Trollope excels in describing girls, their little vanities, their ways, their thoughts; he is especially happy in his portraiture of real, nice, thoroughly English girls, which is decidedly a type by itself, and well worth knowing, whether in fiction or in real life. Cecilia is no exception; one learns to know her, understand her, and love her, and one can almost go along with her in the difficulty she made for herself by putting off speaking, as she did from day to day, for what seemed at the time good and warrantable reasons, till it was too late, and her life and her fate were taken out of her own keeping and her own power. Cecilia was proud, bright, and handsome, not better educated than most girls of the upper classes; but she had literary tastes, upon which she piqued herself highly, and she was great in the French and German poets. She was very attractive to persons of both sexes, and tolerably well aware of her own social value, though full of diffidence when she came to love. She had three intimate friends,—the Dean's daughter, who was engaged to be married; Mrs. Green, wife of a minor canon; and Miss Altifiorla, the daughter of an Italian father of very ancient family, but very small means, who held views of her own respecting the superiority of the female sex in general, and herself in particular; moreover, as was consistent with these views, she held matrimony in abhorrence, and considered a married woman to be little better than a slave. She tried to indoctrinate Cecilia with these views, and with some degree of success, for she joined her friend in somewhat scoffing at love and the necessity of having a lover, notwithstanding a lurking suspicion in her mind, that as far as Miss Altifiorla was concerned, it was rather a case of "sour grapes." Then, in an evil hour for Cecilia, there came to the Deanery a certain Sir Francis Geraldine, the Dean's brother-in-law, but not much liked by his relations. He had lived hard, he was fashionable, and professed to know all the Courts and all the racecourses of Europe. He was exceedingly proud of his ancient baronetcy, and still older family. He had begun to think lately that it was about time for him to marry, and cut out his next of kin, who was particularly obnoxious to him; and, as Cecilia seemed to fulfil all his requirements in a wife, he fell in love with her, and after a fortnight of prosperous love-making, proposed and was accepted. Cecilia was honestly in love with him, and for a month was the happiest and proudest girl in all Exeter. Then things began gradually to change; whether it was that he became less attentive, or that she found out his ignorance and his bad temper, certain it is that her eyes were opened,—she found out that "her doll was stuffed with sawdust," and the time of her worship came to an end. She then went through a time of vacillating misery, which she bore in silence, for she was too proud to take counsel with any one. He, on his side, knew so little the state of the case, that he treated her with indifference, because he felt so sure both of her love and of her ambition that he could take what liberties he pleased, without any danger of losing her. "It was the conviction that such was the condition of his mind, that operated the strongest in bringing her to her resolution to break off the engagement," and break off her engagement she did; and then the man showed her the whole meanness and narrowness of his nature, which she had only suspected before. The state of poor Cecilia's mind after this is exceedingly well given; she did not feel altogether proud and happy in her escape, notwithstanding her conviction that she never could have lived with him as his wife; all things were flat and bald, and the prospect of her future life seemed unutterably colourless and dreary, in comparison to the brilliant dream she had been previously living in. Then to her proud spirit it was a bitter blow to find that she was looked upon in Exeter as a jilted young lady; she disdained to contradict the report, but she fretted herself ill over her isolation, and the doctor advised her mother to take her abroad. And this is the episode that Mr. Trollope considers necessary to be known, before relating Cecilia's story. The mixture of tenderness and humour with which the girl's love troubles are treated is a very happy specimen of Mr. Trollope's insight and observation, and is a very good little bit of character-painting.

* Kept in the Dark: a Novel. By Anthony Trollope. London: Chatto and Windus. 1863.

In the further story, we cannot altogether agree that Cecilia would have acted as she did; a girl of her character would surely have had more strength of mind and determination, and not have kept back anything from Mr. Western, when she loved him so well. There is no denying that the situation almost bordered on the ridiculous. He confided to her that he had been jilted, that his heart was lone and weary, that he could not bear his solitary life at home, and for that reason he had come abroad. This was a fate so like hers, that it was perhaps not to be wondered at that she should hesitate to cap his story with hers. It is, perhaps, in thinking of it afterwards that the improbability appears; in reading it, we are quite satisfied with the account of the poor girl's troubles as Mr. Trollope narrates them, and see how it all came about. If it is not quite natural in the abstract, he has succeeded in making us accept it as natural, by his way of telling it. Mr. Western's character is a manly one, though by no means faultless; he is quite to be liked, notwithstanding his absurd pride and jealousy, and he is well and consistently worked out. Miss Altifiorla is painted throughout more or less ironically, and is perhaps a little over-coloured. Mr. Trollope has no love for women who go in for "rights" and advanced views, and he evidently thinks that ridicule is the best weapon with which to assail them,—and exceedingly ridiculous poor Miss Altifiorla manages to make herself. It is a very pleasant little book, altogether; we feel intimately acquainted with all the characters, we sympathise throughout with the heroine, and are spitefully delighted when Miss Altifiorla meets her match, but it is perhaps a little disappointing that Sir Francis Geraldine comes off so easily at the end. We cannot lay the book aside without a strong feeling of sadness that Mr. Trollope, who has given his readers so many happy hours of amusement and enjoyment, should have passed away from among us.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

There is no article of very striking ability in the new number of the British Quarterly, although there are several excellent and instructive papers, such as "Traces of the Northmen in Normandy," "An Exposition of Our Fish Wealth," and "The Poet Firdusi and his Epic." The two most ambitious articles, "Victor Hugo" and "Marcus Aurelius and the Christian Church," are the most disappointing. The writer of the former has evidently read Victor Hugo very carefully; he is both fair and appreciative, and is not so repelled by Hugo's extravagances as some previous critics have been. Yet he somehow fails to grasp the secret of Hugo; his article is therefore wanting in homogeneity, and looks like a number of short notices of Hugo's works strung together. We have heard rather too much about Marcus Aurelius of late, and that is perhaps the reason why we think a good deal of the article on him in the new number of the British Quarterly somewhat superfluous. It strikes us, however, that the author could write a very good "study" of M. Renan himself, apart from Marcus Aurelius. His description of the attitude of the greatest of French critics towards Christianity is happy, and perhaps something more:—"He seems to regard it much in the same way in which a sentimental juryman might look at a beautiful adventuress. He does not believe in its claims, but he is charmed by its graces." The last article in this number of the Review is an estimate of the Primacy of Archbishop Tait, written from the Non-conformist point of view, of course, but perfectly fair and courteous. The writer, however, has not grasped the meaning of a recent correspondence, when he says of Dr. Tait that "he was not able to subdue the spirit of anarchy which is abroad, and his letter to Mr. Mackonochie was a probably unconscious confession of defeat, which, however, is not less crushing and complete because he may not have seen its full consequences."

The January number of Mind is rather dry and technical, and one misses the pen of Professor T. H. Green, that "lost leader," as Mr. Bryce has styled him. The best papers are the opening one, by the editor, on "Psychology and Philosophy;" and the first of what promises to be an interesting series, styled "A Criticism of the Critical Philosophy," by Mr. Henry Sidgwick. Under the title of "On Some Points in Ethics," Dr. Bain contributes a rather scrappy, yet fair and careful review of Mr. Leslie Stephen's well-known work. Dr. Bain is so little given to smart sayings, that we may quote from his article, a sentence which approximates to epigram, and, perhaps accidentally, is otherwise suggestive:—"Fitness for the conditions of life, on which the author dwells so much, is fitness to beat, and not to be beaten; and we are obliged to call this progress, merely because, in some instances, the beater has been the better of the two." The critical notices in Mind are uniformly very careful, and among those in the present quarter's number is one of Dr. Martineau's "Spinoza," by Mr. F. Pollock, which is excellent alike in tone and in style.

The Modern Review sustains its character for variety, vigour, and strong sense "touched with emotion." "Natural Religion," "Progress and Poverty," "Augustus de Morgan," and "Spinoza" are among the not strictly theological articles. Mr. George Sarson, who writes on "Progress and Poverty," seems to be almost converted to the "agrarian socialism" of Mr. Henry George. His statement of "the new political economy" is clear, however; and he certainly makes good his contention that, for many reasons, more especially, perhaps, on account of the fascinations which such a theory as that of the abolition of private property offers to so many classes and interests, our economical experts are bound to give as full and open and speedy a refutation of Mr. George's "heresies" as they can. Mr. Coe has so much that is sensible to say on "The Abolition of Judicial Oaths," that he might have spared himself some rather strenuous writing about "galvanising ourselves into truthfulness by the sudden flash of divine revelation," "jerks of horror-goaded utterance," and "awe-stricken words, such as might be uttered on some mountain of transfiguration."

In the new number of the London Quarterly there are some informative articles which are above the average. Of these, the best are, perhaps, "Recent French Historical Literature" and "Charity in the Early Church;" although a word of praise is also due to a careful review of the recent volumes on Egypt of Mr. Nassau Senior and Baron Malortie. There is rather too much metaphysics in this number of the London Quarterly; but there is nothing offensive to good-taste in the criticisms which are given of works not written from the theological stand-point of the Review. This is especially noticeable of the paper on "Evolutionary Ethics."

The Student's Geography of British India. By Dr. G. Smith, C.I.E. (Murray).—This book, though scarcely intended for general readers, will be consulted by others than students. It is a marvel of labour and condensation, and its compiler states that he has prepared himself for his task for more than twenty years. Besides full accounts of the geography of India as a whole, its mountain chains, river systems, plateaux, and coast-line, it contains descriptions of every Native State, every Indian province, every Indian district, and every Indian town known to Europeans, with all the statistics necessary to a thorough comprehension of their condition, population, administration, and positive or relative importance. Not only are the height of mountains, the length of rivers, the area of provinces all given, but the most recent results of the census, the latest commercial tables, and the newest information as to the method of governing. For example, there is an exhaustive account of the huge Chief Commissionership or Governorship of Assam, with its area of 55,384 square miles and 4,908,000 people, which in 1874 was lopped off from Bengal and placed on its own feet, but which, except for its production of tea, would be scarcely known in England. This account is as thorough as it would be in a gazetteer, and will be found new to all but a very few Anglo-Indians. Separate chapters describe the geology and meteorology of the continent, while a final one gives the name and authorship of nearly every known book upon the subject. Many of the tables with which the volume overflows will be of value to politicians, e.g., one on the cultivable and uncultivable soils, which reveals the extraordinary fact that an area of 182,000 square miles, three Englands, is still classed as cultivable, but uncultivated. We can, however, only quote the following, which will, perhaps, give the best popular idea to Englishmen of the vastness of the Empire:—

INDIA.	Square Miles.	Population.	Population.	Square Miles.	EUROPE.
Bengal	203,437	69,133,619	37,672,000	204,177	France.
Assam	55,384	4,908,276	25,968,286	58,320	England & Wales.
British Burmah.	87,220	3,736,771	29,702,656	89,005	Great Britain.
Andaman Islands.	3,285	30,000	150,000	4,200	Cyprus.
N.W. Province, with Oudh.	111,086	44,851,542	28,437,091	114,296	Italy.
Punjab	221,749	32,712,120	37,839,427	240,942	Austria-Hungary.
Bombay	191,847	23,396,045	20,974,411	219,280	Spain & Portugal.
Ajmer	2,710	460,722	936,340	2,866	Hesse.
Baroda	4,399	2,154,469	1,506,531	5,851	Baden.
Rajpootana	130,994	11,005,512	27,278,911	137,066	Prussia.
Central India	89,098	9,200,881	29,702,656	89,005	Great Britain.
Central Province	113,042	11,505,149	28,437,091	114,296	Italy.
Berar	17,728	2,672,673	2,846,102	15,992	Switzerland.
Haidarabad.	80,000	9,167,789	29,702,656	89,005	Great Britain.
Madras	150,248	33,840,617	16,625,860	182,750	Spain.
Coorg	1,583	178,302	349,367	1,526	Brunswick.
Mysore	30,500	4,186,399	3,734,370	30,685	Scotland.

Outside a small Anglo-Indian circle, who ever remembers that the Punjab, which is not even a Presidency, is the size of Austro-Hungary, and has more than the population of the Spanish Peninsula, or that the population of Bengal, without Assam, is more than double that of Great Britain, and probably exceeds that of Russia in Europe? The manual is provided with a full index at the end.

The Tower Gardens. By Miss Alldridge. (F. V. White and Co.)—This is a very bright and readable novel, leaving in every chapter an impression on the critic's mind that it ought to be even better than it is. Miss Alldridge has keen observation, much power of description, and considerable ability in dialogue, but her analysis of character is not thorough enough. Every individual figure tends to degenerate into caricature. The catastrophe does not actually happen even with the widow, whose governing principle in life is devotion to her husband's memory, which she shows by starving on an impossible farm, because he had thought it would pay; but you always feel the danger. The portraits of Jessie, the heroine, and Alison, her much more interesting sister, who has a talent for seeing the poetry in old associations, such as to the minds of antiquaries cling about London streets, are very firm and clear, but the men are not quite so distinct. Only their feeblenesses are painted thoroughly well, as by one who had watched, without quite understanding. The plot, which depends on a father who has pretended to be dead, and comes back with a large business and an alias, is clever, but we failed altogether to become interested in the hero, MacCarruthers. If he had died of his cancer, as we rather think he would have done, cancer from a blow indicating a radically bad constitution, Jessie's loss would not have been great. The story, however, is lively and natural throughout, and its central scene—the district round the Tower—described with appreciation. By the way, does Miss Alldridge really think the East-enders so hostile to respectables as she says, or is she confusing the "hoodlums" with the general population?

Left Till Called For (Wells Gardner) is a very well told, but also very pathetic story, by the author of "Honor Bright," of a child left at a railway station, who does a work of genuine civilisation among the rough men that frequent it before he is claimed. Unhappily, also, before this is done, the child meets with a fatal accident in trying to recover a dog he has become attached to, being struck down by an engine. There is humour, as well as pathos, in the tale; and the illustrations, which are of the "outline" variety, are admirable.

We are glad to see that a second and enlarged edition has been issued of The Man of the Woods, and other Poems (Black, Edinburgh), by William McDowall, author of, perhaps, the best and fullest local history that Scotland has produced. Mr. McDowall is no pretentious poet, and this volume is essentially composed of pieces written in the leisure of a busy life. Yet the longer poems, such as The Man of the Woods and The Martyr of Erromanga, are full of tenderness, love of nature, patriotism, and an unaffected piety, with just that souçon of the old Covenanting spirit that is required to make the charm of the whole firm and good. We confess, however, that we like Mr. McDowall best, as, indeed, we like all Scotch poets, from the days of Burns onwards, when he writes in the Scotch language, as in his hearty and homely Ingleside Entertainment. Some of his renderings of Border and other stories and legends are very happy, being written in a direct and simple style. Mr. McDowall has now done his very best to immortalise his native Dumfries and its vicinity, both in prose and verse.

Sizes and Sevens, written by F. E. Weatherly, and illustrated by Jane M. Dealy (Hildeheimer and Faulkner), is one of the prettiest of the many pretty books for children that have passed through our hands this season. The verses are very amusing and flow smoothly, and the humour of them is not above the comprehension of children. The illustrations, especially the representations of animals, are equal to the verses. There is a philosophic cat, however, whose breadth of back suggests the idea of two stout kittens rolled into one.

It is hardly possible to criticise a book at once so handsome and so matter-of-fact as An Account of Some of the Incised and Sepulchral Slabs of North-West Somersetshire. By R. W. Paul. (Provoost and Co.)—The paper and type are of the best, the descriptive letterpress is to the point, and the sometimes startling realism of the plates does the highest credit to Mr. Paul.

MAGAZINES, ETC.—We have received the Bibliographer, which opens with an illustrated article on "Lambeth Palace Library."—The Antiquary, an interesting number.—No. 1 of Amateur Mechanics. (Tribner.)—The Princeton Review, which has now reached its fifty-ninth year.—The Continent.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK.

Allarbi, or the Banks and Bankers of the Nile, or 8vo	(W. Blackwood)	7 6
Amos (S.), Science of Politics, or 8vo	(C. K. Paul & Co.)	5 0
Banks (G. L.), The Watchmaker's Daughter, or 8vo	(Simpkin)	2 6
Bayard (Chevalier), History of, illustrated, royal 8vo	(Chapman & Hall)	21 0
Buchanan (B.), Martyrdom of Madeline, or 8vo	(Chatto & Windus)	3 6
Chatrion (E.), La Guerre, 12mo	(Cambridge Press)	3 0
Conran (J. S.), Clean Money, or 8vo	(Jarrold)	2 0
Crow (A. H.), Highways and Byways in Japan, or 8vo	(Low)	8 6
Gilbert (W.), James Duke, Costermonger, 12mo	(Chatto & Windus)	2 0
Grant (P. W.), The Great Memorial Name, or 8vo	(Hodder)	6 0
Griesinger (T.), The Jesuits, 2 vols. 8vo	(W. H. Allen)	24 0
Hildebrand (H.), Industrial Arts of Scandinavia, or 8vo	(Chapman & Hall)	2 6
King (E.), The Gentle Savage, or 8vo	(C. K. Paul & Co.)	6 0
Knight, Annotated Model Bye-laws of Local Government Board	(Knights)	8 6
Lanier (S.), The Boy's Percy, or 8vo	(Low)	7 6
Lessing, Nathan the Wise, translated by E. K. Corbett	(C. K. Paul & Co.)	6 0
Lovibond (T. W.), Brewing, 12mo	(Spon)	5 0
Max Müller (F.), India: What Can It Teach Us? 8vo	(Longman)	12 6
Owen (H.), Municipal Corporations Act, 8vo	(Knight)	12 6
Perry (J.), Practical Mechanics, 12mo	(Cassell & Co.)	3 6
Prescott (G. F.), Lectures on the Lord's Prayer, or 8vo	(W. W. Gardner)	1 8
Pressensé (E.), Study of Origins, or 8vo	(Hodder)	9 0
Price (A.), Who is Sylvia? 3 vols. or 8vo	(Maxwell)	31 6
Richter (J. P.), Italian Art in the National Gallery, 4to	(Low & Co.)	42 0
Smith (G.), The Geography of British India, or 8vo	(J. Murray)	7 6
Vaughan (H.), Sacred Poems, 12mo	(Bell)	5 0
Vibart (H. M.), Military History of Madras Engineers, Vol. 2	(W. H. Allen)	32 0
Witt (C.), Myths of Hellas, or 8vo	(Longman)	3 6
Woodberry (G. E.), The History of Wood Engraving, roy 8vo	(S. Low & Co.)	16 0
Worsae (J. A.), The Industrial Arts of Denmark, or 8vo	(Chapman & Hall)	3 6

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,848.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1883. [REGISTERED FOR TRANSMISSION ABROAD. PRICE 6d. ST. PAUL, 6d.]

THIS WEEK	101	POETRY—
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		Idylls of the Iliad.—VIII.	115
The Panic in Paris	104	A Welcome	115
Lord Hartington's Political Tone ..	105	ART—
The Revelations in Dublin	106	Rossetti at Burlington House.—
Lord Hartington on Egypt	107	(Second Notice.)	115
Independent Liberals	108	BOOKS—
The Scotch Railway Strike	109	Sir William Rowan Hamilton	117
Marderoous Fanaticism	110	Mr. Payn's Latest Novel	118
The Frontiers of Madness	111	Dante Gabriel Rossetti	119
Book-making	112	A Scamper through America	120
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		Emerson as a Man	121
Politics in Norway	113	A Story of Carnival	123
Consecrated Ground	114	Camps in the "Rookies"	124
National Life in a Mussulman ..	114	The Globe Series of "Readers" ..	125
Country	114	CURRENT LITERATURE	126
Bishop Fraser and the Ritualists ..	114	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	130
Ritualistic Logic	115	ADVERTISEMENTS	138-139
Mr. Denning and the Church	115
Missions in Japan	115

* * * The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

It is our intention occasionally to issue gratis with the SPECTATOR Special Literary Supplements, the outside pages of which will be devoted to Advertisements. The Fourth of these Supplements will be issued with the SPECTATOR for February 17th; and Advertisements for it should reach the Publishing Office not later than noon on the Wednesday preceding that date.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE "crisis" in France still continues, but is a little less acute. The Chamber on Tuesday appointed the Committee to consider the Bills proscribing Princes, and elected six friends of M. Floquet's proposal to four who will support M. Duclerc's. The votes on the selection show, it is said, 177 for the Floquet proposal, 160 for the Duclerc proposal, and 66 against any legislation, but that leaves more than a hundred Deputies unaccounted for. The Ministers have met the Committee repeatedly, and have suggested several compromises, but the Committee have finally reported a Bill proposing that the Princes and their wives and children be expelled—the words "descendants" of reigning families being changed into "members"—prohibiting them from entering or remaining in the French Army, and rendering them liable, if they return, to five years' imprisonment, with exile afterwards. The Government will resist this monstrous Bill, but the action of the Chamber is very doubtful. According to all reports, the Gambettists will vote for it, and thus throw the responsibility upon the Senate; but the consequences would be so serious, that reason may return before Monday evening, when it is believed the vote will be taken. It is not impossible that the President, dreading a Floquet-Clémenceau Ministry, may announce that he will ask the Senate for a dissolution, and the idea of a dissolution without M. Gambetta will influence many votes. Upon the whole, we should say there was still hope of a compromise, though it will be one which will compel the Princes either to leave France, or to remain at the mercy of any accidental motion. The Government, which has been weak all through, cannot last.

The French Government has not proposed to prohibit the exhibition of religious emblems. The statement was either an invention of the Times' Correspondent in Paris, or an illustration of his careless credulity. He did not, it will be remembered, give the statement on Friday last as a report, but as a fact, and in words which suggested that he was writing a précis of the Bill, to which he added nearly a column of reflections upon its consequences. He now states that the intention of the Government is only to prohibit seditious emblems, and coolly adds that the difference between "seditious" and "religious" is a mere matter of "detail." He might as well say that the difference between sedition and religion is a mere matter of detail. As he is now engaged in declaring that M. Jules Ferry, who passed the law prohibiting the clergy from teaching in schools, is the only man who can save the Republic, his queer apology probably represents his real opinion, namely, that nothing is of any importance at all, and that shades of nothingness must be insignificant details. That is bad blundering in the authority on French affairs who is always first read.

Lord Hartington made a remarkable speech to his Lancashire constituents at Bacup yesterday week, on the general character and tone of which—especially in its relation to the Irish policy of the Government—we have commented elsewhere. Here, it may be added that Lord Hartington expressly admitted that he had kept aloof as far as possible from Irish affairs, partly because he could not refer to them without extreme pain in reflecting on the terrible fate of the brother whom he had lost; partly because he had the utmost confidence in those to whom the Irish policy was specially entrusted,—Lord Spencer, Mr. Trevelyan, Sir William Harcourt, and, most of all, Mr. Gladstone. He added, with an emphasis which we regret, and which we regard as the only error in a very powerful and effective speech, that it would be madness to extend local self-government in Ireland, "unless we can receive from the representatives of the Irish people some assurance that this boon would not be misused for the purposes of agitation, and for the purpose of weakening the authority and the power of Government." That we consider a mistake. If better local self-government be admittedly one of the main conditions of social progress in Ireland, we hardly have the right to refuse it because we fear that it may be abused for political ends. The system of Parliamentary representation is undoubtedly so abused in Ireland; but are we going to abolish that, in our fear of the abuses to which it is turned? Unless we can frankly reform real Irish grievances, we can hardly make good the assertion of our best statesmen that Irishmen might, if they pleased, have as good a position in the Empire as either Englishmen or Scotchmen.

Lord Hartington, in the same speech, expressed a strong opinion that the present Parliament could deal, and ought to deal, with the questions between landlords and tenants. He gave no hint of the method to be pursued, but significantly said that public opinion was now ripe, and that an agreement could be effected and condensed into a law,—a remark which will be pondered by the tenantry all through the country. They will not forget that Lord Hartington is not Mr. Chamberlain, but one of the very greatest landlords. On the following day, speaking at Darwen, he announced that it was now quite possible to deal with the licensing laws. The people were diminishing their consumption of drink, the revenue from alcohol which, allowing for the increase of population, should have been £34,000,000, having sunk to £28,000,000; and they should be aided by the Legislature. The method of aid, he hinted, would be to enable the Magistrates to refuse either to grant or to renew licences, whenever the County Boards, soon to be created, intimated their opinion that the number was excessive. In cases of refusal to renew, he thought there should be compensation. That seems a reasonable and moderate plan, but there remains the question, still unsettled by statistics, whether drinking does vary in proportion to the number of drinking-shops. The old drinking in farm-houses, which was all done at home, was quite as heavy as the drinking now.

Lord Hartington, in the first speech at Bacup, told the Conservatives plainly that they would never come back to power till they had made up their minds whether or not they were going to be Conservatives or Tory Democrats. While they vacillate between the two, they will never win the confidence of a people who see that the two are utterly inconsistent with each other. There is no more identity, says Lord Hartington, between the old Conservatism and the new Imperialist democracy, than there is between Liberalism and Conservatism, and till the Tory leaders determine which doctrine they will preach and which they will assail, they will speak two different voices, and be heard maintaining two quite different creeds. And, of course, a party that is divided against itself will not convert the country.

Mr. Goschen spoke at Ripon on Monday, assuming the position of an independent supporter of the Government, and warmly defending their Egyptian policy, and their policy in proposing the reform of Procedure in the Commons. He protested with some warmth against the notion that a politician in his position is always desiring to trip up the Government, because on one point he cannot vote with it; and declared that, in his opinion, the Government had acted abroad with great wisdom and vigour in a position of much difficulty. On the subject of Ireland, he echoed Lord Hartington's warning against any concession to the demand for Home-rule. The Irish should be made to understand that the unity of the Empire is not to be broken up, and that no party can be found in England and Scotland to concede Home-rule, or to concede what may ultimately be construed to involve Home-rule. He warned the country against "drifting" into Home-rule through despair of any other settlement. Mr. Goschen declared himself still hostile to the extension of the household franchise to the counties, but professed his willingness, in case Ripon should wish to be represented by a representative favourable to that measure, to resign his seat as soon as the Franchise Bill is brought in,—a tolerably safe, though, we believe, a thoroughly sincere offer. Ripon is not fanatical about the county franchise, especially as Lord Ripon probably cares very little about it.

Mr. Forster delivered a very important speech to the Leeds Liberal Club on Thursday, the drift of which was that he desired to see a strong Redistribution Bill, and not a mild one; that he inclined to a very considerable step in the direction of equalising electoral districts; that, if some protection for minorities were needed, he would rather see it given in the shape of dividing constituencies into smaller sections, and giving one Member only to each section,—no voter having more than one vote,—than in the direction of any more complex scheme for the representation of minorities; and that he is more and more convinced, the longer he lives, of the soundness of Liberal principles, and the safeness of fully working them out. Mr. Forster was not much disposed to take the value of property separately into account, in considering the question of redistribution; and he was not much disposed to take special indirect representation, such as it is said that London enjoys in Parliament, into account. He would base the redistribution mostly, if not entirely, on numbers.

On the subject of reform in Ireland, Mr. Forster declared for applying precisely the same principles to Ireland as are applied to England; and rather for delaying an Irish Reform Bill, in case Ireland should seem to be still in a state of political fermentation at the time when it becomes necessary to pass the Bill for Great Britain, than for giving to Ireland anything less than we give to England and Scotland. As regards County Government, if we understand Mr. Forster rightly, he thinks Lord Hartington wrong in proposing to delay bestowing on Ireland any municipal developments that we may give to this island,—any local institutions which would decentralise the Government,—a change much more needful in Ireland than it is even in England. Only, he would not hand over to municipal bodies in Ireland the control of the police, which he evidently doubts the wisdom of handing over to local bodies, either in this country, or anywhere else.

Mr. Herbert Gladstone made a good speech at Leeds on Friday week, in which he gave the following cheering figures, to prove the operativeness of the Irish Land Act and Arrears Act:—"Up to January 13th, the total number of notices to fix fair rents received were 88,744; the number of cases disposed of in court—contentious cases—27,449; the number of agreements out of Court—non-contentious cases—amounted to 24,462. In November last, 3,000 contentious cases were settled in Court; under the new constitution of Sub-Commission it was expected that not less than 4,500 cases would be settled monthly, and the number of non-contentious cases, or agreements made out of Court, were over 3,000 per month, and were increasing. Very soon it was expected by the authorities that they would be fixed in Court at 8,000 monthly. These figures showed that most of the work in connection with the Land Act had been got through, and that the tenants in Ireland had availed themselves largely of the Act; and also the large number of cases settled out of Court, showed clearly that the landlords had taken the course of meeting their tenants half-way, and settling the cases out of Court. With regard to the Arrears Act, the total number of applications received under the Arrears Act up to January 13th amounted to 86,085, the number of holdings comprised amounted to 185,385, the estimate of the money involved in these applications amounted to £806,000, and the total number of applications which had now been investigated amounted to 18,000. These figures showed that the Arrears Act was working well, and that the authorities were losing no time in getting through the cases." Taking these figures with those which Mr. Herbert Gladstone quoted to show the rapid diminution of crime in Ireland, we may conclude that, however strong the Irish hatred of the Union may be, the Irish are content with the new Land and Arrears Acts, and are settling down under them into comparative social tranquillity.

The Judges of the Queen's Bench, Ireland, delivered judgment in the cases of Mr. Healy, Mr. Davitt, and Mr. Quinn on Wednesday. The Crown accused these persons of language inciting to sedition, and argued that the Court was bound to require securities for their good behaviour. Nobody suggests, least of all the accused, that the language used did not incite to sedition,—Mr. Davitt threatening insurrection, Mr. Healy calling the Government of Ireland "an organisation of pirates and brigands," and Mr. Quinn declaring that those imprisoned under the Coercion Act "went in reformers, but came out rebels." The jurisdiction of the Court was questioned, but the Judges held that it had always existed, and adjudged the first two defendants to give personal security for £1,000 each, and other security for the same sum, or to be imprisoned in default for six months; and Mr. Quinn to find half those amounts. They are allowed a week to decide upon their course, but according to the Freeman's Journal, their decision is taken. They have decided to go to prison. We shall, therefore, hear all through next Session that Mr. Trevelyan is worse than Mr. Forster, that Lord Spencer is a "minion of a degrading tyranny," and that the Judges—the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Lawson, and Mr. Justice Barry—ought to be impeached.

Cetewayo has arrived at Ulundi, and, therefore, may be considered fully restored. The correspondents contradict one another with the directness only observed in South-African despatches, but the balance of evidence is in favour of the belief that the Zulus generally are pleased, though puzzled; that one or two chiefs, notably Usibepu, are frightened to death; that the King is sulky at the cession of the Reserve, which is, apparently, to be called Dunnaland, but that there is no present danger of his disregarding the Resident. No change has been made in the agreement signed while he was here, but it might have been as well to leave him without a Resident. We shall not want the responsibility for Cetewayo's acts, and if he disobeys the Resident, we shall only withdraw that officer, and not invade Zululand again.

The American Congress, being anxious to get rid of the surplus in the Treasury, is making a bold attempt to revive the American shipping trade, ruined by British competition and the Protective laws. The House of Representatives has passed a Bill granting to American shipbuilders a direct bounty "equal to the duties leviable upon all the imported materials used in a ship," a grant which will prove, it is believed, very heavy. Moreover, any American purchasing a steel or iron ship abroad of more than 1,500 tons register may bring her into an American port duty free, and she will be regarded as an American-built ship, except as to bounty, and except as to coasting trade. All Consular duties, moreover, are abolished as against American ships, and some restrictive laws as to the payment of the men are swept away. The effect of this Bill, if it passes the Senate, will, it is believed in New York, be to revive the American carrying trade, without reviving American shipbuilding. The merchants will find it cheaper to import free steel ships from the Clyde. It is doubtful, indeed, whether even the former end will be secured, as the British shipping trade is firmly organised; and it is not quite certain that the loss of the American trade is due wholly to Protection, and not to the extinction of the class formerly devoted to it. In any case, the law can make no difference to the British, who can build and register ships in American ports, if that pays, just as well as in English.

The discovery on the Thursday of last week of the body of a girl, probably of thirteen years of age, in a starch-box which had been sent as long ago as the 11th December last, through Messrs. Carter, Paterson, and Company, carriers, to 32 Abbey Road, for delivery to a person—named as Miss Green—not known there, and which had consequently remained in the custody of the carriers, till the body began to decompose, and so attracted attention to the contents of the box, has given rise to an inquiry which has not as yet produced any clue to the poor victim's origin. It was at first thought, from the condition of the child's teeth, that she had belonged to the upper classes, and had had four teeth carefully removed by a dentist to give room for the full development of the jaws; but this, it appears, is a mistake, the gaps being due to the late development of the missing teeth, and not to extractions. Nothing is known of the persons who delivered the box to the carriers, except that there were two of them, both men, one of whom came in to book the parcel, while the other only helped to carry it to the door of the receiving-house, 156 Cambridge Street, Bethnal Green. It seems probable that the child was either starved, or poisoned slowly by some poison causing extreme emaciation, and the body had been so doubled up that it had been forced into a box apparently quite incapable of containing it. There was some indication in the state of the brain of the child's having been an imbecile. From the use of the starch-box, and of a brewer's label for the direction, it would seem likely that the child belonged to some tradesman in East London.

The curious case of poisoning by oil of bitter almonds at West Malling resulted on Wednesday in a verdict by the Coroner's jury of manslaughter against Mr. Timins, the clergyman who administered the teaspoonful of oil from which, as it is alleged, Sarah Ann Wright died. Neither of the doctors employed in the investigation seems to have had any doubt as to the cause of death, and both of them declare their disbelief that Mr. Timins did, as alleged, swallow a teaspoonful of the same oil himself, the result of which must have been, as they say, his own death also. The curious thing is that Mr. Timins, a clergyman of sixty-nine, for thirty years Vicar of West Malling, and of unblemished character, himself asserted that he had swallowed this teaspoonful, and that the mother of the dead girl,—a hostile witness,—gave it in evidence that she saw him take a teaspoonful from the same bottle as that from which he had previously given the dose to her daughter. The Coroner's jury, while returning the verdict of manslaughter against Mr. Timins, expressly declared their belief that he had administered the poison with no evil intent.

Mallow election has gone for the Home-ruler by an immense majority, Mr. Naish, the Solicitor-General, having polled only 89 votes, against 161 given for Mr. William O'Brien, the editor of United Ireland. Mr. Sexton, in congratulating the electors, used the usual florid and exaggerated language of the party,—“Never, within his knowledge, had any Irish town so suddenly leaped from the depths of shame, to the pinnacle of glory.” It is a leap, certainly, and a leap in the dark,—for the change was made under the protection of the ballot,—but the question whether the leap in the dark has issued in glory, will be differently answered by different people. For our own parts, we should say that if Mallow has leaped up on to a pinnacle at all, it is a pinnacle rather of temptation than of glory, and that the tempter will probably have his own way. It is clear that outside Ulster at all events, the Government make no progress at all—make a regress, rather—in the favour of Irish voters. The Conservatives must in general either have abstained, or voted for Mr. O'Brien.

Gustave Doré, the well-known artist, died in Paris on the 23rd inst. He was a singular example of a French artist who, though thoroughly French in spirit, found appreciation principally in England. His pictures, despised in Paris, were admired in London, where their scenic treatment of sacred subjects attracted the middle-class, and his illustrations made gigantic volumes like the three of Dante's trilogy popular in England. As an illustrator of books, Doré was very unequal, being sometimes original, more often maniéré and stagey to the last degree; but he was genuine in one direction, his love for the weird, which woke up some latent sympathy in British minds. His greatest success was “The Wandering Jew,” in which he rose occasionally to the conception of the awful; while his greatest failure was the Bible, the simplicity of which he did not understand. His realisation of the levelling horror the Flood must have caused—the mother grasping the paw of a tiger perched on a rock, in order to heave her child higher out of the water—is, however, singularly powerful. He made great sums out of his English patrons, which he expended in building houses of the kind which Alnaschar, the elder Dumas, and Edgar Poe imagined.

The Times defends the great aggregations of land in single hands in England, by saying, on the authority of Mr. West, our Minister at Washington, that greater aggregations exist in the United States. There it has been a custom to encourage long railway lines, by voting to the Companies the property-right in every alternate block of public land along the proposed route. Many railroads thus own land on a colossal scale, the “estate” of the Atlantic and Pacific Railway, for example, being nearly 50,000,000 acres, and the Northern Pacific 42,000,000, and the Union Pacific 12,000,000. The railroads, of course, stick out for prices; and the settlers sometimes complain that with immense tracts of wild land left in wilderness, land is unprocurable. The system of grants may be bad, though without it the railways could not have been built; but the Times forgets entirely the most material fact. The English noble keeps his land, the American company sells it. It never attempts to cultivate or let, but sells, being anxious only to secure that increment of value which its own enterprise has conferred. The Times has only to support Bills abolishing entail and settlement, and making land as saleable as Consols, without long deeds or wearisome formalities, to remove the greatest objection to the aggregation of land in England. The spendthrift heir will disperse his estate soon enough, if only he is allowed, and there will be fifty yeomen, in place of the great landlord. They will not prosper? Possibly not; but they will have happy lives, doff caps to no one, and enjoy, as citizens cannot, whatever personality they acquire.

The Times gives some curious statistics of the Quaker body, or, as they call themselves, “The Society of Friends.” They are now reduced to 17,977 members, or probably 7,000 families, a majority of whom, we believe, reside in Ireland, and 5,700 regular attendants who are not in full membership. They seat ten Members in the House of Commons, besides being represented by six or seven ex-Members, the best known of whom is Mr. W. E. Forster; and according to the Times, “the Society includes one baronet, Sir J. W. Pease,” and one knight, Sir J. Barrington. Are they regular members? A baronet might be, because he would inherit his title, and could hardly be expelled for circumstances of birth; but a knighthood must be taken, and considering the testimony borne by the Society against “man-worship,” is an inconsistent absurdity. We have Pagan knights and Mussulman knights in dozens, and probably knights who believe nothing, but a Quaker knight seems a contradiction in terms.

Miss Ada Leigh, of whose remarkable work in Paris we gave some account in our issue of December 23rd last, writes to yesterday's Times to record the terrible fact that infant suicide in France has actually destroyed twice as many children's lives in four years as her orphanage contrived to save in eight years,—that is, that the energy thrown into infant suicide has been more than four times as productive of result as that of the charity of which she disposes. One hundred and ninety-eight boys and forty girls under the age of fifteen, she tells us, destroyed themselves in four years; and of these, 200 were over twelve years of age, twenty-one between twelve and ten, four over ten years, six below nine, and one was only seven. Surely, in no other country except France does not merely despair, but that impatient intolerance of misery which cuts its way out of life rather than await the end, invade the minds of such babies as these. French children must be premature, as well as most miserable, when they have recourse to suicide; they must have learned to believe that death is a remedy, and that they cannot or may not depend on the kindness of the living, before the age at which most English children have been made acquainted with either belief.

Bank Rate, 4 per cent.
Consols were on Friday 102½ to 102¼.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE PANIC IN PARIS.

THE Liberal politicians of France—for it is not the people which is in motion, and the Reactionaries are only defending themselves—present just now a lamentable spectacle. They are all, without an exception, so far as we can see, during a considerable crisis, obeying some of the least worthy of human impulses. Those who are in power are trembling under their responsibilities, and those who are out of power are either yielding to panic, or to jealousies of the feeblest and most ignoble kind. The Ministers, though they made the mistake of arresting Prince Napoleon, probably without legal warrant, for publishing his opinions on the walls, instead of through a newspaper, are obviously disinclined to go farther, think a proscription of Princes most unwise, and believe confiscation of their commissions, which are in France declared by written law to be the “property” of their holders, positively unjust. They are, however, so desirous of keeping their places, or so afraid of producing agitation, that they hesitate to say this openly, and resign, if they are defeated; but keep on suggesting all manner of compromises, no one of which is based on any principle of justice or any constitutional precedent. The latest out of a dozen is that the Government shall be invested with the power of expulsion,—the effect of which will be constant motions to compel them to use the power; and that they shall introduce a Bill authorising them to place regimental officers en disponibilité, or as we say, on half-pay,—the result of which will be that any Pretender who obtains power for six weeks may legally weed all Republican officers out of the Army. No device could be better calculated to turn the Army into a political caste, devoted, not to the country, but to a leader of special political opinions. While offering or hinting at these terms, the Ministry confess that they are perfectly unnecessary. M. de Faillières, the Minister of the Interior, with reports from all the Departments before him, states positively that there are no plots on foot, no gatherings of conspirators, no signs of disorder anywhere. The Minister of War, General Billot, a sincere Republican, admitted to be a good organiser, affirms that the Army is tranquil, that the Princes do their duty, and that all he has to complain of is that the Duc de Chartres took one day’s leave without leave—an offence deserving a week’s arrest—and that the Duc d’Aumale’s comrades call him “Monseigneur,” which implies just as much obedience as the courteous English habit of describing Madame Eugénie Bonaparte as “the Empress Eugénie.” Indeed, it implies less, for the Duc d’Aumale, as Prince of a House still reigning, is “Monseigneur” by a European courtesy. M. Duclerc himself affirms that there is nothing to fear, and all non-official evidence points in the same direction. Nevertheless, the Government, according to all reports, intends to propose some radically unjust compromise, and will neither encounter the majority boldly, nor ask the Senate for a dissolution. Indeed, it is not impossible that the Ministry may bolt out of the business altogether, and resign before a vote has been taken, thus depriving themselves of the power of making even an effective protest. That is not the conduct of men worthy to govern, or competent to do it.

On the other hand, the politicians out of power appear to be, as the Scotch say, “left to themselves,” given up either to unreasoning fears or morbid jealousies. It is believed that the Opportunists, part of the Pure Left, and all the Extremists have united, and are determined that the Princes shall be expelled both from the Army and the State. They possess, when united, a clear majority of a hundred, and the belief in their determination is supported as yet by all known facts. The Chamber has elected a Committee to consider the matter which has determined on expulsion, and that Committee, after electing as Chairman M. Marcou, who says openly that the Athenians were right, and that the only wise course for a Republic is to ostracise powerful citizens, has adopted by six votes to four a Bill of three clauses, of which the first expels all members of families formerly reigning—the italicised word is levelled at the Empress Eugénie—the second deprives them of political rights and excludes them from the Army; and the third renders them liable, if they return, to be sentenced by the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction to five years’ imprisonment, to be followed by permanent exile. This Bill, which, as against men who have been amnestied by law, women like the Princess Clotilde, who have done nothing, and lads like Prince Victor, still at school, is positively monstrous in its injustice, will, it is firmly believed, be passed by the Chamber, and rejected by the Senate, which must then either dissolve, or become the object of a furious attack, in which it will go down. Of course, it is said, the Chamber will be dissolved, the parties will fight over the Bill with unexampled fury, and France will be plunged into a veiled civil war. For what? The leaders of the majority absolutely assign no reason, except that the deference paid to the Princes constitutes an infraction of equality and a political danger. An infraction of equality it may be, but then so is the deference paid to a Cardinal, to a millionaire, to a man like Gambetta; to Victor Hugo, who is always proclaiming; to any one whose history, or fortune, or ability, or character, elevates him above the mass. Is everybody to be ostracised who wields influence, and does not happen to be a Senator or a Deputy? As to the political danger, it does not, as we believe, exist; for the peasantry have not changed, and the French Army has never yet pronounced without orders from legal superiors or a certainty that it was unanimous. When it struck for Louis Napoleon, he was legal Commander-in-Chief, and even Marshal MacMahon shrank from a struggle which, as he said, would extend to every barrack. When, moreover, has the Army ever followed a General who is not in command and has not won a pitched battle, and where is there such a General hostile to the Republic? The panic seems to outsiders unreasoning; but grant that they are ill-informed, grant that the officers are disaffected, and that a military coup d’état is at hand, and where is the sense of this Bill? If a General is to lead a revolt, he must lead it either in his own name, or in that of a Pretender. In the former case, the Bill is inoperative, for no General quid General is expelled; and in the latter, the French General Monk can bring back his nominee within twelve hours. M. Madier de Montjau, an extravagant Extremist, says this never happens; but the most successful Restoration ever carried out was decreed in the name of a Prince living abroad in poverty, by a General who, it is quite possible, had never seen him, amid a people utterly ignorant of his nominee’s character. The best help a Prince in France can possibly obtain is exemption from the Parisian microscope, which has been so fatal to Prince Napoleon; and Prince Victor, in particular, will be three times as powerful in London or Rome as in the Parisian salons. Even admitting, what we greatly doubt, that there is one Prince who is a popular General and full of disaffection, that is only an excuse for a Bill against the Duc d’Aumale, whom the Minister of War, as General Billot pointed out, if he sees the smallest ground for suspicion, can, under the military law, place in close arrest within a fortress for months at a time, without assigning a reason. What power does the Bill give which the Republican Government does not already possess?

It is, of course, conceivable that the Chamber, once face to face with its own vote, or threatened with dissolution, may on Monday accept some Ministerial compromise, and that affairs may drift on a little longer; but who can confide in a Chamber capable of such panics, and so divided into groups that no Government can obtain a foothold? We do not believe, as some of our contemporaries do, that France “is yearning for a saviour sword,” for the peasantry know well that the swordsmen would sooner or later proclaim war; but we do believe that Frenchmen are timid, that they expect Governments to govern, and that in the absence of Governments they suspect the Constitution of imperfection. They do not object to be governed by the Chamber—that was shown on Gambetta’s fall—but then, the Chamber must accept the responsibilities of sovereignty, and not quiver with fear at every breath of faction in a style which would deprive a monarch of all respect. We do not believe that the Republic is in danger, or that the French people will accept any other form of Government; but we do doubt whether, if a strong Ministry cannot be formed, or if the Chamber will not acknowledge any leader able to guide a Ministry, the revision of the Constitution will not be speedily at hand. Under the present one all the substantive power is deposited in the people; yet the Government can neither obtain permanent support nor distinct guidance from the Representatives, nor consult the people themselves, who again only elect Deputies at long intervals. The Chamber, virtually irresponsible, except after years of delay, degenerates into a public meeting, and during the most dangerous crises, no Minister, or orator, or wirepuller can tell what decision will leap from the urns. The death of M. Gambetta has deprived the Republicans of the only man who could unite them, and unless he can be speedily replaced, Constitutional revision, with all its dangers, its bitternesses, and its disturbances to the course of affairs, will become inevitable. Apart from its radical injustice, which alienates all right-thinking men, a policy of proscriptions splits a country into irreconcilable factions, each of which in turn uses the same weapons, till the headless parties fall into enduring anarchy. Republicanism is the most dignified form of human government, and in theory the best; but Mexico is a Republic, as well as the United States.

LORD HARTINGTON'S POLITICAL TONE.

LORD HARTINGTON'S speeches have very marked characteristics. For one thing, he has a positive scorn for making things appear better than they are; and not only so, but he seems to be fully aware that the English people share that scorn, and that they only respect a Government the more for admitting to the full all the failures they have made, so long as they can show that these failures have not been due to any want of fidelity and zeal and good-sense on the part of Ministers in dealing with their obvious duties. It is perfectly true, says Lord Hartington, at Bacup, that when the Government took office, the last thing they expected or desired was to have to give up all their energies to new Irish legislation. It is perfectly true that the furthest thing from their imagination was that they might have to wage war in Egypt. It is perfectly true, again, that they have actually been engaged much more in combating difficulties in Ireland and Egypt, than in settling any of the issues they placed before the country during the General Election of 1880. But what then? No Government can control events. The duty of all Governments is to deal in the best way they can with events as they arise. The country would be legitimately indignant if the Government ignored the actual emergencies with which it has to deal, in order to fulfil pledges which are not half so urgent as the actual emergencies of the moment. What the country desires is to have a Government it can trust, dealing on principles which the people approve with the duties which have the first claim on the Administration. And if it happens that these duties are quite distinct from those which it anticipated when it came into power, that will not be counted to the discredit of the Government, unless it be due in any way to its own default that its anticipations have been disappointed, and its energies turned out of their natural channel. Any Government may be unable even to attempt the work which it intended to do, and may be obliged to devote its whole force to work it had never for a moment contemplated; but if under these adverse circumstances, it puts its shoulder to the wheel, and struggles manfully against its difficulties, the country will judge it not by its unrealised hopes, but by its actual deeds.

Again, Lord Hartington not only does not apologise for that which needs no apology, namely, inadequate foresight on the part of the Liberal Administration, but he makes the country see vividly the true "logic of facts" which forced the Government off its intended path on to its new path, and that it was no spontaneous voyage in search of heroic legislation which led to this result. How did the necessity for undertaking the new Irish legislation, he asks, arise? Not from any superfluity of adventurous enterprise on the part of the Government, but from the most humble of their duties. The Irish landlords came to them, and asked them practically to collect their rents for them, to apply the machinery of the Government to the duty of enforcing the tenants' obligations, which the landlords avowed themselves wholly unable to enforce for themselves. Of course, the Government could not do that without careful inquiry into the cause of so unusual a condition of things, and they found as the result of that inquiry that it was admitted on all sides, by Liberals and Conservatives alike, that a large proportion of the rents were excessive,—were, indeed, founded on value given to the land by the tenants' own expenditure and labour, and that practically no State could undertake to enforce these obligations successfully, without taking pains first to revise such of them as were radically unjust. This duty was absolutely imposed on the Ministers, was none of their seeking. It was forced upon them by the admitted inability of the landlords to obtain their own rents. It was done in the interest of the landlords, no less than that of the tenants,—in the interest, indeed, of society at large, and of order especially, since no Government could undertake, consistently with public order, to enforce wholesale, a vast number of unjust obligations.

And not only does Lord Hartington refuse to gloss over disagreeable facts, preferring, indeed, to let the logic of events apologise for the commissions and omissions which the pressure of events has compelled, not only does he disavow most strongly any attempt to court heroic enterprises, but he takes up a sturdy and what might be called a rationally impenitent view of the inheritance of evil in Irish affairs which we have received from our ancestors, and exhorts us not to let our frank admission of the existence of this heritage of evil relax the strenuousness of our resolve to persist in holding the Empire together. It is all very well to recognise that you cannot annihilate by any effort, however earnest, the fruits of evil sown, in crop after crop, generation after generation, but there is no occasion to let that frank recognition of England's past obduracy, where England ought to have been yielding, relax the fibre of our determination to be obdurate still, where we feel that yielding would be weak and wrong. Lord Hartington is evidently afraid of the daunting effect of the confession that we have been hard to Ireland where we ought to have been just, and thinks that it may persuade us now into being soft to Ireland where the true justice would be hard. It is no good pretext, he says, for being unjust both to Great Britain and to Ireland now, that Great Britain has heretofore been unjust to Ireland through exclusive regard for her own ill-conceived interests. You will not rectify one great error by making as great an error in the opposite direction. Over-penitence, like vaulting ambition, sometimes overleaps itself, and it is, moreover, inexcusable over-penitence, where you have been endeavouring to repair, so far as possible, the sins of a previous generation, to charge yourself with any responsibility for their guilty indifference. Therefore, says Lord Hartington, don't let us dwell too much on the moral view of the matter, if that has any tendency to unstring our determination to resist foolish wishes, in spite of the fact that formerly-oppressed Ireland urges them. And undoubtedly his advice is, on this head, vigorous and manly. We may properly remember that one of the results of misgovernment is not only to blind the eyes of those who are responsible for the misgovernment, but also to blind the eyes of those who suffer from it. The oppressed and their descendants are even more likely to misconceive the relations in which they ought to stand to the oppressors and their descendants, than even the heirs of the oppressors themselves. If the latter have learnt to see the errors of their fathers' ways, they may have emancipated themselves from the twist of mind which caused their father's errors. But the victims of misgovernment are sure to transmit to their posterity a whole crop of fierce illusions which must bias their judgment, and bias it for evil, in all matters affecting their relations to the heirs of the evil-doers. Lord Hartington is right that a redundant self-reproach for what our fathers did, may easily mislead us into weakness almost as mischievous on the one side, as our perverse and cruel tyranny was mischievous on the other side.

All three positions of Lord Hartington's appear to us very characteristic. A statesman who always faces the facts of the case, however unpleasant, and rather prefers to put them in their barest and most unpleasant form, than to gloss them over in any way, will always inspire confidence in England. Again, a statesman who is rather anxious to deprecate the idea of entering voluntarily upon heroic legislation, and who insists on it that the Government did nothing of the kind, but were forced by the commonest principles of common-sense, under the actual circumstances of the Irish case, to try what they could do to render the collection of rents on a large scale a matter of less herculean difficulty, will thereby recommend himself to the homely instincts of the British people. Most of all, a statesman who warns us not to carry our compunction for the sins of our ancestors so far as to let that compunction hurry us into an offence of the exactly opposite kind,—an offence against British instincts, out of deference to Irish instincts,—will command the hearty adhesion of English Liberals. 'Here,' they will say, 'is a man who does not let Liberal sentiment degenerate into weakness,—here is a man who faces the truth, who is not ambitious of great enterprises, who never encourages himself in morbid exaggerations of the scope and drift of former errors, but who just grapples boldly with the problem of the moment, quite indifferent as well to the fact that it is not the problem he had hoped to be grappling with, as to the fact that by his mode of grappling with it, he may be laying himself open to a plausible (though false) imputation of following the evil tradition of an unjust age.'

Such is Lord Hartington; and being what he is, he will, we believe, command the confidence of English Liberals far and near; of many even who find his tone a little less inspiriting than that of his great leader; perhaps of some who like it all the better because it is less inspiring, because it does not aim so high, but insists so stiffly on not aiming higher than the point to which it can send its shaft home.

THE REVELATIONS IN DUBLIN.

THERE is something in the news of the last few days which is almost appalling to the friends of Ireland. Most of our contemporaries are exulting in the recent revelations in Dublin, because they think that now at last there is a chance that the Assassinating Committee, which all have suspected to exist, will be broken up, that the reign of terror will be ended, and that the murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke will be made to expiate their crimes. That those results, if they occur, will be good, is past all question. It is well that such a Committee should be destroyed, well that a demoralising terror should cease, well that intending murderers should distrust all their precautions for secrecy; but we can feel no exultation. If we cannot trust the testimony of the Informers, things are worse than ever, for we are in presence of men who rival Titus Oates; but if, as seems probable, we can trust it, think of what it is that is revealed. The determined efforts made by Englishmen to remove the agrarian trouble of Ireland have affected but a portion of the social difficulty. Outside that embodiment of agrarian passion and unreason, the Land League, stands another League, the so-called Fenian Brotherhood, which is not caring for the peasantry, not intent on reforms, however far-reaching, not moved by concessions, however hard to make, but stimulated only by hostility to the connection with Great Britain. Nothing will satisfy it, except an independence which Britain cannot grant, and which it is perfectly possible that the Irish people, if consulted by a plebiscite, would summarily reject. The Government, therefore, stands face to face, after all its efforts, with a resisting body of opinion which it is impossible to conciliate, with which there is no reasoning, to which no kind of compromise can be so much as offered. It is as if Stephenson had found, after filling Chat Moss, that the Moss itself rested on pillars which, as the weight reached a certain point, also gave way. As if that were not enough, a section of this body—small, it may be, but still formidable—has adopted and, as the informers allege, has carried out, plans in which the wickedness, the utter contempt for the rudimentary principles of morality, as acknowledged by all creeds and nearly all contemners of creeds, is not more apparent than the perversity. According to the informers, who, we must not forget, are not repentant men, but men avowedly under terror for themselves, a Committee exists embedded in the old Fenian body, the body seeking to stir up insurrection, consisting of men who actually believe that the Nihilist policy of assassination may succeed against a Viceroyalty. That men without scruples should conceive it possible to upset a dynasty by successive assassinations is intelligible. Such an event has never occurred in history, and has been baffled even in Russia, where Revolutionists are able to secure not only relays of assassins, but a succession of self-devoted murderers; but that the evil conception should be applied to a delegated Government, perpetually renewable, and sure to be filled up for centuries, if Viceroy after Viceroy and Secretary after Secretary fell under the knife, shows hopeless incapacity to understand the first conditions of the situation. The English people is not one to be daunted by murder, and until it is daunted, it can find men to run that risk, just as it can find Generals for a campaign or leaders for forlorn-hopes. The Government of Ireland is not drawn from a House which cannot be replaced, or even from a caste or a profession which could be thinned down, but from a nation, which would be extirpated before it yielded to a coercion which assailed it not only in its courage and its pride, but in its instinctive moral sense. As for the local Government yielding, it has not the power to yield, even if it were inclined, and even if such attempts did not arouse in governing men, as they nearly always do, a hard anger which makes life seem worthless, if concession is to be made to men who employ murder. We say nothing of the impossibility of the task, of the forces upon the side of Government, of the difficulty revealed in this trial of securing trustworthy agents, of the extraordinary indications of something like Providential interposition, which baffled, time after time, the organised attempts against Mr. Forster, and confine ourselves to the assertion that if he had fallen, and Lord Cowper with him, the revolution would not have advanced one step. He would have been succeeded as Lord F. Cavendish was succeeded, the crime yielding as total result a sad widow and a determination to carry out the strengthening of the law resolved upon before its commission. If Lord Spencer fell, or Mr. Trevelyan, he would be instantly replaced, though this time it might be by soldiers, more accustomed to effective self-defence. The crime considered as a resource—and in so considering it, we try for a moment to step down to the moral level of the alleged Committee—is utterly thrown away. Even the law they hate only grows the stronger, while popular favour declines. Juries begin to convict, evidence begins to flow in, the police begin to be efficient. It is reported that a marked fact in the situation is a change in the popular temper, that for the first time since the Land League started the populace appear willing to help the inquiries of the constituted authorities. Those results were all, more or less, inevitable, and yet the Assassination Committee was formed.

It is this mixture of unreason with hatred and with contempt for the moral law which makes us so despondent as to the results of the efforts which so delight our contemporaries, and which we heartily approve. Reasonably considered, the criminal organisation in Dublin might fairly be held to have received a death-blow. Its managers have not during their reign been very successful. They have been baffled much more often than they have succeeded. They have not paralysed either the officials, or the police, or the Courts. On the contrary, all these have grown more resolute, more intelligent, and more hard. Nor have they attracted the population. On the contrary, there is some evidence that they have shocked them, and that the willingness to give evidence is not all the result of fear. Just as these facts become clear to the Committee, they discover that their organisation has broken down. All the facts, and especially the methods of assassination pursued, point to a strong belief on their part that, whether from fear or favour, or both, they had no treachery to fear, either from accomplices or agents. They used almost needless numbers of men, posting sentries, for instance, to signal their victims' approach. They employed cars, thus burdening themselves with at least one witness who did not take a direct share in the crime. They selected, in Mr. Field's case, frequented streets, and they employed by preference weapons like knives specially sharpened, and sword-sticks which could be recognised as unlike weapons usually sold. They, in fact, trusted their agents, and now they know the trust is vain. That fact of itself should weaken them, as will also the victory, if victory there is, of the law, the visible certainty that the Government know more than they reveal, and the change of feeling in the lowest people. They must be aware that they are in danger, and be preparing for a flight, which will terminate their action, at all events for years. That, we say, is the reasonable view; but then, on the evidence, has reason anything to do with the matter? If a number of men, presumably sane, were found to believe that a Viceroyalty could be overthrown by a few murders, where is the proof that another group will not be found ready to replace them? The wickedness of the idea will be no greater, nor will its unreason be one whit more evident. There will be just as many victims ready for the knife, nor will the effect of their deaths be any different. It is true that, according to precedent, a society of the kind once betrayed and baffled dies, but then such a society has almost invariably had an object which could possibly be attained by the means used. Landlords could be frightened, or tenants coerced, or insurrection promoted. In the present case, the divergence between means and end is so complete, so unintelligible, that the observer feels himself in presence of forces not guided by reason of any kind, and can no more predict a result than he can predict what would happen if the mad were required to come to political decisions. It is possible that with the coming trials, political assassination, in itself a new crime in Ireland, may cease; but it is also possible that it may be entirely unaffected. The conclusions of reason, however probable, are in the face of facts visibly untrustworthy, and all we can say is, that we hope the Government will apply the law firmly and steadily, and that the Law will act, as it usually does, as an irresistible restraining force. But we do not feel, as we should about any country but Ireland, a certainty that it will. That assassination is wicked, is there no reason; that it is foolish, is no reason; that it is hopeless, is no reason. On what, then, are we all so confidently relying? On an effect of terror, which events may prove to be no effect at all? Terror does not stop men from filling up the places of the slain; why should it stop men from supplying those of the executed or imprisoned? To say there is no motive, is to say nothing, for there never has been any, except a connection between Great Britain and Ireland, which exists to-day as it existed when the Assassination Committee of which the Informers speak was founded.

LORD HARTINGTON ON EGYPT.

THE Government is about to try to rule Egypt through an unacknowledged Resident, who will be called "Financial Adviser to the Egyptian Government," who will be the servant of that Government, but who will be supported by the whole strength of British influence. That is the clear meaning of the Egyptian section of Lord Hartington's speeches in Lancashire. After defending, at Darwen, with singular strength and lucidity, the proposition that Europe and England must interfere in Egypt, whether they like it or not, he affirmed and reaffirmed, in a way which there is no mistaking, that the Government reject the idea of annexing or of protecting Egypt, partly because they are determined to adhere to pledges given before they accepted office, partly because they foresee difficulties with their own supporters, and partly because they see reason to believe that an "interested" course might produce a European war. Upon this last point, Lord Hartington was much more emphatic than any Minister has yet been, even alleging that if we had shown any desire to interfere for our own ends in Egypt, we "should have aroused the suspicion and the jealousy, possibly the actual resistance, of many of the Powers of Europe." As it is, they trust us, because "whenever a settled and a stable Government has been established in Egypt," the British Army will retire, and British influence will be exercised, not through a Protectorate, but "through the position we have acquired there, and through the authority and position of our diplomatic representative, the Financial Adviser whom we intend to recommend the Egyptian Government to appoint. Although, no doubt, he will be a European—although, no doubt, in present circumstances, he will be an Englishman—he will not be appointed by the British Government, he will not be under the instructions of the British Government, nor will the British Government be responsible for his actions. We shall do our best to advise the Egyptian Government to make a good choice. We say, if he acts—as we believe he will act—for the interest of the Egyptian Government and for the interests of the Egyptian nation, we shall give him all the support which it is in our power to give him through our diplomatic representatives, as we shall support Ministers in Egypt in whom we have confidence. But it will not be his particular duty, and he will not be called upon, to look after and direct British interests only. He will be the servant of the Egyptian Government, acting in the interests of the Egyptian Government and of the Egyptian people." These sentences contain the essence of the scheme, which has never been revealed in such detail before, and which has already been carried out. On Wednesday it was announced—and the announcement is correct, if premature—that the Khedive had appointed Sir Auckland Colvin, the former British Controller, Financial Adviser to the Egyptian Government, which will consult him upon "every point connected with finance,"—that is, practically upon every point whatever. In that capacity, he will be supported by the British Representative—that is, by the whole power of the British Government—which, at least until the garrison is withdrawn, is irresistible.

We shall not attempt to deny that even from our point of view this is a very able plan. While leaving the Khedive independent, and his Government entirely native, it virtually imposes upon both a British Controller, whose advice, so long as Egypt desires the friendship of Great Britain, must be sought and followed. He can recommend whatever he deems essential to the first condition of sound finance, the good government of Egypt; and his recommendation, so long as British support is indispensable, will in theory be final. Being imbedded in the Egyptian Administration itself, no other diplomatist can enjoy the same position; while as a mere servant of the finances, he will escape all conflict with the European Consul-General, whose requests, arguments, or menaces will, in fact, be laid before him as ultimate arbiter, who will give the "advice" on which the Egyptian Government will decide. That is in idea an excellent plan, Sir Auckland Colvin being quite capable of understanding hints which are not "instructions," but only remarks, any disregard to which would cost him British support; and if the conditions which Lord Hartington imagines to exist are real, that will work well. In other words, if the Khedive continues submissive, and if the Egyptian Ministry are tractable, and if the Legislative Council is the Ministry over again, and if the Army does not mutiny, and if the people do not rise in rebellion, then Egypt will be governed by a highly competent person, who knows how to secure for a feeble peasantry an endurable Administration. Sir Auckland Colvin will be Controller, without interference from any colleague, and is sure to act in the general interest of Europe, of England, and of the Egyptians. That is admirable, and our single complaint is that all these "ifs" are assumed; that nothing, not even Sir Auckland's exemption from dismissal, is guaranteed; and that if Khedive, or Ministers, or Legislature, or Army prove recalcitrant, we must either yield, and give up the people of Egypt to the Pashas, or must send a second Expedition, and a second time arouse all those jealousies and suspicions which, as Lord Hartington clearly believes, might provoke a European war. If, for example, Sir Auckland insists that the revenue shall be collected by European methods, and neither farmed to German Jews, nor exacted by the courbash, and the Ministry say Non possumus, or the Legislature refuses the necessary Acts, then the whole work has to be done again, under unknown European circumstances, and with the aggravation that we shall have no legal foothold for interference, our Agent being only a servant of Egypt, whose advice the Egyptian Ministry have a legal right to disregard. Of course, a Convention binding the Khedive to take such advice would give the foothold; but then, is that coming, or is it consistent with the self-government on which Lord Hartington insists?

What is the answer to this objection, which we reiterate with the greatest reluctance, and from a single idea of British duty to the Egyptian people? So far as we can perceive, there is absolutely none, except the optimistic official theory that the Egyptians will do none of these things. That theory is well founded so long as the garrison remains, for no Egyptian will conceive it possible for a Government in military possession not to enforce its wishes; but the garrison is not to stay. It is to go, whenever Egypt is ready; and even if Egypt never is ready, Parliament will not agree to the indefinite detention of a British corps d'armée, at British expense, in a country in no way under its own control. When the Army has departed, where is the basis of the theory? Is it the submissiveness of the Khedive? That may not always endure, or if it does, is dependent upon a life which is threatened every day, and may any day come to an end. Any other Mussulman Prince would intrigue with any other Power to obtain support in resisting the Englishman's domination. On the compliance of the Ministry? The Ministry will kick at every turn at proposals which they will think dangerous, either to the Revenue, to their own authority, or to their own and their friends' official profits. They kicked at the Control, and though the Frenchman was, no doubt, imprudent, and pushed "political" argument very far, the steady, persistent pressure of the Englishman will be found equally unendurable. Suppose he asks that the Premier's favourite shall be prosecuted for taking bribes. Is it the Legislature on which Lord Hartington relies? That must be either the Ministry over again, or the Khedive's screen, or an independent body burning with hostility to European ideas. Resistance at some point is inevitable, for Eastern and Western ideas never touch without collision; and whenever resistance occurs, there will be nothing to rely on except British "influence," which may be irresistible or null, according to the political situation. This would be the case in any Oriental country; but in Egypt, where every Consul-General is trying to establish his own ascendancy, where every colony has its own objects, and where every kind of influence can be exchanged for money, the chances of resistance will be much greater. We venture to say that the British Army will not have departed a week, before the dismissal of Sir Auckland Colvin will be the common object of every Consul-General and every foreign trader, or before the cosmopolitan speculators open fire on him in the newspapers of Vienna, Paris, and even London. His first business will be to check plunder, and the first business of every plunderer will be to induce the Ministry to resist the "presumptuous" Englishman. If those endeavours fail, there is the Sultan; and if he fails, there is the Army, which will once more be taught that it is sacrificed to the interests of Infidels.

It is, however, we freely admit, almost too late to argue. Lord Hartington would not have said as much as he has done, if the Government had not decisively made up its mind, and all that remains now is to urge that as much should be accomplished before the British garrison retires as is humanly possible. If the Khedive can be induced to agree that Sir A. Colvin shall not be dismissed without British consent, his position will not be so precarious; and if the Sultan could be persuaded to appoint him Turkish Commissioner, he would be indefinitely stronger. The triumph or failure of British policy now rests upon his success.

INDEPENDENT LIBERALS.

MR. GOSCHEN, in his speech at Ripon last Monday, made some interesting remarks on the unnecessary cynicism of the political world in criticising the position of ex-Cabinet Ministers who offer the Government an independent support. It is always more or less taken for granted that men in this position, though they offer an independent support, really watch for a suitable opportunity of dangerous attack. "My dear Goschen," said a Ministerialist to him, "it has generally been found that those who are outside the Cabinet in that way become very candid friends, and rather severe critics." And no doubt that expresses very fairly the general impression of the outer world, who, justly or unjustly, will impute to the unsuccessful minority of any administrative group, a feeling of soreness, if not grudge, against the majority,—a feeling which, sooner or later, is likely enough to drive them into active hostility. As a matter of fact, this imputation, like other imputations in which society indulge, is often quite unfounded. It would be difficult, we imagine, to find at present more loyal supporters of the Government on every subject except the particular point on which they find it necessary to oppose it, than Mr. Bright, Mr. Forster, and Mr. Goschen, and we do not feel sure that we might not add than the Duke of Argyll. We doubt whether any one of the four would feel the least suspicion of pleasure, or, indeed, anything but positive chagrin, in the appearance of any probability that the present Government might be driven from office. Nor is there anything to wonder at in such a condition of things, if it be so. None of these able men can feel that any slight has been done to them by their former colleagues. Mr. Goschen was not included in the Government, for the very excellent reason that he is deliberately opposed to one of the most important measures which the Government are pledged to pass; and so far from depreciating his ability, they have done all in their power, by sending him to Constantinople, and bearing witness to the great service which he did them, to show how highly they value his services. The Duke of Argyll found it impossible to approve the Irish Land Measure of the Government, and separated himself from the present Administration on that question alone. Mr. Forster strongly disapproved setting Mr. Parnell and the Land-leaguers free before they had given some sort of pledge as to the use they would make of their liberty. Mr. Bright was quite unable to sanction the Naval and Military operations in Egypt. There is no sort of discredit attaching to such differences of opinion as these, and no opening, therefore, for the mutual reproaches and recriminations which have sometimes made of Ministerial resignations the cause of great party splits. It is childish to suppose that because an English gentleman cannot support a particular policy which almost all his friends can and do support, he must cherish a petty resentment against all those who decline to be convinced by his arguments, to the point of cherishing the wish to upset them on other issues on which, had he continued in co-operation with them, he would probably have had no fault to find with the policy pursued. It may be quite true, as Mr. Goschen's old friend remarked, that seceders from a Cabinet often are found to be extremely candid friends, and very severe critics. But when that is so, it will usually be found that the seeds of difference had been germinating for a long time before the secessions took place, and had involved a good deal of personal distrust and coolness between the seceders and the Administration which they deserted. When General Peel, Lord Cranborne, and Lord Carnarvon left the late Lord Derby's Administration, because it gave in its adherence to democracy in 1867, doubtless they felt like the true upholders of the Conservative cause against a Government which had betrayed it; and in a case of that kind, it was to be expected, as it actually proved, that the candour would be extreme and the criticism severe. So, too, when a Minister virtually leaves one party for the other, as the late Lord Derby himself did, nearly fifty years ago, on the question of appropriating some of the revenues of the Irish Church to more national purposes, it is natural to expect something more than candour and something more than severity in the attitude assumed towards former colleagues. Mr. Disraeli could hardly be called candid, even in the most unpleasant sense, towards Sir Robert Peel; and to speak of his criticisms as severe would be applying to the most unmeasured denunciation the language appropriate to caustic remark. So, too, when Lord John Russell turned Lord Palmerston out of office for not submitting his despatches to the Queen before sending them off, there was good reason to expect, what actually happened, that Lord Palmerston would take an early opportunity of turning the tables on Lord John Russell. These, however, are cases where the split either involved personal pique, or else involved a positive change of front on either the one side or the other, so that it was hardly possible for those who remained where they were not to accuse those who changed their principles, of something approaching to moral obliquity.

Where there is no question of mutual recriminations of this kind,—and certainly there has been no question of them on any of the matters dividing Mr. Goschen, the Duke of Argyll, Mr. Forster, and Mr. Bright from the present Cabinet,—it is difficult to understand what reason there can be for acrimony, unless on the coarse ground of political jealousy and envy,—the ground suggested in the picture referred to by Mr. Goschen of the starving boy, "out in the cold" himself, and looking in on the jolly Christmas fare which his old companions are sharing within. That politicians on the successful side who do not get office always resent being excluded from it, is, we believe, quite untrue, though we have no doubt that the influence and importance which belong to high office are usually, in spite of the responsibility and labour, more or less enjoyed by those who hold it, and more or less desired by those who do not hold it. Still, reasonable men do not lose their reasonableness simply because they would like to have what they have not got. Mr. Goschen knows perfectly well what the difficulty is which prevents his former colleagues from asking for his co-operation, and is quite content to admit the soundness of the reason; and the same may be said of the actual seceders. Each of them, no doubt, thinks that if his advice had been taken, the Cabinet would be on stronger ground than that on which it now stands; but each is aware that he cannot have the satisfaction both of putting his protest in a public and emphatic form, and also of continuing to co-operate with those who have rejected that protest. This being so, there is nothing left but either to give cordial support to the Government whenever they agree with it, or to gain the reputation of treating a Government from which they have once seriously dissented as so discredited by that dissent as to be quite unworthy of general confidence. That would not be a reasonable or creditable attitude to take up. And it is very much to the credit of the leading Liberals who stand aloof from the Government, that they have never attempted to take it up.

Mr. Forster's speech at Leeds shows him to be as honest and hearty in his general support of the Government from one side, as Mr. Goschen is in his support of it from the other. Mr. Goschen supports it from the point of view of a Liberal who rather distrusts democracy, and does not wish to see democracy more fully developed in this country than it already is. Mr. Forster supports it from the point of view of a Liberal who thoroughly trusts democracy, and who does wish to see democracy more or less fully developed in this country by the next Reform Bill. Here, then, we see, or think we see, where the cleavage between the Government and the Independent Liberals is very likely to increase, but to increase without any sort of discredit either to the Independent Liberals, on the one side, or to the Government, on the other. It may be taken for granted that Mr. Goschen will throw his whole weight into the scale of the most moderate view of Redistribution which can claim any Liberal authority at all. He will obviously adhere to Lord Hartington's view that the principle of Redistribution should not rest on mere numbers; that some regard should be taken, we will suppose, to the value of property held in any represented district; that some regard, too, should be had to variety in the kinds of interest represented, the less powerful interests having, for instance, something more than their numerical weight in the scale of representation, and the more powerful interests somewhat less. Doubtless, Mr. Goschen will also take into account indirect representation, as, for example, the moral influence of the Capital, and of the Press of the Capital, as a reason for assigning London less than its full numerical share of representatives in the House of Commons; and he will wish to be generous, for the same reason, in giving distant portions of the country, like Scotland and even Ireland, something more than their exact numerical share of representation. And indeed, generally, Mr. Goschen will deprecate any very extensive changes, and try to keep the redistribution within historical limits. If we understand Mr. Forster aright, he would throw his whole influence into the opposite school, into what may be called the school of the "electoral districts" principle, the school which would separate great cities into wards, and give each ward a single representative, the school which would make light of all considerations derived from the indirect representation of various interests, the school which would hardly even take property into account as a separate factor in considering the redistribution. We may fairly expect, too, that the Duke of Argyll will side in this matter with Mr. Goschen; while Mr. Bright will side probably with Mr. Forster. Here, then, we shall undoubtedly have a line of cleavage likely to widen, rather than to diminish,—but to widen on grounds of principle, and not in the least on those petty personal grounds of grudge to which the suspicions entertained of Independent Liberals so often refer. Mr. Goschen will probably become more Conservative than he would have been, had he been able to join the Cabinet and to take part in its discussions; Mr. Forster will probably become more democratic than he would have been, had he remained in the Cabinet and joined in its discussions. Each will lean more on his own view than he would have done had he remained associated with the responsibility of his colleagues, and each will, in consequence, be often regarded as to some extent influenced in fighting against the Cabinet, by political pique. For our own parts, we do not believe that that will have anything to do with the matter. Pique, when it really causes a break-up of a Cabinet, of course has its influence on the combinations of the future. But when it does not exist at first, we do not think that it springs up afterwards. Doubtless, Mr. Goschen and Mr. Forster will both go farther in their own direction, when isolated, than they would have gone had they remained under the collective influence of men whom they respected. But that will not be due to the influence of political grudge, but to the very natural effect of isolation in driving a man back upon the principle which has got the control of his own individual thought.

THE SCOTCH RAILWAY STRIKE.

THE attitude of the public towards a workmen's strike is usually determined by considerations with which personal interest has little to do. Occasionally, the consumer may suffer indirectly by an enforced cessation of work, but it is for the most part so slightly and after so long a time, that the prospect does not prevent him from giving his sympathy to the side to which it naturally inclines. If he is greatly impressed with the hard lot of the poor, and with the disadvantage at which the man who has nothing is placed when dealing with the capitalist, he wishes the workmen to win. If he has a strong feeling about the unreasonableness and the scamped work which are unfortunately too common faults with the artizan class, he wishes the masters to win. In no kind of controversy, perhaps, is it rarer to find the public deciding each case on its merits, without reference to previous considerations of this kind. The recent Strike on the Caledonian Railway differs from other strikes, in the very direct interest that the public have in the arrangement ultimately come to. The concessions demanded by the men were concessions which every one who travels by railway would, if he cares for his own safety, wish to see adopted on every line in the kingdom. There is no more fertile cause of accidents on Railways than over-length of hours. The human machine breaks down under undue pressure just as surely as any other machine, and the effects of its breaking-down are in all respects as disastrous. If a signalman or a pointsman has not all his wits about him, what is to ensure that he will not send on a train that he ought to have stopped, or allow a train to remain on the main line that he ought to have passed into a siding? Granting that there is no security under either of these heads except in the self-possession and recollectedness of the Company's servants, what chance is there that they will retain these qualifications in anything like full measure, after fourteen, or eighteen, or even twenty hours of continuous labour? Just none at all. Accidents may not happen, because even the human machine gets at last a kind of automatic action, which stands to it in the stead of judgment exercised on each individual case as it comes before it, but there is always a possibility of their happening. Railway Directors seem to have made up their minds to chance this. In order to guarantee their men against the possibility of being called upon to work very long hours, they must considerably enlarge their staff, and it would often happen that the larger staff would not be completely employed. The Directors are determined not to run the risk of losing money in this way. They prefer, apparently, to run the risk of occasionally losing it in the form of compensations for accidents. Possibly, in the long-run, there is as much lost in one shape as in the other, but it makes all the difference to the public which shape it takes. The thought of Lord Campbell's Act may minister some consolation to a passenger who feels his carriage going over an embankment, or ploughing its way into the side of a cutting; but when the accident is due to the blunder of a signalman who has been in his box for a day and half a night, the traveller would certainly prefer that the Company should have paid more in wages, and less in damages.

We claim no credit, therefore, for the admission that we are exceedingly sorry that in the Strike on the Caledonian Railway it is the men, and not the Directors, that have been beaten. That the men have been beaten there is no doubt at all. Efforts have been made in some of the speeches at their meetings to make out that a compromise has been arranged, but if so, it is a compromise of which the Company gets all the benefit. The proposals finally made by the men, described by their framers themselves as in the nature of a compromise, were three:—A definite promise that all the men should go back to their work, as they left it; a universal, or nearly universal, ten hours' day; and overtime, including Sunday labour, to be paid for at the rate of one hour and a quarter for every hour. These terms appear to us to have been such as the men were quite justified in asking, and such as the Directors ought themselves to have offered, before the men went out on strike. Ten hours a day is quite as much as a man who has the lives of others in his hands ought, as a rule, to work, and the only convenient way of securing that he shall not work more than this is to make it the interest of the Company not to keep him longer employed. The service of a great railway is so fertile in unexpected wants, that it is impossible to lay down an iron rule that every man engaged in it shall work so long, and no longer. Give the men a right to be paid after the ten hours' day is over fifteen pence for every shilling which they could otherwise claim, and you enlist the interest of the Company on the side of reasonable hours. In other trades, men do not, as a rule, work more than ten hours, though if they do, no harm will be done, except to themselves. On Railways, they seem habitually to work very much more, though the harm done may extend at any moment to the passengers in a crowded train. The Directors did not see matters in this light. Their counter-proposals were that the men should be reinstated in the places they had left, so far as this could be done without breaking faith with old servants who had stood by the Company and had been promoted, or with new men who had been engaged to fill vacancies; that ten hours should, where practicable, be made the ordinary working day, provided that the weekly wages be suitably readjusted; and that overtime should, as hitherto, be paid for at the ordinary rate. As regards Sunday duty, the General Manager and the Heads of Departments would confer with the men, and consider what they have to urge. From the point of view which we have taken—that of the public interest—it is evident that this so-called counter-proposal really comes to nothing. The Directors start with the declaration that a universal ten hours' day is impracticable, and they naturally claim to be the judges when it is practicable, and when not. But they refuse to submit to the only sanction which can in any way bind them to make it practicable, because they refuse to make overtime any more costly than ordinary time. That some readjustments may be made in the matter of Sunday duty is quite possible,—that may be only a concession to Scotch feeling about the Sabbath; but with this exception, we see no reason to suppose that the hours of work on the Caledonian Railway will be materially shorter in future than they have been hitherto. That is a result which affords ground for selfish as well as benevolent regret on the part of the travelling public.

In nearly every case except that of Railway Servants, interference with the hours that full-grown men choose to work is as much out of the question as interference with the wages that full-grown men choose to take. In fact, the two cases are really identical. One man may prefer working shorter hours at less wages, and another may prefer working longer hours at higher wages; but at bottom, it is the amount of wages that has to be decided, and unless particular trades are to become the monopolies of particular workmen, this must, in the long-run, depend on the proportion between the work that has to be done, and the number of men qualified and anxious to do it. The only exceptions are those in which the interference of Parliament for the protection of women and children has incidentally limited the number of hours for adult males. But where Railway labour is concerned, a very strong case may be made out for legislative action. A railway company undertakes to carry passengers with all reasonable precautions for their safe conveyance. Among these reasonable precautions are certainly included the employment of properly qualified servants; and no servant, however well trained in the first instance, can be held to answer to this description after he has worked more than a reasonable number of hours. Consequently, if Railway Companies do, as a matter of fact, insist on employing them for more than a reasonable number of hours, we know of no reason why they should not be restrained from doing so by Act of Parliament. If it is said that their own self-interest will ensure that they will not over-work their men, the answer is that universal testimony goes to show that they are not restrained by this consideration. The temptation not to have more men on their staff than they are certain of always finding full work for is more than they can resist. It would be much better in every way that the limitation of hours should be effected by the automatic action of a rule about payment for overtime, than by legislation. The interests both of employers and workmen would be better consulted, while those of the public would be sufficiently secured. It is because we think this, that we warn Railway Directors not to reject all proposals for a practical limitation of hours, in the way they have hitherto done. If they do not concede such a limitation willingly, they are exceedingly likely to have it imposed upon them by law. That is not a precedent we are at all anxious to see created, but if Railway Directors do not take care, created it will certainly be.

MURDEROUS FANATICISM.

IS there any decrease in the respect felt by the educated for the sanctity of Human Life? To a good many of our readers, especially those who attend chiefly to English opinion, that question will seem either self-answered, or superfluous. They will say that, of course, there is none, the mental process visible in the world being rather the other way. Every murder creates more, not less, horror among the educated, the aversion to massacre has risen to heights before undreamed of, the cultivated opponents of capital punishment grow more numerous, and the horror of inflicting death even in war begins distinctly to affect politics. Judges often lay little plots to avoid taking circuits when they may have to pass death sentences, politicians avoid threats of inflicting death with a conscious aversion, and denunciations of any waste of human life formerly reserved for the pulpit appear in the most popular papers without exciting any feeling, except sympathy. The evidence seems all to drift one way, yet those who watch the progress of the world, especially out of England, shake their heads, question if the sanctity of human life is increasingly felt, even by the educated, and certainly have some reason to give for the doubt that is in them. Nothing is more striking or more sinister in our days than the kind of temper revealed among the educated in such narratives as the history of the Russian Nihilist trials, the sketches of the Anarchist prosecutions in France, the verbatim reports of mass meetings in Ireland, the letters on the causes of the Socialist émeutes in Vienna. It is a constant feature of those stories that some educated man, often what is technically termed "a gentleman," occasionally a man of impressive or, if we may so misuse words, of gentle character, avows that in theory he goes even beyond the violent, that he sees no objection to dynamite, that he holds the objection to assassination sentimental, that, in fact, he has no respect for human life at all, if it stands in the way of the realisation of his ideas. Only last week, a man, presumably an English gentleman, sent a letter to the St. James's Gazette which read to ourselves, at any rate, as if he held this view, under cover of the milder one that the view was intelligible; and we have strong reason to believe that even in England he is not absolutely alone. At all events, on the Continent such persons exist, and in numbers which, if any leading Red would state them, would, we believe, be pronounced by our readers absolutely incredible. The excessive alarm of the Sovereigns is not so foolish as many optimists fancy, nor is the Vatican in its denunciations of Secret Societies moved entirely by its indignation at the breach of Confessional law. There is no reason to doubt, certainly we do not doubt, that all over the Continent respect for life is ceasing to bind an increasing number of educated persons, who, even when they join no Societies, defend, when they are free to speak, Assassination as a weapon natural to the weak, as justifiable in their hands, and as only condemned in its entirety by those who are anxious to prop up existing institutions.

This is a very noteworthy phenomenon, and one which we do not think is quite explained by the usual arguments. The "passion of pity" is often quoted as the explanation, and no doubt such a passion exists; but why, just now, does it rise to such unprecedented heights? There are people oppressed, of course, and the very poor are very miserable, and Utopian ideas are prevalent; but why do these things provoke men to justify assassination more than they did? The world is not more miserable than it was. Governing men are distinctly less oppressive. Institutions, bad and good, have obviously grown weaker. Prince Krapotkine says he saw misery in London, but what would he have thought had he seen London, say, in Hogarth's time, or just before the Corn Laws were swept away? Think of the misery in Manchester before the Factory Acts, or in Staffordshire before female labour was regulated in the mines. As to the Kings, the Emperor Nicholas, whom we all remember, would have met the Nihilists with decrees of execution by the knout; while as to institutions, courts of justice everywhere have grown gentler, the Church is almost inclined to deny the occurrence of autos da fe, and armies invade like machines, instead of like murderous mobs. The progress is fearfully slow, but still there is progress. Nor is it certain that the increase of the consciousness of human misery explains the change. We doubt if the consciousness has increased of late, if the modern philanthropists feel more than the old, if they are in that respect so far beyond the French "Sentimentalists" of the Revolution, the American Abolitionists, or the men among ourselves who fought with Clarkson, Zachary Macaulay, or Lord Shaftesbury, in his earlier days. And even granting that it is so, why does consciousness take this line, instead of the older one of benevolence and tenderness for life. The recent notion of the pessimist philanthropists was that embodied most fully in the Quakers, and involved a reluctance to take life often unreasonable, a belief in "reformation" often dreamy, a hatred of cruelty which sometimes protected the ill-doer. The tendency of the Utopians forty, thirty, even twenty years ago, was towards wooliness; now, it is towards a steely hardness constantly liable at the slightest friction to emit flame. Is it because religious belief is decaying? That, no doubt, is partly true, for it is impossible to regard the sanctity of life in an animal as equal to the sanctity of life in a human being, and under the Continental form of negation man becomes only a superior animal. You are not killing a creature with a soul. Nevertheless, the old unbelievers did not, as a rule, exhibit this temper. The executions under the Reign of Terror in France were murders in a sense, but still they were murders sanctioned by legal authority. Danton possibly consented to the massacres of September, but no Terrorist, except Marat, ever openly advocated assassination, and the Revolutionaries shrank from him because he did so. The natural impulse of an Atheist is either to deify Humanity, and so raise man-killing into a great crime; or to declare that, as man has but one life, nothing can justify any authority—Utopian Committee included—in depriving him of it. The readiness to sanction assassination as one sanctions a vote, as a mere method of attaining the end sought, is new, and is the most perplexing of all new developments.

We believe that the explanation, which we beforehand admit to be most difficult, must be sought in an indirect effect of the decay of religion, the enormous additional strength which, in some minds, that decay gives to the grip of other abstract ideas, of other fanaticisms. The unbeliever is not necessarily a Sadducee; he may be a man whose incapacity of fanaticism extends only to supernatural ideas. The minds of many unbelievers are craving for certainties, for faiths which shall be sufficient under all contingencies, which shall raise them out of care for their own lives or other men's, and they ultimately arrive at them. Social ideas take the grip of them which religion should have done, and master all opposing forces until the proportions of all things to each other undergo a change. Deeply religious men seldom hold their own lives very dear, and in many religions disregard also the lives of others. The Covenanters' habitual phrase, "Faithful even unto slaying," comes to them as a revelation, and in comparison with the victory of their creeds, lives are scarcely anything. That was the temper alike of the honest Inquisitor, the honest Covenanter, the honest Spaniard in the New World; and it is the temper of the new idealogue, intensified as regards assassination by the positive side of his faith. The essence of the faith of every Socialist, Collectivist, or Anarchist is, and must be, that the individual is nothing, compared with the community; that if any are to suffer, it should be the few; that the individual is an object of suspicion; that the right to exist, if your existence injures a multitude, is an aristocratic pretension. So holding, having lost the notion that God forbids murder, and having also lost the feeling that life is important in comparison with ideas, he is driven by a relentless logic to the opinion that when the victory of ideas is concerned, the individual has no rights to be pleaded in opposition, and especially not the right, in itself so unimportant, to keep alive. Life assumes the aspect of a privilege enjoyed to the injury of the community or of the Idea, and it is taken away as readily, and often with as little passion, as a title, or a prerogative, or an unjustifiable possession would be taken. Of course, as in every other case, logic is all the more rigid because it agrees with self-interest, and the king's life or the capitalist's is all the more readily taken, because in the taker's view monarchy is thereby weakened, or the régime of the dominance of labour brought more near. Against such a mental process as this, education is no defence, and indeed it may, in some few cases, be a nourishing force, the non-receptivity which protects the ignorant from the dominance of ideas being in many men weakened by instruction. The man who is carried away by an abstract idea till he seems to those around him half-mad, and sees "men as trees walking," is rarely or never in our modern world a man who cannot read. The educated man who would fifty years ago have been a priest, and as such have risked his life in Missionary work, or have sanctioned slaughter that an evil like piracy might stop, to-day often becomes an idealogue, with anarchy as his road to a vaguely-glowing future, with a total carelessness of his own life, except so far as it is valuable to his Idea, and with a notion that the life of any one else who actively resists his view is a privilege which ought, whenever expedient, to be summarily taken away. We should use dynamite to blow up a dangerous house. The Anarchist does not see why a dangerous life is different in kind.

THE FRONTIERS OF MADNESS.

DR. BALL has delivered a lecture recently at Paris, of which the St. James's Gazette gave an interesting account last Wednesday, on "The Frontiers of Madness," a frontierland on which he appears to think that a vast number of us, who never cross the frontier, habitually reside. Apparently, however, Dr. Ball, like most physicians who have given their minds to this subject, has not applied any very satisfactory test of deviation from right reason, since he seems to regard any kind of irregularity of impression, whether yielded to or not yielded to by the will, whether tested or not tested by the intellect, a danger-signal pointing to some inclination of the constitution towards madness. Thus, he regards all eccentrics as on the confines of madness, and yet expressly admits that in this borderland have dwelt a great many of the creative minds which have left their mark on their age, and by their creative activity "have saved nations, where they have not ruined them." This seems to us a very rough and blundering sort of analysis. You might almost as well class a man who, because his optic nerve is wholly destroyed, cannot see what other people see, as dwelling on the borderland of insanity, as class amongst the insane a man who, because his optic nerve is irritable and morbidly active, sees phantasmagoria which he knows to be illusions and dismisses calmly as illusions, after looking out for the tests which discriminate these misleading visions of his from the objects which he sees in common with other people. Surely, the test not merely of insanity, but of an approach to insanity, is not to be found in any degree in the senses of man, which are frequently deranged by defects wholly unconnected with any deficiency of common-sense, but in the judgment. We should say that any man who is daily misjudging more and more the weight to be assigned to his own impressions, whether of things inward or things outward, is approaching that borderland; while a man who to himself appears both to hear and see what no one else hears and sees, but retains his absolute control over the significance, or rather appreciates fully the insignificance, of these impressions, as grounds for inference or action, is not approaching that frontier at all. We should think it a far more serious symptom of disturbed reason that a man's vanity is becoming inordinate, that he attaches more and more importance every year to his own thoughts and actions, as compared with the thoughts and actions of the rest of the world, than we should that he saw visions like Lalorgne de Savigny, well knowing them to be illusive, since they annoyed him so much that he preferred living in the dark, to being tormented by them in the light. Of course, the very fact that Lalorgne de Savigny attached so much importance to what he knew to be illusions, that he cut himself off from all the advantages which the light brings with it, in order to avoid seeing these visions, was itself a much more unhealthy sign than the mere fact of seeing them, for the former indicated a disturbed judgment; and, as we maintain, it is the degree in which the judgment is disturbed which measures the approach to insanity. But then, the irritation felt against the illusive appearance is not, in our opinion, half so dangerous a sign of disturbed judgment as a rapid growth of self-importance which tends to extinguish all due appreciation of the weight to be attached to other and sounder judgments. You might almost as well regard the passing of dark spots before the eye—a well-known sign of a wearied optic nerve—as a sign of failing reason, as regard elaborate phantasmagoria recognised as phantasmagoria as constituting such a sign. Indeed, most men in perfect stillness can hear sounds, or what seem to them sounds, which no one else can hear. But the moment they recognise that these sounds are either in their own ears, or, if really due to vibrations of the atmosphere, are due to vibrations not perceptible to every auditory nerve,—just as dogs certainly perceive vibrations which most men do not perceive, and are sometimes very curiously affected by them,—the moment they recognise that their affection is individual only, and is not to be regarded as common to them with the rest of mankind, that moment they take up a perfectly reasonable position with respect to these individual affections of the ear, and can in no way be regarded as on the way to a disturbed mental condition. A thoroughly conceited scorn for everybody's judgment that does not agree with a man's own judgment, is a far sarer indication of mental perverseness than any eccentricity of sense, however great, which the judgment only accepts for what it is worth, as a singular phenomenon, possibly deserving consideration, or possibly not deserving it, just as the context of facts may seem to suggest.

Dr. Ball comes much nearer the mark, when he regards very eager, even though not quite uncontrollable, impulses of an unreasoned and unreasonable kind as indications of proximity to mental disease, because such very eager even though not quite uncontrollable impulses do grievously threaten the balance of the judgment. The painter who consulted Dr. Ball on the temptation, which he found almost overpowering, to throw into the fire his own very child whom he was tenderly nursing in an attack of croup; and this even in the very midst of his fervent prayers that the child might be permitted to recover from its illness, was clearly threatened with a grave danger, in case either of his will losing its power, —or what was perhaps more dangerous, losing its vigilance, so that such an impulse might catch him unawares. In the same way, the kleptomaniac who feels a very eager, even though not quite irresistible, desire to possess himself unlawfully of property which he might easily obtain in any quantity by lawful means, without sacrificing anything which he really values,—there is one case of a well-to-do man who was a kleptomaniac only in relation to clothes-pegs,—is clearly threatened with a subversion of his judgment, unless he keeps his will always vigilant and always firm. So, too, the alleged desire of some people to throw themselves over a precipice, or to offend society by calling out insulting words on solemn occasions, is obviously a danger to the practical reason of the men who feel it, if at least it is not merely a morbid fancy but an urgent temptation. But we cannot conceive a case in which, while the judgment remains clear and firm, and is not bewildered in the least by the eccentricity of the sensitive or perceptive phenomena with which it has to deal, there is any approach to the frontiers of insanity. That approach may be made, nay, the border may be fairly passed, without the least illusion or liability to illusion of the senses. Directly a man begins to cherish the notion that he is in some sense the centre of the Universe,—that everything depends on him, and is ordered mainly to contribute to his importance or glorification, or to his persecution and vilification,—he is approaching the frontier of madness much more closely than he ever would through the mere trickery of the senses, his power to check and cross-examine their false reports remaining undiminished. Coleridge, when asked whether he believed in ghosts, used to say that he had seen far too many to believe in them,—meaning that he had had too much experience of the illusions to which the senses are liable, at times when he was perfectly conscious that they were playing him tricks, to let his judgment be biassed by such appearances. Well, that is, as we understand it, the condition of a thoroughly rational mind, just as the allowance made by a man who is blind and deaf for the constant errors into which his blindness and deafness must lead him, is the evidence of a thoroughly rational mind. You are no nearer the frontiers of insanity for excess of sensation or seeming perception, than you are for deficiency of sensation or perception; that which brings you near it is only incompetence to judge soberly of your own excesses or deficiencies of experience,—your disposition to attach an overweening importance to purely personal impressions, especially if you have had good reason to distrust yourself whenever your impressions were in conflict with the impressions of others. Men of genius, on the contrary, often have good ground to trust themselves, even though their impressions are in conflict with those of other men, and in their case sanity is shown by self-confidence, and not by self-distrust, so far, at least, as the limitations under which self-confidence is warranted are closely observed and carefully attended to. But, in any case, the frontier-land of insanity is the region of tottering judgment, not the region of either redundant or deficient sensation and perception.

BOOK-MAKING.

THE term "Book-making" has, within the last few years, acquired a peculiar and somewhat opprobrious significance. To be called a book-maker is, with the vast majority of writers, to be hurt in the deepest and most susceptible part of the feelings. If the designation be unjust, it is taken almost as an insult; while the veteran book-maker himself feels the appellation to be, to say the least, unkind. To call a man a "book-maker," in its modern sense, is similar to calling an orange-seller a "woman," or an athlete a "pot-boiler," and apparently arouses similarly hostile feelings, and, perhaps, expressions.

Books may be, for convenience, generically divided into those which have been originated and those which have been made. But, as with all natural systems of classification, there are many books which, lying in the Tom Tiddler's land between these two genera, cannot fairly be placed with either. Such include works containing a small amount of original writing much diluted with and obscured by a vast amount of introduced padding. Many books of travel—and we have had several lately—are instances of this species. The traveller, having been to the country, records his experiences only after he has completely saturated himself with the accounts of previous travellers, whose material he dishes up for the edification of the reader with anything but piquant sauce of his own. Or, again, there is the biography, which, after starting in the most business-like manner with the habitat and date of birth of the hero, and of his ancestors for some generations back, goes straight off into page after page of quotation from his works or letters, with, perhaps, a line merely of original matter between each to act as a sort of moral gum, and ending oftentimes abruptly with a short eulogy and the date of his death. Several of the so-called books of science—primers, and even more pretentious volumes—are merely jellies, concentrated beef-teas made out of other material. They cannot give within their compass the whole facts, or the reasoning by which the deductions which they do mention have been arrived at, and attempting to give a "boiling-down" of the entire subject, miserably fail, and are most unsatisfying. But when one comes across the work of the genuine book-maker, there is no mistake. Distinctness, deliberateness, and oftentimes wonderful perseverance and ingenuity meet us on every page. It may be the one hundred and fifty thousand quotations by one hundred and fifty thousand authors, each classified under a large-type heading, and carefully indexed, that excites our surprise, and increases our belief in the capabilities of mankind. Or we may come across a gaudily-arrayed volume, under some such title as, "Spicy Bits for Odd Half-hours," and find on opening it that we have presented to our notice the medley of a considerable number of scissors-and-gum cuttings from such authors as Bunyan, Byron, Combe, Cowper, Mill, Milton, Prescott, Gibbon, Shelley, Tupper, Swift, Smiles, Sterne, Darwin, Machiavelli, Paley, Boccaccio, Locke, Fielding, and Kingsley. We take the names from the list of authors in a book of this kind now before us, the extracts in which are arranged so promiscuously as to afford the most delightful and humorous contrasts. The passage entitled "The Merry Devil of Edmonton" rubs shoulders with "Mental Stimulus necessary to Exercise;" "Duelling" is followed by the "Death of Pliny the Younger," and the "Luxury of the Roman Nobles" is closely associated with "The Pains of Opium." In most of these books the snippings seem to have been made without any regard to context. Beginning abruptly, ending abruptly, the excerpts are likely to become hopelessly jumbled up in the mind with the names of the various authors, and if the ingenious youth or maiden (for it may be presumed for such these books are made) does not grow up associating the name of Darwin with divinity, of Tupper with science, and of Gibbon with poetry, it must be due more to good luck than to good guidance.

There can be no questioning the fact that books produced by the many processes of book-making are greatly on the increase. The mass of the public, in the high-pressure life of the present day, have no time to read through complete works; they have little time for any reading at all, and what little they do read must be short, pithy, and interesting. Never were the works of Shakespeare, Scott, Milton, and others less read than now, and yet never were trite quotations from these authors more numerous or commonly known. The demand will always regulate the supply, and judging by the enormous, and still increasing, number of books of quotations, concentrated lives, short histories, gems from the poets, and such-like volumes turned out from our presses, the demand must be steadily on the increase. There are several reasons for this marked phenomenon in the literature of our day. Education has become far more general and widely diffused. The number of people who can read is not far below that of the population. The great mass of people just beneath the middle-class are awakening to the fact that some book-knowledge is required for advancement in life, and they naturally turn to cheap books of the sort we have indicated, rather than to original works and learned theses which they could not comprehend. And last, but not least, the publication of books of this class suits the publishers. Original works, unless by writers well known to the public, are liable to fall flat upon the market. In any case, some time must elapse before the scope and intention of a new work of science, theology, ethics, or philosophy become generally known, and the publisher's return for his outlay is, consequently, proportionately long in being received. This makes him exceedingly chary in embarking in anything that looks at all prononcé or out of the common. Only a small fractional per-centage of such high-class books reach popular and cheap editions, and, when it is remembered that the remunerative branch of a publisher's business consists in being able to produce large numbers of copies at one printing, and selling the whole edition out quickly, it can readily be understood why publishers foster book-making. A book of well selected quotations from popular authors, a painstakingly compiled cookery-book, a volume of representative historical extracts, a searching "confessions-book," or a good, hotch-potch joke-book, can be printed by the thousand and disposed of in a short time. Who shall tell the number of Birthday Registers, each with quotations from one or many authors, that now occupy so prominent a place in every bookseller's shop? Charles Lamb bitterly complained, in his day, of the nuisance to him of young ladies' albums. Had he lived now, he would have been pestered to write his name in the birthday-book of every young lady he came across. Of this class of book, those with Biblical texts seem to obtain most of the popular favour. We have a specimen before us of which, it is said, 150,000 copies have been sold; and we know of another, which, though published only a few months, has galloped through an edition of 70,000 copies. These books cost little to produce, very little is spent in advertising them, they are bought by the multitude, by even the illiterate, and therefore they are exceedingly profitable to both printer, binder, and publisher.

But there is another class of book to which we have not yet alluded. Several of the most eminent firms of publishers in France, Germany, the United States, as well as in our own country, employ a regular staff of wood engravers. These skilled workmen are constantly engaged in turning out illustrations, and many are made irrespective of any accompanying letterpress. The bookmaker here comes upon the scene, and taking the illustrations, he weaves them together in the form of tales, novels, school-books, nursery-books, illustrated volumes of extracts, and a great many of what are termed drawing-room-table books. Electrotypes impressions of wood blocks are sold by one publisher to another, and by one country to another. The process of manufacturing books of this class is usually simple, but some knack and judgment is required to hide the art. The number of books that yearly appear thus written up to or compiled to suit existing illustrations would astonish the uninitiated. And yet we cannot afford to scoff unreservedly at such publications, remembering that the immortal "Pickwick Papers" has to be classed in this category. Some of the most successful and deservedly popular books have been written under these conditions, and not one reader in a thousand has guessed or even hinted at the mode of production. The professional bookmaker (frequently called a "hack" by the Philistines) is a plodding, methodical, industrious individual, of whom the Reading-room at the British Museum generally affords several interesting specimens, both male and female. If he have sufficient originality to propose novel arrangements, happy combinations, and taking titles, he can earn a good livelihood, for at present there is no limit to the demand in this special direction. We know of one bookmaker alone who up to the present time (he is still vigorous and productive) has initiated over two hundred volumes.

We have by no means exhausted the list of books which fall under the head of Bookmaking. There are far more books in circulation now of this class than of books which are the result of original thought and research, of spontaneous effort and brilliant genius. Though, on the one hand, bookmakers and their works afford a frequent source of merriment, yet, on the other hand, they are worthy of something more than mere frivolous attention and comment. The enormous number of books of this kind annually poured out over the country, and absorbed by the masses, the vast employment of capital and labour required to produce them, and the influence for good or evil which they must exercise on the population, are matters of not small importance. It is a good sign of the times that these books are, almost without exception, excellent in tone, of undoubted morality, and if weak and sickly in constitution, at least perfectly innocuous.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

POLITICS IN NORWAY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In some foreign newspapers, there has, of late, appeared every now and then rather alarming news from Norway. The Storthing, or National Assembly, is represented as being not far from rebellion, on the point of proclaiming the Republic, dissolving the union with Sweden, &c. I need not say that all this is mere wild talk, akin to the romantic story told in grave earnest in French papers, and recently reproduced in the Graphic, of the poet Bjornstjerne Bjornson being exiled, because he had challenged the King, Oscar II., if I do not err, on account of literary rivalry! The fact is, however, that our country for the present is going through the most trying crisis since the birth of our liberty in 1814, and a short account of the events that have produced it may, perhaps, be of some interest to an English public. The present conflict between the Crown and the Storthing, though its deeper roots must be sought farther back, may conveniently be said to take its origin in the year 1871, when the Storthing carried a Bill inviting the Ministers to be present at the meetings of the Storthing, as the case is in other constitutional countries. This reform has a curious history. Originally it belonged to the (Conservative) programme of the Right, and from 1821 it was repeatedly proposed, though always rejected by the majority of the Storthing. This chiefly consisted of peasants, who were naturally more jealous of the superior Parliamentary skill and experience of the Government party, and did not like to see it strengthened in the debate by the Ministers' weight and authority. By-and-by, however, becoming conscious of the vast power which the Constitution placed in the hands of the freeholders, and gaining more experience and ability under the guidance of talented and energetic leaders, they began to look differently at the matter, and see the great advantage to be derived from constant oral communication between the executive and legislative powers. But now the reform was opposed by the Government, who feared that it would make the Ministry wholly dependent on the majority, and, in fact, lead to pure parliamentarism, a word which has become quite a bugbear in the eyes of our Conservatives. At last, in 1872, a Bill about the Ministers' presence in the Storthing was carried by 80 against 29, or more than the qualified majority of two-thirds required for changes in the Constitution. The King refused his sanction, but to the next Storthing a royal proposition was presented, containing a list of proposed Constitutional changes which were considered necessary guarantees to balance the reform, and intimated as the condition for a mutual agreement. These propositions did not obtain a single vote, the Conservatives thinking the guarantees insufficient, and the Liberals looking upon them as little short of an insult. A vote of censure was carried against the Ministry, and their dismissal was demanded, but the King again refused.

A paragraph in our Constitution says that if three different Storthings—the Members sit for a period of three years—abide by a proposition without any alteration, it is to be law, even if the King refuses his sanction. By this way the Storthing now tried to make good its will. Twice more the Bill was carried, the last time by 90 against 23! There might now have been a reasonable end to the conflict; the will of the country had expressed itself unmistakably; the thing had been discussed for more than sixty years. The King took the fateful step of refusing his sanction, and a new struggle arose, more fierce than any before, and on a quite new and different ground, the nature of the King's veto. The general opinion now even among our Conservatives outside the small fraction of the intransigents of the Extreme Right is, that it was a deplorable mistake not to acquiesce in the will of the people on this occasion. A Bishop of the Conservative party declared it in the Storthing to be the greatest political blunder in our Constitutional history. But public attention has now been wholly engrossed by a new and more far-reaching controversial question.

The only veto, expressly mentioned in our Constitution, is the suspensive, above hinted at, in conformity with the French Constitution of 1792, and the Spanish of 1812,—its nearest models. Now, it was maintained by the Crown that besides this, which is said to be meant only for common laws, an absolute veto in Constitutional questions does rightly belong to the King. Although its existence was declared to be raised "above doubt," it was found expedient to submit the question to the decision of the faculty of law at our University. This fell out in favour of the Crown's claim. Space does not allow me to enter into the criticism to which the decision of the learned Professors has been exposed. I shall only state that the most prominent man of the Conservative Party—the Premier in the Ministry, Mr. Stang—himself formerly a lecturer in jurisprudence, has denied its existence; that there is not a single word about an absolute veto in the Constitution, and that the indirect proofs were ridiculed by one of the most prominent members of the faculty itself. The chief argument was derived from the nature of the matter. All over the country a singularly vehement protest arose from the Liberals, and the general indignation found an expression in the famous resolution of the 9th of June, 1881. In this the Storthing declared the Bill about the Ministers' presence at its meetings, thrice carried by the legal majority, to be "valid law in the kingdom of Norway." This must be admitted to be a rash and inconsiderate step, the proclaiming of laws naturally belonging to the Executive; and, by moderate Liberals, a vote of censure was proposed instead of it, but they did not get a hearing in the heat of debate. As might have been foreseen, the resolution of the 9th of June was met by a firm protest from the Crown, and this only considerably widened the gulf between the contending parties. The Crown's claim for an absolute veto has been pushed farther. Lately, it was employed to frustrate the permanent sitting, the Storthing's appointment of a Parliamentary Committee, and even some of its financial arrangements.

Besides these leading questions, there is nearly on all points a general difference of opinion between the Government and the Representation. The other reforms of the Liberal programme, such as the introduction of juries, a reasonable extension of the right of suffrage (owing to the want of which a curious class of artificial voters have appeared of late, founding their right of voting on any patch of soil of mere nominal value, the so-called Meormen, undoubtedly against the spirit of our Constitution, though it does not infringe on its letter), a reorganisation of our Army on the model of the Swiss system of militia, are all met by an unyielding resistance on the side of the Government. As little regard is paid by the Liberals to the guarantees claimed by the Crown, as the right of dissolving the Storting, which seems but a reasonable demand, and the fond wish for the creation of an Upper House, of which, however, there is, for all practical ends, a very serviceable equivalent in the Lagthing, one of the two divisions of the Storting, by whom all Bills proposed in the Odelsting have to be approved. Thus matters stand at present. The new elections have returned to the Storting, which is to be opened on February 2nd, a more formidable Liberal majority than ever, ready to use all the means placed in their hands by the Constitution to maintain their will, for instance, the refusing of the Budget, already adopted to a great extent in the last Storting, and perhaps impeaching the Ministers before a Parliamentary Tribunal, a rather unwieldy and questionable weapon, only used a few times in our constitutional history. On the other hand, the King's Speech at the adjournment of the last Storting, irritating in its rebuke, does not give much promise of a reconciliation. Several ways to effect one have been suggested, and it may be fairly hoped that with a little mutual good-will one may be found. The present situation of the country, with its fierce and narrow party-spirit, obstructing all real progress, a Ministry representing for more than ten years a decided minority of the people, while on all essential points it is hopelessly at variance with the great mass of the people, has become well-nigh intolerable.—I am, Sir, &c., T.

CONSECRATED GROUND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It is a curious proof of the ignorance about Church matters which is to be found among Nonconformists, that so cultivated and capable a person as Mr. Baldwin Brown should suppose the consecration of Churchyards to arise from the eagerness of Churchmen "to entrench their graves from chance contact with the body of a Christian Nonconformist." In a long experience, I have never met with a Churchman who entertained so strange a desire. Your correspondent himself gives a most rational account of the matter when he tells you that "the awe which surrounded consecrated things and places of old protected them from violation, and the cause of order and civilisation was largely served by it." It is surely intelligible that some respect for consecrated things and persons may still survive, and that the cause of civilisation may still be served by its survival. Some religio loci is a part of the general sentiment of mankind; consecration expresses it in a Christian form. Almost all men wish the resting-places of their departed to be cared for; the Christian Church commits them to the care of God. To ask his blessing on the "mere soil" is not more superstitious than to ask it on the food we take at our daily meals. Both petitions will appear superstitious to some minds. The real ground of the objection in both cases—though your correspondent does not perceive it—is the disbelief in the efficacy of prayer, or sometimes even in the existence of God.

There is also a legal aspect of consecration, which should not be overlooked. The law, it used to be said, takes no notice of churches or chapels before they are consecrated. Churches are places in which certain acts are allowed, or required, to be done—certain persons allowed, or required, to minister, and the question arises whether this, or that, place is one in which the jurisdiction over these matters is in force. A "sentence" of consecration by proper authority marks out such places as places to which the law applies, and in which the conditions prescribed by law must be fulfilled. No one imagines that a sentence of consecration alters the nature of the soil; that it affects the use of it, in some material particulars, is beyond a doubt.

After all, is it not enough to say that a religious society thinks it well to dedicate and protect places of burial by a religious rite? We do not quarrel with Nonconformists for holding "every clod" to be consecrated; why should they quarrel with us for consecrating some particular clods, to which we believe the principle of separation to apply? To avoid misconception,

I may as well say that I have always spoken, written, and voted in support of the Burials Act.—I am, Sir, &c.,

EPISCOPUS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I gladly believe, with you, that "most Churchmen" are in favour of the Burial Act. Would that you could say the same of most clergymen who, under present arrangements, represent the mind of the Church!—though there is a noble minority, and, I hope, a growing one. May God increase it. I think that it would grow more quickly, if truly large-hearted and liberal men like Dr. Tait were not so rare in the high places of the Church. But let that pass. My point is that the consecration of the ground in which Churchmen rest is insisted upon, before they can lie with Nonconformists within the boundary walls of a common graveyard, as a recent incident in the West of England, to which I do not wish just now to refer more pointedly, has somewhat painfully reminded us. Some of us would be very glad to know what is thought to be behind this idea of "consecrated ground," and what privilege or advantage consecration is supposed in these days to confer. It is possible that some of your able and learned correspondents may feel moved to explain it, not by Church law or Church tradition, but by sound reason, Christian sentiment, and the Word of God.

And believe me, that it is for the sake of peace, and not of controversy, that I venture to submit the question, for I fear that so long as Churchmen maintain and magnify these distinctions, which seem to us so utterly un-Christian and unreal, they will generate discord where so many of us on both sides are seeking to establish harmony, and will aggravate the irritations which we so earnestly long to allay.—I am, Sir, &c.,

J. BALDWIN BROWN.

NATIONAL LIFE IN A MUSSULMAN COUNTRY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In his able speech at Ripon last Monday Mr. Goschen said that "even M. Gambetta, Liberal as he was, was utterly unable to persuade himself for one moment that anything could be done in the direction of developing national life in a Mussulman country." Mr. Goschen himself seems to be of a different opinion, and his special acquaintance with the Mussulman system gives great authority to whatever he says on that subject. But does not history bear out M. Gambetta's view? Is there an instance on record of a national life, developed under Mussulman rule? I do not know of one. Islam has ever been fatal to freedom and civilisation. Lord Ripon's laudable efforts to develop self-government in India are not in point, for in India the paramount Power is not Mohammedan; and that makes a radical difference. A Mussulman ruler, wielding independent sway, must govern in accordance with the tenets of the Sacred Law of Islam; and that law, wherever it prevails, is an insuperable barrier against human progress. Its inevitable tendency is towards the extinction of national life and the absorption of all its votaries in one vast cosmopolitan theocracy. The true Mussulman acknowledges only one country,—Dar-ul-Islam, the home of Islam.

I do not urge this as a reason why England should undertake the government of Egypt, for this country has no special mission to reform Mussulman territories. But it is well to cherish no illusions. Egypt under uncontrolled Mussulman rule will be no exception to Mussulman rule all over the world. Every Mussulman State, as Amari says, "bears the germ of inevitable dissolution in its system;" and the progress in Egypt under Mussulman rule will not be towards nationalism, but towards decay, tyranny, and anarchy.—I am, Sir, &c., MALCOLM MACCOLL.

BISHOP FRASER AND THE RITUALISTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The Bishop of Manchester has often been twitted with his inconsistency in denouncing Ritualists for breaking the law, whilst breaking it himself in not wearing a cope. This is how he has defended himself.

At first, he flatly refused to wear a cope, because "he did not wish to make a guy of himself." Then he said that he would wear one, if the Archbishop of York ordered him to do so. And now he says that he does wear one, and that his black chimes is a vestment as the law prescribes. I need hardly point out that this last plea, if true, proves too much, viz., that he wears the vestment when not celebrating the Holy Communion.

It is a sad thing that a man with so many good qualities should descend at last to quibbles like these. When I think of the good work he did when he first came here, and the enthusiasm he aroused, and contrast it with the contempt and disgust his actions are now provoking in this diocese, "O the pity o't!"—I am, Sir, &c., L.

RITUALISTIC LOGIC.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—If the Ritualists, as a body, are prepared to endorse the opinion expressed by "A. H. W.," that "the whole principle of the Mass and Auricular Confession is involved" in the provision that, to a certain order of men is given the exclusive right of celebrating the Lord's Supper and pronouncing absolution, the sooner this is generally understood, the better. No compromise is possible between those who believe the Mass and Confession to be of divine necessity, and those who believe the one to be a "blasphemous fable," and the other to be a "dangerous deceit." But I would fain hope that the Ritualists in general are not quite so ready as "A. H. W." to draw large conclusions from small premises. It would be as logical to affirm that the Act of Settlement involves the whole principle of the divine right of Kings, because it gives to the House of Hanover the sole right of succeeding to the Crown.—I am, Sir, &c., G.

MR. DENING AND CHURCH MISSIONS IN JAPAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Edward White's letter in your issue of January 20th, I must ask you to allow me to state that Mr. Dening has made no "refusal" to teach the dogmas named by Mr. White, for the simple reason that the Committee have neither formulated such dogmas, nor required him or any of their Missionaries to teach them. It is Mr. Dening who has embraced one of the many modern theories on the subject, and demanded the Society's explicit sanction to his publicly teaching that one theory as the truth.

The practical theory is that commonly known as "conditional immortality," and the annihilation of the wicked. This explicit sanction the Committee felt unable to give; and finding that Mr. Dening was fully minded to teach the theory publicly, as a Missionary of the Society, they had no choice but to disconnect him. The Sub-Committee, with which Mr. Dening had an interview, was an influential mixed Committee of laymen and clergymen. Several laymen were present at the interview, the President, the Earl of Chichester, being in the chair.

We find that information of the kind that was needed in order to deal with Mr. Dening's case is far more satisfactorily obtained by interviews conducted by a small body of men, than in a full Committee of sixty or seventy members. In Mr. Dening's case, a single interview brought out the facts sufficiently to enable the Sub-Committee to determine what to recommend; otherwise, they would have asked him to meet them again.—I am, Sir, &c., FREDERICK E. WIGRAM, Hon. Sec. C.M.S.

Church Missionary Society, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

POETRY.

IDYLLS OF THE ILIAD.—VIII.

CORÆBUS.

Of all who, in her hour of need, to Troy
Came from far lands to fight against her foes,
Corœbus was the youngest. Him nor greed
Of Priam's treasure drew, nor lust of war,
And what war brings, armour and steeds and slaves,
Nor Asia herded by a common dread,
But love of young Cassandra, fairest maid
And doomed to foulest death of all in Troy.
In Priam's halls, when peace was in the land,
Often had boy and girl, in childish sport,
Pledged each to other troth, the while their sires,
Mygdon and Priam, smiled a grave assent.
Then severance, and the Sun-god's fatal love,
And the curse came, which ever in some form
Cometh to mortals whom the Immortals' love;
To her, a curse of wisdom scorned of men,
And unregarded foresight.

Long the youth,
Not knowing what had been and what should be,
Waited the ebbing of the tide of war
That beat on Troy, and passion fired his soul,
To free his bride, and win himself a name.
But all too late it seemed, for now the Greeks
Had fled their fruitless task, and every gate
Was open, and each heart in Troy was glad;
Save one, whose bitter boding not the sight
Of the gay bridegroom, bright with hope and love,
Could quicken into gladness. Sad she sate,
Eyeing the future, as some shrinking dove
Eyes the fast-closing fowler's net, nor dreams
Of flight nor succour, but awaits its doom.
So she. But young Corœbus, half in joy,
Half vexed that no great deed remained to do,
Chid with fond fire, and words of loving scorn,—
"Sweetest and best, after long lapse of years
Restored to freedom, happiness, and me,
Canst thou not, dear one, spare one glance, one smile
Of welcome to thy playmate? Whence thy gloom,
Strange in its grief, when all around is joy?
Frighted with maiden's fears? Nay, sure, my hand
Were strong to save thee from a thousand Greeks,
Yea, from grim Agamemnon's self,—why shrink,
Poor paling sweetheart, at Atreides' name?
By the bright Sun-god, whom ye Trojans hail
Author of Troy, and guardian of its weal,
Rare were the sport, to chase the flying King,
And from Mycenæ and his loving arms
Drag his fond Clytemnestra for thy slave—
Nay, now, what need, with that sweet childish fear,
To shudder? War is past, and war's alarm,
And, if I leave thee now, 'tis but to aid
The housing of yon safeguard of our peace,
The votive monster of the witless Greeks;
And with to-morrow's dawn all Troy shall flame
With happy bridal torches, and the Gods
Shall bless our union." So Corœbus spake,
And went his way, as some gay gilded bark Goes gallant forth across a summer sea,
And brief farewells are waved by careless hands,
That never come again, for o'er them sweeps
The sea, and fishes fatten on their flesh.
So never did Corœbus come again,
But with the dawn, and Troy's red agony,
Sank in the sea of spears; nor could his hands
Avail to save, only his filming eyes
Saw from afar a white tear-dabbled face,
And slender thong-bound wrists,—and kindly death
Forebade to know the sequel of her doom.

O. OGLE.

A WELCOME.

FAR in the sunny South she lingers,
Yet slowly comes along,
With fairy garlands in her fingers,
With snatches of sweet song.
Her eyes with promises are beaming,
Her smiles will rapture bring,
The sunlight from her hair is streaming,—
Thrice welcome, lovely Spring!

She brings us gifts, the royal maiden,
Fair flowers to deck the hills;
With primroses her arms are laden,
Bluebells and daffodils.
Pale crocuses have come before her,
Wild birds her welcome sing;
Ten thousand longing hearts adore her,—
The grey world's darling, Spring.

J. M. ELTON.

ART.

ROSSETTI AT BURLINGTON HOUSE.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

IN our first article upon those works of Rossetti which are exhibited in this gallery, we scarcely did more than glance at some of the painter's most marked characteristics; in this second notice, we shall say a few words upon some of the most notable pictures, though we must premise that, as the majority of these are but single figures of women—and what is more, figures of the same woman—there is little scope for descriptive writing. These pictures and water-colour drawings fall into three clear sets, according to the period at which they were painted. The first includes all the artist's early work, and may be said to end with the year 1855, the second extends from that date to 1873, the third from 1873 to the date of his death.

Of this first period, there are few examples here; but at the Burlington Fine-Arts Club, in Savile Row, there is now open another exhibition of Rossetti's pictures, in which many examples of this time can be seen, and those who are really interested in the painter's work should take care to pay a visit to this gallery. It was not, according to the Royal Academy catalogue, till 1849 that the artist painted his first oil picture, which is exhibited here, under the title of "The Girlhood of Mary Virgin;" but previous to that period he had worked considerably in water-colours, and for some time subsequently his chief attention was given to the latter medium. With the exception of two or three small water-colours, the examples of this period at Burlington House are confined to the above-named picture of the Virgin's girlhood (286), and it is worth some little attention. Two matters strike the spectator at once with regard to this work, one being a mental, the other a technical attribute. Let us take the mental quality first. The picture is naïve to a high degree; it is possessed of all the bland simplicity (if we may use such a term) that marks very early Italian painting; and in it the real and the symbolical facts of the case twine, as it were, in and out of one another. The Virgin and Sta. Anna are seated beneath a vine, with a pile of books before them, and on the books a flowering lily, "which a little angel with rose-coloured wings is watering," a palm branch and a briar lie near the books; whilst in the background is St. Joachim trimming the vine; a dove, surrounded by a halo, typifying the Holy Ghost; and beyond all, a distant landscape, seen through the trellis-work of the balcony. Such is a statement of the bare facts of the picture, and it is sufficient to show that even at this early time Mr. Rossetti's mind evinced that liking for the combination of the natural and the supernatural, the physical and the spiritual, which determined the character of his work to the latest hour of his life. It is worth noting, too, that with all its simplicity of statement, notwithstanding that the story of the picture is chiefly told with conventional symbols, and helped out with explanatory scrolls and inscriptions, yet the result of the whole is rather elaborate. As Rasselas started on a search for happiness, Mr. Rossetti seems in this earliest work to have gone a long journey in search of simplicity, and to have somehow lost its substance, while grasping its shadow. The technical character of the picture is a certain clear, clean thinness of colouring and conventionalism of draughtsmanship very difficult to describe. The tints used, though not discordant, are a little crude and sharp. The vine-leaves almost set the teeth on edge, and throughout the work we see the hand of a man who loves colour, but who as yet hardly knows how to procure it. The drawing, too, is peculiar, rigidly executed, and showing either unwillingness or incapacity to enter into any subtleties of form. It is ascetic in character, and the whole picture might have been designed as an illustration to a fourteenth-century missal. It is a strange question, and one which has never been at all satisfactorily dealt with, how it is that an artist becomes a great colourist? And one of the difficulties of the matter lies in the fact that there is little analogy to be traced between the early works of those who have subsequently become famous in this line. But in the case of Mr. Rossetti, this difficulty can hardly be said to exist. From the first, it is evident both in his pictures and in his water-colour drawings that colour was what he wanted, and what he would have. It might have been confidently predicted by any ordinarily capable judge of Art, that a young man who could deal so boldly and frankly with pure colour as did Rossetti in his early work was absolutely certain to master its secrets. For the one thing which the history of painting proves is that those artists who cared much about pure colour have always been capable of giving its glory to their pictures, and this in no proportion to their amount of scientific knowledge. However, this is not the place to discuss such a question. All we wish to point out in this connection is, that according to a painter's aim will be his success. If in his pupillage he aims at harmony of effect in secondary and tertiary tints, if, to give a technical instance, he bases his picture of the world's beauty upon indigo, light red, and yellow ochre, then it is a thousand to one that he never becomes a great colourist. But if he works, however feebly, with the whole scale of tints, if he accepts vermilion, and lake, and ultramarine, and chrome, and all their vivid combinations, then, supposing him to have the stuff in him of which great painters are made, he is on the right track to become a great colourist. His crudity and garishness will soon disappear, his brilliant hues will become soft as well as sparkling, deep as well as bright; and when he reaches his height of power, he will show us, as does Rossetti in his completed work, colouring which has the lustre of the emerald and the sapphire, rather than the gradations of a muddy road, or the dirty harmonies of a turbid river.

In speaking of the second period, we are beset by the opposite difficulty to that under which we laboured in considering the first. There is, indeed, an embarras de richesses of examples, and where all are so fine, the difficulty of selection becomes almost insuperable. We shall in the main confine our remarks to two pictures, not asserting that they are the best, but only that they afford more opportunity for criticism than most of the others. These are the large picture of "Dante's Dream," and the half-length which is entitled "Monna Vanna" (302). Taking it from a painter's point of view, this latter picture is probably the finest piece of work which Mr. Rossetti ever executed; and it was done about his finest period, 1866. It is a seated figure of a very beautiful woman, in a dress of heavy, white silk, embroidered with gold. She holds a fan in her hand, and is twining some coral beads round her fingers. It is easy to see wherein much of the merit of this picture lies, for its lovely colour and the power with which it is painted are visible to all; but the chasm which separates it from an ordinary half-length portrait is excessively deep, as well as wide, and is difficult to fathom. That extraordinary quality of dignity which strikes most people in the portraits of the Venetian masters, is perhaps at the root of this picture's greatness; it has all the luxury, the pride of life, the sumptuousness, and the largeness of conception of an old Italian painting. This woman is not an English model, but a lady of Venice or Rome, born to an inheritance of splendour. There are just two or three similar works here in which Rossetti's hand seems to have been satisfied with something purely beautiful, and has created it, without troubling its fair surface with the regret and pain that look at us out of most of his women's eyes. The picture of "The Beloved" (297), an illustration to Solomon's Song, is one instance of this, and "The Blue Bower" is another; both pictures glorious with such colour as has rarely been painted in the world, both free from care, or thought of anything but beauty. And it is noticeable that in all these three pictures the physical type of beauty which, as a rule, usurped Rossetti's pencil, is, if not absent, at all events kept in abeyance. As painting, too, in the technical sense of the word, we can scarcely ask for finer work than is to be found in these examples. Not to enter into details, look, for an example of this, at the treatment of the flesh in the "Monna Vanna," at the magnificently broad and yet delicate manner in which the gold embroideries are introduced, at the painting of the coral necklace and the heart-shaped crystal which hang round the lady's neck. This last is one of the most perfect pieces of technical dexterity attained by legitimate means which we ever remember to have seen in oil-painting. The crystal is a thick, heart-shaped one, set in a gold rim, and in the picture we can look down through its clear depths till our eye reaches the flesh beneath. A little thing this, perhaps, to mention, but it has its value when we consider that many artists choose to assert that, in the technical sense, Rossetti could not paint at all.

With regard to the "Dante's Dream," the one large picture of Rossetti's life, and into which he threw all his power, it is impossible, in our limited space, to speak adequately. It represents Love leading Dante into the chamber of Beatrice, to kiss her after her death, and the description given in the Academy catalogue describes the treatment of the subject so well, that we refer our readers thereto. The picture is said therein to be painted in 1870, and it marks, perhaps, the latest work of Rossetti's best period. In truth, grand as it is in conception, it is in some ways defective on its technical side. For, in the first place, though the colour is fine and harmonious to a high degree, it is not splendid, as in the pictures of which we have been speaking, nor is the painting equally good throughout. A coarseness of flesh-painting which grew upon Rossetti in the later years of his life is evident here, especially in the outstretched arm of the figure of Love, in which the brush-work is hard and rough, like badly planed wood; and portions of the drawing, as, again, for instance, in this arm, are both poor and awkward. Another sign of the painter's decline in power may be seen in his treatment of Beatrice's hair, which is of a dull flaxen-red hue, both unpleasant and unnatural in colour. It is curious to note that this painting of hair, which was once one of the artist's strongest points, became ere the close of his life one of his weakest, and that in the later pictures, amongst many other fallings-off, not one is so noticeable as the ugly colour and exaggerated heaviness of the masses of hair round the faces of the women. But to return to "Dante's Dream." If it has one or two grave drawbacks, its merits are far more valuable. It is, as we heard a lady say in the room, an "incarnate poem," full of many varieties of tender meaning, and offering a dozen interpretations to all who choose to think. The great mental triumph of the picture is in the face and figure of Dante, which express the meaning of the picture very perfectly. Technically, the work, despite one or two shortcomings, is entitled to rank with the great pictures of the world; and it is notable that herein Rossetti has succeeded just where it might be thought he would have failed,—we mean in the composition. There is not a trace here of that hurried, over-crowded combination of figures and accessories which marks a great portion of this artist's work. On the contrary, his large canvas is only just adequately filled, and the figures are rather scattered than crowded. The colour, as we have said, is fine, but not such as the "Monna Vanna" or "The Beloved" possess; perhaps the painter thought that for this sad scene of dreams, such colour would be inappropriate, but we fear it was rather the beginning of his decline. What that decline led him to may be traced, for all who care to follow the steps of decaying power, in the pictures of "The Day-dream" and "The Roman Widow," in which last work nearly all the power and beauty of the painter have faded, and only left a sad reflection of his genius. But through this period of decline we do not care to follow him, nor is he fairly to be judged thereby. His best work will be that which determines his fame, and of this we say again that in beauty of colour and poetical inspiration, the world has as yet never seen its equal.

BOOKS.

SIR WILLIAM ROWAN HAMILTON.*

THIS volume, which belongs to the Dublin University Press Series, is the first instalment of a work which, when completed, will be a worthy monument to the memory of a very distinguished and remarkable man. Mr. Graves, who is performing his important task not only with enthusiasm, but with fine discrimination, observes very justly that even Sir William Hamilton's world-wide reputation as one of the greatest mathematicians of his time, might not in itself demand the publication of an extended memoir of his life; but this volume alone, which leaves Hamilton at the age of twenty-seven, when his great achievement—the invention of quaternions—was still in the future, amply suffices to prove that the work of which it forms a part is something very different from a mere addition to the growing mass of superfluous biographies. Not only the great variety of Hamilton's powers, but the remarkably early development of some of them, give a peculiar interest to the story of his youthful years,—years so full not merely of promise, but of performance, that Professor Sedgwick, in referring to Hamilton, at the meeting of the British Association in 1833, could speak of him, without suspicion of hyperbole, as "a man who possessed within himself powers and talents perhaps never before combined within one philosophical character."

William Rowan Hamilton was born precisely at midnight, between August 3rd and 4th, in the year 1805. The place of his birth was Dublin, where he was destined, in less than thirty years afterwards, to win honour and fame; and Mr. Graves' patriotic instincts have led him to make investigations which prove conclusively that Hamilton was a true Irishman, and that the only foundation for a Scottish claim to him is found in the fact that his maternal grandmother was of Scottish birth. His childish acquirements were certainly very remarkable, though his precocity had hardly the all-round character which Mr. Graves seems inclined to attribute to it, being for the most part a precocity of acquisition, rather than of achievement, or even of marked originality of thought. Even when he had reached the age of sixteen, we find him making some remarks upon the books he has been reading which are remarkable for nothing but their common-place juvenility; and the letters of his childhood and early youth are, as a rule, conventional and formal, such interest as they have being due, not to their style or thought, but to the glimpses given in them of the studies he is pursuing, and to their constant testimony to his early acquired elevation and steadfastness of moral character. Still, after allowing full weight to these limitations, it is clear that the little Hamilton was an extraordinary child. When he had only just passed his third birthday we find him reading English, not only printed, but written, and a year later his facility was so assured that the fact of a book being presented to him upside-down made no difference to the little reader. These, however, are mere trifles, in comparison with other items in the record. At four years and five months old he read Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, the last with the points; and when just eight years of age his command of Latin was such that, during a walk through a beautiful landscape, he delivered in that language an extemporaneous and unpremeditated expression of his admiration of the scene. By this time French and Italian had been added to his acquisitions; at nine he had a fair knowledge of Arabic, and was beginning with eagerness the study of Sanscrit; and the sum-total of his linguistic accomplishments may be gathered from a letter written by his father, three months before William had completed his tenth year. Mr. Archibald Hamilton proudly writes of his little son:—

"There is every reason for a well-founded hope that he will at least be a very learned man, and, I trust, also a very worthy character. His thirst for the Oriental languages is unabated. He is now master of most, indeed of all except the minor and comparatively provincial ones. The Hebrew, Persian, and Arabic are about to be confirmed by the superior and intimate acquaintance with the Sanscrit, in which he is already a proficient. The Chaldee and Syriac he is grounded in, and the Hindoostanee, Malay, Mahratti, Bengali, and others. He is about to commence the Chinese, but the difficulty of procuring books is very great. It cost me a large sum to supply him from London, but I hope the money was well expended."

We may, without injustice either to father or son, assume that the words "master" and "proficient" are here used in an accommodated sense, and are not intended to represent what would be ordinarily understood by students as masterhood and proficiency; but for a boy of nine to possess even a smattering of all these languages is extraordinary enough, and that young Hamilton's knowledge was very much more than a smattering is abundantly manifest. Considered as an illustration of the absurdity of the old-fashioned doctrine that precocity in youth is the inevitable antecedent of dullness in maturity, the case, though extraordinary, is one of many; its peculiarity lies in the fact that while Hamilton's adult achievements fully justified the promise of his childhood, they were of an entirely different character from what might have been expected, the marvellous linguist developing into the great mathematician.

The first indication of that interest in mathematical studies which was to grow into an absorbing passion is found in a letter, written at the age of fourteen, in which Hamilton tells his father that he has "made a kind of epitome of algebra," which seems to have been a somewhat elaborate affair, covering six closely-written folio pages, and proceeding as far as quadratic equations. Soon after this, we hear for the first time of his astronomical bent, manifesting itself for the time mainly in a passion for the observation of eclipses, which, in many letters of this period, are spoken of as if they were to the writer the most important and interesting of all possible events. The sphere of his astronomical investigations rapidly widened, but we must not linger over matters which are of interest mainly as leading up to the first great event of Hamilton's life,—his appointment as Andrews' Professor of Astronomy in the University of Dublin, and Royal Astronomer of Ireland. He was now only twenty-one years of age, but both in the special faculties which won for him so unique an honour, and in the general mental force and fertility by which he was to be almost equally distinguished, his growth had been extraordinarily rapid. This rapidity was hardly to be wondered at, seeing that his intellectual life was lived in a heated atmosphere of high enthusiasm, which did not exhaust, because it fed, at the same time that it stimulated. Four years before the event just referred to, he wrote to his sister Eliza:—

* Life of Sir William Rowan Hamilton, including Selections from his Poems, Correspondence, and Miscellaneous Writings. By Robert Perceval Graves, M.A., Sub-Dean of the Chapel Royal, Dublin. Vol. I. London: Longmans, Green, and Co.

"I have some curious discoveries—at least, they are so to me—to show Charles Boyton, when next we meet; he will be my tutor soon. No lady reads a novel with more anxious interest than a mathematician investigates a problem, particularly if it be in any new or untried field of research. All the energies of his mind are called forth, all his faculties are on the stretch for the discovery. Sometimes an unexpected difficulty starts up, and he almost desponds of success. Often, if he be inexperienced, as I am, he will detect mistakes of his own which throw him back. But when all have been rectified, when the happy clue has been found and followed up, when the difficulties, perhaps unusually great, have been completely overcome, what is his rapture!"

If it may be declared, and surely it may, of the genius of scientific vision, as of the genius of poetical creation, that it is born, not made, what can we say but that the fine rapture of toil which expresses itself here is the cachet of this high birthright? In connection with this letter should be read another, still more noteworthy, written to the same sister five years afterwards, in which the glories, the perils, and the demands of a scientific career are celebrated with an eloquent dignity of sombre rhetoric which may well recall the voice of Milton or Jeremy Taylor. We cannot give the letter in full, but for one passage room must be found. After speaking of the public summons, which he considers the solemn call of God and his country to "the career of scientific excellence, the search into the wonders and glories of Creation, the unfolding of the laws and motions of the Universe," Hamilton continues:—

"And glorious as this race is, and high, perhaps, above all earthly honours as is the crown of fame, and usefulness, and intellectual eminence which rewards the successful competitor; yet is the path so steep, so tangled, so sore beset with difficulty and danger, that, of all who have entered upon it, how many have turned aside, or fallen by the way! When, indeed, one reflects on the assemblage of warring qualities; on the union of enthusiastic ardour, with calm and philosophic caution; of the courage that shrinks not from difficulties, with the prudence and art that elude them; of the observing eye that ranges over earth and heaven, with the abstracting mind that can withdraw into its own solitary realm of thought; of the untiring zeal that still aims at unlimited excellence, with the modesty that looks upon all which it has done as nothing; in a word, of highest imagination with clearest and strongest understanding, and of transcendent genius with transcendent industry; when (I say) one reflects on the array of warring qualities which must league together, if they would storm the citadel and win the throne of Science, how may he dare to hope them for himself, or marvel that among mankind so few have reached the prize, and that, at least among his own compatriots, none equal or second to Newton hath yet appeared?"

In these large and liberal outlines, we recognise the features of the writer's personality. It has been truly said by a distinguished living son of his own University, that in him we come face to face with the man of genius in science. He presents himself to us as a great idealist, with scientific inspirations, accompanied by the greatest intellectual vigour and exactness in detail. So many Idealists are vague, so many scientific men are merely positive, and creep after phenomena; but Hamilton was an epic creator in science.

We ought to pay some more adequate tribute than that of a mere mention to the most memorable achievement of Hamilton's early years,—the theoretical discovery of conical reflection, afterwards experimentally verified by Lloyd; but what remains of our space must be devoted to matters of another kind. In the ardour of his scientific enthusiasm, Hamilton never lost his love of literature. His favourite recreation was the production of verse, which, if it never rose to any great poetic height, was always characteristically noble in sentiment and graceful in expression; and in 1827, when he was twenty-two years of age, his delight in literature generally, and in poetry particularly, received a strong stimulus from the influence of a great poet with whom he came into personal contact. It was during a short tour in England in the autumn of this year that Hamilton met Wordsworth, a meeting which was the beginning of a friendship that brought into the life of the young astronomer a multitude of new interests. Many letters passed between Rydal Mount and Dublin, and once Hamilton had the pleasure of welcoming Wordsworth to his pleasant home at the Observatory. Of this visit a very interesting sketch was written by Miss Eliza Hamilton,—interesting not because it gives any new view of its subject, but because Miss Hamilton's impressions are so markedly identical with those of almost every one who knew Wordsworth not as a poet merely, but as a man. After describing her first glimpse of him as he walked up the avenue with her brother—"a tall man, with grey hair, a brown coat, and nankeen trousers, on whom 'Smoke,' our black greyhound, was jumping up in a most friendly manner, not by any means his wont with every stranger"—Miss Eliza Hamilton draws a little portrait which, for one or two touches of delicately veracious observation, deserves reproduction, though for the moment it takes us away from Hamilton:—

"There was a slight touch of rusticity and constraint about his perfect gentlemanliness of manner which I liked,—an absence of that entire ease of manner towards strangers which always tends to do away my sympathy with any mind, particularly a gifted one; but everything he did and said had an unaffected simplicity, and dignity, and peacefulness of thought that were very striking. He was not at all a loquacious man, nor one who seemed inclined to approach with any degree of intimacy even those of whom he knew a good deal, but at the same time, one who met every advance on the part of others with a ready and attractive affability. Other men did not seem necessary to him, or to the existence of his happiness, so that his sympathy with the happiness and sorrow, the good and ill, of the whole creation as it discovers itself in his poetry, gave one the feeling of his natural character being very peculiar. There was such an indescribable superiority, both intellectual and moral, stamped upon him in his very silence, that everything of his I had thought silly immediately took the beautiful colouring of a wondrous benevolence, that could descend through love to the least and most insignificant things among the works of God, or connected with the weal or woe of man. I think it would be quite impossible for any one who had once been in Wordsworth's company ever again to think anything he has written silly."

Miss Eliza Hamilton goes on to describe a conversation between Wordsworth and her brother concerning a passage in the Excursion which Hamilton considered deficient in reverence for science. In this friendly discussion, Hamilton, we think, had the best of it, for while Wordsworth's imaginative grasp of the phenomena of Nature was certainly superior to Hamilton's, there is evidence that in the mere "laws and motions of the Universe," the something in Nature which is apprehended by the pure intellect, Hamilton found an imaginative delight and inspiration to which Wordsworth was all but a stranger. The letters from the poet to his friend in Dublin deal largely with criticism of poetry from the artistic side, and members of our loudest poetical school who rave about "craftsmanship," and are always ready to fling a barren sneer at Wordsworth, may learn from them that if Wordsworth did not, like their master, Gautier, place art above inspiration, his saner estimate of its comparative value in no way prevented him from having a very keen sense of its absolute importance. Another of Hamilton's correspondents at this time was Mr. Aubrey de Vere, then a youth of eighteen; and we have no hesitation in saying that, considering the age of their writer, his letters are among the most remarkable things of the kind in English literature, that on the subject of love (p. 528) being a specially extraordinary performance. Of Coleridge, also, we have one or two glimpses; and, indeed, the last third of the volume is as full of literary as of personal and scientific interest. We have said only a word or two of the manner in which Mr. Graves has, so far, accomplished his biographical task; but his modest self-effacement must not tempt us to silence, or hinder us from paying a deserved tribute to the industry, the literary skill, and the power of emphasising every really characteristic feature, which are manifest in every page of this volume. The interest of the book is increased by an autotype from Mr. Farrell's miniature bust of Sir William Hamilton, and its value by a most admirable index, for which Mr. Graves expresses his thanks to a friend, to whom our gratitude also is due.

MR. PAYN'S LATEST NOVEL.*

We hope we shall not be accused of "sinning our mercies," when we avow a feeling of satisfaction on finding Mr. Payn's newest story less amusing than several of its predecessors. In appreciation of the amusing in fiction, and in gratitude to those writers who provide it for us, we yield to none; but there is, nevertheless, something very pleasant about a new departure on the part of a favourite author; it arouses curiosity, as well as interest, and affords an opportunity of comparing and contrasting him with himself.

In all his novels, except quite the earlier ones—in them he was grim enough sometimes, for instance, in The Cliffs of Cliffe—Mr. Payn's method is to bring out the comedy, and keep down, or rather to hurry over, the tragedy of human life as much as possible, short of the entire denial of seriousness to serious things. The reader may be temporarily shocked by a crime or a calamity, but his spirits are for the most part kept up to a pleasant pitch, while he may securely calculate on a wholesome absence of sentimentality. With shrewd remark and much revelation of knowledge of the world, that still leaves the author on excellent terms with it, we find in Mr. Payn's novels very little analysis of character, and not much description of a minute and detailed kind. Without tiresome sameness, he makes his people in similar spheres and sets pretty much alike, as in real life they would be, on a superficial view, and he produces his effects by means of incident. Ingenuity, not of the lumbering and creaking, but of the light and dexterous kind, is a leading characteristic of his works, and he is an excellent jester. There did exist, and probably does still, among the contents of a certain circulating library at a fashionable seaside place, a well-read copy of A Perfect Treasure, with the following remark written on the fly-leaf, by one of the class of readers so dear to the sympathetic soul of Mr. Thackeray:—"The author is a jolly dog, but there's too much wag in his tale." We have occasionally been reminded of that curt criticism by some of the many successors of A Perfect Treasure, in which the author makes things pleasant a little too persistently; but this is such a venial error, especially in the eyes of any whose attitude towards the dreary waste of recent fiction is a business one, that we readily pardon the deflection from a strict literary standard.

* Kit: a Memory. By James Payn. London: Chatto and Windus.

Kit is a new departure; there is not, indeed, so startling a surprise for the reader in this story, so far as scene and action are concerned, as By Proxy provided, but there is entire novelty of treatment, and just that close and careful handling of individual character that does not appear in the author's previous works. We are disposed to place the miserable hero of this strong and well-told story on a level, in respect to the author's other leading characters, with Mr. Trollope's George Vavasour, in Can You Forgive Her? (a masterly presentation of the great villain who started with small villainies,) as compared with that lamented novelist's numerous and diversified scamps. Kit Garston's introduction to the reader is of an unusual kind, for he gravely tells his two companions (associates rather after the fashion of Mr. Trollope's Three Clerks) that, when he was a boy of fourteen, very imaginative and very reckless, he took a leaf out of Faust's book, and sold himself to the Devil. The three young men whose widely various fortunes form the subject of the story are admirably drawn, and the key-note, the dawning suspicion of Kit in the mind of Frank Meade, contrasts with the crystal-clear faith and affection of Mark Medway—a finely-conceived and beautiful character—in a way that indicates the fated line of events without betraying it with happy and well-considered effect. The setting of the story in Cornish scenery, with the surroundings of ruin, forest, garden, river, and sea, is done with more care than Mr. Payn is accustomed to give to décor, and confirms the idea conveyed by his recent novel, For Cash Only, that he has fallen in love with Cornwall.

The small group of people who play their parts in the story are all well drawn, but duly subordinated to Kit Garston, and to his sister Trenna, a noble creature "warped to wrong." The three elderly gentlemen, Mr. Garston, Dr. Medway, and the Rector, are very well sketched; but why does Mr. Payn say of the latter that "he returned to the world of his books with eagerness, and plunged into the vortex of archæology?" If there be a study totally unlike a "vortex," a study as "calm and critical" as Mrs. Jarley's waxwork itself, it is archæology. The fascination which Kit exercises over his friend Meade and his sister Trenna, by his brightness, dash, eagerness, plausibility, and readiness, those qualities which cover up his selfishness and hide his want of principle, is cleverly conveyed. The first few scenes, with their cheery good-neighbourhood, and the pleasant companionship of young people, make the looming tragedy all the darker, and quicken the reader's sympathy with the devoted sister, who does not share the blindness of her brother's friend, Mark Medway, but is heroically devoted to Kit, whom it is her grief and her curse to suspect,—indeed, to know. That is a really fine scene in which she assumes the guilt of the first crime committed by her brother, to the utter ruin of her love and her hopes.

Mr. Payn seems to have had the familiar names of the Old Curiosity Shop in his mind, while writing this book; the hero is Kit, the unjustly-accused servant is Abel, there is reference to the immortal Codlin and Short, but there is no resemblance in the story. The downward course of Kit, with its bounds and pauses, the dishonesty more or less daring, the perverted cleverness, the mingling of audacity and cowardice, the gradual roughening of speech and demeanour towards his devoted sister, when any concealment or reserve between them has become impossible; the adroitness of the mining swindle, and the shallow vanity that leads Kit to show the stolen diamond to Mark, as a present from his Directors—a characteristic blunder on which the young villain's fate afterwards turns—are all admirable points in the story, and they are treated with strength and seriousness. There is one pair of happy lovers in the novel, but, though no one can grudge that small indulgence to Mr. Payn, who would be wretched without a "dearest girl" and a wedding on principles of mutual attachment, and sound, if modest finance, we do not particularly care about them. Our hearts are with Trenna and with Mark, especially Mark. No one will apprehend our meaning more precisely than Mr. Payn, no one will more clearly perceive that we do not imply the slightest shade of ridicule of his picture of pure and simple friendship on the part of a vastly superior nature for one most unworthy, when we say that Mark Medway seems to us to be a refined, elevated, and possible Tom Pinch, with the overthrow of the idol of his imagination raised out of the sphere of farce into that of tragedy. The conclusion of the story does not equal its beginning, or the general conduct of it. In the interests of morality and of truth, Kit ought to have served his time. Nobody but Edmund Dantes ever got out of a convict prison under credible circumstances as a dead man, and Mr. Payn has conceded too much to his feeling for the young reprobate's friends. Not that a real, good, bouncing bit of improbability is not acceptable sometimes, but that it is out of place at the winding-up of a story so plausibly conducted and so skilfully developed as this one. The deus ex machina, who makes things pleasant for the bridal party at the Knoll, had very rough-hewn ends to shape; and though the author's inveterate kind-heartedness is a weakness in this instance, it is much easier to find fault with the method adopted by the indispensable divinity, than to suggest an improvement upon it.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI.*

THE fame, mysterious and shadowy as it was, which Rossetti enjoyed, or which his admirers claimed for him, in his lifetime, is just at present being put to more than one severe test. That the pictures of any distinguished painter should be collected and exhibited, and have swift judgment passed on them as soon after his death as possible, seems fair enough—it is the nearest approach that can be made to obtaining the verdict of posterity—and every artist with a name among his contemporaries must be well aware of the way in which it will soon be put to proof. But to have volumes of bad English written and published about him with merciless promptitude is a different matter. Moreover, it is not only those who loved or admired Rossetti, or those, a larger class, we may presume, who demand, even in æsthetic literature, some attention to the laws of grammar and plain thinking, who have a right to protest against such books; but those also who care for every influence which can possibly tell on the course of English Art. In spite of Lord Beaconsfield's solemn assertion at an Academy banquet that the distinctive quality of our insular art was imagination (but perhaps he was only jesting, grimly), the world takes precisely the opposite view. It was but the other day that a critic, writing in no mean journal, credited our Academical, and, therefore, it may be supposed, our best and most characteristic work, with some most admirable qualities, such as good drawing, sober colouring, perfect manipulation, &c., but went on to hint very plainly that imagination or creative power was not found in conjunction with them, and that genius would feel itself, and be felt, positively out of place, in regions where we should most wish to see it. Without in the least committing ourselves to this extreme view, we cannot but think that it would be better for English Art if there were no such wide gulf of indifference, no such total breach of sympathy, as certainly exists between those artists and their admirers with whom good work is everything, and those who make nobility of aim or depth of feeling the indispensable condition of excellence and admiration. Now, Rossetti's pictures, with all their manifest shortcomings, have imaginative quality. The great mass of our well-painted, well-drawn work, with not too many exceptions, has none; and that desirable interfusion of the qualities which make for good drawing, and those which make for poetry on canvas, is almost as far off as it was thirty years ago. Mr. Sharp's book, whatever influence it may have,

* Dante Gabriel Rossetti. By William Sharp. London: Macmillan and Co.

will not help us in this direction. The greater part of it consists of descriptions of Rossetti's pictures, and very wearisome and ill-wrought pieces of word-painting they are. The general effect of any one of them, for they are all too long to be quoted at length, is simply bewildering. Take the description of the picture called "La Bella Mano," for example. It is only fair to Mr. Sharp to say that he declares this picture to be "meaningless as a design, and even incongruous, as in the introduction of angels as servitors to a lady washing her hands;" but then he also declares it to be "probably the one which the greater number of fit persons would select from the painter's works as excelling in all mastership of artistic craft," and that it has "elements of endless delight." Here are some of the items or constituent parts of the picture, taken pretty much in the order in which they are enumerated, and we make bold to confess that, after reading this and a good many more descriptions of the same sort in full, we are fain to sigh for the works and days of the immortal Gandish, with his "King Alfred" and "dawning of 'Ope," and little fancies of that kind. First in the catalogue we have the lady herself, "standing with her face in partial profile, the deep blue eyes, the fair, exquisitely moulded face, the golden auburn hair," &c., "making such a portraiture as it is the lot of few to meet with in real life." Then her dress, "which is of a beautiful mauve-purple, with, over her right shoulder, a robe or cloak of soft carmine." Then "a scallop-shaped basin, and beyond the basin an angelic attendant, with scarlet wings meeting behind her head," then "a green china vase containing a purple convolvulus," "below this a brazen vessel, beyond this a rack, from which a white towel comes down to just above the basin;" "then another attendant angel holding the lower folds of the towel," and so on, with ever so many more things, all lucent, brilliant, soft, and dreamy, such as hair-jewels, lemon-trees, rose-trees, poppies, and in the background "a large mirror, containing reflections of the red and yellow flames that twine and flash in the unseen fire." But this picture, "La Bella Mano," is described, so to speak, in a plain and workmanlike manner. "The Lady of the Bower" fares, we think, much worse. In that description we read thus:—"Falling over the side of her face and adown her shoulders are great masses of luxuriant golden-brown hair, portions of the latter being kept back from the listening and charmed ear by a golden pin, where a deep carbuncle or ruby is encircled by turquoises of such pale, delicate blue as hills take on seen across water on a summer day;" and furthermore, it is said of the same lady that "while she is entrancing as a Lilith, with the dominant loveliness of Venus Verticordia, she has the additional charm, that of the inevitable refinement of music,—and though she were as lovingly cruel and remorseless as the Idalian, and as wily as she whose beauty transcended Eve's, the fact of being in such absolute accordance with exquisite sound ["a black dulcimer," we are told, is the instrument which she is "playing"], would enhance her with a Siren charm that would appeal to whomsoever looked upon her loveliness." Surely such writing as this justifies a good deal of indignation, and taken together with what seems to us the extravagant over-estimate of Rossetti's genius as a painter, will do much to hinder the cause which we doubt not Mr. Sharp has at heart, namely, the truer appreciation of those splendid and rare qualities in painting,—colour, and imaginative appeal. We have much regard for Mr. Sharp's evident hero-worship; but why could he not have learnt to express it in decent English? A little mixing up of angels' wing-plumes and brazen vessels, "robes of pale green with white interfusions," and so on, although the result is something very like "a nice derangement of epitaphs," is pardonable, considering his subject; but what excuse can be made for such pure nonsense as this?—"His [Rossetti's] ultimate sum-total of female, or, indeed, of male beauty, is not, from a public stand-point, very sympathetic;" or, for such phrases as these, which are almost ingenious in their malformation?—"A volume called The Shadow of Dante" is said to "represent the only published matter by Miss Maria Rossetti." The year 1851 is given as "the date in which the first conception of a certain drawing was harboured." We are told that there is "a residuum of mistake" in Rossetti's wilful repetition of one model, and that "before he came of age, his influences were only the general ones of circumstances, country, &c." Mr. Sharp ought to have kept his "conception" of writing this book "harboured" until he could write better than he does now. The appendix, which is oddly said to give "the dates of execution, subjects, mediums, states, and present owners of everything mentioned in the foregoing record," seems to be a very meritorious and painstaking piece of work.

The acknowledged deficiency of the painter Rossetti in drawing, and we should say, in power of design, both as regards form and colour, raises an interesting question how far strength of poetical feeling and colour can by themselves justify the very high rank as an artist which is sometimes claimed for him. To us, his pictures, even his finest, do not seem to have been felt and imagined from the first as pictures. The whole passionate, unconscious, labour-compelling force of mind had been spent, or was being spent, on the same thought in another form of art. The pictures seem to us to be translations of such thoughts into a fresh language. The defective drawing asserts itself painfully (as it does not with Blake), because there has not been at work the fusing power of true pictorial imagination. The artist was evidently uncomfortable about it, and could neither let it alone frankly, as a very early old master would have done, nor disguise it from himself and everybody else by the instinct of composition, which can make imperfection and awkwardness themselves instruments of imaginative expression.

A SCAMPER THROUGH AMERICA.*

OF Mr. Hudson's sixty days' scamper over the Atlantic, through America to California, and back by Canada, the record of some forty is interesting enough; the remainder of the volume is "padding," not much above the great "Croft" in style or matter. Leaving the Mersey on Good Friday last, Sandy Hook was passed on the tenth day—there is throughout the book a distressing absence of dates—the only event of the voyage being a storm on Easter Sunday, which, by a sort of anticipation of American parlance, is described as "calculated to blow the very eyebrows off one's face," and recalled to the traveller's mind a "hymn of childhood" so forcibly that he felt compelled to print the following stanza:—

"When lo! a storm began to rise,
The wind blew loud and strong;
It blew the clouds across the skies,
And roll'd the waves along."

With the beauty of the situation of New York, Mr. Hudson was as much impressed as he was, in common with most European visitors who are not arch panderers to the American taste for flattery, with the surpassing ugliness of the town. The Empire City is an extraordinary jumble of dirty, mean streets, ragged telegraph-poles, rotting wooden shanties, monstrous advertisements—one of which kept company with our traveller throughout the entire continent—garish signs, fronts made hideous by daubs of crude red, blue, and green paint, overtopped, sporadically, by enormous piles of heavily ornate architecture, and overshadowed by a network of wires and by the Elevated Railroad. To all this, the Central Park is a most agreeable contrast; and, in fact, the ugliness of the streets is no proof of the New Yorkers' want of taste, but simply of the hurry of their lives, which leaves no time for that inner contemplation out of which alone the finer culture can come. Nor is the street population an attractive one. The women are terribly over-dressed, and to a stranger the men's faces wear a sad, preoccupied, almost saturnine expression; smiles are rare, and laughs are rarer still. Mr. Hudson mentions the want of politeness as a characteristic of New York street life, but this is more apparent than real. At bottom, the American is of a singularly good-natured disposition,—too good-natured even, for he puts up with a variety of tyrannies, social and political, under which most Englishmen would writhe. This patience is due very much to the large elbow-room they have, which enables them to turn the flank of a difficulty in a hundred ways without attacking it directly, thus escaping the labour and the risk of failure as well. Such a system of laissez-aller, however, has its drawbacks; the railroad companies, for instance, who are allowed to carry their tracks pretty much where they will, killed, in 1880, twenty-seven hundred persons at their "level crossings."

While Mr. Hudson was at San Francisco, the news arrived of the Phoenix Park murders. As an Englishman, when he read the news chalked upon huge black boards at the newspaper office, he felt impelled to cast around for sympathy. He found none. "A big man, with Hibernian accent [who heard him mutter, 'It can not be, it can not be!'] turned and remarked, emphatically, 'Why the ——— shouldn't it be?" Indeed, the crowd began to knot itself about him so ominously, that he was glad to get to the Hôtel—the significance of our capital letter will not be lost upon travellers in the States—at the bar of which, advertizing to the news, a "gentlemanly-looking American exclaimed, 'Wal, you Britishers have used Ireland tarnation badly!'" while the conductor of the elevator (hoist) added that a war with England "would make every working-man in the United States a soldier." The truth is, the farther west one travels in America, the less the "Britisher" seems to be liked. Not the individual, concrete Britisher, who is always entertained hospitably enough, but a sort of phantasmal denizen of the "old country," the creation of the Western brain. In the Eastern States, and in the busy cities of the Atlantic seaboard, this feeling hardly exists, save as a vague tradition. Nor is it a predominance of the Irish element, which lessens, rather than increases, as we recede westwards, that is at the bottom of this sentiment, which prevails mainly among the foreign-born dwellers in the Mississippi valley and on the Pacific slope, men whom circumstances rather than inclination have in most instances forced to abandon the country of their birth, and who feel in their hearts an abiding soreness against the land which could not or would not afford them a career. The sentiment is neither deep nor very real, though the exigencies of domestic politics might at any moment work it up to a point at which a misunderstanding would become possible, serious enough to bring both countries within measurable distance of an appeal to arms.

* A Scamper through America; or, Fifteen Thousand Miles of Ocean and Continent in Sixty Days. By T. S. Hudson. London: Griffith and Farran, 1882.

Perhaps what the Americans dislike us most for is the pertinacity with which we refuse to see anything to admire in the Protectionist system, by which they have chosen to fetter their industry and ours. We shall follow Mr. Hudson's advice, and eschew criticism, of which American patriotism is not very tolerant. Transatlantic patriotism differs from ours in that it is concerned with the present and future, rather than with the past, and is honest and robust enough at core, though the outer shells of it, so to speak, are of a less real character; the pride of mere bigness, the conceit of wealth and rapid material progress, the provincial vanity which takes umbrage at so small a circumstance as a change in the botanical name of their big trees. "The Americans hate," says Mr. Hudson, "the name of Wellingtonia, and say that these trees are properly the Sequoia gigantea, once having gone so far as to name them Washingtonia." For all this we are ourselves to a great extent responsible. We are never tired of extolling the bigness of American rivers, mountains, plains, distances, and of lauding the energy with which the American people strive to get the most out of their magnificent estate. But a sixty days' scamper through Europe—and in ordinary times, Europe is for many purposes as much an aggregate of united States as the Transatlantic Republic itself—would afford a depth, a richness, and a variety of instructive and ennobling enjoyment which could not be reaped in the course of sixty of such scampers through America. The only building, to illustrate our argument, which Mr. Hudson finds it worth his while to describe in any detail, is a huge Safe Deposit Block in San Francisco. In this age of comfort and luxury, one is not seldom in peril of forgetting that man does not live by bread alone, and the Arab enjoying his kef may often be justly envied by the club-lounger in Pall Mall and the ten or twenty-times millionaire in Wall Street. The most delightful State in the Union, and almost the only one where State patriotism exists, is undoubtedly California, "Caliente Fornella," "Burning Furnace," though the Spaniards, Mr. Hudson tells us, are said to have called it. The climate closely approaches the perfection of that celebrated by Dante:—

"Un' aura dolce, senza mutamento
Avere in se, mi feria per la fronte,
Non di più colpo che soave vento."

It has all the charm of that of Italy, without its drawbacks. "Yuma has three hundred cloudless days in a year, Los Angeles two hundred and sixty. . . . London (alas!) only sixty."

Of American stage-coach life on the Pacific slope, and of the Yosemite Valley and the famous Big Trees, Mr. Hudson's descriptions, though brief, are among the best we have read. The volume is throughout written in a lively and attractive style. Mr. Hudson's sixty days' "scamper" may be scampered through in twice sixty minutes; indeed, it is difficult to read the book otherwise than in a sort of rush. The Canadian "days"—each of the "sixty days" has its separate record—lack the briskness of those spent in the States; but the reader is pleasantly carried over them by the spirit of rapid motion that pervades the major part of the book. In fine, the author is an experienced traveller, a good observer, and a generous critic, and has sketched a kindly though unflattering picture, rapid in drawing, but full of suggestion, of the lands and peoples he made acquaintance with in his hurried tour.

EMERSON AS A MAN.*

THESE three literary portraits of Emerson are all in different ways so admirable and interesting, that it would be difficult, and were it easy, it would be invidious, to place them in order of merit. We therefore assign precedence according to date of publication, and put at the head of our brief list the work of Mr. Cooke, which, though published before Emerson's death, and, therefore, necessarily incomplete, has more of the character of a formal biography than the volumes of Mr. Ireland and Mr. Conway. Of even Mr. Cooke's pages, nearly half are devoted, not to biography pure and simple, but—as was, perhaps, inevitable—to exposition of, and comment upon, the philosophical, ethical, and literary opinions of the great writer of Concord. With these, we do not now propose to deal. In a previous article,† the strong and the weak points of Emerson's contribution to the thought of his time were sufficiently indicated; and we prefer now to dwell almost wholly upon the features of the singularly attractive and beautiful character depicted in these volumes.

The life of Ralph Waldo Emerson, like that of the majority of men of letters in our time, was not rich in events, or what are commonly known as such; but we can well spare the superficial interest of incident, in a career so full of interest of a wealthier and more satisfying kind. If any figure be in itself impressive, it is more pleasant, and generally more instructive, to be allowed to observe it in repose, or in those attitudes of homely action which are instinctive and unconscious, than in the strain of struggle with external circumstances, where the gracious lines of individuality are lost, and we see simply an embodied type of the passion of conflict. Just as there are characters which recall one or other of the forms of nature—the flaming volcano with its far-reaching lava-streams of destruction, or the solitary lake which is still enough to reflect every star—so there are others which make us think of the beautiful things of art,—of a tender strain of melody, a miracle of pictured colour, or a marble to which the sculptor has given an immortal life. Emerson reminds us of the marble, not carved into the agony of the Laocoon, but into the calm and satisfying beauty of the Apollo. The surroundings of his life were almost as ideally perfect as those with which the imagination of Wordsworth environed the maiden who grew three years in sun and shower. Born of a race of worthy ancestors, who combined the stern virtues of Puritanism with some of the gentler graces in which Puritanism was wont to be deficient, the very blood in his veins was in itself a great inheritance. His mother was a woman of whom one of her sons said "that in his boyhood, when she came from her room in the morning, it seemed to him that she always came from communion with God," and who has been described by one who knew her as possessed of great patience and fortitude, of a discerning spirit and a most courteous bearing; "her sensible and kindly speech was always as good as the best instruction, her smile, though it was ever ready, was a reward." In addition to this inestimable possession, the little Ralph Waldo was surrounded by relatives and friends whose influence could not fail to be cultivating and morally useful to him in the highest degree; while the home of his boyhood was one which, though it could not truly be called poor, seeing that all the real needs of its inmates were supplied, was still approached nearly enough by poverty to become acquainted with its bracing stimulus, but not so nearly as to have experience of its power to chill and harden.

Descending from a line of preachers' who, generation after generation, had gradually passed from Calvinism to Arminianism, from Arminianism to Arianism, and from Arianism to the

* 1. Ralph Waldo Emerson: his Life, Writings, and Philosophy. By George Willis Cooke. London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington.

2. Ralph Waldo Emerson: his Life, Genius, and Writings. By Alexander Ireland. Second Edition, largely augmented. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

3. Emerson at Home and Abroad. By Moncure David Conway. London: Trübner and Co.

† Spectator, May 6th, 1882.

now old-fashioned type of Unitarianism, it was natural that Emerson should find his way into a Unitarian pulpit; so in the beginning of 1829, when nearing the completion of his twenty-sixth year—having been born on the 25th of March, 1803—he received an invitation from the Second Church in Boston to become the colleague of the Rev. Henry Ware, jun.; and as very shortly after this Mr. Ware was compelled by the failure of his health to resign his position, the sole charge of the Church was committed to the hands of Emerson. His way in life now seemed to lie plain before him. In his retiring address, Mr. Ware, speaking of Emerson's acceptance of the Church's invitation, said, "Providence presented to you at once a man on whom your hearts could rest;" and not only the hearts, but the minds of the congregation seem to have found full satisfaction in the character and addresses of their minister, who evidently had the support of his people, even in the act—at that time unprecedented—of opening his church to the unpopular anti-slavery agitation. Everything, in the best sense of the phrase, was going well, when, in the autumn of 1832, to the great grief of his congregation, he resigned his charge, the immediate reason for the step being not, as might have been supposed, any change in his dogmatic position, but a growing feeling that certain religious forms—notably the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper—were inconsistent with a true conception of the spirituality of Christianity. The ground he took was very much the same as that which had been long occupied by the Quakers, and his last discourse, which was at once a farewell and an apologia, is noteworthy, as showing his command of the logical method, which is conspicuously absent from the books by which his fame was won, and as giving us, therefore, some reason to suppose that Mr. Conway is probably right in attributing his general abstinence from logical forms to the fact that "he was more interested in points not to be so carried." Never was a separation attended with less bitterness, or with more of a victorious affection which made all differences seem trifling, than this of Emerson from the people to whom he had ministered. Full of courage as he was himself, and rich as were his sermons in the raw material for a hundred fierce controversies, Emerson could neither be forced nor inveigled into the assumption of a polemical attitude. When he delivered his celebrated address to the students of the Divinity College, Harvard University—an address which was, not unnaturally, received by the Christian world of America with a chorus of disapproval and alarm—he preserved an almost unbroken silence, perfectly sweet, with none of the sullenness which is wont to lurk in most silences of this kind. Only to his old friend and colleague Henry Ware, who sent him a letter of expostulation and a sermon of controversy, did he think it needful to say anything; and his words are instinct with a characteristic combination of firmness and gentleness. Emerson wrote:—

"I ought sooner to have replied to your kind letter of last week, and the sermon it accompanied. The letter was right manly and noble. The sermon, too, I have read with attention. If it assails any doctrine of mine—perhaps I am not so quick to see it as writers generally—certainly I did not see any reason to depart from my habitual contentment that you should say your thought, whilst I say mine. . . . I could not possibly give you one of the arguments you cruelly hint at, on which any doctrine of mine rests. For I do not know what arguments mean in reference to any expression of a thought. I delight in telling what I think; but if you ask me why I dare say so, or why it is so, I am the most helpless of mortal men. I do not even see that either of these questions admits of an answer, so that in the present posture of affairs, when I see myself suddenly raised to the position of a heretic, who is to make good his thesis against all comers, I certainly shall do no such thing. I shall read what you and other good men write, as I have always done, glad when you speak my thoughts, and skipping the page that has nothing for me."

We do not quote this passage for its intellectual soundness, for the thought embodied in it seems to us merely a half-truth, but as an admirable illustration of Emerson's attitude in the presence of opposition. Another and a more humorous one is given in an anecdote quoted by Mr. Ireland. Emerson had been delivering an address to a literary society, and a clergyman being called upon to conclude the meeting with prayer, put up a petition in which occurred the remarkable sentence, "We beseech thee, O Lord, to deliver us from ever hearing any more such transcendental nonsense as we have just listened to from this sacred desk." The teller of the anecdote records that "after the benediction, Mr. Emerson asked his next neighbour the name of the officiating clergyman, and when falteringly answered, with gentle simplicity remarked, 'He seemed a very conscientious, plain-spoken man,' and went on his peaceful way." Emerson was certainly not a man with whom it was easy to pick a quarrel. His was the charity that is "not easily provoked."

After the severance of his connection with the Boston Church, Emerson, though he still occasionally preached, took no other pastoral charge,* but devoted himself to literature, or rather, to lecturing, for, with the exception of his poems, all, or nearly all, of his published works were originally prepared for use upon the platform. Henceforward his biography consists simply of an enumeration of the titles of his successive books, of the incidents of two voyages to Europe, and of a number of simple records which would be trivial, were they not so characteristic. It is mainly for their delightful collections of this last kind of material that our thanks are due to Mr. Ireland and Mr. Conway. The former was Emerson's first English friend, the latter has for thirty years or more been one of his most faithful American disciples; and their long and—save by distance—uninterrupted communication with him has enabled them to give to their portraits not only verisimilitude, but vitality. Though of the three books before us, Mr. Cooke's is the most comprehensive, and will probably be found the most useful by the young reader to whom Emerson is as yet a stranger, the two other works seem to us more attractive, because fuller of the intimate personal revelations, the homely, every-day manifestations of character, which enable us to know the man, not merely to know about him. Mr. Ireland's account of Emerson's sayings and doings during his three English visits fills so admirably a gap in all other biographies, and his narrative is throughout so simply and pleasantly written, that we are almost inclined to grumble at the modesty which has prompted him to confine his personal recollections within such comparatively narrow compass; but volumes cannot be indefinitely enlarged, and we could hardly spare any of the interesting anecdotes which he has gathered together with such discrimination and industry. Mr. Conway has relied almost entirely upon his own resources, which, it is needless to say, are sufficiently ample, seeing that he was not only the intimate friend of Emerson himself, but of Hawthorne and other notabilities, who have made Concord one of the most interesting literary centres of our time. He has much to tell us about the Emersonian circle, which included Thoreau, Margaret Fuller, Alcott, Theodore Parker, and other persons, less known on this side of the Atlantic, but in many respects hardly less worth knowing, so the matter of the book is generally both new and valuable; and though to some tastes its manner may seem too exuberantly rhetorical, it is so totally free from strain or affectation, that we find it pleasant rather than otherwise. If Sydney Smith were right in saying that every style is good that is not tiresome, then Mr. Conway's is a very good style indeed.

But our last words must be devoted to Emerson himself. If we are to judge of a man's moral and spiritual features by their reflection in the minds of those with whom he is brought into contact, it is hardly possible, after reading the unanimous testimonies scattered up and down these volumes, to doubt that his was one of the noblest, purest, simplest, and most harmonious natures of modern times. Even Carlyle's voice lost all its wonted austerity and gained an unfamiliar cordiality, in speaking of the day at Craigenputtock "when that supernal vision Waldo Emerson dawned upon us." Arthur Hugh Clough, not a person of ill-regulated mind, was possessed by the charm of Emerson, to whom he said it was good to go, and whom he declared to be the only profound man he had met in America. To Oliver Wendell Holmes he showed himself as "a soul glowing like the rose of morning with enthusiasm, a character white as the lilies in its purity," the end and aim of whose being was "to make truth lovely and manhood valourous,"—which may all be true, but need hardly have been so affectingly expressed. A man of a very different type, Father Taylor, the well-known Methodist preacher and philanthropist, to whom Dickens has given an English fame, always spoke with intense emotion of the friend who had often helped him in his good works; and was proud of only one thing he had ever done, which was an answer given to some Methodists who objected to his friendship for Emerson. Being a Unitarian, they insisted that he must go to hell. "It does look so," said Father Taylor; "but I am sure of one thing, if Emerson goes to hell, he will change the climate there, and emigration will set that way." To those who do not know the Emerson displayed to us in these volumes, a suspicion of exaggeration may hang about these panegyrics, but to those whose belief in the possibilities of human nobleness is large, it will seem more likely that even such eulogiums should be just, than that eminent men, alike in hardly anything but honesty, should unite in a conspiracy of flattering falsehood.

Among those really qualified to judge, one person only would have been likely to indulge in a kindly challenge of their accuracy, and that person was Emerson himself. An unaffected and unobtrusive humility was one of his most noteworthy characteristics. When he recognised a difference between himself and others, it did not seem to occur to him to make his own nature the standard, and to regard other natures as deviations from it, though this is the attitude which most men instinctively assume. Instead of proudly dispensing tolerance, he gratefully accepted it; yet lost no real dignity, but rather gained it by such acceptance. When he was asked by Theodore Parker's Society to deliver the chief address at Parker's funeral, Emerson wrote to express his sense of the loss which the country had sustained; and then, after stating his reasons for thinking himself incompetent to perform the task assigned to him, said simply, "My relations to him are quite accidental, and our differences of method and working such as really required and honoured all his catholicism and magnanimity to forgive in me." Emerson always seemed to himself the one needing to be forgiven.

Emerson was, nevertheless, a strong man. We have seen how he was the first to extend the hospitality of the Church to the early proclaimers of the gospel of emancipation; and our last quotation shall be a story told by Mr. Conway of how, in later years, he met the soldiers of slavery face to face:—

"When the Southern States began to secede, frightened compromisers in the North hoped to soothe them by silencing the Abolitionists: roughs were employed to fill the Anti-slavery halls, hurl missiles at the speakers, and drown every voice with their yells. When these scenes were occurring in Boston, Emerson repaired thither, and took his place upon the platform. The Music Hall, on one such occasion, was possessed by a vast throng of screaming roughs, whom the well-known Anti-slavery orators vainly tried to address. Even by those near the platform no word could be heard. Garrison was almost in despair, as was Wendell Phillips, who just then caught sight of Emerson, looking calmly on the wild scene. He went to him and whispered. Emerson advanced; the roughs did not know this man, and there was a break in the roar, through which was now heard the voice of Emerson, beginning, 'Christopher North—you have all heard of Christopher North.' There was a perfect silence, as if the name had paralysed every man. Not one of them had ever heard of Christopher North, but this assumption of their intelligence by the intellectual stranger disarmed them. Emerson told the story of Christopher North, that he once defended his moderation in having only kicked some scoundrels out of the door, instead of pitching them out of the window,—and went on to show that under the circumstances, the Abolitionists had exercised moderation. The power of mind over matter was happily displayed in the attention with which the crowd listened to Emerson, who spoke admirably, though without notes or preparation."

We have kept our resolution to speak of Emerson the man, rather than of Emerson the thinker. Of the legacy he has left to the world, the literary portion seems to us by far the most valuable; and it is pleasant to know that the teacher lived up to his teaching, and even embodied the declaration of a great Englishman, whom he loved to honour,—"that he who would not be frustrate of his hope to write well hereafter in laudable things, ought himself to be a true poem."

A STORY OF CARNIVAL.*

THE perusal of this clever and thoughtful novel leaves the reader with a half-feeling that he has been spending his time with some of that family in The Princess who were in a chronic state of confusion as to the difference between shadow and substance; many of the characters give a strange impression of shadowiness, and especially the morbid and introspective hero Gilbert, who might really at times have echoed the words of Tennyson's Prince:—

"I seem'd to move among a world of ghosts,
And feel myself the shadow of a dream."

The key-note to this turn of mind is struck quite early in the story, in a paper written by him, to be read at a symposium of artists and others, who meet at intervals to listen to one another's productions, and we subjoin the account of the reading:—

"It chanced that to-night there were but two papers in the basket. It was Penrith's turn to read. Gilbert did not know whether he was relieved or not, as he heard his own first sentence ticked out in Penrith's neat enunciation. Gilbert had read something somewhere or other about a mad painter, who painted nothing but shadows—shadows of men and women—shadows of actions—shadows kissing each other and killing each other. He had begun half in jest, but the weirdness of the idea had taken hold of him as he went on, and it took more hold still as he listened to Penrith's measured intonation, which gave the sentences an air of importance and sobriety they had scarcely possessed in their author's own imagination. As Penrith read, however, a less pleasant sensation began to assert itself—an ill-defined presentiment that in describing the mad artist's folly he had been unwittingly describing himself—occupied only with shadows. Gilbert had described the madman's pictures as growing more and more tragic and terrible, until his shadows produced on beholders a feeling of horror, keener because more vague than that produced by realities. It seemed to him, as Penrith read on, as if these shadows of his own imagining were not wholly imaginary, but were detaching themselves from the background of his fancy, and surrounding him with threatening gestures and mocking looks. He was very glad when Penrith came to the end, and looking round the little circle, said, 'Well?'

But whatever indefiniteness may sometimes appear in the book where human beings are concerned, there is certainly none in its capital and graphic descriptions of the sights and scenes belonging to a Roman carnival, whose masquerades, pageants, and processions are set forth with an animation and vigour that may almost make the reader fancy himself turned into a spectator. The marked contrast between these two kinds of description reminds us of the difference between objects looked at on a clear day, or in a fog which only at intervals lifts sufficiently to make them for a brief space distinctly visible; in the first case, the eye receives an incisive, definite, well-marked impression, whereas in the other, it is continually perplexed by blurred, vague outlines. We are by no means sure that this effect may not proceed from high art on the author's part, in other words, that she does not produce it intentionally, in order to convey a sort of enchantment peculiar to Rome (where the scene of the story is laid), as a place so full of grand monuments of past ages, that to live there must necessarily give historical memories an unnatural influence, till the past seems more actual than the present, and the unreal more vivid than the real. Perhaps, too, it is this moralising and reflective spirit that causes the gentle tinge of melancholy pervading a good deal of the book. The author appears ever to have before her eyes the grinning skull underlying the fairest exterior, and to be depressed by the recollection of the alloy inseparable from all mortal pleasures. Cherbuliez says, in one of his novels,—"Ce pauvre monde est ainsi fait, qu'il est bien difficile d'avaler un verre de vin où il n'y ait pas une mouche. Quand le vin est bon, et que la mouche n'est pas trop grosse, il faut boire." While Miss Hoppus's people are very ready to drink the wine—to make the most of any opportunity for amusement that comes in their way—it is, nevertheless, evident that they never manage thoroughly to reconcile themselves to the unwelcome fly. The author, however, does not let her turn for moralising make her tedious, and the following extract may show that she has thoughts worth the reading:—"This would be a very easy world to live in, if consequences began and ended at home. But consequences are like thistle-seed—we never know whither the wind may not carry them. Sometimes the wind carries our thistle-seed clear off our own thriftless fields, and into our industrious neighbour's. The beginning of sin is like the letting-out of water." Whether her people be shadowy or not, that they need mutual sympathy and understanding in order to make them happy, is a cardinal doctrine in her philosophy of life, as witness the excellent little essay on love; and also the statement of opinion that "a man has need of some very absorbing pursuit, to be able to live his life alone."

A strong contrast to the irresolute, self-distrustful hero is presented by his half-brother Geoffry, who is as practical, shrewd, decided, full of common-sense, and confident in his own luck, as his brother is the reverse. That a young gentleman so slangy, horsey, and devoted to sport as Geoffry should exhibit a lively interest in the Vatican and other lions of Rome certainly seemed incongruous at first-sight; but subsequent reflection convinced us that the apparent anomaly might be accounted for by the knack he has of deriving entertainment in most unlikely circumstances, by dint of always detecting some point in everything that is congenial to his own tastes. The following speech of his upon statues will illustrate our meaning:—"I'm awfully fond of statues, when they're good ones. Now, there's Marcus Aurelius—there's a horse for you! A man that knows the points of a horse can very soon learn the points of a statue. A picture is another thing; but you can walk round a statue." A very interesting character is that of the American artist, Clissold, an honest, straightforward, simple-minded man, whose "words seem to come from his thoughts in straight lines"; he is a republican, as a matter of course, yet with something of the exclusive ideas of an aristocrat about him, too, to judge by this declaration,—“For my part, I take no interest in those who are, because they are content to be, the common herd. If they take no pains to prove their equality, why the devil should I howl myself black in the face about it?” Clissold, with his English wife and her sister, who is the heroine, form a pleasant picture of a likeable, healthy-toned family trio; and we think the book would have been all the better if the delineation of these figures had been even more definite than it is, though they are less affected by the prevailing tendency to shadowiness than some others. One of the insufficiently marked entities is the meanly revengeful Dremel, and another is a young widower, who is brought into just sufficient prominence to make it evident what a fine fellow he would have been, if he had been allowed to be seen clearly. In Manente and his friend Gregorio, the profound horror of the evil eye which is characteristic of the lower classes in Italy is put forward strongly, and the reader is amused to see how the liberal Gregorio, while assuming to laugh at the superstition and be quite superior to it, is yet never happy unless possessing a charm against it. These two portraits are all the more welcome for their rarity, since it is not often that authors have either inclination or opportunity to observe foreigners of the lower class closely enough for making a good likeness. The merit of the book lies rather in its character studies and spirited carnival pictures than in its plot, which seems to us very slight, and somewhat deficient in construction. There is too much making of mountains out of mole-hills; and in real life, we doubt whether even any one as undecided as Gilbert would have gone on a whole year without taking steps to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the secret story that threatened his position, and without imparting it to some of the other persons concerned. But on this score, it is ungrateful to complain; since, unless he had acted as he did, this book could never have been written, and the world would have lost a thoughtful and enjoyable novel.

* A Story of Carnival. By Mary A. M. Hoppus. London: Hurst and Blackett.

CAMPS IN THE ROCKIES.*

LIKE other works by the same author, this is a pleasant record of travel and sport; but instead of tracking the writer's footsteps among the Tyrolean Alps, we are now called upon to follow him into remote Western fastnesses, and on journeys compared with which his former wanderings, although a good preparation for more serious undertakings, may almost be said to be child's-play. The scene of Mr. Grohman's recent adventures is a portion of the Rocky Mountains, some part of which had not been previously visited by white men. But before entering upon his explorations, or sitting with him by the camp fire, under any of the varied circumstances which he so graphically describes, we shall do well to remind ourselves of the vast scale on which the operations of Nature are carried on at the other side of the Atlantic, and realise that we have not now to do with a continuous chain of summits, however gigantic, but with a number of separate ranges, intersected by high table-land passes of a hundred or more miles in width, the western half of Wyoming alone containing four such ranges, perfectly distinct from each other, the longest, highest, and most important being that of the Big Wind River, at the northern extremity of which, to the south-east of the Yellowstone Country, lies the immense triangular sea of peaks known as the Sierra Soshoné. Of this mountain system, the greater portion is rugged and barren, while some of its slopes are covered by dense forests, the altitudes above timber-line varying from 10,000 to 14,000 feet. A portion of it had been visited by different United States exploring parties, notably those of Captain Reynolds and Captain Jones; but until after the Bannock War of 1878, the country was, owing to the hostility of the Indians, too unsafe for small parties of travellers; and at the present moment, there seems again to be considerable danger from the "Mountain Crows" and Arrappahoes, who are always ready to take to the war-path. At the time of the author's journey, however, the districts we speak of were so clear that he was able to gratify his desire of seeing them, and having secured the companionship of a veteran courreur des bois, who had also played the part of Indian scout in some of the most sanguinary wars, he carried out his expeditions in genuine trapper fashion, reducing his impedimenta to the very smallest modicum, and depending upon bountiful nature for food and lodging.

The sportsman who goes to work in this way sees life under a thoroughly new aspect, and is able to penetrate into regions which it would be otherwise impossible to visit. Once inured to privation, too, he enjoys himself amazingly, although not every one is either mentally or physically qualified for such an undertaking. Mr. Grohman, however, a hunter from boyhood, had already made many trials of his powers of endurance, and found himself, though naturally wanting in experience of a certain kind, fully capable of holding his own, even with the hardiest of frontiersmen. His "outfit," to use the curious Western expression which, as we are told, covers every imaginable human, animate, and inanimate being or article,—a wife, a wedding, a funeral, a rifle, or a hunting party, coming equally under this designation,—consisted simply of the trapper, another man, and a boy, with some pack-horses laden with beaver-traps, ammunition, cooking utensils, a whiskey-cask, and a small stock of provisions and other necessities; and though there was nothing "top-shelf" about it, the caravan had a very workmanlike, "ready-for-all-emergencies," appearance, the leading spirit, "Port," being a thoroughly genial, manly fellow, of great bravery, and full of dry humour, and the man and boy also characters in their own way. Mr. Grohman delights in giving us every now and then a sample of Western slang, which occasionally enlivens, but more often spoils his narrative. This, however, might be forgiven, but not so his deliberately expressed preference for the phonetic spelling of a word, which continually meets us in the hideous guise of canyon, and is enough to put the mildest reviewer out of temper, especially as one of the most delightful parts of the book is the account of the winter journey to the wonderful and little-known gorges of the Colorado River.

Unable to provide boats for visiting the Cañons in the only way hitherto deemed practicable, the author hit upon the novel expedient of attempting their exploration in the depth of a very severe winter, believing, and as it proved correctly, that the river would be ice-bound even at so great a depth, and, notwithstanding the extreme rapidity of its current. With some necessities packed on an Indian pony, having left his permanent camp near the head cañon, Mr. Grohman threaded his way alone through several of these remarkable gorges, at the bottom of which lay the rock-hemmed river, looking, except at the rapids, like a broad, smooth, Alpine road through a gigantic mountain defile, some sixty yards in width, and from two to three thousand feet in depth, the colouring of the massive walls being often wonderfully beautiful, while the solemn stillness had also its special charm.

Mr. Grohman often speaks of the strangely vivid, but crude colouring that distinguishes Western mountain scenery, especially among the mauvaises terres, where the country, for many thousands of square miles lacking the upper crust of vegetation, and with its singular geological formation showing in the intense sunlight successive bands of different conglomerates in black, brown, pea-green, purple, and vermilion streaks, and that, too, in fantastic, isolated crags, airy pinnacles, or castellated summits, reminds the traveller of some of the early pictorial attempts of primitive races, alike devoid of perspective, and of harmony of tints. Speaking of the Sierra Soshoné, the author remarks:—

"We penetrated into this range from two sides, from the south and from the east, and more weird mountain scenery than was disclosed to me day after day cannot be imagined. Rugged, as, perhaps, no other upheaval in the world, the eye wanders in amazement from the trenced and castellated upper surface, to the deep canyons, lined with great caverns, pillars, towers, and steeples, often hundreds of feet in height. Most of the narrow, fissure-like gorges have been produced by water erosions through consecutive strata of various lava conglomerates, to a depth of 1,500 and 2,000 feet. . . . Except the bizarre Washakie Needle, a prominent landmark, and the only mountain in the vast ocean of pinnacles that has received a name, and another nameless one, which I discovered north-west of it, which are both of granite, the other hundreds, nay, thousands, of peaks and eminences are of volcanic origin."

In strong contrast with this is the description of the lovely forest and lake scenery about Timberline, a ramble through which, in quest of wapiti or bighorn, is so delightful, in the keen, bracing atmosphere. Above the vast stretches of trackless forest, you come upon hundreds of lakelets, each with its distinct physiognomy. In one you may see a great stag or a moose deer knee-deep in the water, while the presence of beaver will give to another "the peculiar charm of inhabitedness;" some will be shut in by vast rocky walls, or surrounded by huge boulders tossed about by some convulsion of nature, while others lie serene and smiling amidst their wooded shores, the waters being of crystal clearness and of the hue of the beryl. Again, they may be found lying in tiers over each other, as many as six tiers having been seen together on the slopes of some giant peak, separated from each other by huge, perpendicular steps in the mountain formation. On many an occasion after a long stalk, it is pleasant, the author tells us, to stretch oneself on the soft sward beside one of these tranquil tarns, and look by turns at the magnificent landscape, and at the furred and feathered creatures who people these solitudes—the deer coming down to the water, the otter creeping along the banks, the “old-man” beaver, with his spouse and kittens cutting or collecting feed-sticks, a quaint little family of blue-winged teal circling and diving in the little bay, or perhaps a flight of wild-geese making a halt in their southernward journey—until it is time to return to the camp fire, which looks so picturesque, with its group of Rembrandt-like figures smoking the pipe of peace, before beginning the two hours’ hard work of the evening, for rifles have to be cleaned, cartridges to be loaded, clothes have to be patched and horses to be shod, boots and mocassins want the awl and last, straps and pack-harness need splicing, and pack-sacks patches; while last, but by no means least, there is most likely a large heap of peltry to be carefully stretched and pegged out, before the buffalo-skin bed can be smoothed and occupied. Not always, however, is a camp scene so peaceful; it may be that a night, or perhaps a day and a night, has to be passed in a snowstorm, when all the saddles and traps have to be used to keep down a protecting sail-cloth, and the pick-axe does duty for an anchor; or possibly an eight days’ hurricane may have to be got over in a miserable “dug-out,” some 10 ft. by 9 ft., scooped out of the side of a cañon, and crowded up with the whole “outfit;” but of course the rough must be taken with the smooth, and Mr. Grohman and his followers seem to have had the happy knack of “not being given,” as he expresses it, “to borrow trouble.”

* Camps in the Rockies. By W. A. Baillie-Grohman. London: Sampson Low and Co.

In his chapter headed, “Camps in Cowboyland,” as well as in the appendix, he gives an interesting account of the cattle-raising business, and its westward extension, with statistics which may serve to show very fairly what are the usual profits made by men who have had moderate luck, and who were possessed of reasonable skill; and one point is especially dwelt upon, in reference to English immigrants, namely, the necessity, and yet the great difficulty, to a Briton of becoming thoroughly Americanised, without which process it seems that success in the business is most unlikely. A gentleman-farmer is an unheard-of personage in the States; a man must work with his men early and late, and he must never say, “Go and do,” but, “Come, let us do so and so.” And if the English gentleman aspires to be a good ranchman, he must work as do the others, for in no occupation is popularity more essential than in this one, and in none is a man so dependent on his neighbours, so open to petty annoyances, or so helplessly exposed to vindictive injury.

There is also in Mr. Grohman’s book a good deal of information about the fauna of the Rockies, for he studied not only the various animals of the deer tribe, which were the special objects of his pursuit; but also directed much attention to the beaver, and describes minutely the habits and methods of working both of the “bank” and “dam” beaver, and the formation of beaver meadows, telling us the suggestive story of the man who learned from the examination of the work of these intelligent creatures how to get over a serious engineering difficulty, by building dams and reservoirs entirely of peat. Of a less pleasant animal Mr. Grohman has also a good deal to say, going into the question of hydrophobia produced by skunk-bites and the method of cure, and giving us also some curious facts about that disagreeable creature. On the whole, we may fairly say that his book, while it cannot fail to amuse the stay-at-home reader, is also likely to prove useful to the traveller or the settler in Western lands.

THE GLOBE SERIES OF READERS.*

THE physique, so to speak, of this series, which consists of six readers and two primers, is excellent. The paper is good, the type large and clear, and the illustrations, which are sufficiently numerous to please, and too few to distract, call for little criticism, though in some instances the blocks appear to have seen hard service, and the woodcuts occasionally have a common look about them. To the text, or rather to the method of the compilation, quite the same praise cannot be accorded. The system of marking pronunciation, though sanctioned, we are told, by the high authority of Professor Bain, does not commend itself as judicious. The letters á, é, í, ó, ú, with the acute accent, are directed to be pronounced as the diphthongs in “main,” “mien,” “mine,” “moan,” and “moon.” This is neither the natural nor the common pronunciation of these vowels in English, though the contrary is often supposed to be the case. They are not usually so sounded, save where the succeeding consonant is followed by an e mute—a mere orthographical device—or where, by a false analogy, the names of the vowels have induced a corresponding pronunciation. It should have been pointed out that the sound of u in “tune” is a degradation of the Continental u, the true sound of which is nearly preserved in the Scottish “guid,” “pair,” &c. The proper short sound of u is heard in “put,” “full,” the long sound in “rule,” “yule,” and to mark the former ú, and the latter û, is an unnecessary deviation from the accepted use of the circumflex and grave accents. The broad a in “all” were better represented by the Swedish ä than by o, and to signify by (˘) that a vowel is long, but unaccented, is surely a confusing employment of the symbol. A similar exception may be taken to the use of ä and ö, to note the sounds of a in “far” and a in “all,” when unaccented. These marks would have done as well as any other, were it not that, by almost universal consent, they already subserve different orthographical needs. It is worth while insisting on the fact that in English, as in Anglo-Saxon, the vowels had originally, and still have, properly, nearly the same values as on the Continent. A much needed reform in our orthography can only thus be brought about, and the awkward singularity of our pronunciation of the vowels, when we depart from what may be fairly termed their legitimate sounds, removed.

Of the series, the earlier volumes are, perhaps, the most important. If the art of reading is not found easy by children, their elders have found it still less easy to invent a thoroughly satisfactory method of teaching the rudiments of the art. Not to be possessed of the art, is to be destitute, as it were, of a sense, to be in a measure mentally blind. The grown man who cannot read has no other knowledge than that gained by his personal experiences, together with some reflection of that possessed by his circle of acquaintances. He is a member not of society, but of a coterie. Hence the paramount importance, not to himself merely, or even mainly, but to society, that every one should at least be able to read, that he may be capable of becoming a full member of it. The acquirement of the art must be most difficult to the immature minds of children. We may understand the difficulty, when we reflect upon the painful drudgery one has to go through in beginning to learn a language written in a different character from that of our own. Take Russian, for instance, with its thirty odd letters, and some half-dozen sounds to many of them. Simply to decipher Russian, with anything like the ease with which we decipher English—by words, even by sentences—requires the assiduous study of at least twelve months. With Arabic, twice or thrice that time is necessary; while Chinese children are said to take six or seven years in learning to spell through their horn-books. On an average, an English child probably takes, at least, two years to learn to read with facility enough to make the practice of reading otherwise than irksome. Such, at least, is the case upon any system of instruction yet invented. The matter has not been sufficiently investigated, deductively or inductively. There are no statistics enabling a judgment to be formed of the comparative excellence and rapidity of the various systems in vogue, and the subject can only, at present, be treated deductively. The first thing the compiler of an elementary reader should do, is to collect a child’s vocabulary. A child of three will have a stock of not more, probably, than half a hundred words; of six, a hundred; of nine, from two to three hundred. With these materials, sentences should be constructed, and short stories and descriptions put together, of a nature to interest the little learners. They should be taught, as recommended in the Oxford Series, to read words as wholes, not by parts or syllables, to read them as a sort of ideographs. A little experience will soon enable them to recognise the parts and their respective values, but both analysis and synthesis should be allowed to follow naturally in the wake of concrete knowledge, not taught directly to intellects far too immature to be capable of these mental operations in any useful degree. The words need not be all monosyllabic,—children use polysyllabic words freely enough. Spelling, which is an analytic operation extremely irksome and uninteresting to children, should not be insisted upon at first,—perhaps, at no stage as a separate task. The teaching should be wholly dogmatic, and based as far as possible upon the child's vocabulary, until he becomes fairly familiar with the written representations of his stock of words. He will by that time have unconsciously acquired a certain elementary knowledge of principles, which it will be easy to develop, both immediately and mediately, through continued reading. In the Primers, Mr. Murison has made a good choice of words, though he has stuck somewhat too closely to monosyllables. In the second primer, the lessons consist of short stories or descriptions, some of which are excellent; others might have been told with more simplicity and less repetition. He adopts the method, followed in most reading books, of impressing the vowel and diphthong sounds upon the memory by frequent repetition, a number of lessons in succession being devoted to the same vowel or vowel combination. This plan has its merits, but the disadvantage of it lies in its irksomeness to children, who love variety. The earlier lessons in the first primer would hardly attract children. They consist, not of short stories, &c., but of phrases, such as "I am at it. . . . It am I in if an ox is in, it is on us," &c. Further on, we have sentences such as, "There is rum in the tun They got some fun at the tun," &c. Phrases of this kind are to children sound divorced from sense, and render instruction both difficult and uninteresting. The plan of introducing exceptional, yet not uncommon words, in special type, is an excellent one, and might with advantage have been carried out more extensively. The jingling rhymes, too, are good, and are sure to be appreciated by the little beginners whose task they are intended to relieve. The Readers are better than the Primers. The selections are good, and sufficiently varied in style and matter. The didactic element is not too largely introduced, and the attempt to graduate the lessons is, perhaps, as successful as any such attempt can be. The fact is, children's literature of a high order is anything but extensive; there are not many Lewis Carrolls in the world, and the Blakes are rarer still. Mr. Murison has been wisely bold in "adapting" some of the pieces to suit his readers. Numberless extracts from good authors, by a certain amount of delatinisation and some simplification of phraseological structure, may be made wholly intelligible to very young readers. The selection, from a literary point of view, is, of course, open to criticism. But then, every chrestomathy must be so, and we should simply illustrate the fact in indicating a different selection. After all, the choice, within certain limits, is a matter of minor importance, so long as the object is rather to teach the art of reading, than to convey instruction, or to present models for composition. As Mr. Murison well observes, "The first purpose of a series of Reading Books is to furnish a succession of lessons of such a character as to teach children to read, and to implant in their minds the love of reading." In this, as in all similar collections, the extracts are taken from books written for men, not for children, and there seems to be no good reason why the language of men should not sometimes be translated into that of children, as far as practicable, without sacrificing too much of the meaning and force of the original.

* The Globe Readers. Compiled and Edited by A. F. Murison, M.A. London: Macmillan and Co.

Explanatory notes are appended to the Lessons, elucidating the more difficult words and phrases. These, if left to himself, the young student will, doubtless, be inclined to skip, but it should be the business of the teacher to induce his pupil to attend to them. With patience, he may be persuaded to desire explanation, and once this desire is implanted in him, a great step forward will have been made in his intellectual development. The notes, therefore, should be clear enough to be easily intelligible and accurate in substance, though exhaustiveness of definition need not be aimed at. Mr. Murison has followed the fashion in giving his readers mild doses of etymology which can do no harm, and the proper names occurring in the Lessons are not left without some brief account of whom or what they designate. Some of the notes show a certain want of care. A "myth" is wrongly defined (Book IV., p. 2) as "a fanciful story or a fiction;" the true meaning of "journey" would have been best illustrated by reference to the word "journeyman," in which its original sense is preserved. Statues are not "carved" out of bronze, and the description of chemistry as the "science that considers the nature and component part of bodies" is both awkward and misleading, though not, strictly speaking, inaccurate.

In fine, the series is as good as most others of the kind, and better than many, but has nothing distinctly novel about it, except the excellence of the illustrations, for which the publishers deserve commendation. The editor aims too much at combining instruction in reading with a sort of universal smattering, a plan likely, in our opinion, to confuse the young student. It is a standing wonder to the present writer that, in the compilation of Readers, the works of such authors as William Cobbett, and many of the sketches of travel and adventure contained in periodical literature, are not made use of, while much tawdry poetry is a stock element in nearly all of them. Mr. Murison's series will stand a fair chance of success, in the competition with the crowd of similar works that flood the educational market, but the ideal Reader has yet to be produced. Many a similar series must appear, have its day, and vanish, before this result, the importance of which can hardly be over-rated, will be attained.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Quarterly Review makes a good start in 1883 in all respects but the political one; the January number is a decided improvement upon its predecessor. As we have already referred to the chief political paper, we may dismiss the decidedly weakest element in this number of the Review, by saying that it contains an article on the war in Egypt, which reads like a speech by Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett. But there are two papers which recall the old literary vigour of the Quarterly, "Progress and Poverty" and "American Novels." The former is the best written of the many answers which the celebrated work of the American economist has produced. The writer of the paper on "American Novels" does scant justice to Mr. James and Mr. Howells, but then he does ample justice to such authors as Mr. Cable, who has done for Louisiana what the elder Hawthorne has done for New England, and who is too little known; and then he has opinions of his own, which he expresses with a vivacity that is as enjoyable as it is uncommon in the heavier Reviews. Poor Sir Archibald Alison gets more notice—certainly, more generous treatment—from the Quarterly, now that he is dead, than he ever obtained during his life, although the writer of the article on his "Autobiography" shows himself to be perfectly aware of its weak points. The author of "Pawnbroking" knows his subject, and writes in a style which is never dull; and "Corea" and "Private Life of Cardinal Mazarin" are also well worth perusal. The former, in particular, is very opportune. The paper on "Archbishop Tait and the Primacy," with which this number of the Review opens, is fair and discriminating.

The new number of the Edinburgh Review has a dull, disappointing, behind-date look. Why should we have an article at this time of day on "Henry Erskine and his Times," not to speak of the imperfect view taken in it of Thomas Erskine, who was a much stronger man than his brother? There is an article on "The Merv Oasis," which is really a newspaper review of Mr. O'Donovan's book. The writer on "The Nationalisation of the Land" has not such keenness either of eye or of pen as the Quarterly critic of Mr. George. Besides, when he compares Mr. George's views to those of Communists, Socialists, and the like, he ignores or forgets the fact that Mr. George claims for his "one great remedy" that it will realise the dream of the Socialist, without resort being had to Governmental repression. There are, in fact, only two good papers in the new Edinburgh, "Life and Correspondence of George Sand" and "Immanuel Kant and the Kantian 'Revival,'" the latter of which, apart from other merits, is a very good précis of recent Kantian literature.

There is much erudition in the new number of the Church Quarterly, although not a little of it, as in the articles on "The Use of Unfermented Wine in the Holy Communion," and "Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister," looks like love's labour lost. It is, however, seen to decidedly greater advantage in articles on "The Revised Edition" and in Mr. Philip Pusey's "Cyril of Alexandria." An estimate given of Carlyle's life and works deserves high praise, being temperate, and full of sound criticism, such as that "Carlyle's merit as a moralist consists in the contagious force of his own moral nature." Perhaps the most useful paper is a retrospect of 1882, though the reader had better take it with a few grains of lay salt. The distinguishing characteristic of the Primacy of Dr. Tait is happily stated, when it is said that "by the unexpected and unwonted strength which he infused into the Primacy of All England, he has put the mark of inexpediency against that favourite creation of modern statesmanship, a weak Archbishop of Canterbury."

There is little to be said of the new number of the Dublin Review, except that it is almost all Ireland and Roman Catholicism, and full of St. Martin, St. Patrick, and St. Francis. We could wish, however, that a large section of the Irish people would take to heart the sound sense conveyed in an article on "Ireland, her Friends and Foes." There is some out-of-the-way and interesting information in "Catholicism in Egypt."

There are several articles of popular, or at least of lay, interest in the new half-yearly part of The Journal of Psychological Medicine, such as the papers on suicide, lunacy, and lunacy-law reform. Dr. Winn, who writes on Darwin, might, however, have attacked the evolution theory without losing temper, and speaking of contributors to one of our quarterlies "imagining that the use of obscure and pedantic phraseology is adding to our knowledge of the operations of the human mind." It is not humorous, it only savours of flippancy, to write in this fashion:—"Darwin's account of sexual selection is very amusing, but we prefer his grandfather's poem on 'The Loves of the Plants.'"

Days of Grace in India, a Record of Visits to Indian Missions, by H. S. Newman, Leominster (Partridge and Co.), is a curiously interesting book. Rather commonly got up, and with a portrait of the Prince of Wales at the beginning, one is hardly prepared to find, as we do, much that one can turn to again and again in its information, or to find, in its numerous engravings, a realisation of the things and people of India for which one is grateful. Then the catholic spirit of the record is delightful, for the writer shows sympathy with good, wherever he finds it, even when, as in the case of Keshub Chunder Sen, it is mixed with much that is unintelligible, or even distasteful. As to the present effect of high-class education on the young men, the writer quotes the opinion of a native pastor at Madras, Rajahgopal. He says that "in not a few cases, when students leave the Missionary colleges, their attitude towards idolatry is one of marked and thorough antagonism. They have completely swept away every vestige of idol-worship from their houses, and are found years after clinging to their Bible tenaciously, but the numerical strength of those who have been morally and spiritually benefited is not to be measured by the number of baptisms or public professions."

The Home Life of Henry W. Longfellow, by Blanche Roosevelt Tucker Machetta, (Carleton and Co., New York), should be of interest to English readers, on account of the glimpse it affords of the literary circles in America, and the peculiar way in which a coterie forms itself round a man of any celebrity. No doubt, amongst ourselves, the same kind of thing obtains to a certain extent; but if fellow-workers in the literary field are admitted to intimate association with their more celebrated companions, they do not usually take the public into their confidence in the way Americans do. Of course, we lose a good deal in this way of such details as are given in the book before us; some of them, however, we could afford to lose, even in the case of so musical a poet and so excellent a man as Longfellow. Trivialities are frequent in the record, but they are relieved by occasional passages of deeper interest. Those which refer to Victor Hugo, and Longfellow's friendly interest in all that could be told about him, are amongst these, but too long to quote; such also is his account given to Madame Machetta of his visit to Jules Janin; but we must give a part of his conversation with his young friend on the subject of Alfred de Musset. He said:—

"Now, there is another French writer whose books have probably been read by millions, but to whose writing I can never turn with pleasure. I speak of Alfred de Musset, a man with a God-given, beautiful talent, but all for the bad. I often think of what he might have done in the world had his mind been on anything pure or virtuous. . . . He is to me a heart-rending example of the uses to which a man may dedicate a great gift originally of divine import, whose whole life and writings are made up of worldliness, licence, and innate cravings after unhealthy mental food. His words pander to the vilest taste, while the beauty with which he clothes his ideas is undeniable. Even in some of his most violent outbursts, he does not divest his pages of charm and exquisite wording. He seems to have lived with a gloss of utter indifference to any faith covering a soul which I have often hoped was not so barren as he himself painted it. I deplore with my whole heart such a mistaken life, that had within it the wherewith to be something good and true. Only think, had he described good with the eloquence and sincerity that he bestowed on vice, what a benefit he would have been to the world, and what a series of powerful arguments he would have wielded for mankind, with a brain and pen that followed each other in such a headlong torrent of irresistible poetry!"

The Caravan Route between Egypt and Syria. By his Imperial Highness the Archduke Salvator of Austria. (Chatto and Windus.)—This book is translated by the Chevalier de Hesse Wartegg, and so well done, that it is only here and there, when he uses "Arabian" in cases where we should say "Arab," that one recognises it as the writing of a foreigner. Indeed, many an Englishman does not write such good English. But notwithstanding this, the very nature of the route to be described causes a great quietness and monotony in the narrative, which fortunately is enlivened greatly by the drawings done by the studious prince, and very well engraved. Being faithful, they, of course, partake of the repose of the subject, a deserted highway; but they give a much better idea of the brilliant light and wide expanses of the desert than many more pretentious pictures. The travellers followed the telegraph wires all along the once well-trodden route, but it seems that no railway is practicable, on account of the shifting nature of the loose sand which composes the soil, and which would so constantly choke up the line, that it could only be kept clear at too great expense.

Health Resorts, and their Uses. By J. Burney Yeo, M.D. (Chapman and Hall.)—This is not, as its title might suggest, a mere pamphlet, but quite a good-sized octavo volume, in which the subject in hand is treated exhaustively. Most of the papers have appeared before, but now they are collected, they will form a very useful guide both to those who have patients to advise, and to the patients themselves. Indeed, any one would be interested in the opening subject, which is the relative properties of sea and mountain air. After referring to some experiments by Professor Beneke, the writer says, on p. 5:—

"These observations appear to justify the following inference:—Since the activity of tissue-changes will correspond with the loss of heat, the greater the loss of heat, the greater will be the activity of change of tissue, i.e., the greater the stimulus to nutritive changes. Hence, in mountain air these nutritive changes are comparatively much less active than on the shore of the North Sea. And Professor Beneke's practical conclusions are that individuals in whom the processes of tissue-change do not require hastening are, ceteris paribus, better off on mountain-heights than on the sea-coast. Highly irritable, nervous organisations, people who, as we say, take too much out of themselves, profit more by mountain than by sea air. For those, on the contrary, who have no tendency to nervous irritability, and who are in a condition to bear the increased stimulus to tissue-change, sea air is a more powerful restorative agent. Hence the greater part of scrofulous persons, and those exhausted by over-work, who retain some activity of the digestive organs, should prefer the sea-side. But although these general conclusions of Beneke's are probably in the main correct, there are many other considerations to be attended to in determining the relative value in individual instances of sea and mountain air. I have, however, thought it advisable to call attention at some length to these really valuable observations and suggestions of Beneke, as they are almost the only experimental researches published on this interesting and important practical question."

The Hebrew Student's Commentary on Zechariah. By W. H. Lowe. (Macmillan and Co.)—The Second Book of Samuel. Edited by C. F. Kirkpatrick. (Deighton, Bell, and Co.)—These are both scholarly works for scholars, due to the impetus lately given from Cambridge to more accurate theological study. The former appeals to Tripos men, and explains the Hebrew words and sentences from a purely grammatical point of view. One of its excellencies consists in the comparison of the original with the Septuagint, and the attempt here and there to reconstruct the earlier text, from which the Masoretic has varied. The work of Mr. Kirkpatrick, who since its publication has become Regius Professor of Hebrew, is of a less technical and more widely useful character. He addresses himself to the English reader desirous of the best information on the rendering and meaning of the Book of Samuel. It is just what is wanted by the candidates for examination by the Local Board. The notes are lucid, terse, and sufficient, as we can testify from personal use in teaching a class.

The Hem of Christ's Garment (Hodder and Stoughton), is the title of the first of twenty collected sermons of Dr. Mellor, with a biographical notice by Dr. H. B. Reynolds, of Cheshunt College, introducing his recollections of this former Chairman of the Congregational Union. This body has now attained so commanding a position, that any memorial of one of its annual Presidents has an interest. Besides "taking the highest place as a preacher," Dr. Mellor is described as a master in debate. "Great controversial victories were won by him over Agnostics, Owenites, Jingoes, and Ritualists, as the case may be." The juxtaposition suggests a mind of a very combative order, but the tone of these published sermons is peaceful enough. A strange title has always an attraction for a reviewer, and consequently we turned to the pages headed "Lily Work." This is strictly "a sermon in stones." From the mention of the delicate carvings round the capitals of the twin pillars in Solomon's Temple, Jachin and Boaz—"Stability" and "Strength,"—the moral is drawn that "Christian character is very incomplete, until it rises up to the efflorescence which crowns strength with beauty." This savours of what our ancestors would have called a "conceit;" but at least it is a pretty conceit, and the lesson sound enough, and one which Mr. Matthew Arnold might rejoice to find written where it is.

Alick Treherne's Temptation. By Alaric Carr. (Smith, Elder, and Co.)—The author of this novel ought to have written a better one. He—or should we say she?—possesses some of the qualities requisite for the writing of readable and enjoyable fiction, but has not yet acquired the art of using them skilfully; they are, so to speak, in a state of jumble, like good things in a bag, which are pulled out at random. The author is wasteful at one part of the story, and niggardly at other parts; bangs off a quantity of ammunition at the beginning, and then hangs fire, under the stern and senseless three-volumes condition. There is also some carelessness about the style, and lawless handling of parts of speech. Nevertheless, this novel has interest, and is pleasant to read; but the author would make a mistake in regarding it as an achievement; it is only a tolerably fair promise.

A Brief History of the Indian People, (Trübner and Co.), by Dr.

W. W. Hunter, is warmly to be commended as a high-class school-book, and also as an introduction to the other and larger books on the same subject. It is admirably arranged and concisely written; and the devices of varieties of type are used to mark both salient points in the narrative and digressions from it. Dr. Hunter has, it is well known, opinions of his own on India, to which he adheres tenaciously. But he does not obtrude them here; on the contrary, he has kept in view throughout his own doctrine that "the greatest service which an Indian historian can at present render to India, is to state the actual facts in such a way that they will be read." This compact little volume ought to do much to remove that ignorance of the history of India which it is to be feared is very nearly as much the reproach of our schools as it was when Macaulay pointed it out.

Under the title of England's Essayists (Macniven and Wallace, Edinburgh), the Rev. Peter Anton writes both with judgment and with enthusiasm of Addison, Bacon, De Quincey, and Lamb. He would, in our opinion, however, have done still better, had he said a little less about these four writers, and said something about others. Goldsmith is, although in a different way, as charming an essayist as Addison, in spite of his having written some sad nonsense about Shakespeare's mixed metaphors. Then, what about Johnson, and even Steele? Within his own chosen lines, however, Mr. Anton has done his work well, even if he is too lenient to Bacon. There are no faults of style, to speak of, in this volume. What does Mr. Anton mean, however, by saying that "Lamb was not a stomachic man?" As the expression stands, it recalls a Scotch Mrs. Poyser, who figures in some old novel, and asserts, with contemptuous vigour, that "there were no such things as stomachs in her young days!"

Mr. Alfred Rimmer, no doubt, intended his Early Homes of Prince Albert (Blackwood) to do service as a gift-book. As such, it is likely to be much appreciated. The paper and type are very good, and the illustrations—the subjects of which the title of the book itself suggests—are numerous and admirable. Mr. Rimmer's style is of the better guide-book sort. He is very loyal, but his enthusiasm is sometimes expressed in slipshod English. Thus, speaking of the demonstrations in England on the occasion of the marriage of the Queen and Prince Albert, he says,—"In the city of Chester, where these lines are written—and surely it is remote enough, and even more remote in these days from any centre than it is now—the rejoicings were on a scale quite commensurate with the opportunities of the inhabitants."

SHORT STORIES.—Whoever desires to have a supper—or, to be strictly accurate, three meals—of horrors, should read the stories of morbid passion which Mrs. Horace Dobell has published, under the title of Dark Pages. (Remington and Co.)—There is force in every one of these three tales; there is genuine descriptive power in particular in "The Windmill on the Common;" and it is to be hoped Mrs. Dobell will yet put it to better purpose.—"How dreadfully pretty these girls are!" says one of the heroines of Brookdale (Griffith and Farran), by Kate Chamberlin. Let "common-place" be substituted for "pretty," and the young ladies who bustle about in Miss Chamberlin's pages, and play at cross-purposes with their male friends, are correctly described. In one sense, Brookdale is all naïveté; but naïveté, to be enjoyable, or even tolerable, in fiction, ought to be charming.—Power and promise are the rare characteristics of Mericas, and Other Tales (W. Satchell and Co.), by Clementina Black, especially of Mericas, which is a very creditable attempt to realise some of the English manners and customs of the eighteenth century from the stand-point of a sprightly Spanish girl. It is, besides, a pleasant story.—If Oxford Undergraduates were really as silly and as much given to idiotic practical jokes as they are represented to be, in Tales of Modern Oxford (Unwin), we should feel inclined to say, "Perish, Oxford!"—Flora Maclean's Reward (Olipphant, Edinburgh), by Jane M. Kippen, is the unpretentious story of a Highland servant-girl, of whom it is literally true that "thro' patience she inherits the promises." It is worth a score of ordinary tracts.—Peace and War in the Transvaal (S. Low), by Mrs. Walter W. C. Long, is an account of the defence of Fort Mary, Lydenburg. It is short, concise, and simply written.

Burke's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage. (Harrison).—This is the forty-eighth annual edition of Mr. Burke's useful guide. From the preface, we learn that during 1882, only one title in the Peerage, "Netterville," has become extinct, while four new dignities have been created. Fourteen Peers and twenty-seven baronets have died since December 1st, 1881; two baronetcies have become extinct, and thirteen have been created.

James Russell Lowell (Trübner and Co.) is a short biographical sketch, by Francis H. Underwood. The illustrations, paper, and type are superior to the narrative, which is eulogistic rather than discriminating.

We have received:—An Illustrated Dictionary of Words Used in Art and Archaeology, by J. W. Mollett, B.A. (Sampson Low and Co.) The book is intended to supply as far as possible the information given in the "classified catalogues" issued in connection with the South Kensington Museum.—A Religious Encyclopedia; or, Dictionary of Biblical, Historical, Doctrinal, and Practical Theology, edited by P. Schaff, D.D., LL.D., Rev. S. M. Jackson, M.A., and Rev. D. S. Schaff. (T. and T. Clark.) The present work is based on that by Herzog, Plitt, and Hauck.—Charities' Register and Digest (Longmans, Green, and Co.), issued in connection with the Charity Organisation Society.—Catalogue of the York Gate Geographical and Colonial Library. (Murray).—Relics of Popular Antiquities. (Elliot Stock.) The volume is published for the Folk-lore Society, and contains an account of "Researches respecting the Book of Sindibad" and "Portuguese Folk-tales."—The Journal of Education for 1882. (Walker and Co.)—Military Transport, by Lieutenant-Colonel G. A. Furse (Stationery Office).—A Text-book on the Elements of Physics, by A. P. Gage, A.M. (Heath and Co., Boston, U.S.).—Calendars, for 1882-1883, of Queen's College (Macmillan), Trinity College (Spottiswoode and Co.), and Mason College, Birmingham. (Cornish Brothers, Birmingham).—Keble's Christian Year. (Kegan Paul and Co.) It was an excellent idea of the publishers to include this in their admirable "Parchment Series."—A new edition, with illustrations, of Dr. George Macdonald's History of Gutta-Serena Willie. (Chatto and Windus).—Social Science Association, a Narrative of Results, by J. L. Clifford-Smith, secretary to the Association. This narrative of the proceedings of the Nottingham Congress is clear and concise.—William Ewart Gladstone, by E. R. Emerson. (Ward, Lock, and Co.); Dr. David Livingstone (Edinburgh, Oliphant), by Samuel Mosman; and Ruskin's Thoughts and Teaching, by Edmund J. Baillie. (John Pearce.) These books, though dealing with very different subjects, may be classed together, from their being short and appreciative, and so appealing to people who may not have it in their power to buy larger biographies. The execution of all is above the average.—Chaucer's Squire's Tale, Shakespeare's Henry V., and Macaulay's Essay on Clive. These all belong to Messrs. W. and R. Chambers's carefully-annotated series of reprints. The essay on "The Rise of European Power and Commerce in the East," with which Mr. G. B. Turnball introduces the last, is very careful and readable, and his notes, which follow the text, contain a mass of really well-digested historical and literary information.—The Seventh Book of Xenophon's Anabasis, by J. T. White, D.D., an addition to Mr. White's series of "Grammar-school Texts," published by Longmans, Green, and Co.—Map of the Channel Isles, an addition to the handy and neatly bound "Ordnance Survey" series, published by Philip and Son.—The Principles of Glass-making, by H. J. Powell, B.A., H. Chance, M.A., and H. G. Harris, an addition to the series of Technological Handbooks published by Bell and Sons.

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE SPECTATOR."

	Yearly.	Half-yearly.	Quarterly.
Including postage to any Part of the United Kingdom ...	£1 8 6	0 14 8	0 7 2
Including postage to any of the Australasian Colonies, America, France, Germany, ...	1 10 6	0 15 8	0 7 8
Including postage to India, China, &c. ...	1 12 6	0 16 8	0 8 2

SCALE OF CHARGES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

OUTSIDE PAGE, TWELVE GUINEAS.
Page	£10 10 0	Narrow Column	£3 10 0
Half-Page	5 5 0	Half-Column	1 15 0
Quarter-Page	2 12 6	Quarter-Column	0 17 6

Six lines and under, 3s. and 9d. per line for every additional line (of eight words).
Displayed Advertisements according to space.
Special Contracts for a Series of Three, Six, or Twelve Months.

HINDLEY'S CHINTZES.

ORIGINAL DESIGNS, FAST COLOURS.
From 9d. per yard.
WALL PAPERS AND CURTAIN STUFFS.
O. HINDLEY and SONS,
290 to 294 1/4 OXFORD STREET, W.

LIBERTY'S ART FABRICS.

ALL PATTERNS POST FREE.

LIBERTY'S ART CURTAINS, CHINTZ AND UPHOLSTERY STUFFS, NOVEL IDEAS IN LADIES' WINTER CLOSTUME AND TOILETTE FABRICS. LIBERTY'S COLOURS. EASTERN AND EUROPEAN DESIGNS. PURE FINISH, INEXPENSIVE MATERIALS. East India House, } REGENT STREET, W.
& Chesham House, }

OSLER'S CRYSTAL GLASS AND CHINA SERVICES.

ELECTROLIERS, CHANDELIERS, AND LAMPS.
100 OXFORD STREET, W.

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,849.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1883. [REGISTERED FOR } PRICE.....6d.
TRANSMISSION ABROAD. } BY POST, 8d.]

THE WEEK	137	Prince Bismarck and the English Sunday	149
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		The Society of Friends	150
The Crisis in France	140	Mr. Romanas' "Animal Intelligence"	150
Ireland and the Proposed Reforms	140	Sir William Rowan Hamilton	151
Mr. Forwood on the Future of Toryism	142	ART—
The Proposed Additions to the Cabinet	143	Gustave Doré	151
Mr. Chamberlain at Swansea	143	BOOKS—
Prussia and the Vatican	144	Miss Gordon Cumming's "Fire Fountains of Hawaii"	152
The High-Church View of the Episcopal Office	145	Modern Landscape	153
"Methratten"	146	Two on a Tower	154
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		Mr. Courtney's Studies in Philosophy	154
Mr. Denning and the Church Missionary Society	147	Stories by an Old Bohemian	156
Consecrated Ground	148	The Magazines	157
Ireland and England	149	CURRENT LITERATURE	158
Mahomedan Self-Government	149	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	161
		ADVERTISEMENTS	161-168

* * * The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

It is our intention occasionally to issue gratis with the SPECTATOR Special Literary Supplements, the outside pages of which will be devoted to Advertisements. The Fourth of these Supplements will be issued with the SPECTATOR for February 17th; and Advertisements for it should reach the Publishing Office not later than noon on the Wednesday preceding that date.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

SINCE our last issue, the Duclerc Ministry has fallen. On Saturday, the 27th ult., the Committee of the Chamber for the examination of M. Floquet's Expulsion Bill, at the request of the Ministry, accepted a Bill drawn up by M. Fabre. The Ministry, through the Minister of the Interior, M. Fallières, adopted this measure as a compromise, and resolved to defend it. It consists of three clauses, by the first of which, "The members of families which have reigned in France can fulfil no electoral function, and no civil or military employment. Voting-papers bearing the names of the above persons will not be counted." Under the second clause, the President of the Republic in Council may decree that any such person "whose presence compromises the safety of the State" must quit French territory; and under the third, any such banished person may, if he returns, be sentenced by a correctional tribunal—that is, without a jury—to five years' imprisonment. It will be observed that Clause II. exonerates the Government from giving any reasons, as only they can decide whether the safety of the State is compromised or not; and that if the Chamber votes expulsion, the Ministry must obey, or resign. As we understand the Bill, the Princes keep their commissions, but can perform no functions; but the War Ministry, as represented in debate, apparently consider that the commissions are gone too, General Thibaudin specifically promising that if resistance arose among officers on that ground, he would put it down.

The adoption of this Bill was accompanied by the resignations of the Ministers of War and Marine; and the Premier, M. Duclerc, who is ill, on learning the facts, resigned also. M. Grévy at first sent for M. Jules Ferry, but on his refusing office, appointed M. Fallières, previously Minister of the Interior, to the Premiership. M. Fallières faced the Chamber on Tuesday, without Ministers of War or Marine, but in the middle of his speech fainted, and has since been ill. General Thibaudin, however, accepted the Ministry of War, and M. de Mahy that of Marine, and on Thursday the debate was finished. All the Right, some Moderates, and thirteen Extremists, headed by M. Anatole de la Forge, resisted proscription in any form; but the majority called for the clôture, declared the sitting permanent, and after ten hours' voting on amendments, marked by some stirring scenes and the suspension of two Deputies for "insult," the Fabre Bill was carried, by 343 to 163, a very large majority. The Chamber then adjourned till next Thursday, to await the decision of the Senate.

The Bill has still to pass the Senate, and it is well understood that a majority of Senators think it unjust and impolitic, and they may, therefore, throw it out. If they do so, however, the two Chambers will be in direct collision, and as the Deputies will not give way, a dissolution would be unavoidable. That will, no doubt, be voted, if M. Grévy wishes it; but it is said that he is unwilling to propose this, except as a last resort, and that the Senators will, consequently, only amend the Bill, by limiting the power of expulsion to cases in which a Prince has performed some specific act calculated to menace the Republic. The Deputies, it is hoped, having had time to cool, and being conciliated by the banishment of the Princes from active life, may seize this opportunity of putting an end to an irritating discussion. M. Jules Ferry would then take power, and another effort would be made to form a stable government. Affairs, it is possible, might be arranged in this way, if the Chamber were not headless; but it is without any general leader, it despises the ad interim Government, and it is not anxious that M. Jules Ferry should resume power. It may, therefore, resist all compromise, and insist on its own Bill, relying on M. Grévy's known reluctance to issue any manifesto to the country which, if rejected, would necessitate his own resignation. The Senate is to be immediately invited to consider the Bill, so that this part of the crisis may not be too protracted.

The news from Ireland is still conflicting. On the one hand, it is asserted that the police, who are now confident of convicting the murderers of Mr. Field, a cabman's daughter, named Alice Carroll, who saw the crime, having come forward, have hopes of punishing the murderers of Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke. Two of the assassins and the car-driver are pointed out by informers, and a gentleman has been found who saw these two and the car loitering about. The knives used and the pistols worn can also be identified. On the other hand, it is evident that many of the population of Dublin sympathise even with the assassins, the witnesses' families are threatened, and it is necessary to guard both witnesses and accused by heavy bodies of police. As regards any charge, except assassination, to have been prosecuted is to possess a prima facie claim to become a Member of Parliament. No political repute, not even one for extreme opinions, quite equals that. By all accounts, the feeling among the people against the British Government was never more bitter, just as it was never more unreasonable.

Mr. Chamberlain attended on Wednesday a banquet given by the Swansea Liberal Association in honour of Mr. Dillwyn, M.P., and delivered a very amusing speech, in which, claiming for himself the name of Radical, he did full honour to the influence exerted by Mr. Dillwyn and his party over public affairs. "According to some pessimist writers and speakers," he said:—"Mr. Dillwyn belongs to a class which is fast dying out among us. He is the typical independent Member, a man who is to be gagged and to be enslaved by a caucus. In spite of these terrible inventions, I do not doubt that Mr. Dillwyn will be able to hold his own, although he has never thought it necessary to advertise his independence by abusing his friends and flattering his opponents, nor to assert his superior virtue by ascribing the meanest motives to every other member of his party. Yet I do not think that any one will be found to say he has ever been false to his convictions or untrue to his principles. The fact is, it is a mistake to suppose that independence can only be asserted in isolation. A man may hold very advanced opinions himself, and yet may be perfectly able to co-operate heartily with those who do not go so far as he does upon matters in which they are willing to pursue objects in common. If I dwell upon this at all to-night, it is because it seems to be a characteristic of English Radicalism which has had very important results in our past history. An English Radical may be occasionally unreasonable, but he is never irreconcilable. The Anarchists of France and Nihilists of Russia and the Fenians of Ireland have very few sympathisers in this country, and we Radicals—for I am proud to be one of them—do not think it to be our business to upset the coach, every time the pace does not come up to our expectations." The debt of the Government to the Radical party for bearing with the long delay in the introduction of the measures which Radicals most desire is, in Mr. Chamberlain's belief, a very heavy one.

Mr. Chamberlain evidently is not one of those members of the Government who are very anxious for an early introduction of the County Government Bill. He would prefer, he hints, to wait for household franchise in the counties, before reforming the government of the counties. What he looks forward to immediately is the Corrupt Practices Bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, the Patents Bill, the reform of the Criminal Code, the Government of London Bill, and the Tenant Farmers' Compensation Bill,—a peaceful programme which it will be very difficult for the Tories to obstruct vehemently, unless it be in relation to the Government of London Bill.

Sir Percival Heywood has, it is said, commenced the suit called Quare impedit against the Bishop of Manchester for refusing to institute Mr. Cowgill at Miles Platting. It is stated that, under the Order in Council of 1880, which abolished the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice, the Court of Queen's Bench will have to try the action, and that as the ground of the Bishop's objection to Mr. Cowgill is not a criminal charge, the Court will probably send a writ to the Metropolitan (in this case the Archbishop of York, who is known to have advised Bishop Fraser to refuse the institution of Mr. Cowgill), commanding him in the Queen's name to try the question, and to certify the result to the Court. It is to be expected that if this course is taken, the Metropolitan will sustain the Bishop, and that the only really doubtful point will be the question of Archbishop Thomson's power to satisfy the Court of Queen's Bench that Bishop Fraser's reason for refusing to institute Mr. Cowgill was adequate. If the statement made in several newspapers be true, that the Church Association—the Ritualist Prosecution Company (Limited), as somebody dubbed it,—are considering the course of offering the presidency of that body to Bishop Fraser, the Court of Queen's Bench will probably scrutinise with some rigour the conduct of a dignitary thought worthy of so ambiguous a compliment, even though it be a compliment carefully repudiated by the prelate to whom it is offered.

The Bishop of Manchester has been, it would seem, inundated with memorials thanking him for the course taken at Miles Platting, to several of which he has replied, identifying his action with the cause of law, and that of poor Mr. Cowgill with the desire of standing above the law and judging it,—a criticism which the Bishop re-enforces by quoting the Epistle of James, chapter iv. (verse not given). We suppose that the intended reference is to the words,—“If thou judgest the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge.” Take the passage as a whole, however, and it would, we think, tell rather against the Bishop than against the curate. It runs thus,—“Speak not evil one of another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge. There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy: who art thou that judgest another?” From which it appears that the disposition to judge a brother is the criterion of the disposition to judge the law, and certainly in this case Bishop Fraser is spontaneously judging Mr. Cowgill, not Mr. Cowgill spontaneously judging Bishop Fraser. St. James, chapter iv., is hardly a fortunate episcopal quotation.

The Daily News has complained that the three Bishoprics recently filled up should all have been conferred on High Churchmen. In point of fact, we should say that not one of them has been conferred on a High Churchman. Dr. Benson has never been regarded as a High Churchman in any sense in which Dr. Lightfoot is not regarded as a High Churchman. Indeed, he is, we believe, claimed by all who know his antecedents well as belonging entirely to Bishop Lightfoot's theological school. The Bishop Elect of Truro (Canon Wilkinson) has never been regarded as of the High Church party; and if Archdeacon Lewis is High Church, it is only in the high-and-dry sense, by no means in the sense of leaning towards Ritualism. What is true, unfortunately, is that the recent appointments have played into the hands of the Conservatives, Dr. Benson and Archdeacon Lewis at least, being very strong Conservatives; so that it is commonly said in Clerical society that while Mr. Gladstone is Prime Minister, a Liberal High Churchman has hardly any chance of promotion.

The contest for Haddingtonshire, vacated by the succession of Lord Elcho to the Earldom of Wemyss, comes off on Monday, and is likely to be a close one. The Tory candidate is Lord Elcho, who, it is hoped, will be aided by the great body of his father's tenantry; and the Liberal candidate is Mr. Finlay, a shrewd lawyer, and sound politician. He would, it is said, win easily, but that he will not pledge himself to Disestablishment, which so irritates some Liberals that they intend to abstain. We can hardly believe that any Scotchman is unintelligent enough to take such a course. It is perfectly certain that the Tories will not disestablish, and any Voluntary who abstains from supporting a Liberal is helping thereby to maintain the system he detests. We should have thought that in Haddingtonshire, of all places, the farmers would have longed for household suffrage, to emancipate them from landlord control.

On Tuesday, Lord Carnarvon addressed a new Conservative Club in Colchester, in a speech in which he put the old charges in a very epigrammatic way. The Liberals had done well in Egypt, but in doing it had defied every principle which they professed in Opposition. They had sacrificed their consistency, but had restored British credit in the East. Their Moses had conquered Egypt, and then returned into the wilderness, the wilderness being a Session barren of every good measure, except Lord Cairns' Settled Property Act. [Does Lord Carnarvon hold the Married Women's Property Act, the most thorough-going Bill of our time, and also supported by Lord Cairns, to be a bad measure?] Trade was depressed, and the Liberals only offered to reform the City of London. Agriculture was more than depressed, and they only promised a County Franchise Bill. The expenditure was greater than ever, yet the taxpayers were called upon under the Arrears Bill to put their hands into their pockets, and pay the debts of dishonest people who could pay them for themselves. As the landlords got that money, and not the tenants, that is disinterested of Lord Carnarvon, whose speech leaves on us the impression that he likes most things that have been done, but cannot forgive those who have done them for being so successful. He reminds us of the farmer's opinion of Erskine. He would not admit that Erskine was either orator or lawyer, and when reminded of the cases he won, blurted out, “Hoots! he was always on the right side.”

M. de Giers, the Russian Foreign Secretary, has visited Vienna, and has returned to St. Petersburg, pursued, as usual, by volleys of contradictory reports. It is affirmed, on the one hand, that he has consented to the Austrian annexation of Bosnia and the Herzegovina, and that the Hapsburgs will this year extend their rule down the Balkans, even to Salonica. Russia, of course, receives, as a consideration, the eastern side of the peninsula. It is maintained, on the other hand, that he has failed; that the distrust of Russia in the Hofburg is too great, and that he is covering retreat by spreading all these rumours. It is impossible to discern truth amidst these reports, and the old rule to believe that statesmen are guided by their immediate interests is probably still the best. If that holds good, Austria and Russia have come to no grand arrangement; but they have agreed not to quarrel over details, and consequently the final absorption of Bosnia by Austria will not be opposed by St. Petersburg, nor will the fusion of the two Bulgarias by Vienna. Neither arrangement seriously modifies the facts of the situation, even the Sultan losing nothing beyond nominal rights. Some understanding, moreover, has probably been arrived at as to the navigation of the Danube, a serious matter, involving the possibility of half-a-dozen wars, about which a Conference is immediately to sit in London, under the presidency of Lord Granville.

The death of M. Gambetta has probably preserved Madagascar from a French descent. The French Government has too much to do to think of expeditions, and the "policy of the fireside" will probably be triumphant. We therefore note only as an incident in history that on January 10th, M. Duclerc peremptorily, though civilly, rejected Lord Granville's offer to mediate between the French Government and the Hovas. The Malagasy Envoys, he wrote, quite understood French claims and the concessions to which France could agree, and "cannot have entertained any illusions respecting the consequences of the attitude which they have thought fit to maintain." It is an odd illustration of the existing solidarité of our planet that, in an African island, in a thousand Wesleyan chapels, brown men will sing Te Deums in bastard Malay because Admiral Jauréguiberry could not approve the expulsion of the Comte de Paris. Prince Napoleon's placard probably affects the whole future history of Madagascar.

Mr. Chamberlain made a very amusing and a rather Conservative speech yesterday week, at the annual dinner of the Birmingham Law Students' Society. Its Conservatism consisted in his panegyric on the general fairness and trustworthiness of the decisions of "the Great Unpaid" in Quarter-Sessions and Petty Sessions; its amusingness, in the delicacy with which he defended the Attorneys-at-Law against the gibes of Dr. Johnson and the many libels of our dramatic fiction. "I do not know, gentlemen," said Mr. Chamberlain, "whether you are aware that one-half of the world tried to do without you altogether,—unsuccessfully, I need not say; but when Spain first colonised America, there came from every one of the new settlements petitions to the mother-country begging that no lawyers should be allowed to go out, because, as these petitioners observed, the colonists desired to perpetuate themselves and to live in peace, whereas by the malice of men and the introduction of scribes, the prosperity of those regions would be jeopardised. In spite of the most stringent prohibitions, lawyers have not been wanting in the New World. . . . I mention this historic incident only to prove, what to most of you is a well-known fact, that lawyers are an indispensable adjunct of civilisation." It was certainly a sanguine notion that law could be adequately elaborated, and yet lawyers done away with. It would be even less sanguine to hope for the full help of mechanics, and yet to dispense with all professional mechanicians.

Mr. Lowther, M.P., delivered one of his fierce diatribes against the Liberal party at Richmond in Yorkshire on Monday, in which he ridiculed the notion of the Liberals really wishing to abolish corrupt practices at elections, on the ground that they had "clambered to power, and had given out their intention of endeavouring to retain power, by abstracting money from the pockets of their fellow-subjects for the purpose of bribing their own supporters,"—a charge of wholesale corruption which has reference, we conjecture, to the Irish Acts, though it might quite as plausibly be applied by the Liberals to the Conservative legislation which subsidised the local rates out of the central Exchequer, a few years ago. We wonder, however, whether Mr. Lowther really understands the true character of the dishonourable motives which he thus imputes wholesale to the Liberal Party. If he does, it seems strange that he should be willing even to meet in society the instigators of such corruption. But it is more probable that he does not think it half so really dishonourable to propose what he is willing to describe as measures of plunder passed for the purpose of gaining popularity, as his language leads us to suppose. One of the worst results of this sort of popular invective is that it gradually accustoms both parties to think without shame of the vile imputations which they make so recklessly against the opposite party. Mr. Lowther wishes to introduce plural voting, as the antidote to any large extension of the suffrage, if he cannot indefinitely postpone such an extension.

When speaking at the celebration of Sir Harry Verney's political jubilee last Tuesday, Mr. Mundella made a remarkable speech on the national progress which had been due to Liberal legislation. He pointed out that in 1833 the poor-rate had amounted to £3,600,000, 63 per cent. of which then fell upon the land (for there were real agricultural burdens then); whereas now, with very nearly twice the population, we spend absolutely less on the relief of the poor than we did at that time. "For the first thirty-five years of this century, crime increased at a threefold greater ratio than the population, until the people were being drawn so rapidly into this dreadful gulf of pauperism and crime, that one could only wonder, and be thankful that we had escaped some great national convulsion, and that England stood firm and loyal during such a period of discontent and distress." Mr. Mundella declared that it was Liberal legislation which had changed all that. Well, no doubt the new Poor-law did much, but Free-trade, which was due to Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and Sir Robert Peel, did more, and can hardly be called a Liberal measure. It was a measure for which Radical knight-errants had prepared the people, but one passed by a Conservative minister.

A letter addressed to Tuesday's Times by Dr. Macanlay Posnett gives a striking sketch of the unfair difference now existing between the English and Irish system of voting, both political and municipal. But it is on the municipal side certainly that that difference is most mischievous, for, so far as we can see, there is hardly a county or a borough in Ireland which would return a different class of representatives under a more English franchise, than it returns under the existing franchise. But in local matters it is different. For example, in Ireland ex-officio members of the Board of Guardians may constitute one-half of the Board,—in England, only one-third; in England, two-thirds of the Board is elected, in Ireland only one-half; nor is the ballot allowed in poor-law elections. In Ireland, again, county taxation is administered by twenty-three Crown nominees, who impose the county cess, one-third of the whole local taxation of the country. No wonder the Irish cry out for more genuine local self-government. All good English Liberals ought to aid them in their demand for this reform.

Oxford University has now collected a circle of very distinguished young lawyers, who ought to make a considerable impression on the law students of the present day. Professor Bryce, M.P., has long been known for his masterly studies in Roman Law. We announced the other day Mr. Albert Dicey's appointment to the Vinerian Professorship, and this week it has been made known that Mr. F. Pollock, another learned scientific lawyer of very vigorous general ability,—a learned Spinozist, as well as a learned jurist,—has been elected to the Corpus Professorship of English Law, of which Blackstone was the most famous, as well as all but the first holder, and which has recently been made more illustrious by the striking lectures of Sir Henry Maine. With these three extremely able men lecturing on Law in Oxford, the Oxford School of Law should take a high place in the history of legal method.

The Times, in a paper announcing that recruiting is falling-off, chiefly because the standard of age has been raised from eighteen to nineteen, publishes some statistics which show the almost unexpected value of the Reserve. The men belonging to this force, all trained soldiers, now amount to 30,000, and by 1886 they will, with the Supplemental Reserve, amount to 60,000. Of these, at least 90 per cent. will, on an emergency, be present with the colours. So far from the men disappearing during the recent mobilisation, 96 per cent. at once appeared to fulfil their engagements; and of these, again, less than 4 per cent. were declared physically unfit. Roughly speaking, we shall within five years have a Reserve of 55,000 trained men sure to be present when called on, and costing only £10 per head per annum. That is a remarkable success, for an innovation which was at first distrusted by the public, more than by old soldiers. Many of the former knew, what the latter do not, that to be summoned for a campaign, with its adventures and chances, is a very different thing from being summoned for barrack duty. The men feel the discredit of shirking active service just as much as their leaders do.

We greatly fear that the Tait Memorial Fund is to be frittered away in dribblets, for this purpose and that. There is to be a monument at Canterbury, a monument at St. Paul's, a monument at Westminster, a restoration of the Archbishop's Chapel at Lambeth, a scholarship at Rugby, and a Missionary fund as well. This seems to us a great mistake. One, or possibly, two, adequate memorials might have been raised; but these snippety memorials will result in nothing great or dignified. It is, however, understood to be the desire of the Royal Family that the Tait memorials should be thus numerous; and in social matters, the desire of the Court seems always to have something like unlimited influence.

Bank Rate, 4 per cent.
Consols were on Friday 102 to 102½.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE CRISIS IN PARIS.

THE crisis in Paris is a little less acute, but the situation is not improved. The majority of the Cabinet, afraid of the Radicals, afraid of the Princes, afraid, as they avowed during the debates, of the Ambassadors who remonstrated on their behalf—King Humbert, for example, is exasperated at the insult to his sister—resolved to adopt a Bill proposed by a little known Deputy, M. Fabre. This proposal, though called a compromise, is nearly as unjust as M. Floquet's, is politically more dangerous, because it alarms the Army, and is logically much more absurd. M. Floquet declares the Princes dangerous by right of birth, and expels them; and his Bill, though cruelly unjust to men who were amnestied for their crime of birth by formal statute, is intelligible and final. M. Fabre's Bill, on the contrary, does not expel the Princes, but enables the Government by Order in Council to expel any or all of them, deprives them of all rights of voting or being voted for at any election, and disqualifies them for the Army in any capacity, even that of private soldiers. Prince Victor Bonaparte, for example, who is serving his legal year as a Volunteer, must go home to Paris. The practical effect of the measure is to place the Princes in a category apart, which may be called a disgraced or a privileged category, at pleasure; to make them liable to expulsion for no reason except the caprice of a Minister or a hasty vote of the Chamber, to strip them of rights inherent in their military commissions, which the Army regards as properties, and to restrict in a very gross way that right of universal suffrage upon which the Republic rests. The electors are forbidden to vote for candidates they prefer, although those candidates are still, for all but voting purposes, citizens. The Princes are, in fact, placed by law in the position of women, with the aggravation that they may be exiled at any moment, without proof of misconduct. And yet, under the Bill, as if to add a crowning touch of absurdity to the injustice committed, any one of the Princes may still be legally elected President of the Republic. That is not an "election" in the statutory sense, as the defenders of the Bill admit; but an appointment by the Assembly, in the exercise of its sovereign right, is in fact a law, and cancels any proscription. No Bill at once so foolish and so unjust was ever proposed in the Convention, where men had at least the courage of their opinions, and its acceptance by the majority of Ministers in a Cabinet supposed to be moderate is absolutely inexplicable.

Accepted it was, however, and the moment the resolve had been taken, the Ministers of War and Marine, General Billot and Admiral Jauréguiberry, threw up their posts, and the Premier, M. Duclerc, who was lying at home too ill with pleurisy to be seen, sent in his resignation. The President had, therefore, to reconstruct his Cabinet, with only a few hours to do it in, and, after a vain attempt to persuade M. Jules Ferry to take office, M. Ferry positively refusing to defend the measure, he offered the Premiership to M. Fallières, a pleasant man, just then Minister of the Interior, with no force, no popularity, and, as it turned out, no health. M. Fallières could find no Minister either for War or Marine, the anxiety of a position to which he was inadequate killed sleep; and on Tuesday, after completing half a speech, in which his main arguments were that the Princes conspired by their silence, and that in visiting Frohsdorf the Comte de Paris had "rebuilt the House of France," with all its pretensions, he was compelled to plead fatigue, and, retiring to the lobbies, fainted away. The Chamber adjourned to Thursday, when the Ministry presented themselves again, still without the Premier, the remainder of whose speech was read by an Under-Secretary, but with Ministers of War and Marine, whose appointment marked in the most painful way the hostility of the Army and Navy. No Admiral at all could be found to vote for the degradation of the sailor Prince de Joinville, and M. de Mahy, a civilian, was gazetted Minister ad interim; while, after applications to General Champenon, whom Gambetta favoured, and to another General, not named, the Bureau of War was actually entrusted to General Thibaudin, an able officer and firm Republican, but accused of breaking his parole. General Thibaudin may be a slandered man, and his own account, that he was not asked for his parole, because the German doctors pronounced him physically "unfit for further service," may be exactly true; but he undoubtedly accepted a command under a false name, he is believed by Germans to be guilty, and he would not have been selected had the Government been able to find a competent administrator with a history provoking less discussion. The Ministry, however, was technically complete, and after scenes which recall the Convention, after the adoption of the Clôture and a resolve to sit en permanence, after a protest read at midnight from twelve of the Ultra Extremists against proscription on any grounds whatever, and after a vote by roll-call, which takes hours, and recalls the worst scenes of the Revolution, by a dead heave they carried the Fabre Bill, the final vote in its favour being—according to Reuter, who is usually right—343 to 163, a majority of 180. That is more than a two-thirds majority of all present, and nearly a two-thirds majority of the whole House, and, of course, so far ends the debate.

If this were all, the incident would be over, and we should only have to lament that a Liberal Republic should have adopted the most dangerous of all forms of oppression—the most dangerous, because it covers classes, not persons, and does not awake the instinctive conscience, as the guillotine or confiscation does,—in order to punish political suspects; but this is not all. The Fabre Bill has yet to pass the Senate, and if it is rejected there, a dissolution is inevitable, with a general election to the cry of "Proscription, or no Proscription?" a cry almost sufficient to wake civil war,—a cry which will call out the whole strength alike of Reactionaries and Ultras. If, on the other hand, as is now expected, the Bill is amended in the Senate by the addition of a clause limiting the right of expulsion to Princes guilty of overt acts, the dispute must be long and wearisome, and must still end in establishing the precedent that persons may be disfranchised and disqualified merely for their political position,—an accusation which would justify the application of the same penalty to every non-Republican general, statesman, or powerful financier. In either case, during the whole discussion France must remain virtually without a Government. This one is a poor make-shift, and no considerable statesman, no popular Minister of War, and no first-class financier will take office until this question has been disposed of. That would not matter much, if the Chamber could be trusted to govern, as the permanent Bureaus can do all necessary work; but the Chamber, without leaders, without an influential Ministry, and without a permanent majority, has become a mere public meeting. It does not know its own mind from day to day. It has in this very week revoked the vote by which, only two months ago, it affirmed the immense and most dangerous principle that the Magistracy should be elective. The groups form and re-form almost hourly, often in obedience to occult influences, and both Reactionaries and Extremists slip from side to side solely to embarrass adversaries, till Ministers feel as courtiers feel in presence of a Sovereign whose mind is not quite sound,—as if any course of action whatever would expose them to disgrace. We do not believe that such a game of blind-man's buff can continue in any country without danger, and regard the situation as slowly reducing itself to three alternatives. Either some new leader will take the helm in a determined way, M. Brisson, the President of the Chamber, being the only probable one; or M. Grévy will dissolve, and ask the country for some definite reply; or there will be a stroke struck either by the Army or by Belleville. The second is the right alternative, and, we trust, the most probable one; but for the first time in twelve years, we feel a sensation of distrust. The old passions are loose again, and the Chamber—the only civil authority in France which has genuine vitality—is suffering under them, until its action cannot be predicted even for hours. It is the only sovereign, and when sovereigns are liable to coups de tête, States suffer.

IRELAND AND THE PROPOSED REFORMS.

THE single sentence which we had reason to regret and condemn in Lord Hartington's masterly speech at Bacup a fortnight ago is already bearing fruit. Lord Hartington, in speaking of the County-Government Bill, objected strongly to its extension to Ireland, "unless we can receive from the representatives of the Irish people some assurance that this boon would not be misused for the purposes of agitation, and for the purpose of weakening the authority and the power of the Government." Even Mr. Forster at Leeds, last week, though we understand him to have deprecated any delay in the extension of local government to Ireland, admitted that it might be necessary to delay the passing of an Irish Reform Bill till fermentation of a dangerous kind had ceased; but this week we have had Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, the Secretary to the Admiralty, echoing with all his might the remark of Lord Hartington. At Tunbridge Wells, on Tuesday, he is reported to have said:—"Glad as they would all be to see extended to Ireland the freedom we had in England, the present was hardly the moment to enable Parliament to give that freedom. The Government had applied remedies they believed to be necessary to the existing evils, and to the root of those evils; but although the cause had been thus dealt with, it was not possible to follow up that treatment by the application of tonic measures until the feverish and inflammatory condition had passed away. For this reason, he trusted no serious organic reforms would be attempted in Ireland until peace and order were re-established." This seems to us very timid, as well as very dubious policy, and certainly not the policy of true Liberals. Let it be granted, as a correspondent tells us to-day in exceedingly forcible language, that Ireland is never grateful for English justice,—nay, that she hates a measure, however just, which is passed by British Ministers in a Parliament mainly British, simply because it is to British Ministers and a Parliament mainly British, that she must owe it. Grant, again, what is possible, that Ireland, organising herself freely, will find more satisfactory opportunities for expressing her hatred of Great Britain, than Ireland possesses at the present moment. Still, surely it is neither to inspire gratitude in Ireland, nor to prevent the free outpouring of resentment, that a Liberal Government legislates for Ireland. The only fair reason for delaying genuinely remedial measures—for delaying the grant to Ireland of privileges which we claim in Great Britain—would be their tendency to foster disorder, plunder, threats, assassinations. Of course, if it could be truly said that a good County Government Bill, for instance, would put more power into the hands of Secret Societies, than it would put into the hands of peaceable men opposed to Secret Societies and to the terrorism of irresponsible agents, we should have nothing more to urge. But is it even possible that this should be so? It is conceivable,—indeed it is not improbable,—that for a time at least the grant of more efficient local liberties would increase, instead of diminishing, the volume of the feeling in favour of complete Home-rule. That we do not deny for an instant. But how, by any fairly constitutional means, we are to prevent the Irish people from forming and expressing their own judgment on Home-rule, and the reasons for it, we cannot even imagine. Assuredly, no Liberal Government has ever professed a desire to stifle the free discussion of subjects of this kind in Ireland, or to arrest by penalties the growth of any popular sentiment whatever, that does not take the form of directly stimulating to violations of the law. Liberals have always professed the conviction that to misgovern Ireland in order to prevent Ireland from showing signs of disloyalty to the Empire, is as unjust as it is short-sighted. Yet what is the deliberate delay of organic improvements even more needed in Ireland than they are in England, except the misgovernment of Ireland for purposes of precisely this nature? The true Liberal policy is to remove every grievance that we can remove without breaking up the unity of the Empire, as soon as we can remove it. If that increases the local patriotism of Ireland, and renders the agitation against the Union for a time more ardent and universal, we cannot help it. This has been already one of the results of doing Ireland such justice as we have done her, and yet no true Liberal will regret having done that justice. The policy of keeping from Ireland all the liberties that she would claim from a really popular Parliament of her own, in order to prevent her from obtaining a really popular Parliament of her own, is a policy tried for centuries, with the most fatal and tragic results. Indeed, the very essence of that policy is that it is right to do injustice in fifty different ways, in order that we may not give Ireland the chance of imposing what we hold to be a great injustice upon us in one way. That is not only a thoroughly selfish policy, but it is an exhausted policy,—one which the Liberals have given up, and which the Tories will never venture to restore. And we cannot deny that the deliberate delay of what is so obviously and urgently needed in Ireland as a good system of county government,—though we are taking pains to confer it on Great Britain,—solely because the Irish will cry out for Home-rule,—is a leaf from the book of an obsolete and execrable policy which long ago resulted in Irish misery.

It may, however, be said that it is not on account of the mere stimulus it would afford to political discussion that any extension of British Reform Bills—whether political or municipal—to Ireland, is so undesirable. It may be said that such a course would put dangerous weapons into the hands of the lawless, of the conspirators and terrorists from whom Ireland has suffered lately so severely. Well, that is a consideration of a really important character. If it be true that any Reform Bill proposed for England and Scotland would throw fresh power into the hands of Irish conspirators and assassins, of course that reform ought not to be introduced into Ireland, because, in that case, it would not be a reform; it would be a deterioration. We cannot reasonably take very exceptional powers to detect and punish crime with one hand, and offer the means to stimulate crime with the other. That is not a rational course. But then it must be shown that there is at least some probability of such a result from the extension of local liberties to Ireland. Is there any such probability? Would a County Board add any strength to the organisation of a secret society? Would the extension of the household franchise to Ireland facilitate the terrorising of landlords by tenants, or of those who do not wish to dissolve the Union by those who do? On the contrary, every legitimate opening for the energies of the Irish will let off the steam which otherwise concentrates itself in these Secret Societies. You cannot discuss plans of assassination in County Boards, or oblige Members of Parliament to bring in Bills at Westminster for the confiscation of private property. The more every legitimate political energy is organised in Ireland, the more will politicians shrink from involving themselves in unlawful conspiracies by which they know that they will lose their standing-ground as politicians. Mr. Forster never said a wiser thing than when he declared last week at Leeds that "Home-rule or dissolution of the Union means two countries, and the only way to meet that is by showing that we will treat the Irish as we treat ourselves. Therefore, I look forward to the same popular franchise, both in counties and in boroughs in Ireland, as in England." And not only so, but we at least look forward to a simultaneous grant to Ireland of the liberties, whatever they be, which we grant to England and Scotland. The only effect of postponing that grant is to confess that, though we hope to make the two countries one in the future, we are obliged to keep them two at present. There is, indeed, a very adequate reason for keeping them two so far as the special measures needed to put down local crime are concerned. You cannot apply precisely the same remedy to a totally different class of exigencies. If Wales or Yorkshire were to develop a special kind of persistent crime, we should have to apply a special remedy in Wales or Yorkshire. But there is no occasion at all for postponing the extension to Ireland of a measure which is even more needed in Ireland than in England,—like a good County Government Bill,—solely on the ground that the existence of special crime in Ireland has obliged us to have recourse to a special remedy. One reason why there is so much crime in Ireland is, that there is so much discontent; and the reason why there is so much discontent is, that there is so little independent local self-government, so little wise control of local affairs. To postpone the removal of that evil, is to postpone the recovery, not to hasten it. We agree, indeed, with Mr. Forster, that the police arrangements must not be left in local hands. That would be, no doubt, endangering greatly the safety of both property and person. But then, we say the same for England and Scotland. We hold that nothing is managed worse than the local control of the police in England, and there is no good reason why the State, which prescribes the conditions of order all over the country, should not retain in its own hands, and refuse to delegate to others, the control of the agents who are to enforce that order. No one would think of handing over the control of the Metropolitan Police to the Municipal Government of London, and we believe it to be a mischievous arrangement to leave the control of the county police in the hands of local bodies. The Irish should have as complete a system of self-government as we have in England, but this ought certainly not to include what, in our opinion, it ought not to include even in any part of England,—the power to control those arrangements for enforcing the law on which the safety of life and property depends.

But it seems to us that, with this very necessary reserve, nothing can be more short-sighted or less truly Liberal in policy, than to delay indefinitely the removal of the evils to which we justly ascribe the unhappy condition of life in Ireland, in deference to the craven fear lest a little more public life and liberty should increase the number of opportunities for hostile demonstrations against the Union. No doubt, it will increase the number of opportunities for talking openly in that sense, but for that very reason it will diminish the temptation to plot secretly in the same sense. And if the Union will not bear a few more jets of eloquent denunciation, it is not the strong tie of interest and policy for which we, at all events, honestly take it.

MR. FORWOOD ON THE FUTURE OF TORYISM.

"WE must have Tory men, and Liberal measures." That seems to us the sum-total of the advice which Mr. A. B. Forwood offers to his party, in this month's Contemporary Review. It is a remarkable paper, and well worth Liberal study, if only because of the position of its author. He is, or was till the last Election, the dictator of his party in Liverpool. After years of active municipal life, Mr. Forwood was elected fourteen years ago to the Chairmanship of the Conservative Association; he has retained it ever since, and he was selected last year by the whole party as the one candidate for Lord Sandon's vacant seat certain to succeed. They waited weeks for him, and when he arrived, nominated him by acclamation. He was beaten, partly at least, on account of his democratic programme; and it is after that enlightening experience, as well as after the instruction derived from years of successful work in the interests of his party, that he repeats his firm conviction that old Toryism, the policy of resistance to progress, is dying out, and puts forward a programme which is in a large measure identical with that of moderate Liberals. "I have no hesitation in stating," he says, "that if, as a party, Conservatism is simply to be the brake on the wheel of legislation, having no enlightened or progressive policy of its own, it will soon cease, and deservedly so, to exercise any power in the city of Liverpool." He then declares that the Conservatives must "trust the people, and they will reciprocate the sentiment;" and that "as much regard must be paid to measures conceived in the interest of the working-classes, as to the wants of any other body of the community," and that in particular, the Master and Servant Statutes must be amended in their interest. He is not opposed to another Reform Bill, making household suffrage universal, though he insists on gutting the counties of urban influence by grouping small boroughs, and he is for a large and really democratic measure of Redistribution. He actually lays down as a doctrine that all constituencies should be large, because "large constituencies are essential to purity of election,"—a doctrine which would have made the Tories, not only of 1832, but of 1867, gasp with indignation. He would make the Church of England "broad and comprehensive," would strengthen rather than weaken the ecclesiastical power of the lay judiciary, and would rearrange the revenues of the Church on a more democratic system, dividing, for instance, the income of overgrown or over-wealthy parishes among their poorer neighbours. He would grant to Ireland all the local self-government and all the franchises we grant to the remainder of the kingdom, would abolish the Lord-Lieutenancy, and in fact "would, as a principle, strive to place the two islands under one system of Government." He would encourage "such legal reforms as will make the sale of land as simple and inexpensive as that of other property," which involves, we need not say, restrictions upon settlement, that keystone of the aristocratic system; and finally, he would in all things have the Party declare itself ready and eager to carry out "the firmly constructive and safely progressive policy of the future."

What is all this, but ordinary, moderate Liberalism, applied to the immediate problems before us? It is true that we can just detect, by careful study, that Mr. Forwood's real policy in Ireland is very different from Mr. Gladstone's, and that he would oppose both in Ireland and England any concessions to tenant-farmers, he holding that all Land Acts everywhere interfere with the principle of free contract, which he regards with as superstitious a reverence as if he had never been driven in a cab; but, as regards Great Britain, where, except as to the Holdings Act, is there any difference between Mr. Forwood's views and Lord Hartington's? Both propose the same improvements, both are ready with the same concessions, both affirm as a cardinal principle that "the people"—meaning thereby the majority counted by heads—must be trusted, and must ultimately decide. It is again true that Mr. Forwood parades the Monarchy and the Constitution as objects weak enough to need the utmost care, and Lord Hartington does not, and that Mr. Forwood makes much of his love for Colonies, and Lord Hartington does not; but that difference consists only in this,—that Lord Hartington will not take the trouble to dissipate unreal fears, while Mr. Forwood is at the trouble to exaggerate them. Nobody is going to dethrone Queen Victoria, or upset the Constitution, or dismiss the Colonies, and so Lord Hartington is silent about them; but there is no other difference, and if the Tory leaders adopted Mr. Forwood's programme, we should have two great parties in the State, differing only in their leaders' names, and perhaps in their intellectual ability, racing with each other to earn "the confidence of the people" by measures which, whether we call them Liberal or Tory, tend directly to make of the Democracy the ultimate directing and governing power. And this, it is past all doubt, is the policy of that section of the Tories which Mr. Forwood represents, and which is weary of a resistance that, however wise or however beneficial, leaves Tories, as they fancy, always in a minority and out of power. It is the policy which is paralysing the Party, for the leaders cannot denounce it, with Lord Salisbury as their chief and Lord Beaconsfield not yet forgotten; and they cannot accept it, because the body of their immediate followers do not like it, and because they see that if the mass of the people want Liberal measures, they will ask Liberal men to carry them out. High Tories like Mr. Lowther will never vote for County Government on the "trust in the people" principle, while old Conservatives will look with sullen distrust on all the Liberal measures which Mr. Forwood presses on their acceptance.

Why, then, ask the Tories, do we discuss Mr. Forwood's propositions? If they will not be accepted, and only weaken the adversary's strength, why do not Liberals let them alone? Is it not, they suggest, a superfluity of naughtiness in Liberal journals to be so much interested in Tory divisions, and is there not something of malice in their close watchfulness, while Conservatives do their thinking? The answer to that jibe, in itself a fair one, is clear. It is as interesting to Generals to know what their enemies propose, as to know what they themselves design; while for ourselves, we confess to an additional and non-partisan interest in the inquiry. We have a strong conviction, amounting to a certainty, that in the internal fight in the Conservative camp, the old Conservatives, the men whose idea of their function is to apply the brake to the machine, will win, and have a deep intellectual interest, historic, not partisan interest, in watching for the signs of the coming victory, its men, and its method. We are not impressed by the Tory pessimists at all, shrewd as many of them are, and are more than half-amused with their present inability to trust in their own principles. We believe that Conservatism rests upon facts as indestructible as those which support Liberalism, upon the instinctive reluctance of half mankind to abandon the usual, upon their fear of all changes, and upon their natural, and, in many respects, admirable reverence for the past. A section of mankind will always be guided by those feelings, and in a country like this, where great numbers are honestly contented, where utopias, owing to the national character, have little influence, and where history inspires a lofty pride in the past, as being on the whole a noble past, that section will be a great one, and will, the moment it finds adequate expression, be seen to be a great one. It had no expression under Lord Beaconsfield, and it has none now; but that it will find one, is as certain as that the Liberal party will one day commit blunders. All these feverish Tory-Democratic tentatives are but tentatives,—the efforts of impatient men to clutch at a popularity which never accrues to any party, unless it has its roots deep in human nature, and in the history of the country to be won. They are all made under a belief which is a pure delusion,—the belief that Lord Beaconsfield had a hold upon the country through his principles, his proposals, his policy, through something, in fact, other than his personal genius. He never had the slightest. Without his genius he never would have carried a dozen seats, and we seriously doubt whether, in spite of his genius, he was, after his policy was understood, popular at all, whether a Dissolution on any day after 1877 would not have shattered his power. His imitators are spending their breath in vain, are alienating more people than they attract, and we watch their efforts, we admit, with the keenest interest, because when they have done, when they are exhausted, the old Conservative party will revive, and Liberalism will once more be challenged by an equal foe. They are, we think, growing exhausted now. So long as the "pony Disraelis" confined themselves to foreign policy, their powerlessness was never clear, the nation as to foreign policy distrusting its own ignorance; and while they were vituperating, they were comparatively safe; but now that they avoid foreign policy, and have exhausted abuse, and are turning, like Mr. Forwood, to home affairs, their principles become visible, and are by the majority of the people summarily rejected. The true Conservatives, who include nearly half England, do not want to "trust the people" in the sense of making the people absolute, or to remedy all abuses, or to pass "safely-progressive" measures; but to distrust the people, to find excuses for abuses, if only they are old, and to hold back Liberals hard, for fear that progress should be too fast. They will find their leaders, sooner or later, probably very soon; and when they do, Conservatism will be a great power again, and Mr. Forwood either a forgotten man or a repentant one, who declares that, in spite of a momentary abjuration, extorted by impatience, his true, though deserted faith has always been expressed in the words, "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari."

THE PROPOSED ADDITIONS TO THE CABINET.

WE cannot support the demand, raised by so many Chambers of Commerce and Agriculture, for the creation of a special Ministry or special Ministries for those Departments. The objections stated by Mr. Kynaston Cross, the new Under-Secretary for India, in his speech of Wednesday to his Bolton constituencies, are in themselves nearly final. As he says, every Department, the whole government of the country, is concerned with Commerce and Agriculture. Hardly any officer of State can do anything without touching those interests, and half the policy of the Government is directed to the improvement of their condition. The Cabinet cannot sanction a foreign despatch, or arrange a Budget, or consider a Banking Act, without thinking of commerce; while every measure for the improvement of tenure, for the reform of county government, or for the readjustment of rates, directly and in many cases most perceptibly, affects agriculture. The greatest agricultural and commercial measures of our time, the new Poor-law and Free-trade, were measures of high policy, to be settled by Governments and Parties, not by Departments; while the smaller measures now in front, the French Treaty and the modification of tenure called the Holdings Act, could not possibly be left to individual Ministers. They are and will remain questions of the class which Cabinets must think out, and on which the Premier, or the Premier plus the two or three men who form in practice an interior Cabinet, must finally decide. A Minister of Commerce who could propose and carry, say, complete Free-trade, would be above the Premier and the Treasury too; while a Minister of Agriculture who could propose tenant-right would be above the whole Government. Yet, if he could not propose these things with a good prospect of carrying them, he would be a mere intermediary, extremely inconvenient to the Cabinet, where he would be an intruding and, so to speak, isolated person, and of very little use to anybody. Important interests like agriculture and commerce, with hundreds of representatives, can already address the Treasury with quite sufficient emphasis. No Minister of Commerce could have pressed on the Foreign Office the case of Bradford under the French Treaty more vehemently than it was pressed; and no Minister of Agriculture, if he had been as eloquent as Fox or as competent as Sir R. Peel, could have forced a Government to grant compensation for slaughtered cattle as it was forced by the agricultural property-holders in the House.

We do not deny that, in matters of detail, Commerce and Agriculture, considered as interests, may have something to complain of. The Chambers all say so, and they must, on such a point, know the grievances of their constituents. As regards commerce, we think it possible that a special Minister might collect information now left vague or scattered—this is certainly true of Asiatic facts—might inquire more persistently into new openings for trade, and might stimulate the Foreign Office to attempt new treaties of commerce with States like the Republics of South America, to which "public opinion," now the only motor, will not continuously attend. A Minister of Agriculture also might collect information, now left too indefinite—the history of ensilage is a good illustration—and collate more accurately the views of the Chambers about tenure, and even give valuable warnings from the whole world to agricultural districts. An Office set apart for special inquiry always receives a great deal, and such Ministers might be most convenient intermediaries between the interests concerned and the governing Committee. But then they should be Ministers, not Secretaries of State. Mr. Mundella, who has quite enough to do with Education, without worrying himself about sick cows, should receive a colleague, a second Vice-President, with agriculture as his business; while the Vice-President of the Board of Trade should become a much bigger man, with the extension of Commerce as his department. Each of these officers would be grand sifter for the interest represented, and his sifted information and proposals would be sure of attention, and even eager attention, from a Cabinet which would like nothing better than to see its way to any improvement really needed by any great interest. That means a great many votes at the next election, as well as a benefit to the country, and with those two motives pulling together, a Cabinet soon puts itself in motion.

We confess to a good deal of jealousy about additions to the Cabinet. So far as we see, a non-political Department gets itself most admirably managed whenever it is in the hands of a Minister who is a good administrator, who is just under Cabinet rank, but who is strong enough to weigh heavily with the Government as a whole. We do not see how we can have the Education Department better managed than it was by Mr. Forster, or is by Mr. Mundella, and fancy we owe a good many recent improvements in the Post Office to the fact that Mr. Fawcett has not to consider the affairs of the whole world. We are by no means satisfied that the work of the Board of Trade would not be better done if its head were a Vice-President under the Treasury, instead of a leading politician; and are quite certain that if the First Commissioner of Works were in the Cabinet, the Crown lands would be managed with less attention. Even for Ireland and Scotland, our ideal, if it were possible—which it is not, while the Lord-Lieutenancy continues—would be representative Under-Secretaries, answerable to the Home Secretary, who should himself be directly responsible for the peace of the Three Kingdoms. The Cabinet should not be too full, and it should be filled with men of political rank who are more than heads of Departments. Day by day, two silent political processes are going on which will materially modify the working of the Constitution, which are probably beneficial, but which ought to be watched with the greatest care. The force of the Cabinet is growing. The tendency of our Democracy is towards Cabinet government. The majorities grow larger—ten was formerly a working majority—the groups more numerous, the pressure of business heavier, the powers of private Members less, till the initiative is being confined to the governing Committee, which has, moreover, a working veto on all propositions. It is essential that this Committee should be fairly homogeneous, not too much of a little Parliament—we note that Councils, now-a-days, sit long—and should consist of men not entirely worked to death, but with a little capacity left for initiating new things. Energy, too, and secrecy are increasingly necessary, and to secure all those objects a Cabinet should be rigidly kept from unwieldiness. The increase of Cabinet power will not, we conceive, stop, it being the most natural instrument through which a democracy can govern; and though the second process may stop, it also may not. This is the great increase in the standing, and therefore the power, of the Premier. We shall soon have been governed twenty years by two men, each of whom, whatever his merits or demerits, was admitted all round to stand head and shoulders above his fellows. It has been Lord Beaconsfield's Government and Mr. Gladstone's Government in an unusually truthful sense. That is not a bad change in itself, whenever we can find the right man, a moderated personal ascendancy giving coherence to the Administration; but it increases the need for confining the Cabinet to the powerful, and avoiding a dilution, the effect of which is to exaggerate the personality of the Premier. It is all very well at present, but we do not want the Cabinet always to be, as it certainly was last year, when Mr. Gladstone was bearing the world on his own shoulders—rather crushing them, as we now know, by that supreme effort—the Premier's Council. The stronger, in short, the Cabinet is made, the better, and concentration is a great element in strength.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AT SWANSEA.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in the speech at Swansea, in which he did no more than justice to Mr. Dillwyn, as one of the staunchest and quite the most consistent Radical in the House of Commons, took credit for the English Radicals that, whether or not they were sometimes discontented, they were never "Irreconcilable," never disposed "to upset the coach" because the pace did not please them. It would be difficult to define an Irreconcilable better than in these words. The great French Irreconcilables of the present day not only admit, but boast that this is precisely what they aim at. They think it their bounden duty to upset the coach because the pace does not please them,—or rather, perhaps, because no pace which simply tends in the direction of the reform of existing abuses could possibly please them. To their minds, everything is wrong,—“the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint,”—and consequently they think that upsetting everything as it is, is the only proper preliminary to bringing anything to be as it ought to be. If English politicians would read the account in Friday's Daily News of the conversation between Élisée Reclus and the correspondent of that paper, they would,—we will not say understand, for they would not understand at all,—but apprehend the position of a true Irreconcilable as they had never before apprehended it. And a position, we venture to say, less like that of a stout English Radical, is not to be conceived. In some respects, even the despondent Conservatives are nearer to the Irreconcilables than the Radicals. They often look on the modern tendencies of political society with almost as much gloom as the Irreconcilables themselves, though for a different reason. Now the Radicals look on the modern tendencies of political society with tempered satisfaction. And instead of wishing to invert all the tendencies they see, they wish, on the whole, to promote most of the tendencies they see. Being in this hopeful frame of mind they are actually a greater contrast to the Irreconcilables than even the true Tories themselves. Lord Carnarvon's lugubrious speech at Colchester, for instance, does not strike one as forming half so striking a contrast to the political hopelessness of Prince Krapotkine and M. Élisée Reclus as Mr. Chamberlain's speech at Swansea,—the fault of which, so far as it has a fault, is rather its too sanguine expectations from the results of tendencies actually at work, than any revolutionary bias, of which there is indeed no trace.

The Times is very much offended with Mr. Chamberlain for intimating that there is perfect harmony of purpose between the Radicals in the Cabinet and the present Government, and asserts that the only danger of any discord breaking in upon that harmony has arisen from Mr. Chamberlain himself. But the Times does not tell us when and where that discordant note was struck. So far as the public know, the Government have never differed from Mr. Chamberlain, nor Mr. Chamberlain from the Government. If the release of Mr. Parnell and his colleagues last year from prison were specially supported by Mr. Chamberlain, it was also specially supported and specially defended under the circumstances, by Mr. Gladstone and by Lord Hartington; and the only Minister who disapproved the course taken was the Minister who retired. To the best of our belief, the co-operation of the Radicals has not only increased the popularity of the present Government in the country, but has guarded the Government—so far as the Government may have needed guarding—against the blunders into which the so-called Moderates might possibly at least have betrayed them. It was the Radical party, headed by Mr. Dillwyn, who pressed upon the Government the restoration of Cetewayo. It was the Radical party, again represented by Mr. Dillwyn, who pressed upon the Government the many grave alterations in the Procedure Rules which were adopted by the House of Commons in the autumn meeting of Parliament, to the great chagrin of the Conservatives. And it is at the present time the Radical party whose staunch protest against every attempt to suppress political liberty in Ireland, renders it simply impossible that any of the reactionary suggestions which appear to be favoured in what is called the Moderate Press should ever be adopted by the public. We do not in the least mean that the so-called Whig element in the Cabinet has been hostile to the Radical element on these points. We do not believe that it is so, but the Radicals have at least had the satisfaction of putting it out of the question that the Government should have taken the bad advice often tendered to them by the organs of the Moderate party. If the Moderates had had their way, for instance, there can be no doubt that the unmeaning compromise called the Closure by a two-thirds majority would have been substituted for the Closure as we have it, and the result of that would have been that the country, which cares for nothing so much as the restoration of the House of Commons to the full control of its own business, would have turned the cold-shoulder to an Administration capable of such weakness as that. So far from agreeing with the Times, we hold very strongly that but for the influence of the Radical party on the Government,—an influence of which Mr. Chamberlain has been hitherto, we suppose, the chief channel,—discords in the Government would have been long ago manifest which have never actually put in an appearance. It is probable enough that the Prime Minister and Lord Hartington would have insisted on the right course whatever had been said against it in the Moderates' organs,—for the Prime Minister and Lord Hartington have a very sagacious, political insight into the folly of half-measures,—but it is also very probable that other Members of the Cabinet, terrified by the cries of the Times, and organs like the Times, would have made much more effort than they did to divide the Cabinet, had not it been so well known that this course would have involved a breach with the Radical party the consequences of which must have been very serious. To the best of our belief, the determined attitude of the Radicals has again and again saved this Government from the breaking-out of discords which might have been fatal, and has never involved it in a single blunder. But for the Radicals, the Duke of Argyll would hardly have left the Cabinet alone. But for the Radicals, Mr. Forster would hardly have left the Cabinet alone. And but for the Radicals at the present time, there would be far more disposition to postpone Irish reforms solely because Ireland is politically ungrateful for what it has received, than there actually is. Mr. Chamberlain, in his speech at Swansea, adroitly staved off the difference between Lord Hartington and the Radical party on the subject of extending any County Government Bill that may be brought in for Great Britain to Ireland, by suggesting that perhaps it might be better to wait for household franchise in the counties, before passing a County Government Bill at all. But for the rest, he strongly supported the manly and reasonable course of doing all in our power to reform abuses in Ireland, without paying the least regard to the fact of the political irreconcilability of the Irish people. And, for our own parts, we cannot help thinking that the reform of the present atrociously bad system of local government in Ireland is so urgent for the welfare of the Irish people, that it will be a great mistake to wait even for the extension of household franchise to the counties before attempting the reform of our system of local government. Be that, however, as it may, Mr. Chamberlain, and the Radical party whom he and Sir Charles Dilke now represent in the Cabinet, have been again and again the good genius of the present Government, instead of the evil genius, as the Times represents him. Through him, the Radical party, so well represented at the banquet to Mr. Dillwyn, have made their voice adequately heard in the Government. And the voice of the Radical party has never been listened to by the Government, since 1880, without results which even the ablest of the Whigs now consider as in the highest degree satisfactory.

PRUSSIA AND THE VATICAN.

THE letter which the German Emperor, in his character of King of Prussia, has addressed to the Pope is an indication that the negotiations between the two Powers are nearing their end. For the time, at all events, Prince Bismarck has fixed a minimum of concession below which he will not suffer the Pope to go. If the May Laws are to be reconsidered, the Pope must take a particular step. He must accept in principle the obligation to notify all presentations to the State which one of these laws lays on the Ecclesiastical authorities. The Emperor's letter does not say that the law must be accepted precisely as it stands, but that it is in relation to this law that the advance demanded from the Vatican must be made. As to the other side of the transaction, the letter is not equally precise. The immediate benefit to be derived from this concession on the part of the Vatican is the creation of a conviction in the Emperor's mind that the Pope is as anxious for a reconciliation as he is himself. When this has been impressed on him, he will be able to countenance the reconsideration by the Prussian Parliament not of the May Laws generally, but of such of them “as, in the course of the struggle for the protection of contested rights of the State, became requisite, without being permanently necessary to secure peaceful relations between Church and State.” A pledge of this kind is obviously open to almost any interpretation which the Emperor's advisers choose to put on it. It rests with them to determine which of the May Laws are permanently necessary, and which were only requisite for a time. It is not to be supposed, however, that the Vatican will make any advance whatever, without some more precise understanding as to the consideration it is to receive for its concessions. The publication of the Letter is probably meant to convey, not that the Emperor will commit himself to nothing, but simply that he will not be the first to commit himself to anything. By singling out one solitary provision of the May Laws which the Pope must declare himself ready to accept in advance, he does, in effect, intimate that on every other point he is open to argument and persuasion.

To submit all Ecclesiastical appointments to the veto of the Civil authorities is a light or a serious matter, according to the conditions under which the right of veto is exercised. Under the May Laws, these conditions are of extraordinary severity. The Civil authorities may refuse to accept the appointment of any priest, either for want of qualification, or for having been convicted of any offence, or if there is reason to suppose that he intends to disobey the law. The qualifications prescribed are, that the presentee must be of German birth; that he must have been educated and have passed the final examination at a gymnasium; and further, that he must have spent three years at a German University, or, if there be no University in the Diocese, at an Ecclesiastical College approved by the Government. Among the offences conviction for which operates as a disqualification, is the illegal exercise of spiritual jurisdiction, a crime for which a large number of the Catholic Clergy of Prussia have from time to time been found guilty, while reason to suppose that a man intends to disobey the laws in future may easily be stretched so as to include all the rest. How a request to submit presentations to benefices to a veto which at present is so all-embracing would have been met by the late Pope, it is easy to imagine. He would have replied by a simple "Non possumus." But Leo XIII. is of another temper from Pius IX. He is above all things a Whig, and from the Whig point of view it is of extreme importance that the Ecclesiastical and Civil authorities should work harmoniously together. Pius IX. was at bottom a Revolutionist; constituted authorities were to be treated with deference when they did what he liked, and to be altogether ignored when they did what he disliked. By Leo XIII. they are regarded in a very different light. He interprets the Apostolic injunction to live peaceably with all men as binding him in a special manner to live peaceably with Sovereigns, and nothing but the strongest conviction that the conditions demanded from him are such as he cannot conscientiously concede will prevent him from meeting the Prussian offer at least half-way. Probably, therefore, the acceptance or rejection of the Emperor's terms will be determined by the extent of the revision to which the May Laws are to be submitted. If the provisions relating to the qualifications of the holders of benefices were repealed, the veto would become a mere right to reject a particular presentee, with no cause assigned. This would be a much less serious restriction on Ecclesiastical action than a right to reject all presentees who do not satisfy the very stringent conditions just enumerated. The one tends in practice to come down to the occasional rejection of some priest who has made himself specially obnoxious to the civil authorities; the other keeps alive a complete system of clerical education which, rightly or wrongly, the Ecclesiastical authorities think actually mischievous. The former might be met by successive presentations drawn from a virtually unlimited area; the latter limits the supply to the small minority of the clergy who happen to have satisfied the conditions of the statute.

It appears from the attitude of Herr Windthorst that the Centre party are disposed to see a more conciliatory temper in the Emperor's Letter than appears on the surface of it. Probably, therefore, they assume that Prince Bismarck has in view some considerable modification of this part of the May Laws. Whether the Centre is really very anxious to bring about a reconciliation between the Prussian State and the Vatican may, perhaps, be doubted. The Clericals of Germany are in this respect not unlike the Clericals of France. They are politicians first, and Clericals afterwards. As regards the French Clericals, the whole history of their relations with the late and present Nuncios proves this. They are irritated almost beyond bearing at the determination of the Pope to avoid, if possible, an open quarrel between the Church and the Republic. Every courtesy which the Nuncio shows to the President of the Republic is a fresh annoyance to them. Their object is to destroy the Republic, and they think that if the Pope would but refuse to have any more dealings with the Republic, an important step would have been taken towards this consummation. The Prussian Clericals have not the same feelings towards the Prussian Monarchy that the French Clericals entertain towards the Republic, because the Prussian Monarchy is not revolutionary in its origin. But they have political objects of their own, the accomplishment of which may be helped or hindered by the exercise of a judicious diplomacy in relation to Prince Bismarck. If they want to attack the Government, it is always easy to find an occasion somewhere in the May Laws; and they might not be altogether pleased at seeing these laws repealed, if their repeal constituted the whole concession made by the Government. It is difficult to define with precision the extent to which the Pope is compelled to take this feeling into account. He is certainly not disposed to defer to it in all particulars, and yet it is impossible for him to ignore it entirely. The spiritual destitution to which Catholic Prussia has been reduced under the operation of the May Laws must be greatly in the Pope's thoughts, but even destitution cannot be relieved without some degree of co-operation on the part of those in want. The Prussian Clergy have by this time gained some of the immunities which belong to Confessors, and even a less religious Pope than Leo XIII. could not altogether disregard the sufferings they have undergone on behalf of Ecclesiastical independence. To give up everything that has been fought for during the last nine years would not encourage the Clergy in other countries to be equally resolute in the same cause. That a modus vivendi may be found, if the Prussian Government are in earnest in looking for one, cannot be questioned; but whether it is contained in the generalities of the Emperor's letter must depend on the private negotiations by which that letter has, no doubt, been accompanied.

THE HIGH CHURCH VIEW OF THE EPISCOPAL OFFICE.

MR. HATCH, in the February number of the Contemporary Review, speaks of the canonical vow of obedience to the Bishop by the Priests of the Church as not flowing "from anything inherent in the Bishop's office." "The obligation," he says, "is that of a contract. On the one hand, all Clerks have entered into a certain contract at their ordination, but that contract is defined and limited by its terms; it is a promise of submission, not to a Bishop as such, nor to any purely spiritual authority, but to the 'Ordinary,'—that is, the Judex Ordinarius, whoever he may be, whether Chancellor or Vicar-General, Bishop or King. On the other hand, all beneficed clerks (except in the few cases in which 'institution' is not required) have entered into a sacred contract by which they have given to their Bishop the same promise of obedience which they would, in feudal times, have given to any other feudal lord; but this obedience is limited by the adjective 'canonical,' and by the phrase, 'in all things lawful and honest.' The conception of a Bishop as being entitled to obedience, and that an almost unlimited obedience, on the part of his clergy, by virtue of the spiritual character which his consecration has conferred upon him, is as much at variance with ecclesiastical history and present fact, as it is with the great currents of Christian opinion which are already shaping the policy of the Churches of the future." It will be observed that this definition of the meaning of canonical obedience decidedly bears out the technical sense in which that duty has recently been understood by the High-Church party of the Anglican Communion, to whom nothing would seem to have been more foreign than that deferential attitude of mind towards their Bishops which Cardinal Newman describes in his "Apologia" as having been his own at the time of his greatest activity as a member of the Anglican Communion. Dr. Newman at least seems always to have had the idea that obedience was due to "something inherent in the Bishop's office." In writing to Bishop Bagot,—the then Bishop of Oxford,—Dr. Newman says:—"In your Lordship's Charge for 1838, an allusion was made to the 'Tracts for the Times.' Some opponents of the 'Tracts' said that you treated them with undue indulgence. . . . I wrote to the Archdeacon on the subject, submitting the 'Tracts' entirely to your Lordship's disposal. What I thought about your Charge will appear from the words which I then used to him. I said, 'A Bishop's lightest word, ex cathedra, is heavy. His judgment on a book cannot be light. It is a rare occurrence.' And I offered to withdraw any of the 'Tracts' over which I had control, if I were informed which were those to which your Lordship had objections. I afterwards wrote to your Lordship to this effect, that 'I trusted I might say sincerely that I should feel a more lively pleasure in knowing that I was submitting myself to your Lordship's expressed judgment in a matter of that kind, than I could have even in the widest circulation of the volumes in question." And Dr. Newman steadily treated the Charges of the Bishops against the "Tracts for the Times" as a very solemn witness of the Anglican Church against these "Tracts,"—so solemn, as to leave an Anglican of that period little choice between the duty of reconsidering those of his opinions which were inconsistent with the theological testimony of the Anglican Bishops, and the conclusion that the Anglican Church was destitute of divine life in its dealings with subjects of this kind. In a word, Dr. Newman, as the spokesman of the High Anglican party of that day, regarded the practical authority of a Bishop as entitled to an almost implicit obedience, simply because it was a Bishop's; while he regarded the unanimous dogmatic testimony of the Bench of Bishops as almost amounting to proof of the actual creed of the Church in which they were the rulers, whether that creed were right or wrong, because he could neither believe that, if the Bishops were collectively wrong, the Church could still be right, nor that if the Bishops were right, the recent revival of ecclesiastical principles could be in any way justified.

We suppose that few High Churchmen would follow Dr. Newman in this matter in the present day. They would regard his disposition to obey a Bishop's injunction, as if it were something having a sacred presumptive claim on his allegiance, almost with amusement; they would, for the most part, laugh at the doctrine that the testimony of the Bench of Bishops, as a whole, is any trustworthy index of the dogmatic creed of the Church to which they belong. For the most part, our modern High-Church clergymen look at the vow of obedience to the Bishop as one involving no sort of mystical deference or spiritual loyalty, but one requiring only a purely technical interpretation. And as to the dogmatic authority of the Bench of Bishops in relation to the creed of their Church, the High Churchmen are often disposed, we think, rather to assign it a negative value,—that is, to hold that it is at least very improbable that what all the Bishops alike sustain, is likely to cover the central truth—the essential truth—of the Anglican creed.

Mr. Hatch states that this grudging attitude of mind towards the Bishops is by no means a new one; that at the beginning of the eighth century, "the majority of the Churches were held by unattached Clerks (Olerici Vagantes), many of whom held Arian or other heretical opinions," but "whether unsound in faith or loose in morals," "subject to no special discipline." At present, the Bishops, in England at least, have no reason to complain of their impotence in cases of moral scandal. Public opinion supports fully the exercise of authority in matters of that kind, nor are the statutes which define the Bishops' powers inadequate for the purpose of dealing with real abuses. But in relation to matters of ritual and heresy, the Bishops find their authority extremely limited, and probably nowhere more so than when they try to regulate the doings of the High-Church party. Dr. Newman's feeling that the lightest word of a Bishop is weighty, is not only very rare at present in the Anglican Church, but particularly rare among the High-Church party. Their opinion appears to be,—and we do not wonder at it, for the experience of the last forty years has necessarily fostered it,—that the Bishops, to use a later phrase of Dr. Newman's, have always "vigorously handselled their Apostolical weapons against the Apostolical party,"—and that they are, in fact, much better disposed to be "Ordinaries" of the State, than to be the bulwarks of any kind of Church principle whatever. The result is that even those of the Clergy who contend most vigorously for the due transmission of the "Orders" of our Church, as the sole guarantee of the Sacramental system, attach no importance at all to the possession of these Orders considered as guarantees of either wise government or sound doctrine. They are apt to regard Bishops as primâ facie persons worthy of thorough distrust, men who must win a character for prudent administration before they are entitled to any deference at all. Of course, they will profess themselves willing to fulfil their "contract" to obey, so far as they contracted for obedience; but beyond the terms of the contract, obedience is not to be thought of, unless it has been previously justified by establishing a specific claim to confidence. Dr. Newman's personal loyalty to Bishop Bagot was the offspring of a theory which has not been since supported by facts,—a theory that the Bishops, as channels of divine grace, must generally also be supposed to be channels of just feeling and wise judgment on things sacred. Evidently our modern Clergy do not think so, nor do we know that they have any particular reason for thinking so. As a rule, we quite admit that the Bishops of the Anglican Church have not been very courageous, nor very coherent, nor very Liberal, nor generally very straightforward in their dealings with what they regarded as eccentric or dangerous views. Our Bishops have been, for the most part, more anxious to prevent the State from withdrawing its confidence from the Church, than they have been to make the State worthy of the confidence of the Church. And through that tendency they have very naturally alienated many of those eager and ardent men who have thought, in the first place, of making Christians out of evil-doers, and only in the second place of sustaining the reputation of the Church for safe and prudent habits.

But what puzzles us is how so considerable a school can have arisen which, insisting as it does on the Apostolic inheritance of the Bishops in relation to their custody of Sacramental grace, yet regards that function as involving nothing at all further than is Apostolic, nothing of either special guidance in practical matters, or special insight in doctrinal matters, to which a presumption at least of authority ought to attach. We do not complain that the Bishops are not regarded with much veneration in either light. We rather think that they have deserved little, and have, taken as a body, been more conspicuous during the last forty years for their genuine official diligence than for any other good quality that could be named,—and even more conspicuous perhaps for worldly wisdom than for official diligence. But still, it cannot, we think, be denied that Dr. Newman's a priori conception of the weight to be attached to the judgment of such channels of sacramental and spiritual grace as, in the opinion of Anglicans, those who confer the power of baptising, absolving, and consecrating the elements, should possess, is a natural one. It is very difficult to understand how an order of men who are chosen to convey such gifts to the Church, should have been deserted by, or else should have forfeited, all special grace for the purposes of practical administration and doctrinal guidance. And yet that is, so far as we can tell, the general view of the High-Church party, who, though they consider a bishop's intervention essential to the due conveyance of sacramental grace to the heart of Christians, nevertheless consider a bishop's decision on things practical, and a bishop's condemnation of a dogmatic opinion, decidedly more likely to be wrong than right. It is, to our minds, difficult to understand this complete divorce between the High-Church view of "Orders," and the High-Church view of those who confer Orders. Is not Dr. Newman's veneration for the Apostolic authority of a Bishop a very natural view in a school which believes that the bishop is made the exclusive channel for diffusing a certain most potent kind of divine grace? Is it not hard to understand how such grace could pass, and pass habitually, through the Bishops' ceremonial activity without sending out any fertilising side-tributaries to the Bishops' intellects, consciences, and wills?

"METHRATTON."

WE are always a little amused at the surprise which journalists either feel, or affect, when some local "wizard" like Hartwell, the Birmingham fortune-teller, "philosopher, astrologer, grand master of the mysteries, enchanter, sorcerer, and dealer in magic and spells," is committed for trial for obtaining money on false pretences, or sentenced as a rogue. The man has always adopted some magnificently ridiculous name—in this instance, Methratton, surely given him in joke by some learned gipsy, if, as we suspect, it is an Indian word, which means "Jewel of falsehood"—has always proposed to deal in the secrets of futurity, amulets, and love philtres; has always betrayed a craving eagerness for silver coins, in this instance half-crowns; has always found hundreds of dupes, usually girls; always relies upon their reluctance to give evidence in Court; and always is punished somehow, sometimes, we fear, to the straining of the law. Thereupon the journalists lift up their hands, and either cry, "Who would have thought it, in these days of education?" or moralise upon the fund of superstition still remaining in the human heart in an age of telephones and photographs. Well, the last proposition is true enough. There is a fund of superstition in the majority of people of all races—not in all, though—probably incurable, except by the dominance of a religious belief, and at all events quite beyond the influence of telegraphs and express trains; but that being so, why do we wonder that it exists in ignorant girls, in secluded country-houses, and in farms where ideas are never fresh? Why should it not exist, and what has education, in the sense of Board-School teaching, to do with the matter? The wonder is not that so much superstition about magic exists, but that there is not infinitely more of it. The readiness to be superstitious, the strong curiosity, the deep fear of the unknown, the keen pleasure in the indulgence of wonder, all the elements which produce superstitions exist, and are directed into the queer channels usually noticed in England, into a search, that is, either for love or cash, partly by a traditional method of fraud practised by whole classes, such as the gipsies, partly by a vast body of traditional teaching which, like some of the herbalists' knowledge, is handed down from house to house, cottage to cottage, and age to age, without the tutors of mankind being any the wiser. Sometimes an old clergyman stumbles upon the track of this teaching, sometimes some mother in Israel who has cured in her flock the fear of ridicule detects suddenly a faith the clergyman never heard of, sometimes it is revealed before the Magistrates, but all who discover it alike are startled with its extent and its influence. Two hundred silly people in Birmingham paid Hartwell, and some of them, at least, were in good positions. Positive beliefs, hardly distinguishable from beliefs in magic, are still in existence in England; and though those who hold them are now afraid of acknowledging them, for fear of the ridicule of the young and the frowns of the clergy, they still, in many places, penetrate very far. The writer can testify of his own knowledge to positive faith in astrology, in fortune-telling by the cards, and in palmistry as existing among fairly educated persons; and among the ignorant range of beliefs is much more extensive, covering a whole armoury of philtres—one of which is distinctly dangerous—and the use of a charmed mirror, the rationale of which the writer, who as a child in Norfolk heard of it constantly, would very much like to trace. Upon minds essentially ignorant, that is, without the power of thinking out anything so as to correlate cause and effect, and deeply imbued with this teaching, the promises of any "Methrattion" have their effect, if it be only the effect of intensely stimulating curiosity and a kind of fear, motives which would be indulged much more often, but for a belief equally traditional, long descended, and untraceable, that any resort to magic is necessarily wrong. That feeling is quite as strong as the belief in magic, and in hundreds of villages, which never, perhaps, heard of the elder Christianity from which it has come down, is the strongest corrective to a credulity which might easily become monstrous, and, indeed, every now and then—as in the horrible case which occurred at Sible Hedingham a few years since—does so become. As for "education," how is that to remove such a faith? "The three R's" are no disproof of magic in themselves, and the teachers, who might disprove it, or wake up the brains of their pupils to the necessary clearness, never touch upon the subject. We are told in books that the Catholic Clergy, who necessarily hear more of the secret thoughts of the people, do in England sometimes exhort the foolish victims of "necromancy;" but the Established Clergy despise the whole set of ideas too much to speak of them, and are known to despise them, and consequently never hear of them except in the vaguest way, through the talk of some child, or the cursing of some angry man. The Magistrates do, it is true, hear of them, and do rebuke them, and in that fact is, perhaps, the best justification of the existing law. It is a little hard on a rascal, often a half-believer in his own trade, that he should be imprisoned for selling a charm which his customer is foolish enough to ask for, when quacks are every day selling impossible medicines, ridiculous recipes, and injurious hair-dyes; but if the sale of the amulet were unpunishable, the ignorant would never hear that the cultivated thought amulets absurd. The two hundred girls who bought Methrattion's rubbish are very much disenchanted by his going to prison. Indeed, that teaching might be effectual, but that the Magistrates are supposed to act on the law of the land, and not on their own opinion—which need not be identical—and that the sentence destroys belief only in Methrattion, and not in Methrattiondom at large. He was a rogue, you see, for the Magistrates sent him to prison; but then that astrologer ten miles off, who sells bits of stone, instead of bits of paper or parchment, may be the genuine article. And so the belief lasts on, to be reported to the next generation, with any evidence, real or imaginary, that the reporter may have heard of. Education would break the long chain, no doubt, if it were education of the right kind, from the right people; but where is that, in the usual course of things, to come from? Sometimes it does come. There is a clergyman's wife in the parish, or a squire's daughter, who is entirely trusted, because he or she "don't never jeer;" or a schoolmaster who has a telescope, and "is a bit of a 'strologer hisself;" or best of all, a hard-bitten old farmer who knows it all, believes it all, and calls all who act on the belief fools and cowards—he ducks the wizard, which is disenchanting—and then in that village the man of mystery, even if he is a gipsy, has no chance at all. But in the ordinary run of events, nobody teaches about such things in a way which comes home to the taught, and so the superstitions linger. You cannot believe in magic mirrors after you have seen Pepper's "Ghost," but you can very much after learning any amount of compound arithmetic. Rule-of-three, they say, is very deadly to amulets; but then that is because the mind which comprehends rule-of-three has begun to think for itself, instead of merely remembering. True education kills magic, but what is called education does not, nor does shrewdness. The Roman populace can do sums, and believe in the jettatore all the same, while no possible teaching of mere practical things will ever make an English lad as shrewd as the Hindoo, who knows at a glance what you are at, who is a senior wrangler in some trade, and who cannot be done out of his money, but who for all that will abandon a speculation if he sees a hare, and is furious with alarm if you praise his child, or if a faquir remarks that he shall curse his house.

The Times seems to think that a good many of Methrattion's victims are induced to pay money by a half-belief which is not belief, and that, undoubtedly, is true. The astrologer is often consulted as the "Sortes Biblicæ" are still consulted, from the vague interest excited by any method of guessing by rule. The girl is undecided whether she shall prefer the light suitor or the dark one, the joiner or the blacksmith, and consults the wizard, not because he is a wizard, but because his answer is a guide less controlable by herself than, for example, tossing a penny would be; but this form of questioning, though it swells the fortune-teller's receipts, does not make up their bulk. The majority of applicants want something positive, be it philtre, or charm, or amulet, or sometimes, we fear, drug, and are so ashamed of wanting it, that they will give no evidence. They want it because they have been told, they hardly know how, that such things have their "effect," and have never had the slightest chance of being "educated" as to the folly of such belief, any more than they have had as to the folly of believing that asses have a stripe because Balaam's ass was struck. Suppose a girl of the kind that sends the half-crown had learned "the three R's," and hemming, and some cookery quite perfectly, but had never heard the elementary truths of astronomy, would she not believe that the Sun went round the world? And she has, as she thinks, nearly as much evidence for the amulet, namely, the constant testimony of an unreal experience, the facts that Aunt Jane's Mary Ann wore an amulet, "and never caught nothin' all her life." The weight of apparent evidence is with the believer, and its influence is not to be abolished by an instruction which never, in ordinary cases, approaches the point at issue.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MR. DENING AND THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

[To THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Letters have appeared in your last two numbers bearing on the cause that led to my disconnection from the Church Missionary Society. With the hope of throwing a little more light on the subject, and of bringing out facts which hitherto have been kept in the shade, and thus of enabling the public to judge for themselves in the matter, I will endeavour to conquer that repugnance which we all have to writing on personal matters, and state my views as concisely as possible. The most casual reader of the two letters that have already appeared will perceive that the point of view of their authors is entirely different.

Mr. White, as a representative of a certain section of public opinion, takes the fact of my disconnection from the Church Missionary Society for having adopted the view known as "conditional immortality," and argues from it that had I still continued to proclaim the dogma "of eternal torment," I should not have been disconnected; and, therefore, that it is not incorrect to say that my disconnection was owing to my refusing to teach this dogma.

To this, Mr. Wigram replies by asserting that the Committee do not require their Missionaries to teach the "dogma" in question. If this assertion could be shown to be in accordance with facts, Mr. White's inferences from the action of the Committee would at once appear to be unfairly drawn. Now, whereas it would appear from Mr. Wigram's letter as though the Missionaries of the Church Missionary Society were at liberty to proclaim what doctrines they pleased on the subject of future punishment, as a matter of fact, the Committee have never in any way informed the Missionaries that they have this liberty. And the Missionaries of the Society are all under the impression that what are known as the old views, and no others, are considered orthodox by the Society. And furthermore, the Missionaries of Japan suggested to me, when they heard of my having given up these views, and having preached others, that it would be only doing what was proper on my part to communicate this fact to the Committee. And as a proof that not even to-day are the Committee prepared to swerve from the old lines, I will quote from a letter that has been sent to the Missionaries of the Society in Japan since my disconnection:—"We feel confident, however, that you will agree with us that it is impossible for the Committee to authorise the teaching by the Missionaries of the Society of the various views which have recently been put forth on eschatological subjects, which, being contradictory one to another, cannot all be true. They must not swerve from their old lines of careful adherence to the Scripture statements, and must look to their Missionaries not to incur the risk of provoking controversy in the Mission field, and possibly of circulating erroneous teaching, by stating as dogmatic truths of Scripture things not plainly revealed as such. . . . Many questions are among the secret things that belong unto our God, and should be approached and handled with the reserve becoming those who avowedly know but in part."

In reference to Mr. Wigram's statement to the effect that the Committee have been asked to give their explicit sanction to my teaching the doctrine of conditional immortality, I would say that I am aware of no such request having been made. All that the Committee was asked to do was to allow me the liberty to act up to my convictions in this matter, which they refused to grant. The Church Missionary Society, being a voluntary society, has perfect right to dismiss its agents at whatever time and in whatever way it pleases, but what I feel it my duty to protest against is any attempt made by the Secretaries of the Society to obscure by circumlocution the real cause of my disconnection.

I think, therefore, that the inferences drawn by Mr. White in the letter published in your columns were fairly drawn, and that, practically, disconnecting a man for having adopted one of the many current theories of eschatology, is no other than a disconnection on account of a refusal to teach the old view,—i.e., as far as a Missionary is concerned, for I suppose that no one is simple enough to suppose that with such a class of inquirers as we meet with in Japan, a Missionary is able to refuse to answer the question so constantly put,—What is the teaching of the Christian revelation in reference to a future life? No evasive answer would be for a moment allowed, and if the Missionary informed the inquirer that he had nothing definite to tell him, then the reply would be immediately forthcoming, if the Christian revelation has nothing definite to tell us about the region that lies beyond the horizon of all ordinary science and philosophy, then, why is it called a "revelation" at all? It is evident that every Missionary must adopt one of three courses in this matter.

Either he must proclaim the old view, which is that the soul is inherently immortal, that owing to the nature of its essence, it is incapable of being deprived of conscious existence, and, therefore that the finally impenitent must endlessly suffer. Or he must adopt one of those theories which, though very ancient, are known as "modern theories," and teach accordingly. Or he must remain silent altogether on the subject of the future life, and treat the whole subject of eschatology as of minor importance, and one upon which nothing definite can be said.

After much study of the subject ranging over some five years, I have seen fit to adopt the second course, and it is on that account, and on no other, that I have been disconnected from the Church Missionary Society. The Committee of that Society has never been asked to sanction the view, but only to tolerate the man; and this it has refused to do.

In conclusion, it may be well for me to state that, in writing this, I am actuated by no wish to injure in any way the Society under which I have worked as a Missionary for so many years. No one feels more than I the importance of its receiving public support. It is only with the desire of letting the public know where the Committee of the Church Missionary Society stands in reference to the eschatological question which has been so widely and so earnestly discussed in Europe and America during the last ten years, that I have, somewhat against my will, taken up my pen on this occasion.—I am, Sir, &c., Durham, January 30th.

WALTER DENING.

CONSECRATED GROUND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I freely confess my ignorance of many things with which I ought to be acquainted, but I hope that it is not so dire as "Episcopus" imagines. If I conveyed the impression that I considered that the object of Churchmen in consecration was to intrench their bodies from chance contact with the bodies of Nonconformists, I must have expressed my meaning very imperfectly. I was thinking of the effect, rather than the purpose,—an effect which a recent case in Cornwall has, as I intimated, somewhat painfully forced upon our sight. I always study close compression when writing for space as valuable as yours, and I see that if I had used more words, I might easily have made my meaning more plain.

In the ages in which consecration was a power, and was inweaving itself with the system of the Church, of course there were no Nonconformists to intrench against. There was always a deep undertone of protest within the Church against the Church, which had its root in an enlightened conscience and in the Word of God. Indeed, we may say that this struggle of the truth with the Church which enshrined, but partially paralysed it, was the chronic agony of Christian Society. But to suppose that in those days consecration was regarded as protective as against religious dissent of any sort would be dark ignorance indeed. But when in these days Churchmen and Nonconformists are already peacefully lying side by side in a cemetery, and a Bishop stirs himself vehemently to get a bit of it consecrated and marked off from the rest for the use of his own communion, I submit that the impression naturally produced is very much what I have described.

The pleas for consecration which "Episcopus" urges, in his kindly and courteous letter, I am already tolerably familiar with, but they do not touch the heart of the difficulty. He asks—Why should we quarrel with them for consecrating some particular clods, to which they believe the principle of separation to apply? I ask, in return, why should not Churchmen, now that the cemetery is taking the place of the churchyard, and can as perfectly protect the grave from violation, learn the lesson of the burial of their Lord, and consider that the grave is consecrated by the Christian dead who lie in it? They would thus avoid the appearance of jealous exclusion, which is essentially un-Christian; and they would let brethren lie together as brethren in death, with a hope that they might learn to work together as brethren in life, in time.

Into the legal aspect of the matter, I do not venture to follow your correspondent. We Nonconformists believe that a Church established by law, is fettered by law; and to be told that certain Christian acts can only be done in certain places as ordained by law, does not tend to increase our reverence for a Church which in the discharge of its vital functions makes the dictum of the law so absolutely supreme. But on the subject of the sentiment of the matter, I am entirely at one with "Episcopus." It is the fashion now to sneer at sentiment. As well sneer at the flush on the cheek, the gleam in the eye, the play of the lips on a human countenance. It is like stripping the flesh from the bones of a human body, this divorce of the sentiment from the truth of Christianity. But it seems to me that we Nonconformists realise all that is valuable in this sentiment without the consecration of the clods. We bury our dead with prayer; we commit them to the care of God; we have sacred associations with their resting-place, and we make the sepulchre sure. But our benediction rests, not on the clods, but on the dear remains that lie there, and which make our graveyards holy ground to us; while we do not kindle heart-burnings and angry passions, by keeping the folds of the Christian flock separate even in death. A sentiment taking a form which bears such fruits of strife, is an un-Christian sentiment; and the consecration of the clods, however useful it may have been in the past, is in these days among the things which are decaying and waxing old, and ready to vanish away.

I am so deeply persuaded of the efficacy of the fervent prayer of a righteous man, that I see very clearly, however blind I may be as to other matters, that doubt about the power of prayer is in no sense the real ground of my objection to the consecration of clods. And let me tell "Episcopus," with all respect, that this attributing such un-Christian doubts and denials to those who may be honestly seeking to purge Christianity of the superstitions which have grown round it, has a sad tendency to drive into unbelief those, at any rate, whose faith is not very firmly fixed on God. I am at one with him about the efficacy of prayer, but I should probably differ with him as to the real value of official petitions about things which have no reality behind them, and which minister to strife. I believe, too, with him in giving of thanks with our daily bread; but I have heard grace "said or sung," on public and private occasions, after a fashion which could not add much sanctity to the feast. But as to prayer, I say,—Would God we had more of it, warm and living from the heart! I think that then we should recover the power with God and with man which we appear to have well-nigh lost, and should once more prevail.

I cannot say that "Episcopus," though I thank him for answering my letter, has done much to make me appreciate better the virtue of consecrated clods. And I am more than ever sure that if the scattered sections of the flock are to be drawn together in that unity for which the Saviour prayed, it must be on the basis of a truth which goes behind unreal distinctions, and by means of a sentiment which is healthy, intelligent, and aglow with charity. Warmly thanking you for your kindness in sparing me space for these letters, I am, Sir, &c.,

J. BALDWIN BROWN.

IRELAND AND ENGLAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me to say a few words on the unhappy Irish question? Myself an Irishman, and in Holy Orders of the Irish Church, I am yet, what is most rare in such a case, an earnest Liberal. Let me begin, then, by saying how strange, how very strange, is the long-continued misapprehension by almost every Englishman of the real point at issue. You talk of agrarian outrages, of the great land question, of denominational education, and what not. These all are, no doubt, elements (important, too, in their own way) in the question, but they do not touch the real, vital point. That point is, that the masses of the population are, to a man, disloyal at bottom. From indifference and antipathy, this feeling towards England exists in every possible phase, till it culminates in bitter hatred. That being so, you see at once why efforts at pacification fail. It is enough that they are English,—that they come from England. They are tainted,—they are doomed to certain failure. I do not defend or share this feeling, far from it. Yet, in view of all the circumstances of the case, it seems to me a feeling by no means unnatural or strange,—by no means one to be wondered at.

Now, Sir, this being the case, various doctors come over to treat the unhappy patient (not an Irishman, by the way, among them). They live at the Castle, or, it may be, now and then take a flying trip into the wilds of the country. But what do they know of the real ailment? Almost nothing whatever; and so that happens which always happens when a doctor treats for one malady a patient suffering from quite a different one. Let me add to the picture I have tried to draw of the feeling toward England of the Irish masses this, that I believe a great deal of passive disloyalty exists amongst the classes supposed to be loyal. Nowhere is there any love for England, nor any liking, even, of a hearty kind. Reared in the very midst of so-called loyal Irish Protestants, I can well recall that, as a child, I always thought and felt towards the English as towards a strange people. This feeling was unconscious; it was in the air I breathed.

I could go on, but fear you would deny me space. I have already drawn a dark picture, but have to add one dark touch more,—that it seems as if the feelings of the Irish towards England had but grown in bitterness these last few years.—I am, Sir, &c., HIBERNICUS.

MAHOMMEDAN SELF-GOVERNMENT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your last number, there is a very able criticism upon the English scheme for Egyptian self-government, and a very interesting letter from Mr. Malcolm MacColl upon the inability of Mahommedan nations to govern themselves. It strikes me, knowing something of the state of affairs in Egypt, that the scheme proposed by Lord Granville for the future organisation of the Khedive's dominions exactly meets the difficulty suggested by Mr. Malcolm MacColl. We do not leave the Egyptians to themselves. The question of the Mahommedan capacity for self-government would have been distinctly raised by our acceptance of Arabi's programme. But this programme was not accepted, and the Egyptians were brought completely under European control by our English victories last summer. The great questions of debt-paying and judicial reform are now in safe hands. No mere native effort, in the new Legislative Council, can upset the strong administration which the Khedive has established, under European advice. England has provided his Highness with experienced officers, to command his army and gendarmerie. The Custom House, the Post Office, and the Railways are directed by Englishmen of approved ability. Every great Department of State is more or less controlled by Europeans. The coastguard service, the lighthouses, and the Canal are all under European guidance. Then, too, there are the International Tribunals (with distinguished foreign Judges), which give full security to foreign creditors, not only against the indebted Fellahs, but against the Egyptian State itself. These things are important, in their bearing upon the nominal independence of any Egyptian Ministry. We English can well afford to keep as far as possible in the background, and to give our ally the Khedive a fair chance of directing purely native affairs. We have so much power in the country, that we need not be anxious about mere names and outward forms. I think that though Lord Granville's cautious policy may make the English influence a little slower in filtering through to improve the condition of the Fellahs, yet that if we thereby avoid grave European complications, it is our positive duty to wait. We Europeans, doubtless, owe it to our national honour to make Egypt happier and better in the long-run for our presence upon Egyptian soil. But this progress, so much to be desired, will surely, if slowly, follow upon what has already been established. The old oppression, the severe exactions, and cruel beatings of former days cannot be continued under a system of police officered by Englishmen. There is certainly much yet to do; but we are bound to deal fairly by the Khedive, and bound to step very carefully in reforming a country where the foreign, non-English, population is so powerful. This foreign population has an immense capital invested in farms and factories, in hotels and warehouses, besides the better known and less sympathetic claims of the village money-lenders. These foreigners are secured in their various rights by our English victories, and so long as the directing influence of England is prudently kept in the background, they will be content to let us rule. But they will not so easily tolerate our avowed authority, and Lord Granville has adopted the only possible plan for giving Egypt a fair chance of improvement, without risking a great war on that account.—I am, Sir, &c., Temple, E.C., January 30th.

J. HILARY SKINNER.

[Mr. Skinner is entitled to be heard, but where, when the troops have gone, is his guarantee for anything, even the lives of the Europeans? Why should Egyptian Sepoys not kill officers, like Indian Sepoys?—Ed. Spectator.]

PRINCE BISMARCK AND THE ENGLISH SUNDAY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—What wonderfully short memories we have! That story about Prince Bismarck being prevented from whistling in Hull on a Sunday, and in consequence proceeding to get into the fire from the frying-pan by taking steamer to Edinburgh, which, as telegraphed to the Standard from Berlin, has been so much criticised this week, by the Pall Mall Gazette and other journals, was told at a Versailles dinner-party in the autumn of 1870. It will be found at p. 222 of the English translation of Dr. Moritz Busch's famous "Bismarck in the Franco-German War," published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co.—I am, Sir, &c., W.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your statistics of the Society of Friends, quoted from the Times, are, no doubt, correct. I have not the Irish returns before me, and so cannot check them with official documents, but your belief that a majority of the 17,977 members reside in Ireland is very far from being correct. In the official return published last May, the number of members in England and Scotland is reported as 15,113, of whom 192 only were in Scotland, leaving, if the figures you quote are correct, 2,864 Irish residents. Of the 5,700 attenders of meetings not in membership, 5,084 are English and Scotch, leaving 616 Irish.

The list of Quaker Knights should have included the name of Mr. Justice Fry, who, as well as the other persons you mention, are regular members.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In a review of my book on "Animal Intelligence," which appeared in the Spectator two or three months ago, it was alleged that in the course of the book I had made three mis-statements of fact concerning the habits of animals. In replying to that review I explained that, being then out of the region of libraries, I was unable to test the accuracy of my critic's allegations. I have now looked up the three points in question. The first I find to have been a printer's error, concerning a well-known fact, which I failed to observe in the proof. For the other two I find I had good authority, so I will ask you to publish this letter, in order that your reviewer may in future learn to adopt a less dogmatic tone when, without taking the trouble to inquire into a subject, he accuses an author of inaccuracy.

Your reviewer says, "Female ostriches take no part in 'the duty of incubation' (i.e., do not assist the male); and woodpeckers certainly do not 'carefully carry away the chips' when they cut their holes in trees." Now, concerning the ostriches, I find that my authorities were Mr. J. E. Harting and Mr. E. B. Biggar. The former, in his exhaustive work on ostriches, written in conjunction with Mr. J. D. Mosenthal (1877), states very explicitly that the female bird assists the male in the process of incubation (p. 41); and, without reference to this work, the statement is corroborated in detail by Mr. Biggar, who three years later published in the Field (August 21st, 1880), the observations which he had made on the habits of ostriches in the large ostrich farms of the Cape Colony. It is needless to occupy your space with quotations from these authorities; it is enough to say that their statements with reference to this point are as distinct as it is possible for statements to be, and therefore that in view of them I did not doubt, and do not doubt, that the evidence which such testimony supplies concerning the habits of ostriches in a state of nature is more trustworthy than that which was furnished by the observations made at the Zoological Gardens in Regent's Park, to which reference is made by Mr. Darwin in his "Descent of Man" (1874, pp. 478-9), and which, no doubt, your reviewer had in mind when he so confidently accused me of inaccuracy. Moreover, Mr. Nicols, in his recently published "Zoological Notes," also states that the hen bird assists the cock to hatch the eggs; and on my writing to him to ask whether he had witnessed the fact, he answers that although he has not done so himself, a well-educated friend, "who passed some time in visiting ostrich farms in South Africa," had done so; and in answer to his express inquiry on the subject wrote, "that the female took part in the task, though not nearly to so great an extent as the male," adding that he was surprised to hear there should be any question about a fact so well known to the ostrich farmers. Clearly, therefore, your reviewer is not acquainted with any of the more recent literature upon the habits of these birds.

Concerning the woodpeckers, my authority was Couch, who writes in his "Illustrations of Instinct" (p. 239):—"Many birds will carefully remove mutings of the young from the neighbourhood of their nests. . . . and the woodpecker (Picus viridis) and the marsh tit (Parus palustris), in particular, are at pains to remove even the chips which are made in excavating the cavities where the nests are placed." The copy of Couch which I happen to possess is one that was lent me by the late Mr. Darwin, and this passage, besides being strongly marked by him, is also the subject of a manuscript note, which shows that he accepted the statement as sufficient evidence of the fact. Indeed, the only place where I have been able to find that it is disputed is in the new edition of "Yarrell's British Birds," where there is a foot-note saying that the writer has never himself observed the habit. But clearly, the negative testimony of this writer is not sufficient to justify your reviewer in dogmatically contradicting the positive testimony of such a naturalist as Couch.—I am, Sir, &c., London, January 18th.

GEORGE J. ROMANES.

[Our reviewer requests us to append the following remarks.—Ed. Spectator:—"First, as to the ostrich. The passage in Mr. Harting's book is based on the statement of Le Vaillant, whose assertions, except when confirmed by later experience, are justly discredited by the best-informed naturalists of the present day, as he was notoriously so often unworthy of belief. Dr. Sclater, writing on the subject nearly twenty years ago, wholly disregards them, and says ("Proc. Zool. Soc.," 1863, p. 233):—"I shall not repeat the numerous stories that are universally current respecting the reproduction of the ostrich. . . . But we now know with certainty from the observations of M. Noel Suchet, Director of the Zoological Garden at Marseilles, that the normal habits of the ostrich do not differ materially from those of its allies of the same family." He then goes on to give the substance of these observations, which may be seen at length in the Revue de Zoologie and elsewhere, made "in a quiet enclosure near Marseilles" (and not in the Regent's Park, as Mr. Romanes seems to imagine), to the effect that both sexes made the nest, and that after the female had laid, "the male took up his position on the eggs, and the young birds were hatched." Mr. Biggar's article contains the following sentence:—"Contrary to what has been usually understood, and what is still stated even in colonial accounts, the cock-bird sits at night, not the hen." It is true that he speaks, though apparently not from his own observation, of the hen's taking part in incubation by day-time, and I give Mr. Romanes the benefit of that evidence; but it seems to me more than possible that it rests simply on a survival of the old belief. As to Mr. Nicols's book, it has appeared since my article was written, and therefore I could not have been acquainted with it; but had I known it, what he says does not alter the case, for he adduces no new evidence. But to be quite fair, and I am sure I have no wish to be otherwise, I think that the generalisation from M. Suquet's (for that is, I believe, his real name) single observation may have been hasty. I learn that in 1870 there was a joint and successful incubation by a male and female ostrich in the Zoological Garden at Florence, and moreover, that Andersson, whose accuracy I cannot doubt, has asserted that both sexes assist in hatching the eggs; but the passage which Andersson quotes from Thunberg will be found in the original not to imply that the hen ostrich which the latter encountered at her nest was engaged in incubation. I would, however, point out the essential difference between evidence of this kind and that on which Mr. Romanes has based his statement; the one is the direct testimony of competent witnesses, the other the traditional impression of opinion.

Next, as to the woodpecker. Couch was doubtless quoting Yarrell's early statement, disregarding, however, the prudent "it is said" with which that cautious naturalist prefaced an old story, the origin of which it is needless here to trace. Couch himself could scarcely have had an opportunity of confirming it by his own observation, for, as his biographer tells us, he rarely quitted his home, which was in a part of Cornwall destitute of trees, and therefore of woodpeckers. But if Mr. Romanes would only look at a green woodpecker's nest himself, his doubts would cease. Meanwhile, he might refer to what Naumann, the best of German field ornithologists, has written; or to that excellent observer's, Mr. Harley's, notes furnished to Macgillivray, stating,—"Some authors, in their history of this bird, speak of its carrying away the chips from the foot of the tree in which it has been preparing a place for its offspring; but, although such may be the case, I have never, after a very minute search, seen either male or female removing the chips, which, on the contrary, I have always found in profusion near their holes." Mr. Romanes may also like to know that in Sweden the black woodpecker is known by a name meaning "chip-crow," from this very habit; and if he will look to Mr. Simpson's account in "The Ibis" of that bird's nidification, he will find that accurate observer saying:—"Chips, some of them half-an-inch in length, lay plentifully at the foot of the tree, giving the ground the appearance of the floor of a carpenter's workshop." Finally, Mr. Romanes is hardly fair when he speaks of "the negative evidence" of Yarrell's editor, for that writer positively stated that "he has always found the easiest way of discovering a [green woodpecker's] nest is by observing the foot of each tree in the presumed locality, that which contains it being invariably recognisable by the chips strewn on the ground." Mr. Romanes, it is clear, has as yet little experience of the persistency with which old errors are maintained, even by the writers of the most modern books on natural history.—THE REVIEWER OF 'ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.'"]

SIR WILLIAM ROWAN HAMILTON.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—There are few, if any, now living who can speak to having witnessed the amazing instance of precocity exhibited by Sir William Rowan Hamilton as a child. When about nine years old, I was taken by my father to the house of his old friend "Archy Hamilton," William's father, in Dominick Street, Dublin for an evening tea. The son, William, was brought in, to show off the progress he had made, not only in languages, but in the facility with which he could read the characters, Greek and Hebrew especially, however placed before him. The Hebrew Psalter, placed upside-down, was read with as much ease as if it were in its right position before him.

Later on in life, when Astronomer-Royal, evenings were spent with him at the Observatory, Dunsink, near Dublin, where his chief pleasure consisted in inviting us up to the meridian to view the stars, and this with a simplicity of manner that was charming, and with a total unconsciousness of his marvellous intellectual powers. I was led to understand, when first we met, that he and I were born on the same day, month, and year; but I find from the book you have reviewed that he had the start of me by three days, while I have laboured ever since with the disadvantage, on my side, of not having been born under the same horoscope with him.—I am, Sir, &c., Liverpool, January 29th.

WILLIAM BLOOD.

ART.

GUSTAVE DORÉ.

LAST week there died in Paris, at the age of fifty, Gustave Doré, the most fertile and vivid designer that the world has ever known, and an artist who was probably more widely famous than any of his contemporaries. For this last there were good reasons, since his best work was done for the purpose of book illustration, and in that easily portable form found its way into the remotest corners of Europe. To say that as an illustrator no artist has in any way approached his fame, is scarcely to put the matter with sufficient strength. It would be more accurate to say that the enormous range and variety of his work place him entirely in a rank by himself, wherein we have to compare him, not with this artist or with that, but with all those who have attempted to depict the intellectual ideas of others. We should probably be within the mark if we asserted that, in the twenty years during which Doré was chiefly engaged in work for the publishers, he produced more designs than all his countrymen put together, and of the enormous majority of these works it may be confidently asserted, that whatever be their shortcomings, they possess power, originality, and vivid imagination. It has been said with justice that in a matter such as this of illustrating, the mere quantity of the work produced prohibits us from criticising with extreme severity minute, individual errors. No one man, for instance, could be expected to illustrate perfectly such a poem as "The Inferno," or such a book as the Bible; the range of ideas is too vast, the number and complexity of the personages and circumstances are too tremendous, to admit of perfect reproduction by a single mind and hand. And therefore it is the almost universal custom in England to employ upon such works a variety of artists, who will supply in variety what they lose in unity; whose powers will, in fact, supplement one another. But Doré attempted (and in the main succeeded) in carrying the whole artistic burden upon his own broad shoulders; and where another man would have sent two or three designs, he sent two or three hundred,—we might almost say, two or three thousand. If he did not render his author's ideas with uniform success, he is at least entitled to this praise,—that in some way or another he rendered them all; he shrank from no difficulty of subject, however great, and grudged no labour, however wearisome. An artist who, by the time he is thirty, has published forty-four thousand designs on subjects of every imaginable kind, has earned a right to be judged by the general quality of his work, and the general success or failure which he has shown in entering into the ideas of his authors. To demand from such a one a scrupulous delicacy of execution, or an entire freedom from inaccuracies of any kind, is alike futile and unjust. What we are entitled to ask is, that he should justify his comprehensiveness by throwing new light upon all the subjects he treats of; that he should prove himself capable of entering into the spirit of his author, and that his work should not fall below a certain fair average of executive skill and intellectual insight. On the whole, Doré fulfilled these conditions, and even exceeded them. His woodcuts have, besides, the merit of telling their story intelligibly and strongly, and with an amount of weird fancy and superabundant life, such as renders them as original in character as the work in which they are placed. And it is a strange proof of the power of the young French artist, that he was able to give to his designs for such works as "The Inferno" and "Don Quixote" sufficient character and imagination to make them take their place by the side of the text, as it were, less than in subordination thereto. For in looking at books which Doré has illustrated, one is somehow almost obliged to take the illustrations into serious consideration; and it is impossible to help feeling that they are, even when most extravagant and unnatural, works of genius, as opposed to works of manufacture. When we consider that the young artist was doing these wood-drawings at an average rate of production of eight a day (for he could hardly have begun publishing designs before he was fifteen, and at thirty, as we have said, he had published 44,000), the only feeling with regard to their shortcomings is one of wonder that they could be as perfect as they are. The rate of production seems incredible.

An analysis of M. Doré's art would take far more space than is at our command, and for such, should the subject be one which interests our readers, we may refer them to an elaborate and most detailed article by Mr. P. G. Hamerton, published in the Fine Arts Quarterly Review (1865). We shall only endeavour here to touch upon one or two of the artist's most characteristic points. One of the most notable of these was the absence in his art of all quality of gentleness, an absence which may be considered absolute, for where he strives to be gentle, he only succeeds in being weak, and his tenderness is either ludicrous or childish. Of humour which is not fun, but grim and rather savage in its intention, he has a great store, and at the point where comedy touches burlesque he is also powerful. But of fun such as it is understood in England, our artist shows no trace; his laughter is either coarse, with Rabelais, or mocking, with Voltaire,—there is an absinthe flavour in his simplest jokes. His three finest works are the "Contes Drolatiques" (Balzac), the "Don Quixote," and "The Inferno," and illustrations to these remarks of ours may be found throughout these books. His laughter, indeed, has little human good-fellowship,—it scarcely seems to come from a man of the same race as ourselves. But perhaps its least human quality is neither its scorn nor its cruelty, but a strain of exaggeration such as that which produces the great pasteboard heads which we see at Christmas pantomimes. We never feel quite sure that there is any real personality behind the outside appearance of Doré's heroes and heroines. They are beings of no human race transplanted from the land of "Erewhon;" and this impression is probably deepened by finding that their creator cares little or nothing what becomes of them. He stabs, or slashes, or drowns them, with little ceremony and no remorse, in his pictures, as Mr. Hamerton truly says, "heads fly about like tennis-balls," to which we may add that legs, arms, and bodies follow their example; and there is one particularly horrible drawing, we remember, in which a man who has been cut in half is raising himself upon his bended arms, apparently to see what has become of the lower portion of his body. We have mentioned this, because it lies at the root of Doré's shortcomings, and of many of his merits. His genius was one which showed an indifference to suffering such as could scarcely be paralleled in the history of Art; he revelled in the horrible, and conceptions of Dante's which appear to most readers almost unbearable even in words, were elaborated by him into designs in which no detail of their horror was omitted. No doubt the painter was cruel by temper, and occasionally even ferocious in his cruelty, and this failing underlies all his work. His sympathies were with the "big battalions," and in some ways he might be called the Carlyle of Artists. But he was only an irreverent Carlyle at the best of times; he believed in nothing except himself. His vanity and his power seem to have been almost equal, indeed probably the one could not have existed without the other. At all events, he could never have done half the work he did, had he been able to see his own shortcomings. As a painter, he was, in France, where they understand painting, frankly a failure. And his power in sculpture, though real, consisted in ignoring rather than fulfilling all the accepted requirements of the art. In fact, his sculpture is illustration in the round, just as his designs are illustrations in the flat. And though London, with its customary ignorance of Art, sustained for ten years, and does sustain to this day, a Doré Gallery, it would be difficult to find a single person of cultivated judgment who regards his pictures otherwise than as great scenic representations. The art of painting he never mastered, did not perhaps give it even the "huit jours" which Ingres said it required. The art of drawing, in which he might probably have excelled, he grew to disregard, from the fact of habitually exaggerating all the details of his designs. It were easy to pick out some of his illustrations in which all the relative proportions are entirely wrong,—in which, evidently, the artist has never stopped to consider them. What will be his place in the future? It is very hard to say. He had a wider imaginative range in all subjects where the gloomy, the terrible, the fantastic, or the extravagant played leading parts, than any living artist, and probably than any artist who ever did or will live. But his power is singularly unsympathetic, his conceptions are too uniformly unreal not to forfeit much of their power, and for the delineation of the simpler aspects of humanity he shows no capability. In fact, out of his fifty thousand designs, Doré has not left us a single beautiful picture.

BOOKS.

MISS GORDON CUMMING'S FIRE FOUNTAINS OF HAWAII.*

THE nineteenth century will certainly be able to boast, among other products of its inquiring genius, of the group of lady travellers whose adventurous careers have recently been recorded by an appreciative admirer of the courage and patience with which they have fronted the perils and endured the discomforts of travel in the remotest corners of the globe. Miss Gordon Cumming is by no means the least conspicuous member of the group in question, comprising names so well known as those of Miss Ida Pfeiffer, Lady Hester Stanhope, and Miss Bird, and abundantly displays in these volumes the ease and strength which have characterised her previous narratives. She possesses the rare power of being at once graphic and true. She rather, indeed, prefers, on the whole, to lag a half-tone or so behind, than to be in advance of Nature, and her readers feel a pleasant assuredness that they are not being deluded by fine words into an acceptance of a counterfeit for a reality. Yet she is no mere word-photographer, and never fails to combine with her descriptions that subtle human element which distinguishes the artist from the savant. We can safely say that Hawaii, which has been so often described by previous writers, will less easily bear description hereafter. The autotype illustrations, we feel constrained to add, do not by any means rise to the level of the text in picturesqueness and clearness.

To Miss Cumming, as to her predecessors, the principal attraction of the Sandwich Isles was the volcanic district of Hawaii, the largest and southernmost of the eight islands which form the realm of our recent amiable visitor, King Kalakaua. Here, on the grandest scale, the cosmic energy developed when the nebulous mass, torn off from some parent agglomeration and cast spinning into space, was condensed, some fifty or sixty thousand millenniums ago, into the solid globe of our earth, still displays itself in phenomena rivalling the tremendous cataclysms which have scarred, pitted, and seamed the surface of the moon. Miss Cumming's first view of Kilauea, even of the famous inner crater, Halemauau, was a disappointing one, and for scenic effect, she declared it inferior to a great conflagration. A day or two's patience, however, was duly rewarded:—

"Last night was Hallowe'en, the great fire-festival of our ancestors, and here it has been celebrated in right royal style, for the fire spirits have broken loose, and are holding high revel. The flow is increasing rapidly, and is magnificent. The fire has burst out at so many points together that it has formed a new lake in the outer crater, in which fire-jets are spouting, molten lava thrown high in mid-air, great masses of red-hot solid lava being tossed to a height of from 40 ft. to 50 ft., while from the overflowing rim or from weak points in the sides of the lake basin flow rivers of lava, forming a network of living, rushing fire, covering fully two square miles of the very ground over which I was walking only two days ago. It is a scene of marvellous beauty, and is inexpressibly fascinating. From the edge of the crater wall I have watched each stage in the growth of this strange new lake, I have seen it gradually rise higher and higher, till at last it overflowed in glowing streams, like rivers of golden syrup, but brighter far, and of indescribable colour. The centre of the lake is oftenest of a silvery-grey, only crossed by zigzag lines of flame-colour and deep rosy-red; but all round its shores it is continually surging and upheaving great crested billows, which break in fiery surf, and toss up clouds of fire-spray. Sometimes the whole lake appears to be in a tremendous commotion, heaving and trembling, as if acting obedient to some pressure from the furnace below."

Of Mauna Loa, Miss Cumming did not attempt the ascent, under the impression that it was not worth while to climb 10,000 feet above Kilauea to see nothing more than what was to be seen in the lower crater. Miss Bird's greater faith, however, was rewarded by the magnificent spectacle of a fountain of living fire, a glorious incandescence attaining at times a height of 600 feet, and glowing with the intense yellow of liquid gold. In 1852, a light like that of a solitary star burst out with amazing splendour 4,000 feet below the summit. For twenty days and nights it threw and sustained a column of liquid fire 700 feet high, and 200 to 300 feet in diameter. "The descending showers," adds Miss Cumming, quoting Mr. Coan, "formed a cataract of fire upon the rim of the crater, and the molten flood of millions of tons of sparkling lava rolled down the mountain in a deep broad river, at the rate of, probably, ten miles an hour." In 1840 a stream of lava issued from its flanks three miles wide, and fell into the sea near Hilo, "leaving a basaltic precipice about fifty feet in height, and forming a magnificent fire-cataract about a mile in width. . . . So intense was the glare, that at places forty miles distant fine print could be read all night by its fiery glow."

But after all, volcanic phenomena on a grand scale defy description. No words can, with any approach to adequateness, paint a Niagara of fire, or a Mississippi of molten, glowing rock, or a fusion-fountain 800 feet high. Such tremendous displays of the interior forces of our globe must be seen to be realised, even in part; once seen, no language is needed to recall their terrible sublimity. For ourselves, we confess that the chapters of Miss Cumming's book which have given us the greatest pleasure are those dealing with the past fortunes and present condition of the Hawaiian people. To this portion of her subject the second volume is entirely devoted, and the treatment is as full as it is sympathetic. Like the Japanese, and much more completely than the Japanese, the Hawaiians within less than a decade accomplished a complete revolution, not only in their polity, but in their religion, and even in the form of their society. On the death of Kamehameha the Great, his successor, after consultation with the principal chiefs, publicly and ostentatiously broke through the system of tabu, which for countless generations had held the Hawaiians, in common with other Polynesian peoples, enthralled in an oppressive, and visibly useless bondage. The high Priest of the War God luckily sided with the King, and concurred in the abolition of idolatry, as well as of tabu. The heroic defiance of Pélé, the dread Goddess of the Volcanoes, by Kapiolani, a high "chiefess," was in very truth "a grand, brave deed," well worthy of the glowing record Miss Cumming has given of it. The Conservative party took up arms in defence of the deposed gods, and the question of light against darkness was fought out on the shores of Hawaii in November, 1819, when tabu, priestcraft, and idolatry perished for ever out of the land. With this reform, unexampled in the rapidity of its accomplishment and the practical universality of its acceptance, the foreigner had nothing to do; for the terrible moral disorganisation that supervened, the rowdy sailors and strangers that infested Honolulu were, on the other hand, in great measure responsible. Meanwhile, however, the means of deliverance had been shaping themselves, in the person of a "dark-skinned lad," whom some Yale students found crying on a door-step, and who turned out to be a poor, deserted, Hawaiian boy. He was properly cared for, and grew up to be a fervent Christian. Death overtook him before he could carry the Gospel to his countrymen; but the task was taken up by worthy hands, and in 1819, the very year of the revolution, a band of American Missionaries sailed for Hawaii.

* Fire Fountains: the Kingdom of Hawaii, its Volcanoes and the History of its Missions. By C. D. Gordon Cumming. 2 vols., illustrated. Edinburgh and London: Blackwood and Sons, 1882.

The story of their struggles and eventual success is one of the most interesting episodes in the history of Hawaii, the pleasanter to dwell upon, because from the days of Captain Cook up to quite a recent period, the little insular kingdom has had but little reason to bless foreigners. Even the great navigator's treatment of the islanders, who received him with every courtesy, believing him indeed, to be a god—a dignity which he seems to have accepted with great complacency—was harsh and tyrannical, and fully explains, if it does not justify, according to the only code of ethics with which the Hawaiians could then be acquainted, the manner of his death. The French, the Americans, and the English vied with each other in oppressive and ungenerous treatment of this poor and dwindling people, until Admiral Thomas, on July 31st, 1843—the 4th of July of Hawaii—formally established and acknowledged Hawaiian independence. The gradual dying-out of the native population is a curious and not easily explicable fact. Since the visit of Captain Cook, it has dwindled from 400,000 to 50,000 in 1872, and the process is said to continue. It is quite possible that the apparently trivial circumstance of ceasing to oil the body, since the habit of wearing cotton dresses has become established, in a wet and changeable climate, where very different temperatures obtain at different heights, has not a little to do with the great mortality. In adopting European modes of life, again, the islanders are exposed to risks which the lives of their forefathers have not fitted them to meet, and that this may be an efficient cause is shown by the fact that half-castes display much more tenacity of life than the pure-blood natives. Let us hope that the name of the heiress-apparent may be an omen of greater longevity to the race. She is H.R.H. the Princess Victoria-Kawekira-Kaiulani-Lunalilo-Kalau-niuihi-lapa-lapa.

MODERN LANDSCAPE.*

At a time of the year such as the present, when the most general prospect which a Londoner beholds is one uniform yellow expanse of fog, a book upon modern landscape full of illustrations of summer skies and bright sunshine comes as a pleasant reminder that there are better seasons of the year than this dull February. We even feel tempted to forgive the book for its "edition of luxury" form, and to think that the importance of the fact it impresses upon us is a fair reason for cardboard-like paper, gorgeous binding, and scarcity of text. We say scarcity, because though the book is a large and somewhat heavy folio, the print within it is only equivalent in length to an article in a monthly review, and is, indeed, of the same character. We must, however, do Mr. Comyns Carr the justice to say that if he has nothing that is very new to tell us about Titian and Dürer, Claude and Turner, Gainsborough and Chrome, Daubigny and Rousseau, Corot and Millet, Cox and De Wint, Millais and Lawson, he, at all events, talks quietly and easily about them and their works, without much affectation, and with considerable knowledge of their more evident peculiarities. The unreal tone which characterised this gentleman's first writings upon art, has, in a great measure, passed away, and been succeeded by a criticism which is sober and painstaking, even if it be wanting in originality; and it is something gained, at all events, to be as intelligible and plain-spoken as Mr. Carr is in this work, after having lingered so long in the land of "coloured silences," where "perfect women, with their feet on perfect flowers, passed across his fancy as in twilight." But we may at once say that this essay on modern landscape adds nothing to the literature of the subject. It is a pleasantly-written sketch of some landscape-painters, but it has not much consistency or meaning, if taken as a whole. The reader will wonder, perhaps, at the preponderance of the illustrations, and at the fact that there is no special reference to them throughout the text. The reason is, probably, that the whole book is, as is so often the case with éditions de luxe, a compilation from the pages of the French periodical L'Art, of which Mr. Comyns Carr is the English director. If we mistake not, all, or nearly all, of these etchings and woodcuts have appeared previously in the magazine referred to, and very possibly Mr. Carr's essay was also first published in the same place. However, we may be mistaken in this, as there is no hint at republication given on the title-page, which surely should have been done, if both the text and its illustrations were reprinted from the magazine. The illustrations are very unequal in merit, but have nearly all the advantage of being reproductions of good pictures; and as several of the etchings and many of the woodcuts are concerned with the work of French landscape-painters, they will probably be new to most English readers. Even to thorough picture-lovers, the works of Corot, Rousseau, and Daubigny are comparatively little known out of the country in which they were executed; and of the less distinguished members of the school, not even the names are generally remembered. These painters did not form a school, in the ordinary sense of the word, for each was working in a manner individual, original, and personal to himself; but there were certain characteristics of feeling and intention which were alike in all, and the practice was alike at least in this,—that having been acquainted with the traditions of the schools, it was not content with them, but endeavoured to form a tradition for itself. That in this effort, it was, after a desperate struggle, successful, and that from the work of these men sprang the most vital school of French landscape painting, is now tolerably well known, even in England, but few know how hard was the fight for mere existence of these artists. There is, perhaps, no sadder, certainly no sterner, chapter in the history of Art, than that which narrates the story of Millet's life. This is not the place to tell it, but as evidencing the temper of the man toward his art, the following quotation from one of his letters to Alfred Sensier has special interest:—

"But to tell you the truth, the peasant subjects suit my temperament best; for I must confess, even if you think me a Socialist, that the human side of art is what touches me most; and if I could only do what I like, or at least attempt it, I should do nothing that was not an impression from nature, either in landscape or figures. The gay side never shows itself to me. I don't know where it is. I have never seen it. The gayest thing I know is the calm, the silence, which is so sweet, either in the forest or in the cultivated land,—whether the land be good for culture, or not. You will admit that it is always very dreamy, and a sad dream, though often very delicious. You are sitting under a tree, enjoying all the comfort and quiet of which you are capable; you see come from a narrow path a poor figure, loaded with faggots. The unexpected and always surprising way in which this figure strikes you, instantly reminds you of the common and melancholy lot of humanity,—weariness. It is always like the impression of La Fontaine's 'Woodcutter' in the fable:—

'What pleasure has he had since the day of his birth?
Who so poor as he in the whole wide earth?'

Sometimes, in places where the land is sterile, you see figures hoeing and digging. From time to time, one raises himself, and straightens his back, as they call it, wiping his forehead with the back of his hand. 'Thou shalt eat thy bread in the sweat of thy brow.' Is this the gay, jovial work some people would have us believe in? But, nevertheless, it is, to me, true humanity and great poetry!"

This letter gives us the key-note to Millet's art, and to the fascination it has for thoughtful people. His painting enforced certain sadly simple truths, with which half mankind are bitterly acquainted. A peasant himself by birth and training, he felt for and with the peasants, not with the pity of a superior, but the friendship of an equal; and so it is that there came from his hand and heart those pathetically truthful and pathetically lovely pictures which have made his name famous. Here in England we shirk all truths which we cannot remedy. The upper classes must not be made uncomfortable by the too vivid representation of the sorrows and sufferings of those beneath them in the social scale. And so our peasants are bluff, sturdy, honest men, with money in their pockets, and a smile upon their broad faces, who carry a rosy child with one hand, while they lift a mug of beer with the other! So at least our artists tell us. There is literally not a man in England who dares to tell us pictorially the truth about a London "rough," or a Wiltshire labourer, in the way Millet told the truth about French peasants. And it is little to be wondered at that there was at first a wild outcry even in France against one who spoke so violently and so unmistakeably of such unpleasant matters. Had Frederick Walker once seen the truth about the "people" as Millet saw it, we might, perhaps, have had equally grand pictures, for he had an equal sense of beauty with the French painter, and, probably (though it was never developed), almost as much tragic power.

But this is a subject on which we must not dwell, but conclude with a few words upon the chief illustrations here. The worst etching is the one of Corot, which gives not the faintest idea of his beauty; the best is that from the Theodore Rousseau etched by Chauvel. But in truth, none of these are first-rate, nor are they so much etchings in all their essential qualities as engravings. The worst of etchings which attempt to reproduce oil pictures, is that the qualities of spontaneity and freshness, which are amongst the chief charms of good etching, are scarcely to be preserved, and the defects of the process, especially in the rendering of subtle tones of colour and gradations of distance, show very clearly. We are apt to get, in an etching which reproduces an oil landscape, a picture in which the foreground has to be unduly forced in light and shade, in order to get all the gradations possible between it and the extreme distance. The truth is, that the mechanical defects of the process unfit it for such work, and it requires one who has spent his whole life at the business to overcome these shortcomings, and even when they are overcome it is at a loss of the very things which etching should preserve. Of the woodcuts, we can only say that they are very unequal; some are good, some indifferent, and some bad, but on the whole, they are up to the usual average. Now, however, that the English public see what quality and number of woodcuts can be given in a monthly periodical for a shilling, it may be doubted whether they will not soon insist upon having at least as high an average for the illustrations of expensive books.

* Modern Landscape. By J. C. Carr. London: Librairie de l'Art.

TWO ON A TOWER.*

As a general rule, we hold a reviewer is scarcely justified in revealing the purport of any work of fiction upon which he writes. His opinion should be given in such a way as not to destroy the interest of the book for those who read it subsequently to his criticism; in fact, the author should be left to tell his story himself, and not have it compressed into half-a-dozen sentences. But there are exceptions to this, as to all other rules, and we intend to make an exception here. Mr. Hardy is an author who has given us, as he has given most of his readers, great pleasure in several of his books. His fiction is distinguished by an originality and a power which remove him from the ordinary herd of novel-writers, and in his best works he bestows an amount of attention upon the subordinate characters and the local surroundings of his tales such as we can scarcely parallel amongst living writers. Without entering into any description of his general merits, of which we have often spoken, and which are, by this time, quite familiar to most of our readers, we say at once that, in return for much pleasant reading at his hands, we consider the greatest kindness we can show him in the review of Two on a Tower is to tell its story in plain words. If that story so told should prevent any of Mr. Hardy's admirers from reading the book itself, we think the author will have every reason to be grateful to us.

Here, then, first of all, is the story:—The Lady Viviette Constantine is fair to see, and has an unkind and jealous husband, who indulges his jealousy by going to Africa lion-hunting, and leaving her shut up in a lonely country house, pledged to go to no amusement ere he returns. The lady grows solitary and bored, not unnaturally, and for very lack of something to do, ascends to the top of a tower, which stands in the midst of a ploughed field upon her estate. Arrived at the top of this monument, she discovers a youthful philosopher, with a Greek profile, a velvet skull-cap, and corn-coloured curls, studying the stars with an old-fashioned telescope. The Lady Viviette interests herself in this youth, gives him her confidence, a Ross's equatorial, and finally, herself; for, in the meantime, news has come that the lion-slaying husband has died of fever. The Greek astronomer, who is only twenty, and the Lady Viviette, who is eight-and-twenty, conceal their marriage, and visit one another in the most uncomfortable way, for no earthly reason, or at all events for none that Mr. Hardy can explain to us, when there appears upon the scene a deus ex machina, in the shape of a brother who has failed in the diplomatic profession, and also a bishop, who, coming to confirm the villagers, falls in love with the supposed widow, Lady Viviette. Meantime, just before the marriage, a great-uncle of the youthful astronomer dies, leaving him £400 a year, on condition that he does not marry before he is twenty-five. Now follow complication upon complication. The diplomatic brother, who is one of the most incomprehensible idiots it has ever been our luck to come across, after laying various plans to detect his sister's love for the astronomer, and failing in them all, disappears from the scene because she refuses to accept the bishop, who proposes to her by letter as soon as he has returned to the bosom of his diocese. At this moment the local solicitor appears, and informs Lady Viviette that her husband did not die when he was supposed to die, but a year later. Then Lady Viviette discovers that her young astronomer has forfeited the bachelor uncle's £400 a year in order to marry her. The state of matters now stands thus:—Lady Viviette is a widow, not a wife, as her husband was alive when she married again; the astronomer, who is now twenty-one, must disclose his marriage and abandon the £400 a year and re-marry Lady Viviette, or stick to the £400 a year and leave her to her fate. Of course, the lady takes the high-minded course (as she considers it) of refusing to allow her youthful lover to make her the wife legally, that she is morally, and conceals the episode altogether. And so the wife who is no wife, sends her husband who is no husband, away to the Cape, to discover stars and enjoy his £400 a year; and soon after, discovering herself to be enceinte, marries the bishop, and palms off her child upon him as his own. To end the story, the bishop dies, the astronomer returns to marry Lady Viviette; but when she hears his intention, she gives one shriek of joy, and falls dead in his arms.

We may, of course, be quite wrong, but, in our opinion, this is a story as unpleasant as it is practically impossible. There is not, from beginning to end, a single gleam of probability in the plot, and what good end can be served by violating all natural motives in order to produce such unpleasant results we are at a loss to see. But it is not alone in the unpleasant character of the plot, and its forced and unnatural situations, that we think this book so unworthy of Mr. Hardy's reputation. The manner of treatment is even more objectionable. Lady Viviette's passion for Swithin St. Cleeve, which is the main motive of the book, is a study which, in its mingling of passion, religion, and false self-sacrifice, appears to us to approach very near to the repulsive, and the more so, perhaps, for a certain peculiar reticence with which it is dwelt upon. Lady Viviette herself is meant to be very nice, but is so self-contradictory as to lack all reality; she is more of a shadow at the end of the book than she is in the first chapter. The rest of the characters are the merest lay figures; and the rustics, to whose appearance Mr. Hardy has accustomed us, are but the palest shadows of those in Far from the Madding Crowd, &c. That there are throughout the book many little touches delicately descriptive of Nature, and many flashes of quaint village wit, is only to say that it is by Mr. Hardy. He cannot help being impressive when he talks of natural scenery; and no writer has ever conveyed more subtly the silence of the country at night, and the weird suggestiveness of little natural sounds of wind, or beast, or bird, when heard in the absence of human voices. But the book, as a whole, is bad,—the worst the author has written. So much we may say confidently. It is melodramatic without strength, extravagant without object, and objectionable without truth.

We have spoken frankly our opinion of this book, for Mr. Hardy is one of those authors in whom it is not impossible that frank speaking may produce good results. Let us now, as some set-off to our unfavourable opinion of this latest work, quote the passage which describes the meeting of Swithin St. Cleeve with Lady Viviette, on his return to England. It must be remembered that in the interval his early love has been wedded and widowed, and that St. Cleeve's purpose in returning to England is to marry her. He finds Lady Helmsdale (such is now her name) sitting at the top of the old tower, with her (and his) child at her feet.

"'Viviette!' he said. 'Swithin!—at last!' she cried. The words died upon her lips, and from very faintness she bent her head. For, instead of rushing forward to her, he had stood still; and there appeared upon his face a look which there was no mistaking. Yes; he was shocked at her worn and faded aspect. The image he had mentally carried out with him to the Cape he had brought home again as that of the woman he was now to rejoin. But another woman sat before him, and not the original Viviette. Her cheeks had lost for ever that firm contour which had been drawn by the vigorous hand of youth, and the masses of hair that were once darkness visible had become touched here and there by a faint grey haze, like the Via Lactea in a midnight sky. Yet to those who had eyes to understand as well as to see, the chastened pensiveness of her once handsome features revealed more promising material beneath than ever her youth had done. But Swithin was hopelessly her junior. Unhappily for her, he had now just arrived at an age whose canon of faith it is that the silly period of a woman's life is her only period of beauty. Viviette saw it all, and knew that time had at last brought about his revenge."

MR. COURTNEY'S STUDIES IN PHILOSOPHY.*

Of the nine essays which make up this volume, two have already been published, while the others have appeared for the first time. The book may, however, more conveniently be considered in the light of the distinction made on the title-page. Two essays are

* Two on a Tower. By Thomas Hardy. London: Sampson Low and Co.

* Studies in Philosophy, Ancient and Modern. By W. L. Courtney, M.A. London: Rivingtons.

devoted to subjects which are ancient, and seven consider problems of modern philosophy. The essays on "Parmenides" and on "Epicurus" are of a high order, and afford a good example of Mr. Courtney's power of sympathetic insight and critical construction. They are so good, that we are contented with saying so, and we only add our desire that Mr. Courtney would give us more work of the same kind. We need, notwithstanding all that has been done in the interpretation of ancient thought, to have the thoughts and systems of ancient thinkers as they thought them, unmixed and uncoloured by modern speculation. These two essays show that Mr. Courtney has made an unusually near approach to this desirable consummation.

The seven essays on modern subjects are as follow:—"The Failure of Berkeley's Idealism," "A Chapter in the History of the word 'Cause,'" "The New Psychology," "The New Ethics," "Back to Kant," "Kant as a Logician and as a Moralist," and "A Philosophy of Religion." We have given the names of the essays, as it is very difficult for a critic to give a true account or an adequate estimate of the contents of a volume like this. A book which has an inner unity of construction may be fitly criticised by laying hold of that principle,—holding it up to the light, and bringing its validity to the test of a stringent criticism. But separate essays must be dealt with in a separate manner. More particularly is this the case where the essays are themselves critical. No doubt, it will help one even here to know what is Mr. Courtney's point of view, and from what position he looks at the problems here discussed. There is no difficulty in ascertaining Mr. Courtney's philosophical attitude. In the preface, he says,—"The one common feature which runs through them is intended to be a vindication of the Kantian stand-point, as against popular English philosophy on the one side, and the later German metaphysics on the other." Mr. Courtney is, however, Kantian with a difference. He takes, as a valid and permanent contribution to philosophy, only a small part of Kant's work. He throws overboard as valueless the categories, and their deduction and their schematisation, together with the critique of the practical reason. At all events, if he is compelled to choose between the logic and the ethics, he has no hesitation in rejecting the ethics. So, when Mr. Courtney says "Back to Kant," he must be understood to mean back to the Kant which survives after having been subjected to the criticism of Mr. Courtney. This Kant is different from the Kant of Dr. Stirling or the Kant of Professor Caird. If we unite the negative criticisms made from different points of view on one or other parts of the system of Kant, it is surprising to find how little remains of it. This treatment Kant has received not from professed opponents of his teaching, but from professed followers, who look on his work as the turning-point of modern philosophy. On all hands, we find apologies for the master. He erred, we are told, in not being critical enough. He left an element of dogmatism in the very centre of the critical philosophy, dogmatically assumed the distinction between the mind and the world, and supposed that the knowing faculty is roused to exercise by objects which affect our senses. To eliminate this "surd" has been the object of the speculation which may be called Hegelian, the sum of which is that the distinctions of matter and form, of world and mind, are only shifting distinctions, relative to the point of view from which they are contemplated, and to a true theory of knowledge the mind and the world are, in a sense, convertible terms. Criticisms of Kant from this point of view are many and various. Mr. Courtney looks in this direction with a certain wistful desire to find the system true. Of Hegelianism he says:—"These are hard sayings, and it is not within the capacity of the present writer to accept them as saving truths, or stigmatise them as mystical errors." He gets eloquent, however, in the exposition of them. In his criticism of Principal Caird's Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion, his attitude is that of one who is fascinated by the attractions of the theory so gracefully propounded by the learned Principal. He yields himself to the fascination, is drawn on, until he finds himself almost false to his Kantian allegiance, and recovers himself with a start, to mutter that he is still a Kantian. He makes room for one paragraph for the essay on the "Philosophy of Religion":—"As a Philosophy of Religion, these transcendental doctrines are exposed to all the usual difficulties which beset the attempt to make a speculative theory of the divine. One such difficulty is always near the surface: it is to combine in an harmonious whole the historical element of Christianity with the philosophical. Is Christianity a revealed religion? If so, there must be allowed to have occurred once, under conditions of time and space, a serious interruption of the natural history of man's spirit. Is religion explicable as a perfectly normal product of human feelings,—a product which has a history, a development, an evolution? Then the Christian religion must have its place among the incidents of man's natural progress, and the supernatural revelation must disappear. Which alternative must we adopt? There can be no doubt which of the two has found most favour with the philosophers, with all their apparatus of heredity, and descent, and organic development. The natural history of religions has been everything; the supernatural origin of Christianity has been nothing. The historical elements have been quietly ignored, or referred to antecedent spiritual conditions; the philosophical elements have everywhere received due emphasis and elucidation. But according to the interpretation of Principal Caird, we are told that 'the idea of organic development is in no way inconsistent with the claim of Christianity to be regarded as a religion of supernatural or divine origin.' It is as though a man should believe in the Ascidian origin of human beings, and yet believe them to have been divinely created on the sixth day. One cannot pin one's faith equally to the development of species and the Book of Genesis." (pp. 200-1.) On the whole, then, Mr. Courtney finds that the Hegelian dialectic makes too great a demand on his powers of belief; though he has yielded to it more than he seems to know, and we know not how soon he may cross the borderland which separates the Kantian from the Hegelian.

In the criticism of the New Psychology and the New Ethics, Mr. Courtney has been able to assume a freer attitude. The new psychology is that of Mr. G. H. Lewes, while the new ethics is that of Mr. Herbert Spencer. The advance which these thinkers have made on the old methods and results of psychology, is fully recognised by Mr. Courtney. They have applied the methods of the natural sciences to the study of man, and have, as a consequence, been able to admit facts which were strenuously denied by their predecessors. Biology plays a great part in the new psychology. Full justice is done to the merits of Mr. Lewes as a worker in psychology, even when Mr. Courtney cannot agree with his conclusions. Here, for instance, is an admirable statement of the fundamental difference which has always divided the schools:—"The battle of the psychologies rages fiercest round the so-called Forms of Mind. Kant's analysis of experience seems to reveal certain archetypal forms of intelligence, which are presupposed in all possible human knowledge, which are given to experience, and not abstracted from experience. To say as much as this seemed to the opposing school a revival of the doctrine of Innate Ideas, clothed in a clever, but superficial disguise. It involved the impossibility of explaining knowledge without the assumptions of certain activities of thought which, if true, would be fatal not only to such sensationalism as that of Hume and Mill, but also to any material evolution of human intelligence, whether professed by a Darwin or a Herbert Spencer. What, then, was the answer of the Evolutionists? Simply that the so-called mental forms were themselves the product of evolution. That which would explain the gradual birth of Humanity out of Ascidians, could also explain the genesis of certain mental capacities and aptitudes out of the accumulated experiences of generations of men. Thus, the Kantian forms might indeed be a priori to any given individual, but they were none the less a posteriori to the race." (pp. 108-9.) To admit, as Mr. Lewes and Mr. Spencer have been constrained to do, that mental forms are a priori in any sense, is a new departure. They have not been able to explain how accumulation of experience can transform its nature, or how a posteriori experience can become a priori forms of thought. Is it possible to get more out of a thing than was somehow put into it at first, or at some stage of the process? Is not the distinction drawn between the experience of the race and the experience of the individual altogether untenable? This is, however, only one form of the fallacy which passes for truth in many quarters. Evolutionists assume that, if they have time enough, and if the process be slow and gradual enough, anything may become anything else. No rational account is given of the process, or of the gradual steps by which the change was accomplished, nor under what compulsion or by what guidance the result was produced. The only explanation we get is, "It happened so." Nor has any reason been forthcoming yet why the highest rational animal should be a biped, and not a quadruped; should be a land animal, and not one free both of land and sea. Evolution can only say what Mr. Grant Allen says of the elongation of the receptacle in the strawberry,—it was a freak of Nature. We conclude by quoting the last paragraph of the essay on the "New Ethics":—

"It is not easy to picture the mental and social lives of men as the mere development of the physical life, when they appear to be so clearly contradictory of it, and so obviously to curtail, circumscribe, and overpower the privileges of animality. Nor, again, is it at once apparent how Mr. Herbert Spencer can possibly allow that Absolute Ethics precede Relative Ethics; that the ideal truths come first, except on the supposition, which is fatal to the scientific evolutionist, that the end is really implicit in the process; that the evolution requires, so to speak, a prior involution; and that, therefore, there is a hysteron proteron, as in Scientific Psychology, so in Scientific Ethics. But it is undeniable that, in some senses, the newer version of morality speaks smooth things to our ears, things easy to be understood by our common clay. Let us, then, in clear recognition that a long life means not only a happy one, but a moral one, pull down our private barns and build larger, social co-operative ones; and let us say to the tribal soul that it has many goods laid up for many years, that it may eat, drink, and be both selfishly and altruistically merry,—unless, indeed, we have not yet banished the haunting suspicion that somewhere, or somehow, or somewhen, either from Nature or fate, or fortune or God—there may be borne in upon us the intolerable irony of that voice,—'Thou fool.'"
(pp. 133-4.)

STORIES BY AN OLD BOHEMIAN.*

THE "Old Bohemian" has read a good deal, especially of the German literature of the early part of this century, and has picked up a good many stories full of character, and not seldom of psychological interest. These stories he has not taken any very great pains to present in any specially artistic form, but rather prefers to relate them with the straightforwardness of one who tells them chiefly for the sake of the story, and not for the sake of presenting a powerful picture of human life and action. However, he has so keen a mind, and has been so much attracted by stories which throw new light on the secrets of the heart and the understanding, that there are few, indeed, of these stories without a freshness and novelty of their own which separate them from the common run of narratives of this kind. The finest of all—like all the best of them, a German one in origin—"The Old Candidate," is full of genuine pathos, as well as vivacity. The picture of the venerable theological student who could never get any congregation to appreciate his merits, in spite of his having the largest heart and the fullest head in the whole neighbourhood,—a consequence partly of the ugliness of his face, and partly of the grotesqueness of his delivery,—is very striking. But the interest of this story depends too much on the whole narrative, to render it suitable for selection here as illustrative of the "Old Bohemian's" story-telling talents. A better illustration by far is the story called "A Psychological Problem," or that termed "A Strange Witness." Both these are curious in themselves, as well as very skilfully worked out by the author, the interest of the one turning on the secretiveness of insanity and the way in which insane impulses may ally themselves with benevolent and even noble ends, while that of the second turns on the power (now well established by the experience of the newer deaf-and-dumb schools) of catching what is said by others through the eye, instead of the ear, by virtue of the insight gradually obtained into the movements of the lips and muscles of the face. Both stories are told with the utmost vivacity, and a very clear grasp of the central interest which the narrator wishes to develop. The picture of the benevolent old botanist and book-hunter, Professor Tauber, with his hobby for introducing humane slaughter-houses, and his tender friendships for his brother-professors of Leipzig and his various distinguished pupils, is very skilfully drawn; and from the very beginning of the story the reader is well prepared for its striking close. The scene opens with the unaccountable murder of the Baron von Hoheneck, of Rosenau Park, near Leipzig, on a bright July morning, in his own summer-house, without leaving the smallest trace of any struggle, the Baroness being also killed by the excess of her hysterical grief and horror at the event:—

"A careful investigation was at once entered upon. The merest cursory examination of the dead man's head showed unmistakably that the temporal bone on the right had been literally smashed in by a tremendous blow with the broad end of a heavy hammer. The murderer was presumably a strong man, then, and most likely a man of tall stature. Considering the powerful frame and the notorious herculean strength of the late Baron, coupled with the fact that his dagger was found lying bare on the table before him, whilst his double-barrelled fowling-piece was resting quite handy against the right arm of the chair, with both barrels loaded, it was evident that the unhappy man must have been taken altogether unawares, and assailed suddenly by the cowardly assassin. . . . The Professor [Professor Tauber] had been botanising in the wood, when the baron had accidentally met him. They had had a chat together. The professor, it would appear, had just heard that Count Seebach, an old war comrade of the baron's, who was living on his estates near the Saxon capital, had in his possession a fine collection of rare Elzevirs, which he, not much given to books, would not feel disinclined to part with on reasonable terms. So the professor had asked the baron for a few words of introduction to his friend, which Hoheneck had cheerfully promised to bring personally to the professor in Leipzig in the course of the afternoon. This explained the letter which the unhappy man had just begun writing when the assassin struck his foul blow. The professor, unconscious of his friend's sad fate, had returned to his modest bachelor's dwelling in the Katharinen Strasse at about nine. At one in the afternoon he had gone, as was his daily wont, to drink his chopin of wine in the famous old Rathswage Cellar at the corner of Catherine Street. Here he had heard the first of the fearful news, and had at once hastened to Rosenau Park. Professor Tauber had known the baron from childhood. At a later period young Hoheneck had been one of the most eager and attentive auditors at the professor's far-famed lectures on natural philosophy. To the Baroness Maria von Hoheneck, Tauber had been godfather. He had loved both of them with the warm affection of a childless old man; and now they were both dead—carried off suddenly by a startling, overwhelming calamity! No wonder the old man was well-nigh crushed with grief. It was affecting to see him literally throw himself upon the murdered body of his dear friend, which he held in a close embrace, sobbing convulsively all the while, and almost bitterly charging God that he had permitted the perpetration of this foul deed. When the first fierce spasm of his grief had calmed down a little, he fondly patted the cold cheeks and kissed the pale lips of the man who in life had been so near his heart. 'Oh, my beloved George,' he murmured at last, in a semi-conscious state and half dreaming, as one slowly awakening from a frightful nightmare, to find himself face to face with a still more frightful reality, 'dearest and most cherished of all my pupils! this is bitter, most bitter to bear; but it must have been the will of the Almighty, and we can only humbly submit. He knoweth that if all the blood in my old veins could bring back thy dear life, I would joyfully shed the last drop of it. But alas—alas! the past is irretrievably gone from us, and there thou, only just now so full of vigour, liest stark before me, never to rise again on this earth, whilst I, decrepit old man, am left standing sad and desolate to mourn thee. Bitter, ay bitter indeed! Oh, how gladly would I change places with thee! And my darling little Maria also swept away mercilessly!—No, no! God forgive me!—not mercilessly, but mercifully—most mercifully! For what agony would have been hers to suffer and mine to see her suffer it!' This in a fierce burst of passionate grief. 'Nay, nay, thank God this has been spared me!' Then, by a most sudden transition, the man of science, the calm student of Nature, the impassive wielder of the searching scalpel, took the place of the tender, acutely suffering, bitterly bereaved friend. He curiously examined the place where the smashing blow had fallen; then, turning to the professors and physicians around, he exclaimed, almost exultingly:—'This is a great consolation indeed! He could not have suffered even one brief instant's pain. Before the startled nerves could possibly have carried the feeling of the fatal blow to the great centre of consciousness, that centre itself must have been dead to all impression from without. You see, gentlemen, this is a blow such as I have long been endeavouring to recommend for all purposes of slaying, when slaying is absolutely needed. You may see here how much more merciful such a life-annihilating lightning blow as this must be than even decapitation by the guillotine, where there is always the horrid reflection that the brain may continue to feel and to suffer until the last drops of the fluid of life have run out of the severed veins. Our own method of execution by axe or sword is simply horrible, and hanging is positively beastly. No, no; the hammer for me, my own broad-faced hammer, which I decidedly must again petition the town council to adopt in the city slaughter-house.' It was ghastly to listen to the man now set off riding at full speed on his hobby; but every one present felt that it was a merciful thing for him, as it obliterated, for the time being at least, all thoughts of grief and sorrow, and changed the dearly beloved—and, just a brief moment before, so bitterly bewailed—friend into a mere 'subject' to hang a lecture upon the easiest and most painless mode of death!"

The similar and equally mysterious murders which soon succeeded, and the demeanour of Professor Tauber when the supposed murderer is at last caught, are very powerfully delineated, while the close of the story is full of grim vividness. We suppose that the "Old Bohemian" must have had a solid basis of fact for this story; at all events, he produces that impression on the mind of his readers, though he makes no assertion to that effect. It reads like a faithful and very curious study from the many strange records of insanity.

Almost as striking in its way,—indeed, more striking in the minutiae of its effects,—is the story called "A Strange Witness," where the curious consequences of learning what people say by the faculty of sight alone are brought out with great felicity. The reader,—not, of course, knowing the explanation, and misled by the facility of the "Strange Witness's" dialogue,—is greatly puzzled by his singular desire to get a clear view of the faces of the people with whom he talks, which, of course, the reader, like the persons with whom the "Strange Witness" comes into contact, imagines to be due to some curious twist of mind, or possibly to some species of imaginary clairvoyance. It never occurs to the reader that a man who talks so freely and replies so precisely to every question asked of him, should have been quite unable to hear the shot of a revolver, or any remark made by an interlocutor with averted face. As the complete deafness of the "Strange Witness" does not come out till the very end of the story, and as it is on his evidence that the fate of a man accused of murder turns, the contents of his evidence and the lacunae in it present a curious study, the context of which is both unexpected and effective. This piece might, we should think, be made the subject of a very effective play, if an actor could be found to play with subtlety and skill the part of the deaf witness who reads off the remarks which he sees, but hears absolutely nothing.

* Stories by an Old Bohemian. By the Author of "Reminiscences of an Old Bohemian." In 2 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers.

The "Old Bohemian" has a certain humour, as well as an eye for the secrets of character. The story of "Hands and Hearts" is marked by this humour, as well as some portions of the story of "The Old Candidate." Indeed, except, perhaps, "The First Tear" and "Expiation,"—the former a rather vulgar one, the latter a crude story of mistaken identity,—there is hardly a story in either volume which has not some characteristic stamp on it that makes it worth reading as a record of something remarkable, sincerely taken from human character and fate. But the German stories are, on the whole, much the best. The writer is more at home in the characters and domestic life of Germany, than either in the English or the French.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE Nineteenth Century for the month, though it contains no very striking essay, is full of readable papers. Dr. Jessopp gives us a most striking picture of the condition of a Norfolk parish, Rougham, six hundred years ago, when Edward I. was King. Though light in tone, its author declares it compiled from original research into contemporary documents, and its general drift is unmistakable. The majority of the people of Rougham lived in a condition of misery of which their successors have little conception. It was not only that their houses were mere hovels, without windows or chimneys, but only holes to let out the smoke, for Highlanders live happily in such cottages to-day; nor was it that their food was bad, though it was so bad, especially in winter, that skin diseases, and even leprosy, were frightfully common, for low diet is known even now in Western Ireland and the Hebrides; nor was it that clothing was scarce, the people wearing but one garment fastened by a belt, for that was the case also within living memory in the North of Scotland. The people suffered not only from economic causes, but from want of liberty, being bound to the soil by strict laws, from bloody laws intermittently executed with ferocity, and from an extraordinary prevalence of ferocious crime. Within a single hundred, in one year—1285—when the population was as thin as it is now in the wildest part of Cumberland, twelve men and women were murdered, often for a few shillings, five were killed in fatal frays, and five persons committed suicide. The country, in fact, was full of terror,—terror of the landlords, who had all manner of privileges; terror of the King's Justices, who hanged without mercy; and above all, terror of robbers, who butchered undefended people for a little food. The Monasteries had not begun to feed the people, as they did later on; and Dr. Jessopp's conclusion from his researches is, that "the poor had no friends," a fact they occasionally perceived, and resented in risings which were put down by executions. The Duke of Argyll describes "the economic condition of the Highlands" as prosperous and hopeful, except in Lewis, where the numbers of the population have again outstripped the means of subsistence. The Duke holds, in the strongest way, the conclusions of Malthus,—that there is in the human race a breeding-power which, under certain conditions, increases the population, till misery is inevitable until it is again reduced. He attributes the prosperity of the Highlands to the thinning-out of the people, and is evidently inclined to regard emigration as the great natural check which saves nations. He regards the prospect in Germany, for example, where the population doubles in fifty years, with deep alarm, and quotes figures to show that the people are becoming poorer and poorer,—the first cause, we may remark, of the Judenhetze. This poverty is the secret of the great emigration, which, nevertheless, does not keep down the natural increment. There is a basis of truth in what the Duke says, but he states it too unreservedly, and does not sufficiently estimate the increase of industry and of occupations to which increased population gives rise. England is certainly not worse fed since 1815 than it was before, and it is since 1815 that the grand increase of population has taken place. We do not quite understand, either, if he thinks means of subsistence the cause of increase, why he lays so little stress on the facts that in Bengal and Ireland increased numbers have not always checked increased growth. The Malthusian doctrine should work as a self-curing law, and does not, till the catastrophe, actual famine, comes. Dr. Martineau gives us a vivid sketch of the ideas which Mr. Greg expressed in "The Creed of Christendom," in which, as we think, he incidentally preposterously over-states the argument against the Fourth Gospel; and Mr. C. E. Lewis, M.P., puts together some telling figures about the Conservative electoral chances. He is a strong Conservative, but his belief is that these chances amount to nothing, the Liberal majority in England being, he says, 63, and in the three smaller kingdoms 123. That majority will hardly be shaken in England, while in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales it will increase. It might be reduced by the Tories agreeing to a transaction with the Home-rulers, but Mr. Lewis rejects this, and sees no hope whatever, except in the conversion of moderate Liberals and the formation of a new party devoted to preservation and building-up, a pessimist view which we recommend to over-confident Tory agents. The Nineteenth Century also publishes a very instructive paper on the "Unknown Public," the consumers of penny literature, chiefly fiction. Mr. Wright maintains that they are chiefly women, not by any means of the lowest class—never servants—and that their taste is for stories of the sensational kind, stories such as "Ouida" writes, but that it is gradually and rapidly being improved, till he thinks good novels of the lively kind, like Mr. Payn's, would now sell. He writes with knowledge, but we wish he had told us whether it is true, as we have heard, that the proprietors of these serials are themselves extremely puzzled to know what will sell, and are constantly surprised by fluctuations in demand estimated by themselves in hundredweights. An account of the stories which fail in this way and stop would be more instructive than accounts of those which succeed. We note, as a curious feature in the account, that when Mr. Wright himself studied these stories, the most successful were all marked by a single feature, the appearance of a fascinating poisoner as the demon and motive-power of the story, who cut all knots, and made the rich all-powerful. One would have thought that was French, and we should like to know if no suspicion ever crossed Mr. Wright's mind of what "dramatists" call adaptation.

The interest of the Contemporary consists chiefly in the paper on "Democratic Toryism," by Mr. Forwood, noticed elsewhere; in a highly suggestive, but not very deep, paper on the religious future of the world, by Mr. W. S. Lilly, which leaves on us, we confess, the single impression that "totum finit in mysterium;" and two most thoughtful articles on Gambetta. The first, by M. Gabriel Monod, is, on the whole, eulogistic. Admitting Gambetta's southern nature, his extreme ambition, and his irregular private life, M. Monod holds that he was a sincere patriot, utterly incorruptible in pecuniary matters—he repeatedly rejected millions, once when he was in financial straits—wonderfully free from rancour—he, for instance, made his bitter enemy, M. Lanfrey, a Prefect, and allied himself with M. Thiers, who had called him a fou furieux—a superb orator, and by his genius and ascendancy over men a reserve force for France. He was, says M. Monod, essentially a Conservative,—a statement curiously confirmed by the friend who sketches him in the Fortnightly, and who declares him no enemy to the Church, though personally a Comtist of the Littré school. On the contrary, he kept up almost a friendship with Monsigneur Czaccki, the Papal Nuncio, his true feeling being rather Erastianism gone mad, than hostility to religion. The State was to him all in all, a Church as well as a country, and he would tolerate no independence of it in any shape. This view also is not inconsistent with the gossip but valuable account of him presented in the Cornhill. The other sketch in the Contemporary is hostile, written by a German, who resents the needless defence of France after Sedan, the elevation of new couches sociales to power—the writer evidently agrees with the Elector of Hesse, that "brewers shan't govern"—and the mismanagement of the Chamber. He considers Gambetta no loss, either to France or Europe, and gives him credit only for his wonderful eloquence. The attack is able, but leaves behind the feeling that had Gambetta been a well-born man, the writer's estimate of him would have been very different. Mr. Quilter exalts Rossetti once more, but he brings into unusually strong relief one element in the painter's character which is too often forgotten, his entire indifference to the impression his pictures created. He painted what was in him to paint, without a thought for the outside world, and in that isolation lay his power, as also the limitation which ultimately fettered and, as we think, impaired it. Like most secluded men, Rossetti became his own slave, utterly unable to get out of his own personality and the circumstances which "forced him into one groove of thought and held him there like a vice." Professor Boyd Dawkins's argument that early peoples invaded Britain across the Silver Streak will hardly reconcile their descendants to the Channel Tunnel, any more than his assertion that "the sea is an element of weakness, offering avenues of attack to our enemies on every side." If that is true, so much the more reason for not giving those enemies a second and dry road of access.

The Fortnightly, besides the able sketch of Gambetta quoted above, has a curious paper by Mr. H. D. Traill, a dialogue in the shades between Lord Westbury and Bishop Wilberforce, which will be read with pleasure by all who enjoy satiric literature. It is exceedingly clever, full of steel-pointed little sentences, and delightfully free from reticence; but we cannot say that we find in it much wisdom. Mr. Traill has reproduced Lord Westbury perfectly—who but he could have said, "To really relish the Papacy from the point of view of the ruling ecclesiastical class, one ought to be Pope oneself," or have defended Infallibility, because "the solo has natural advantages over the chorus, if only that it leaves less doubt about the tune"?—but the Bishop is not equally well painted. Dr. Wilberforce would have held his own far better in a discussion about the Church, and have proved, we think, that some of Lord Westbury's sarcasms were baseless, even if he had not answered an argument which we confess we find vague. Is it Mr. Traill's position that Erastianism is a wretched system, but the only one under which the English Church can flourish? Sir G. W. Daseant's friendly account of Dr. Wilberforce is interesting, even after all recent discussions, and he adds at least one good story to the long list of which the Bishop has been the occasion:—

"Once only in our own recollection do we remember the Bishop of Oxford silenced by a rejoinder. In general, after he appeared to have spent all his shafts, he had still one bitter arrow left to pierce his foe. It was at a meeting for the restoration of the Chapter House at Westminster, now, thanks to the liberality of Mr. Gladstone, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, most beautifully restored, but then in a deplorable state of ruin. All present were agreed that the building must be restored; but where was the money to come from? 'Certainly not from us,' cried the Dean and Chapter. 'Our Chapter House was taken away from us by King Edward I. It is no child of ours. We look upon it altogether as a damnosa hereditas.'—'That being so,' said a very insignificant person at the meeting, 'why should not the Ecclesiastical Commission restore it?'—'Ah!' said the Bishop, with a sneer, 'that is a cow which everybody wishes to milk.'—'Yes, my lord,' retorted that very insignificant person; 'but you cannot deny that it is a cow which eats an enormous quantity of grass,'—and the Bishop was speechless."

The Rev. T. W. Fowle fights for an immediate Reform Bill, with arguments which are just enough, as, for example, that the rural population ought to have its say about county government, and that the Reformed Parliament will move with greater energy, but which do not bring conviction. The truth is that every question of interest has been so set aside for Ireland and Irish Obstruction, that human nature resents the idea of further delay, even to carry a necessary and righteous Reform Bill. The present instrument can do certain things, and let us do them, before we furbish up another. Mr. Fowle says we may lose the opportunity, but we do not believe that the reign of Liberalism will be limited to the Gladstone period, or that the resistance to reform will be really desperate. The Tories at heart all think that for them matters could hardly be worse than they are. We have read with interest Mr. Jesse Collings' view of Russian politics, after his journey there. Mr. Collings, for some reason or other, is supposed to be so "wild" that it is a surprise to find his essay not only vigorous, but very temperate, and in its suggestions slightly Philistine. Mr. Collings' view of Russian affairs is the one usually entertained by well-informed persons, with the difference that he holds the Russians to have been trained to freedom by their communal self-management, and that he thinks the remedy for Nihilism is a "Constitutional" Government. We doubt whether the effect of serfage is yet out of the Russian blood, and would much rather see the autocracy endure for a time, instructed by a free Parliament and Press, and fettered by a fundamental law securing to every individual his personal and individual liberty. Mr. Collings puts forward the idea that by possibility the Army may take the lead in demanding a Constitution. That has been the dream of every Russian Revolutionist, but as yet the Army, though it has often turned the policy of the Czars, has never declared against them. The arrests occasionally reported only prove that certain officers are Liberals of an extreme type.

Blackwood, besides the continuation of "The Ladies Lindores"—one of the best stories Mrs. Oliphant has written, and almost equal in interest to her supernatural story now going on in Macmillan, a story so far absolutely original—has a very short sketch of Anthony Trollope, from which we take the following anecdote:—

"This was how it happened. I was writing a note at a table in the Athenæum, when two men came in, and settled themselves at each side of the fireplace; one had a number of 'The Last Chronicle of Barset' in his hand, and they began discussing the story. 'Trollope gets awfully prosy,' said one of the critics; 'he does nothing but repeat himself,—Mrs. Proudie—Mrs. Proudie—Mrs. Proudie,—chapter after chapter.'—'I quite agree with you,' replied the other, 'it is Mrs. Proudie ad nauseam; I am sick to death of Mrs. Proudie.' Of course, they did not know me, so I jumped up and stood between them. 'Gentlemen,' I said, 'I am the culprit—I am Mr. Trollope—and I will go home this instant and kill Mrs. Proudie.' In the very next page, accordingly, the weak and persecuted Bishop is made actually to pray for the removal of the masterful partner who has brought so much grief and humiliation upon him; and hardly has the tragic prayer been uttered, than he is made aware of its fulfilment."

There is also a paper, stupidly enough entitled "A New Winter Resort," which is all new matter. It is a sketch of Haifa, the seat of the new colony founded in Syria, just below Carmel, by a German heresiarch, Mr. Hoffman, who, with his followers, hold that the world is to be converted to Christ, and the advent of the Messiah to be brought near, not by preaching Christianity, but by men leading lives governed by Christ's teaching. When a community lives up to the Christian law, the Messiah may come. The sect endeavours so to live, and three hundred of them cultivate olives under Carmel, "doing a good stroke of business with Nazareth," and dwelling righteously in their clean, commodious village, among the Moslem, who, the writer says, used to swindle them, but now respect them greatly, and copy their agriculture, and aid them in it. The founder, Mr. Hoffman, now lives near Jerusalem, and the community has adopted no special law either of property or life. It strives only to live up to Christianity, a form of fanaticism which, in these days of Anarchists and Fenians, is a positive refreshment to the weary observer. The whole paper is most interesting, containing, as it does, in addition to the history of this colony, an account of Carmel as it is, with all its monks.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Pompey's Peril. Written for the Zoophilist by Mrs. Cashel Hoey. (Published by the Society for the Protection of Animals from Vivisection.)—This is a story full of liveliness and humour, in which the hero, "a certain wiry-haired terrier, yellowish of colour, playful of disposition, tender and true of character, with soft, brown eyes," runs the greatest possible risk (from which he is only just saved) of being betrayed into a physiological laboratory. Pompey belongs to a coachman in a Kensington mews. How admirably Mrs. Hoey enters into Pompey's character, the following brief passage from his master's description of him will show:—

"He's that knowledgeable," said Dick Traynor, one day, with pride, to a credible witness, 'I'd a'most trust him to count the corn-sacks, and as for tramps! None of your song-book and fortune-telling customers makes off with my horse-cloths if Pompey is about, and he generally is. Blest if he don't think he's got the whole Mews to look after. Pliceman X we call him at home. Why, there's our Bessy, that dog's as partic'lar about her going to school as the Board visitor herself,—couldn't make out why she was kep' at home when she had her throat bad, and fetched her basket off the shelf to my missis, to have her bit of lunch put in it, reg'lar. We got it all ready one day, and he started off with it in his mouth, and stood waggin' his tail, most comical, at the bottom of the Mews—but when he found it was no go, and had been imposed on, he came back a trailin' his tail in the mud, and down-hearted and disappointed than a Christian. 'Don't deceive him any more, father,' says our Bessy, 'it cuts into his feelin's, and it hurts his pride; isn't he just tellin' us that with his eyes?'—and so he was. You mightn't believe it if you didn't see it, but Pompey, he brought back the basket and dropped it on the floor just under the shelf, and down he lay with his tail straight out and his nose along of his paws, saying nothing to nobody, and even a bone wouldn't bring him round for ever so long."

The Zoophilist does well to enliven its interesting pages with such stories as this, which, without harrowing the soul, really shows in the most practical form the profound inhumanity of a practice which so many physicians now assure us is not only admissible, but highly laudable, and the agitation against which they describe as both mischievous and absurd. Mrs. Hoey has given to her little tale genuine force and brightness.

Songs and Rhymes, English and French. By Walter Herries Pollock. (Remington.)—There is much grace in some of these verses, but also not as much substance as there ought to be in verses that are to take hold of the mind, except in the rare cases where the perfection of form is so remarkable that the substance hardly matters. Mr. Pollock's verses are graceful, but not graceful up to this point,—graceful rather with the grace of a mind that can feel beauty keenly itself, but can hardly make others feel it adequately. The French poems show a remarkable command of French turns of thought and expression.

A Flight to Mexico. By J. J. Aubertin. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—As the author of this record of a short visit to Mexico was able to converse with the natives in their own language, he, of course, gained many interesting particulars which would have escaped an ordinary traveller. But the facts which give a special interest to the book, and which could have been gained in no other way, are those relating to the last days of the unfortunate Maximilian. He was shown the fatal spot, a small mound just outside Queretaro, where he and his two companions suffered death; and he heard from the lips of officers concerned in the military part of the affair, and from the confessor who gave him spiritual consolation, many most affecting details. Yet with all his interest in Maximilian, and compassion for his untimely end, the author thinks he can trace to a certain feebleness and vanity in the Emperor's mind, a good many of the untoward circumstances by which he was thwarted. There are several illustrations of buildings and landscapes in Mexico which, though not very fine specimens of art, yet help, with the author's vivid descriptions, to take one with him through the country. There are many interesting little bits of information about other places visited by the author, who does not aim to do more than to gossip pleasantly with his readers about anything of which he is reminded by the objects on his route. He seems to give a good idea in this way of engineering difficulties in Mexico, by comparing them with those of Brazil. The only drawback to an otherwise instructive and entertaining book is found when the author allows himself to sneer at the faith of those who do not share his scepticism.

Celin Clout's Calendar. By Grant Allen. (Chatto and Windus.)—Here are thirty-nine picturesque studies of hedgerow, moor, and forest, of stream, field, orchard, and garden. Mr. Grant Allen, the "Evolutionist at Large," discourses pleasantly and profitably of many of the beautiful and curious sights which the country-side affords from April to October. While his sketches, or rather pictures, are gracefully and sympathetically drawn, they reveal everywhere a keen insight into the meaning of nature. He has been most successful in placing the results of recent researches in evolution before cultivated, but non-scientific readers. Nor is the volume before us without original matter, for Mr. Grant Allen has added observations and arguments of his own to the facts and reasonings of Wallace, Darwin, and other workers. It would be hopeless to attempt an analysis of these essays, in a brief notice like the present; but we may at least say that if any one wants to know something of the secrets which Nature has been lately forced to reveal, he cannot do better than read the essays which treat of such subjects as the following.—The Primrose, Swallows, the Trout-jump, the Green Leaf, Clover-blossoms, the Mole at Home, White Rabbits and White Hares, Scarlet Geraniums, the Origin of Grouse, and Some American Colonists. Not that most of the other pictures are not well worth attentive study, but we are obliged to make a selection from the copious and varied Table of Contents. We do not suppose every one will agree with Mr. Allen in each and all of his theories, explanations, and judgments. Some naturalists will think that he neglects some of the objective causes of the variations observed in plants and animals,—their physical environment, for instance. Some lovers of colour will demur to his low estimate of the beauty of almond-blossom and other masses of spring bloom on leafless boughs (p. 33). Some botanists will decline to admit the correctness of his statement concerning the wind-fertilisation of all the cereals (p. 63), and the value of the Cirencester experiments on transmutation among grasses. And if Mr. Allen will take a few crystals of the beautiful substance asparagine, and crunch and munch them till they have all dissolved, we fancy he will no longer be of opinion (p. 186) that he can call this compound the "essential flavouring principle" of asparagus. Probably there is no easily soluble substance which is so perfectly devoid of flavour as asparagine. But each of these studies is so carefully wrought, and the authorities consulted in their preparation so recent and so trustworthy, that we do not think that many slips, even of the most trivial kind, can be found in the book before us. We should add that the papers in this volume are reprinted from the St. James's Gazette. It is certain that they deserved republication in a more handy and permanent form, for we know that they attracted much attention as they originally appeared.

The appearance of the Revised Version of the New Testament has let loose an army of discontented writers. At first they confined themselves to sharp and distant criticism; they are now coming to close quarters with hostile versions of their own. Of such is the Life and Letters of St. Paul, by Dr. Dawes. (Longmans, Green, and Co.)—The author's original desire to translate was occasioned by the remark of a sick man, who stopped his clergyman's advice to faith and repentance by saying, "Oh, Sir, if you understood yourself the Gospel you preach, you would know that the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." The fact that the Revisers only made a marginal attempt to meet this sick man's difficulty has procured for us the publication of Dr. Dawes' book, for he thinks this instance of conservatism only one of many failures to remove the hard sayings which offend God's little ones. Consequently, we are presented with the Epistles of St. Paul in a colloquial form, which professes, according to Mr. Kennedy's canon for a good translation,—“that it may be read with pleasure, or at least without difficulty.” The present may indeed be read without difficulty of a certain kind; but as to the pleasure, that is a matter of taste, not always determined by the easy flow of language.—The New Testament Scriptures in the Order in Which They Were Written, by the Rev. Dr. Hebert (Henry Froude), is another attempt in the same direction; but this is motivated by discontent with the text rather than with the translation of the Revisers, and by a desire—laudable in its degree—to place the books of the New Testament in their chronological order. But we demur, as a matter of principle, in this age of scholarship, to any version founded on the arriéré text of 1611. As this instalment, however, of Dr. Hebert's book only represents the six earliest letters of St. Paul, the faults of the old text are not very prominent, though among them is the weak interpolation in Romans xiv., 6, "He that mindeth not the day, to the Lord he mindeth [it] not."—On the other hand, in the Origin and History of the New Testament (Hodder and Stoughton), we have Mr. James Martin of Melbourne, Victoria, cordially accepting the results of the Revision. He has been led to expand a lecture on "The Written Word" into a volume of 250 pp., which describes the occasion of each book of the New Testament, the collection of them into a Canon, the fortunes of the chief Greek manuscripts, the nature of the various versions, the origin and characteristics of the eight English translations which preceded the Authorised Version, and lastly, the reasons which have justified a revision. The whole seems to be done in an instructive and genuine way.—A New Metrical Translation of the Hebrew Psalter, by W. D. Seymour, Q.C., LL.D. (Longmans, Green, and Co.), is an adventure into perilous regions, especially on the part of one who tells us that his acquaintance with Hebrew roots and stem-words, vowel-points, and reading-signs is not as deep as he could wish. Would any one venture to preface a translation of the Epistle to the Romans with such a naïve confession as to the state of his Hellenistic Greek? And yet the language of the Old Testament does not seem to be thought one of those matters wherein "a little learning is a dangerous thing." The apology for the metrical form of the book consists in a quotation of the apologetic preface to Keble's version made in 1839. But is not the omen rather a sad one? Can that version be said to have lived? Will this, therefore, live, under the shadow of its sanction? This opening verse of Psalm xlv. shows fairly enough the quality of the sing-song rub-a-dub which we are asked to take in place of the solemn and musical rhythm of the Bible and Prayer-book:—

"We have heard it, O God, with our ears,
And our fathers the story have told,
What a work Thou hast wrought in the years
That are growing historic and old;
How, the heathen expelled by thy hand,
Thou didst establish our sires in their place,
How Thy measures of vengeance were planned
To uproot an idolatrous race."

Familiar Lectures on the Physiology of Food and Drink. By R. J. Mann, M.D. (Ward, Lock, and Co.)—This is an interesting book, which, after our first cursory inspection, we felt inclined to praise highly. Indeed, the greater number of the lectures here printed deal with important physiological processes in the human body not only clearly, but accurately. The blood, its functions and circulation, the liver and secreting organs, the structure of muscles and nerves, and the action of the kidneys and the skin, are discussed in a popular, yet satisfactory manner. Much of what is said about alcohol and the effects of intemperance may be similarly commended. But on submitting many of the more purely chemical statements in this volume to careful examination, we find that they are obsolete or inaccurate, while much of the vegetable physiology here offered must be condemned for the same reasons. Thus, on page 15, we find the extraordinary statement that all the solid matter of vegetation is derived from water absorbed by the roots, although the carbonic acid introduced by the foliage and other green parts is, in fact, the chief source of the substance of plants. The origin of all the nitrogen of vegetation is wrongly assigned to ammonia on page 37, where, moreover, the weight of ammonia conveyed annually to the ground in rain is enormously exaggerated. Then, again (page 29), a pair of human lungs is said to give out into the air, in a single hour, no less than 586 grains of carbon; one-fourth of this quantity would be nearer the truth. It is a pity that errors such as these should disfigure a book which in plan and style presents many commendable features.

Alasnam's Lady. By Leslie Keith. (Bentley.)—There is too much of this novel, and of that too-muchness, talk has an undue share. But the author will do things worth doing, if she cultivates the art of pruning, and is remorseless in its exercise. Her heroine is charming; but she might have married the good fellow with brains (indeed, we took him for Alasnam, until quite near the end), without prejudice to the story; the mystery is well contrived, though transparent, and the local colour is fresh, pleasant, and characteristic. It is quite a treat to be taken to Spain in a novel; we are as tired of the Riviera as Sir Charles Coldstream was of everywhere.

Cavalry Life. By J. S. Winter. (Chatto and Windus.)—When Mr. Winter claims to be the true exponent of military life, he probably means that Ouida and her imitators are among the number of those "charming women" who "talk of things they do not understand," and that he is, on the contrary, acquainted with "the way they have in the Army." He is welcome to the credit, so long as he does not claim to shew us military life as Maxwell, Lever, and Lawrence have shown it to us. His "Cavalry Life" is a collection, in two big volumes, of flimsy stories, some of them amusing, others as heavy as the dragons whose dreary talk they chronicle. A young lady is not to be made impressive by spelling her name (Alice) "Alys," and we should seriously like to know what Mr. Winter means by "obtuse self-blindness."

POETRY.—The Garden of Fragrance, being a Complete Translation of the Bostân of Sâdî into English Verse. By J. S. Davis, M.D. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—None but a good Oriental scholar can judge the whole question as to the value of such a translation as this; but in his remarks on the principles to be followed in translations in general, we cannot but think the translator of these poems greatly mistaken. He says in his preface:—"I have endeavoured to make it as literal as possible, and, by imitating Sâdî's metre (anapestic tetrameters) and rhyme, to give it, in some measure, the ring of the original. With very few exceptions, each line is the equivalent of the corresponding line in the Persian. This has not been accomplished without sacrificing, to some extent, elegance of diction." In our opinion, the translator has sacrificed a good deal more than that. When languages, even coming originally from the same fountain-head, have, in the long course of ages, diverged as widely as have English and Persian, it is fatal not only to the beauty, but to the sense of a translation, to make it a literal one. We take, at random, a proof of the truth of this from a short poem "On the Frailty of Creatures and the Glory of God," p. 137. It begins,—

"The pathway to wisdom is twist upon twist,
For the holy the Maker alone can exist.
You can tell this to people who truths recognise,
But people of theory will criticise."

Then, after a few lines, these words occur:—

"But when will mere surface-observers obtain
A glimpse of where spiritual prisons remain?
For if it's the sun, not a speck they decry;
If the whole seven seas, not a drop can they spy;
When the Sultan of glory his flag has unfurled,
Into Nullity's collar collapses the world!"

The merely narrative parts sound a little better than this twaddly sing-song, and there are some good stories, of the obviously moralising kind, set in thoroughly Eastern style; but, on the whole, it is a poor book, as, with such a principle of translation, it must be true to the letter only.—Prizes and Proximes for Prose and Verse Translation, with Some Original Poems by Contributors to the Journal of Education. (John Walker and Co.)—The translations in this book, following, as we hold it to be, the true principle of grasping the spirit rather than the letter of the original, are much more pleasant reading, and some of them strikingly good. A ballad such as "Les Souvenirs du Peuple," of Béranger, is most difficult to render into English so as to keep some of the sparkling intensity of feeling thrown into its original French by that master of the ballad style. Yet the anonymous "J. R." has accomplished this, and we only regret it is too long for quotation. Another very happy effort is the version of Victor Hugo's sonnet, "A Petite Jeanne," by Mrs. J. S. Philpotts. There are in the volume three translations of this sonnet, and, though all are good, we prefer, with the compiler, the one first named. There is an excellent rendering, by Miss Annie Matheson, of "In der Ferne," by Geibel; and "Schönster Tod" is also very spiritedly rendered in the English of the Rev. James Robertson, from the verses of W. Müller.

It is an interesting collection, and to show how miscellaneous, we will conclude our notice with one or two of the "Maxims on Education":—

"He who depends upon a child's candour is likely to find the virtue on which he relies; he who assumes a child's dishonesty will too often sow the germs of that which he fears. To treat children as unworthy of consideration is a cruel mistake; to behave as if they alone were to be considered is a mistake more cruel still."

—Songs of Many Days. By K. C. (Marcus Ward and Co.)—The motto of this little volume of poems is, "Look, then, into thine heart, and write" and the wish rises in the mind of the reader of them that the author's heart had been full of less saddening tales. Several of them are classical in their origin, and the first especially, on the legend of the daughters of Proetus, who were stricken with madness for despising the worship of Dionysus, scarcely repays by beauty of style for the melancholy of the subject. "Antigone" is the subject of the second, and neither here nor in any of the others can we find lines sufficiently fine to invest a well-worn subject with new interest, though many of the poems read musically.—Storm-drift, and other Poems, by H. E. Clarke (David Bogue), is, as its name imports, a book full of horrors, not the least of these being the atmosphere of unbelief in which it seems to have come to light, if, indeed, we can mention light in the midst of such gloom. The author needs to be reminded that no stringing-together of wild and weird suggestions can by itself constitute poetry, and that it needs more than the power, which he possesses to a certain extent, of imagining the thoughts and feelings suitable to certain circumstances, to give to a description a truly poetic form. We hope it was not the author, but the printer, who put "wrapt" for "rapt."

—The Praise and Blame of Love is got up in the unfinished style now prevalent, and the poems themselves seem to partake of it; they are fragmentary, and spoilt by affectations. The author's name is not given, but the publishers are (Wilson and McCormick, Glasgow) evidently Scotch, a fact which the book itself would hardly have suggested.—A smaller volume, and quite unlike the former, is Poems, by Alexander Carruthers. (Porteous Brothers, Glasgow.)—The sentiments appear, as far as they do appear, to be of the best; but there does not appear with them the poetical skill, either in form or style, which alone can justify the publication of them.—In the next book which presents itself, we have the effusions of a mind which has already made itself known to the public. Still, in Poems, Lyrics, and Sonnets, by L. S. Bevington (Eliot Stock), we fail to discover the merit which would justify high appreciation. The vague miserableness which seems to beset those who are called advanced thinkers runs riot everywhere, and is scarcely redeemed by the little flashes of genuine truth of feeling which are apparent here and there. We have looked through the "Sonnets" for one to quote, that our readers may judge for themselves, but cannot find one worthy of transcription; so we will give, instead, two verses from a short poem called, "How do I Know?" which is far better than the long philosophical rhymings amidst which it stands:—

"How do I know you good? Because, dear love,
In needing you
My inmost soul most urgently desires
Great goodness too;
Pure skies alone can win a turbid sea
To perfect blue.
One little, lovely victory for your sake,
O'er my mad blood,
One little hour when higher than myself
I knew I stood,
One stillness, dear, has taught the blessed truth
My love is good."

We have received:—The Continent of Europe, by L. B. Lang, edited by the Rev. M. Creighton, M.A. (Rivingtons), a geography, physical, political, and descriptive, for beginners, with maps.—Damascus and its People, by Mrs. Mackintosh, illustrated. (Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.)—A second edition of Theodore Compton's Sketches of Rural Life and Scenery amongst the Mendip Hills. (Poole.)—Student's Manual of German Literature, by E. Nicholson. (Swan, Sonnenschein, and Co.)—The Science of Existence: a Study, by K. F. Fröbel. (Williams and Norgate.)—Beautiful Homes, by Mrs. Haweis. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Bible Studies in Life and Truth, by the Rev. R. Lorimer, M.A. (Douglas, Edinburgh.)—A Comprehensive Phraseological English-Ancient and Modern Greek Lexicon, founded upon a manuscript of G. P. Lascarides, and compiled by L. Myriantheus, Ph.D. Two vols. (Trübner.)—The Policy of England in Relation to India and the East, by J. A. Partridge. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Vols. I. and II. of the eleventh edition of Bloxam's Principles of Gothic Ecclesiastical Architecture; also a "Companion" to the same work. (Bell and Sons.)—Physical Optics, by R. T. Glazebrook, M.A., F.R.S. (Longmans and Co.), an addition to the "Text-books of Science" series.—A third edition of the late Mr. G. Brimley's Essays, edited by W. G. Clark, M.A. (Macmillan.)—The Book of Enoch, translated from the Ethiopic, by Rev. G. H. Schodde, Ph.D. (Trübner.)—Stories from Robert Browning, by F. M. Holland, with an introduction by Mrs. Sutherland Orr. (Bell and Sons.)—Etyma Graeca, an etymological lexicon of Classical Greek, by E. R. Wharton, M.A. (Rivingtons.)—Smith's Synonyms Discriminated, edited by the Rev. H. P. Smith, M.A. (Bell and Sons), a new edition of a useful work of reference that ought to find a place in every mechanics' institute or free library.—Vol. IV. of Messrs. Stewart and Long's translation of Plutarch's Lives (Bell and Sons), an addition to the neatly got-up "Bohn's Standard Library" series.—Vol. III. of Professor Plumptre's translation of the late Dr. Hagenbach's History of Christian Doctrines (Clark, Edinburgh), an addition to the "Foreign Theological Library."—The Philosophy of the Upanishads and Ancient Indian Metaphysics, as exhibited in a series of articles contributed to the Calcutta Review, by A. E. Gough, M.A. (Trübner), an addition to the "Oriental Series."—An English translation of Rosmini's Discourses. (Duffy and Sons.)—The Foundations of Morality, by Stanley Leathes, D.D. (Hodder and Stoughton), a series of discourses on the Ten Commandments, with special reference to their origin and authority.—Vol. I. of a translation of the third edition of Schmidt and Holzendorff's Commentary on the New Testament, by F. H. Jones, B.A. (Williams and Norgate.)—Shakespeare's Historical Plays, Roman and English, by C. Wordsworth, D.C.L., Bishop of St. Andrew's. Vol. I. (Blackwood and Sons.)—A Concordance to the Revised Version of the New Testament, by J. A. Thoms. (Allen and Co.)—A second edition of Jervise's History and Traditions of the Land of the Lindsays, by J. Gammack, M.A. (Douglas, Edinburgh.)—A Short History of "the People called Methodists," by the Rev. W. H. Daniels, A.M., revised, with preface, by the Rev. T. Smith. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—A popular edition of the Life and Speeches of John Bright, by G. B. Smith, with portraits. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Vol. V. of the Folklore Record. (Nichols and Sons.)—A Concise Irish Grammar, translated from the German of E. Windisch by N. Moore, M.D. (Cambridge University Press.)—Second Latin Reading-book, by G. L. Bennett, M.A. (Livingtons), a continuation of "Easy Latin Stories for Beginners."—Water and its Teachings, by C. L. Morgan, F.G.S. (Stanford.)—An eighth edition of the Civil Service Geography, edited by T. Gray. (Crosby Lockwood and Co.)—Handbooks for Bible Classes, edited by the Rev. M. Dods, D.D., and Rev. A. Whyte, D.D. ("Genesis." (Clark, Edinburgh.)—A new edition of Ferguson and "Genesis." (Clark, Edinburgh.)—The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by W. A. Holdsworth. (Routledge and Sons.)—Electric Light Arithmetic, by R. E. Day, M.A. (Macmillan.)—A new edition of George Barlow's A Life's Love. (Remington.)—A Grammar of the Modern Spanish Language, by W. J. Knapp, Professor in Yale College. (Gian, Heath, and Co., Boston, U.S.)—A third edition of Main's Rudimentary Astronomy, revised by W. T. Lynn (Crosby Lockwood and Co.), being No. 96 of "Weale's Series."—Illustrated Handbook of Plain and Fancy Needlework; Good Plain Cookery, by Mary Hooper. (Ward, Lock, and Co.)—Platt's Essays, Vol. I., "Business, Money, Economy." (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.)—Cutting Tools Worked by Hand and Machine, by R. H. Smith, Professor of Engineering in the Mason Science College, Birmingham (Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co.), an addition to the "Manuals of Technology" series, edited by Professor Ayrton, F.R.S., and R. Wormell, D.Sc., M.A.—And a number of volumes on Biblical and doctrinal subjects, published by the Religious Tract Society.—A Little Pilgrim in the Unseen. (Macmillan.) We noticed this "wistful attempt to follow a gentle soul which never knew doubt into the New World, and to catch a glimpse of something of its glory through her simple and childlike eyes," as the record of it appeared in instalments in Macmillan's Magazine. It was well worth republication.—The Life of Hannah More, by Anna J. Buckland. (Religious Tract Society.) This book is written with both spirit and judgment, and is calculated to place in her true light the "high priestess of the Clapham Sect," who has been somewhat under-rated of late, just as she was formerly over-rated.—The Decisions of Speaker Denison, by Edward Gordon Blackmore. (J. Spiller, Adelaide.) This little manual of fifteen years' Parliamentary decisions was drawn up for South Australian use, but it might be of service here, while yet our Rules of Procedure have to be tried.—The Eight Circulars of Auguste Comte. (Trübner.) This translation, which is well done, will be deeply interesting to all who wish to know Positivism exactly as it is.—Old Friends, by the Rev. Charles Leach. (Dickinson.) This is a collection of Sunday half-hour lectures to working people. Mr. Leach means well, and couches his sentiments in language calculated to go home to his Birmingham audience. This is his style of appeal.—"My dear, good woman, as you value your own welfare and happiness, have loving voices to welcome Bob, or Jim, or Harry; and if you give him a kiss I won't grumble."—Round a Posada Fire. (Satchell and Co.), by Mrs. S. G. C. Middlemore. We cannot say much for this collection of Spanish legends. They seem poor, and the illustrations are sadly blurred.—The Scriptures Half-hour at Mothers' Meetings (Religious Tract Society); and Readings and Devotions for Mothers (Wells Gardner). Both these books seem excellent in their different ways.—Thoughts on Marriage, by Elizabeth Kingsbury (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.), seem decidedly more suited for ordinary male than female reading.—Wells of Water, by M. S. Simpson. (Nisbet.)—This is a series of simple religious exhortations, by an Edinburgh lady.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK.

Bisset (A.), A Short History of the English Parliament (Williams & Norgate)	3/6
Book of Common Prayer (The), with Commentary, 18mo	(S. P.O.K.) 2/6
Carruthers (J.), Communal and Commercial Economy, cr 8vo	(Stanford) 9/0
Chevalier (W. A. C.), William Longe, of Wykeham, 12mo	(Nisbet) 3/6
Dictionary of Medicine and Absolution in the Bible, cr 8vo	(Longman) 34/0
Elwin (W.), Confession and Absolution in the Bible, cr 8vo	(Hayer) 2/0
Farrer (F. H.), The State in Relation to Trade, cr 8vo	(Macmillan) 3/6
Fasnacht (G. E.), Synthetic French Grammar, cr 8vo	(Macmillan) 3/6
Foreign Office (The), &c., from "Vanity Fair," cr 8vo	(W. H. Allen) 6/0
Gilbert (E. W.), Tables of Interest, imp. 8vo	(Hodder & Stoughton) 36/0
Hamilton (S. G.), Homer's Odyssey, 24, 24, 12mo	(Macmillan) 3/6
Hawke (E.), The Life of, by M. Burrows, 8vo	(W. H. Allen) 21/0
Hollings (G. S.), Considerations on the Spiritual Life, cr 8vo	(Masters) 2/6
Horner (W. G.), The Post's Bible, New Testament, cr 8vo	(Ibister) 6/0
Infelice, 12mo	(Nicholson) 2/0
Johnston (J. F. W.), Agricultural Chemistry, 12mo	(Blackwood) 6/6
Laorlaire (H. D.), Life of St. Dominic, cr 8vo	(Burns & Oates) 12/0
Lenormant (F.), Beginnings of History, cr 8vo	(Low) 2/6
Lloyd (J. S.), Honesty Seeds, and How they Grew, cr 8vo	(W. M. Allen) 16/0
Lorimer (J.), Institutes of Law, Vol. 1, 8vo	(W. Blackwood) 4/6
Malet (A.), Book of Job, Ecclesiastes, and Revelation, cr 8vo	(Nisbet) 7/6
Marcel (W.), Principal Southern and Swiss Health Resorts, 8vo	(Churchill) 9/0
Merivale (H. C.), White Pilgrim, and other Poems, cr 8vo	(Chapman & Hall) 31/6
Miss Elveston's Girls, 3 vols. cr 8vo	(Tinsley) 16/0
Nasmyth (J.), Autobiography of, edited by S. Smiles, 8vo	(Murray) 18/0
Newcomb (S.), Popular Astronomy, 8vo	(Macmillan) 2/6
Nicoll (W. R.), Lamb of God, cr 8vo	(Macmillan) 15/0
O'Connor (W. A.), History of the Irish People, 2 vols. cr 8vo	(Simpkin) 15/0
Perkins (C. C.), Historical Handbook of Italian Sculpture, 8vo	(Remington) 15/0
Phillips (P.), Song Pilgrimage, 4to	(S.S.U.) 8/6
Psalm of the Saints, cr 8vo	(Masters) 2/0
Purnell (E. K.), Shakespeare's "Othello," 12mo	(Rivington) 18/0
Reber (F. V.), History of Ancient Art, 8vo	(Low) 50/0
Rusden (G. W.), History of New Zealand, 3 vols. 8vo	(Chapman & Hall) 12/6
Rutherford (W. G.), Babrius, with Notes, Dissertations, &c., 8vo	(Macmillan) 12/6
Shakespeare's Dramatic Works, Vols. 1 and 2, 8vo	(Paterson) each 48/0
Stephen (J. E.), History of Criminal Law in England, 3 vols. 8vo	(Macmillan) 48/0
St. John (P. B.), Sailor Crusoe (The), 12mo	(Simpkin) 2/0
St. John (P. B.), The Snow Ship, 12mo	(Maxwell) 2/0
Thomas (A.), Allerton Towers, cr 8vo	(White & Co.) 3/6
Venosta (F.), Companion to the Grammar, cr 8vo	(Williams & Norgate) 5/0
Watson (A.), Christ's Authority, and other Sermons, cr 8vo	(W. Blackwood) 7/6
Whelpett (E.), Lincolnshire Heroine (A), 3 vols. cr 8vo	(Chapman & Hall) 31/6
Williams (W. H.), Select Vocabulary of Latin Etymology (A), 12mo	(E. Clark) 1/6
Wordsworth (C.), Church's History, Vols. 3 and 4, cr 8vo	(Rivington) each 6/0

It is particularly requested that all applications for Copies of the SPECTATOR, and Communications upon matters of business, should not be addressed to the EDITOR, but to the PUBLISHER, 1 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

LIBERTY'S
ART FABRICS.

LIBERTY'S ART CURTAINS, CHINTZ AND UPHOLSTERY STUFFS, NOVEL IDEAS IN LADIES' WINTER COSTUME AND TOILETTE FABRICS. LIBERTY'S COLOURS. EASTERN AND EUROPEAN DESIGNS. PURE FINISH, INEXPENSIVE MATERIALS. East India House, } REGENT STREET, W. & Chesham House, }

ALL PATTERNS POST FREE.

JAPANESE LEATHER PAPERS.

FOR DADOS, WALLS, AND SCREENS, From 12s per piece.

WALL PAPERS AND CURTAIN STUFFS. Artistic and Inexpensive.

C. HINDLEY and SONS, 290 to 294 1/4 OXFORD STREET, W.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO.

Has been celebrated for more than half a century as the best, purest, and most fragrant preparation for the teeth ever made; it whitens and preserves the teeth, imparts to them a pearl-like whiteness, strengthens the gums, and gives a pleasing fragrance to the breath. Health depends in a great measure upon the soundness of the teeth, and all dentists will allow that neither washes nor paste can possibly be as efficacious for polishing the teeth, and keeping them sound and white, as a pure and non-gritty tooth powder; such Rowlands' Odonto has always proved itself to be. Ask for Rowlands' Odonto.

APOLLINARIS.

"MIND YOU PUT APOLLINARIS IN THE CHAMPAGNE."
—Punch, June 10th, 1882.

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

ANNUAL SALE,
TEN MILLIONS.

OSLER'S CRYSTAL GLASS AND CHINA SERVICES.

ELECTROLIERS, CHANDELIERS, AND LAMPS.

100 OXFORD STREET, W.

POSITIVIST SOCIETY, Newton Hall, Fleur-de-Lis Court, Fetter Lane, E.C.—Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON will Lecture on Sunday mornings in February and March, at 11.15 a.m. precisely, on "Principles and Types of Public Life." Subject, Sunday, February 4th, "Leon Gambetta." Every Wednesday evening, at 8 p.m., Dr. T. FITZPATRICK, M.D. Camb., on "The Elements of Biology." All Lectures and Classes free.

WANTED, a GENTLEMAN to ASSIST in EDITING a WEEKLY JOURNAL. Must possess the highest qualifications for the work.—Apply, stating remuneration required, to "R. J." care of Messrs. COUSINS and CO., Publishers, York Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

SPECULATION AND INVESTMENT IN STOCKS AND SHARES, WITH A MINIMUM RISK.

Explanatory Book, just published, gratis and post free on application.

Operators in Stock-Exchange Securities should test this System, by which LARGE PROFITS are realised, and the possibility of Loss is reduced to a Minimum.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Civil Service Gazette.—"The method recommended by Messrs. Gutteridge is easy to comprehend, and safe."—English Churchman.—"Messrs. Gutteridge deserve the best thanks of investors and speculators."—Society.—"I commend Messrs. Gutteridge's accounts of last year's workings to the study of capitalists."—Manchester Courier.—"The examples cited so completely demonstrate its advantages, that the plan will doubtless be generally adopted."—Figaro.—"Their advice is worthy of attention; the book is well worth perusing, and is very instructive."

Special Weekly Circular and Report sent regularly, on application.

W. GUTTERIDGE and CO., Sworn Brokers,
Drapers' Gardens, Throgmorton Street, E.C.

THE COMMITTEE of the LONDON ANTI-VIVISECTION SOCIETY feel assured that all sympathisers in the Anti-Vivisection Movement will be greatly encouraged to learn that Mr. RICHARD BARLOW KENNETT'S noble OFFER has been REALISED, through the raising of the Special Fund of £1,000 by the appointed time. The Committee desire to express their very warm THANKS to Mr. Kennett, and to every Contributor. Office, 180 Brompton Road; M. Walbrook, Secretary, to whom all Communications may be addressed, and of whom may be had free a Form of Petition to Parliament for the Prohibition of Vivisection, and a List of Publications on the subject.

FIRTH COLLEGE, SHEFFIELD.

The Council of Firth College, Sheffield, are prepared to APPOINT a PROFESSOR of CHEMISTRY. The stipend will be £150 per annum, and half the Fees of his own Department. Candidates are requested to give full particulars concerning age, experience, and any academic distinctions they may have gained. The names of three gentlemen to whom references may be made should be given, but no testimonials need be sent, unless they are asked for. Applications to be sent on or before March 1st.—Further particulars may be had from ENSOR DRURY, Registrar.

Firth College, Sheffield, January 31st, 1883.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.

The TWENTY-FIRST WINTER EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN. 5 Pall Mall East. From 10 till 5. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

WATER-COLOUR EXHIBITION,
53 Pall Mall, containing 350 Works by Well-known Artists in Water-colours. Three great Works by John Martin, K.L., and 50 others in oil. Now Open.—Admission, 1s. ROBT. HOPKINS, Manager.

THE HAMMOND COMPANY ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING COLLEGE,

2 Red Lion Square, W.C.

Principal—HUGH ERAT HARRISON, B.Sc. (Lond.)
Electrical Engineer—FREDERICK C. PHILLIPS.
A LIMITED NUMBER of STUDENTS will be ADMITTED at the Commencement of the Second Half of the Session on WEDNESDAY, February 14th. Application should be made to the undersigned, at the Office of the Company, 110 Cannon Street, E.C., from whom full particulars may be obtained.
PHILIP A. LATHAM, M.A., Secretary.

A HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL for GIRLS in one of the Healthiest Suburbs of London, close to the Crystal Palace. Preparation for Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations. Among the Professors are:—F. Ryland, Esq., M.A., late Scholar St. John's College, Cambridge; C. J. Frost, Esq., Mus. Doc.; C. H. Midforth, Esq., South Kensington. Large garden. Prospectus on application to the PRINCIPALS, Welland House, Forest Hill.

FRÄULEIN HEUTSCHY will be glad to receive a Few more Young Ladies, for instruction in German, French, Music, and other branches of education. Prospectus and references on application.—Tannegg, Solothurn, Switzerland.

THE VINE CLUB.

PATRONS.

The Lord Ashley.
The Lord Robert Brudenell-Brance.
General Sir Henry de Bathe, Bart.
The Earl of Ellesmere.
Vice-Admiral H.S.H. Prince Leiningen, G.C.B.
Colonel Sir Robert Lloyd Lindsay, V.C., K.C.B., M.P.
General Lord Welsley of Oatso, G.C.B., G.C.M.G.

COMMITTEE.

(Nominated by the Patrons.)

The Club is started on a double basis:—

- 1.—As a non-Political Society of Gentlemen.
- 2.—To enable its Members to obtain for their own home consumption, Wine, Spirits, and Liqueurs, at the actual wholesale cost price.

This last is an entirely new feature, the advantage of which must be apparent to every wine consumer. For Rules, Application for Membership, &c., apply to
CHARLES A. PRITCHARD,
Secretary, (pro tem.)
Temporary Offices, 20 Regent Street,
Waterloo Place, London, W.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' NEW PUBLICATIONS.

MR. SKELTON'S NEW WORK.

"The author refers in his preface to the great interest which her Majesty the Queen took in the first edition of 'The Defence of Mary Stuart.'"—Courant.
"It is difficult to decide which pleads for the unfortunate Queen more eloquently—the beautiful picture by Sir Noel Paton here reproduced, or the admirable advocacy of Mr. Skelton."—Scotsman.

ESSAYS in HISTORY and BIOGRAPHY.

Including the Defence of Mary Stuart, Disraeli, Bolingbroke, Macaulay, Field, Dante Rossetti, J. A. Froude, Thomas Carlyle, &c. By JOHN SKELTON, LL.D. (Edin.) With Frontispiece by Sir Noel Paton. Bound in buckram, price 12s. 6d.

Also, just ready, a CHOICE and COMPLETE EDITION of

The ESSAYS of SHIRLEY.

Vol. I.—ESSAYS in HISTORY and BIOGRAPHY. Vol. II.—ESSAYS in ROMANCE. On fine paper, and in antique binding, with Illustrations, price 20s.

"Mr. Skelton has given us one of the most human and most consistent portraits of Mary."—Scotsman.

"Sets forth the argument with singular clearness, and from an original point of view well worthy of attention."—Athenaeum.

THIS DAY is PUBLISHED.

The INSTITUTES of the LAW of NATIONS.

A Treatise of the Jural Relations of Separate Political Communities. By JAMES LORIMER, LL.D., Advocate, Regius Professor of Public Law and of the Law of Nature and Nations in the University of Edinburgh, Member of the Institute of International Law, and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Jurisprudence of Madrid, &c. In 2 vols. 8vo. Vol. I., now ready, price 16s.

THIS DAY is PUBLISHED.

ALIRABI: or, the Banks and Bankers of the Nile.

By a HADJI OF HYDE PARK. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"With Nile Bedaween and crocodiles, the chequered career of Alirabi himself and the warmth of Eastern colour with which the volume glows in such chapters as 'Pan-Islamism,' 'The Pyramids,' and 'Pharos at Midnight,' the curiosity of the reader is stimulated and sustained; while the hitherto untrodden field which the novelist is called upon to deal, imparts a freshness to the story which, to the jaded novel-reader, will be as welcome and inspiring as the morning air. Altogether, this is a very clever book, with a sparkle and fascination of style which compels one to read it right through."—Liverpool Mercury.

The REVOLT of MAN. By Walter Besant.

Sixth Edition, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD and SONS, Edinburgh and London.

CAUTION.—The ANTI-

STYLOGRAPH (HEARSON'S PATENT) is totally distinct from every form of Stylograph, or point-writer, in that it carries a nibbed pen, with points to suit all writers, and thus preserves all the characteristics of the handwriting. It requires no adjustment, and carries sufficient ink for several days' use. Prices: Pocket Size, 2s. 6d.; Desk, 3s. 6d. Pens, 1s. per box. Fitted with Gold Pen, iridium-pointed, 10s. 6d. Of all Stationers; wholesale only of the sole Licensees and Manufacturers, THOS. DE LA RUE and Co., London.

ROYAL INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE, Cooper's Hill, Staines.

This College has been recently placed on a new basis, and the advantages afforded by it as a training institution for those who purpose adopting the Civil Engineering profession in India or elsewhere, are now offered to all persons desirous of following the course of study pursued there.

A number of Students, not exceeding 60, will be admitted to the College in September, 1883. Candidates for admission must, on July 1st, 1883, be over 17 and under 21 years of age, and must give satisfactory proof of their having received a fair general education.

The Secretary of State for India will offer 13 Appointments in the Indian Public Works Department for competition among the Students entering the College in September, 1883, at the termination of their prescribed three years' College course, that is, in the summer of 1886. The Secretary of State for India will further offer Two Appointments in the Indian Telegraph Department among the same Students, after two years' course of study, that is, in the summer of 1885.

In the event of there being more candidates for admission than the College can receive, the preference will be given to qualified candidates according to dates of application for admission.

For all further particulars, apply by letter only to the Secretary, Public Works Department, India Office, S.W.; or to the President, Royal Engineering College, Cooper's Hill, Staines.

JULAND DANVERS, Secretary,
Public Works Department.
India Office, October 26th, 1882.

A LADY of considerable experience in the education and management of Children, assisted by a younger Sister, is desirous of undertaking the entire charge of TWO YOUNG ORPHANS, or of children whose parents are abroad. Her house is in a healthy locality, with garden attached. Good references given and required.—"M. N. H.," 1 Edith Grove, Fulham Road, London, S.W.

THE GRANGE, BUXTON, DERBY-SHIRE.—BOARDING-SCHOOL for LADIES.

conducted by Miss GEDDES. Indian Children would here find a bright, happy home. Ladies wishful to prepare for the Higher University Examinations received.

DULWICH COLLEGE.—In pursuance of the provisions of the Scheme for the administration of the Foundation of Alleyn's College of God's Gift, at Dulwich, in the county of Surrey, the College Governing Body are prepared to receive testimonials and other evidence of qualification for the office of HEAD MASTER of Dulwich College.

1. Candidates must be Graduates of some University in the United Kingdom.

2. In addition to a residence, rent free, the Master will receive a fixed annual stipend of £300 per annum, in addition to the capitation payments, provided by clause 77 of the Scheme, viz., £4 for each boy attending Dulwich College up to 300; £3 for each boy attending Dulwich College from 300 to 400; £2 for each boy attending Dulwich College above 400. The number of boys attending Dulwich College in the winter term, 1882, was, according to the Capitation-fee Register, 589.

3. The Master will not be entitled to receive any Boarders.

4. Applications, in writing, stating age, degree, and other particulars, together with testimonials, giving evidence of qualification, of which, as well as of the application, 25 printed copies will be required, must be sent to the Clerk, New College, Dulwich, S.E., on or before the afternoon of February 24th, 1883.

5. The Master will be required to enter into office on such date, not later than April 9th, as the Governors may appoint.

6. No personal canvass of the Governors will be permitted.

7. The Governors do not hold themselves responsible for the return of any original testimonials.

8. Copies of the Scheme, containing the conditions under which the appointment will be made and held, may be obtained, on application to the Clerk, New College, Dulwich, S.E.

Dated this 18th day of January, 1883.

J. WATCHURST, Clerk to the College Governors.

FIRST-CLASS INSTRUCTION in PIANOFORTE PLAYING and SOLO SINGING given by a Young Lady (Silver Medalist) in Schools or to Private Pupils.—"A. B.," 1 Trevor Terrace, Knightsbridge.

DRESDEN.—MR. H. B. COTTERILL,

M.A., formerly Assistant-Master at Hailbury College, RECEIVES FIVE PUPILS. Classics, Mathematics, and Modern Languages.—Address, Liebig Strasse 11.

STONEYGATESCHOOL, Dr. Leicester

—The Misses FRANKLIN receive Boys between the ages of Seven and Fourteen, to prepare for the Public Schools. They are assisted by Experienced Resident and Visiting Masters. The Classics are taught by a Graduate in Honours of Oxford, and careful instruction is given in Elementary Science. The House was built for the School, and is about a mile and a half from the town. Reference is kindly permitted to the Right Hon. A. J. Mundella and the Right Hon. Sir John Mellor.

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,850.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1883.

[REGISTERED FOR TRANSMISSION ABROAD.] PRICE.....6d. BY POST, 6½d.

THE WEEK	169	Braithwaite and Buttermere	183
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		Railway	183
The Programme of the Session	172	"Cañons" and "Canyons"	183
Mr. Courtney on Egypt	173	"Storm-drift: Poems & Sonnets"	183
The Expulsion Bill in the Senate	174	POETRY—
The Coming Proposal for Tenant-right	174	Nepenthe	183
Ritualists and the Evangelicals	175	ART—
Lord Ripon and the Black Act	176	George Mason	183
The East-Lothian Election	177	BOOKS—
Sacred Anarchy	178	The Commercial Restraints of Ireland Considered	185
A Needed Etiquette	179	Mrs Lorimer	186
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		Christ Church Cathedral, in Dublin	187
The East-Lothian Election and its Lessons	180	Science and Sentiment	189
Egyptian Sepoys	181	Travels in Baluchistan	190
Irish Reforms	181	Mr. Isaacs	191
The Miller Plating Case	181	Lambeth Palace	191
Consecrated Ground	182	CURRENT LITERATURE	192
High Churchmen and Bishops	182	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	194
		ADVERTISEMENTS	194-200

. The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

It is our intention occasionally to issue gratis with the SPECTATOR Special Literary Supplements, the outside pages of which will be devoted to Advertisements. The Fourth of these Supplements will be issued with the SPECTATOR for February 17th; and Advertisements for it should reach the Publishing Office not later than noon on the Wednesday preceding that date.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Report of the Committee of the French Senate on the Expulsion Bill was read by the Reporter, M. Allou, on Thursday, and somewhat frigidly received,—probably because it had not the terseness and piquancy of most of these reports. Nevertheless, it contains a very impressive constitutional argument against the Bill, which it recommends the Senate not to modify, but simply to reject. It insists on the insignificance of the placard in which all this panic originated, and the impotence of Prince Napoleon to disturb public tranquillity; on the perfectly satisfactory declarations of the Minister of the Interior as to the non-existence of dangerous plots; on the folly of giving the impression of a weakness which does not exist, by taking most dangerous precautions against imaginary dangers; on the steadfastness with which the Republic had passed through far more dangerous crises without taking refuge in a policy of proscription; on the uselessness of driving Pretenders to plot abroad, where their plots would be not less, and might even be more dangerous, than plots at home; on the radical injustice of punishing particular persons for their birth, and the utter failure of republican equality which it involves; on the prospect of an extension of the proscriptive principle, if once accepted, to all those classes which are regarded with jealousy by violent agitators; and on the certainty that a policy of denunciation having been once inaugurated, the Senate would soon itself become the object of attack. The report frankly appeals to the Chamber itself to respect Law, Equality, and Justice, and in the interest of all three principles, to acquiesce in the rejection of a Bill fatal to all of them. The debate will commence to-day.

At the Cabinet Council held on Tuesday, both Lord Spencer and Lord Hartington were escorted by detectives. It was not at first apparent why the Minister of War should be in danger of attack, but it appears that Lord Hartington's speech at Bacup has greatly offended the Irish. They fancy that although he steadily supported Mr. Gladstone's policy, he longs to exact vengeance for the murder of his brother. The Irish Nation, published in New York, declares that he has sworn a vendetta against Ireland; that his "whole mind is coloured by an engrossing desire for vengeance;" that "he secretly gloats over the sufferings of the peasantry, and anticipates with cruel satisfaction the number of lives which will be sacrificed to the manes of his unfortunate brother." And finally, it calls upon all Irishmen to make the expulsion of Lord Hartington from the Cabinet their supreme object. The occasion for this outburst is only a speech in which Lord Hartington, wrongly, as we think, but in most moderate and statesmanlike fashion, advised that county government and the new franchise should not be granted to Ireland till the country had settled down. It is almost impossible to reason with men liable to such accessions of fury, or indeed with men who are unable to see that if there is one English Minister to whom Ireland owes more than friendliness, it is the Marquis of Hartington. His family, at all events, has suffered enough for being innocent.

The most jealous precautions were taken on Lord Spencer's return to Ireland to protect him from assassination. He was surrounded by dragoons, detectives filled the carriages behind him, and a tunnel under which he had to pass was occupied by armed police. Englishmen do not yet honour Earl Spencer enough. A great noble, with a large income, full of literary and artistic tastes, a favourite in society, and a man who enjoys it, he goes to Ireland, to live in momentary expectation of death from a bullet or an amputation-knife, solely in order to perform a public duty. He performs it so ably that a great organisation at war with Government and Society is being broken up, while he constantly rejects the "severe" counsels which men indignant at the spectacle offered by Ireland press on his attention. It is difficult to conceive a more self-sacrificing life than the one he is now leading, for which he will obtain in this world neither reward nor honour. The Irish dislike every Viceroy, and as no Viceroy can perfectly succeed in Ireland, Englishmen scarcely perceive how well they are sometimes served by men whose danger is unlimited, while their powers are almost restricted to advice.

Messrs. Healy, Davitt, and Quinn all went to prison on Thursday. Repeated offers were made to provide the necessary recognisances, but they were all refused. Mr. Healy, before surrendering, offered to resign his seat; but his constituents will not, it is believed, accept the offer. Of course, imprisonment will greatly increase the popularity of all three, and especially of Mr. Healy, and, in fact, the Government of Ireland is in this position. If it passes over incendiary speeches by leading agitators, it is accused, not unjustly, of punishing the followers, while leaving impunity to those who lead; while if it restrains the chiefs in the regular way by recognisances, they go to prison, as victims of British tyranny. The situation is most unfortunate, and, indeed, practically insoluble. No Radical can heartily approve punishment for spoken words, yet no Radical can be blind to the fact that in Ireland such words are constantly followed by overt acts. If the danger in Ireland were of insurrection, it would be far wiser to let every man say his say, and descend into the streets, if he could, but notoriously that is not the case. When the Viceroy is accompanied in London by detectives, and in Kingstown surrounded by dragoons, speeches against the laws cease to be speeches, and become charges of powder for the nearest pistol. Whether imprisonment damps the powder may be doubtful; but the local rulers, with their wealth of information, think it does. If it does, they are justified; and whose opinion are we to take, if not theirs?

The Liberals lost Haddingtonshire on Monday, by a large majority, Lord Elcho being returned by 492 votes, against 400 given for Mr. Finlay. This is the worst beating the Liberals have had since 1865, and the majority against us is more than double that of 1880. The reasons are simple. Lord Elcho went almost as far for the tenant-farmers as Mr. Finlay, while Mr. Finlay went almost as far for the Church Establishment as Lord Elcho. At a bye-election especially, the Free-Church party appear to have felt themselves almost called upon to emphasise the importance which they attach to a settlement of the issue between the Free Church and the State Church of Scotland.

Mr. Courtney addressed his constituents at Liskeard on Monday in a speech of much ability and illimitable self-confidence, on the Egyptian part of which,—on the stewing of that mess of political pottage, which he is so desirous to contemplate impartially from a distance,—we have said enough elsewhere. Mr. Courtney then went on to ask himself “why we should not also let Irishmen stew in their own juice?” a question which he appeared to be more than half inclined to answer, by saying that it is only because we have not courage to do so. However, he conquered his half-inclination, and declared, first, that it was impossible to separate Ireland’s destiny from our own; next, that Ireland is not homogeneous, and that Ulster is as much at issue with the rest of Ireland as Great Britain is; and lastly, that Irishmen show very little consistency, though much vehemence, in their political demands. But if we refuse Home-rule, says Mr. Courtney, we must not concede all its evils without the advantage of the new sense of responsibility it would impose,—we must not concede to the Irish Home-rulers all they ask, without making them feel that they are to take the consequences. We should do what we believe to be justice to Ireland in every respect, without waiting for agitation,—for instance, we should give a popular local government to the counties,—but we must not let the Home-rulers dictate our measures, and then throw all the responsibility of their failure on the sister-kingdom. There Mr. Courtney showed his strong masculine sense.

Mr. Healy’s very moderate speech on Wednesday, on county government for Ireland,—sketching out the mode of electing county and provincial boards,—the latter to be elected by the county boards, and to take charge of the Irish Private-Bill legislation now submitted to the House of Commons,—reads like an attempt to vindicate his title to the rank of a statesman, just at the moment when the prosecution directed against his violent denunciation of the British Government as brigands, is, in his own view at least, compelling him to go to prison. The speech has no insincere ring in it, and we can hardly help thinking that it expresses Mr. Healy’s actual wish on the organisation of local government in Ireland. At the same time, he may well think, as Prince Bismarck is supposed to think, that there is no better way of concealing his real convictions than to speak them out frankly. Mr. Healy may suppose that he will be given so much credit for malignity of intention, that Englishmen will at once assume his suggestions to be purely mischievous, and will thereby be led to reject without hesitation the very plan that would do most to cure the Irish sore. Mr. Healy may suppose that he will most effectually prevent the English people from doing the right thing, by himself suggesting the thing that ought to be done. But whatever his motive, we are persuaded that his scheme deserves very grave consideration, and has in it the elements of a statesmanlike measure. It does not do to be so suspicious of an enemy as to take all his advice the wrong way. Sometimes he will give advice that is good, in order to secure its rejection.

Sir Robert Peel, as a politician, seems to have lost his head altogether. At Warrington, on Thursday week, in a speech which was not reported in London, he not only burst into a furious tirade against the Liberals, charging them, among other absurdities, with making “peace with dishonour” in Egypt, but accused Dr. A. Clarke of inventing an illness for Mr. Gladstone, to prevent his being cross-questioned in Midlothian about the “Treaty with the Vatican.” “Seriously,” he said, “they had a Prime Minister who had deserted the helm of the vessel of State at the very moment when Parliament was going to meet, when Cabinet Councils ought to be held, and when he ought to be superintending the machinery for the coming Session. They knew that the Prime Minister had relinquished the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had relinquished it at a time when the finances of this country, owing to extravagance and mismanagement, were in a very unsettled state.” Some strange change must have passed over Englishmen, when they will bear that kind of malignity, even from the most scatter-brained of politicians, who believes, as he said, that if Mr. Gladstone resigned, the Liberal party would fall in pieces.

The fear of the Nihilists in St. Petersburg is on the decrease.

The Czar has quitted Gatschina, and is giving entertainments at the Winter Palace, during which he moves freely among the guests, who, however, are closely scrutinised at the gates. It is even rumoured that he has appeared walking in the streets, but this requires confirmation. It is, however, true that he has by public decree fixed May as the month for his solemn coronation in Moscow, and has summoned thither all the notabilities of the Empire. The ceremonial will be most magnificent, and it is rumoured in Berlin that after it the Czar may make some great concessions. Nothing is known, however, of this idea in St. Petersburg, where little is expected, beyond an amnesty for certain classes of offenders. The cause of the diminished fear of the Nihilists, which is evident, is not explained, the popular theory that they have all been arrested being unsupported by any evidence. If it were true, the Government would be eager to announce such a complete success. It is more probable that some concession has at last been made in return for immunity, or that the Czar, weary of imprisonment in his own Empire, has resolved to face his fate, whatever it be.

Mr. Gibson, on Monday, made a curious speech in Dublin. He first roundly condemned the Government policy in Ireland, accusing the Ministry of having used the Land League, and of then being defied and beaten by it, and of failing to display either “judgment, sagacity, or statesmanship.” They shut their eyes to all dangers, and disloyalty had grown stronger than ever. Nevertheless, he maintained that, “owing to the firm and fearless administration of the Crimes Act by Lord Spencer, order is better maintained than at any time for two years;” and “regarding the whole position fairly, and balancing the good and the bad, I look on the condition of Ireland as grave and anxious, such as to justify solicitude, to require caution, care, and prudence; but I cannot join in any cry of despair, and prefer to seek grounds for hope, although the quest may be attended with some difficulty and discouragement.” Considering the badness of the Government, that is surely a hopeful view. The truth is, we suppose, that Mr. Gibson feels it his business to criticise, but as he understands Ireland, he cannot get rid of the perception that the Government is fairly successful.

The Farmers’ Alliance, at its annual meeting on Tuesday, resolved unanimously to press on Parliament two demands,—compensation to tenants for unexhausted improvements, and the prohibition of any increase of rent, based on the value which tenants’ improvements have given to a farm. In both instances, landlords are to be forbidden to contract themselves out of the law. As immediate legislation is at hand, we have discussed these proposals elsewhere, and may add here that the farmers also ask for the abolition of the law of distress, and for a law compelling railways to carry farm produce and manures more cheaply, for the abolition of extraordinary tithes, and for the division of rates between the landlord and the occupier. The last, though very dear to the farmers, is a cry for the moon. Rates must ultimately reduce rentals, whatever laws the Legislature may pass, just as certainly as water must flow down-hill. If the landlord pays rates, he will ask more rent; and if the tenant does not pay them, he can afford more rent. The farmers’ proposal is to adjust a tax, say, on salt, which shall not fall on the buyer. When that is found, we may find a tax which shall not fall on anybody.

Last Sunday, Mr. Frederic Harrison took for the theme of his discourse to his Positivist friends the career of Gambetta, whom he spoke of as the first statesman of European importance to recognise Comte as his master alike in politics and in philosophy. Further, Gambetta “was himself, to some extent, the type of the Republican chief whom Comte had sought,—a statesman, that is, who should unite the cities and the country in one policy, and carry out the legitimate ends of the Great Revolution in a Conservative spirit, governing by public opinion, but never making a doctrine of pure democracy.” Rising to a more ardent point of eulogy, Mr. Frederic Harrison declared Gambetta to be “the first statesman of European rank finally to repudiate any kind of homage to any sort of Church. His religion was France.” “It may well be that in history he will be recorded not only as the young lawyer who replaced the Empire by the Republic, but as the first statesman in Europe who refused to bow the knee in the Temple of Rimmon.” By a mighty effort of imagination, Mr. Frederic Harrison uses the Temple of Rimmon to signify the Temple of God. The Positivist who recurs to the Old Testament in his imagery when denouncing theology, is, indeed, either singularly audacious, or singularly deficient in literary feeling. Mr. Harrison might as fitly use the language of rapture in which the gates are bidden to lift up their heads, and the everlasting doors to be lifted up, that the King of glory may come in, as appropriate for the welcome of the pallid Positivist into his dreary and empty shrine.

The Swansea Chamber of Commerce did honour to Mr. Chamberlain yesterday week, when Mr. Chamberlain made a speech chiefly concerning the forthcoming Bankruptcy Bill, in which he did not spare the Bill introduced by the Associated Chamber of Commerce last Session, which it had been, he told them, his unfortunate duty to oppose. The truth is, that the Associated Chambers of Commerce had failed to embody in their Bill the most important of the objects which they had themselves previously laid down. Mr. Chamberlain's chief object is, he told Swansea, to make bankruptcy less easy and pleasant a process. Some one had said that under our present law no man in difficulties, with a proper regard to the interests of his family, should ever think of paying 20s. in the pound. Mr. Chamberlain wishes to blunt the edge of this sarcasm. He intends to have an impartial and judicial inquiry,—to treat insolvency much as you treat the loss of a ship, and brand any bankruptcy or insolvency which is, after impartial inquiry, judged to be due to fraud or culpable carelessness, as you would brand the loss of a ship through the connivance or through the culpable carelessness of its captain,—to affix a stigma to it that will stick. This is an object perfectly within reach, and doubtless, if adequately attained, it would do more to bring actual disgrace on disgraceful insolvency, and therefore to render it less common, than all other provisions whatever.

The Jewish World, the organ, we believe, of the Reformed Jews in England, pronounces this week in most unmistakable language against all projects for a restoration to Palestine, or for setting-up a Jewish State there. It maintains that the project is impracticable, the Jews being separated in language, in ideas, and in habits; and undesirable, inasmuch as the Jews have a mission, "that of propagating a sensible view of life, and its duties," which can be best performed by their remaining a cosmopolitan people, with seven millions of people dispersed all over the world. "The yearning for a restoration of the Kingdom of Israel is no portion of the ideal of the Jewish religion. It is only an abnormal growth of the delirious hopes of ages of persecution."

The coal-miners of the North, having obtained an increase from the masters of ten per cent. on their wages, have decided, it is stated, to decrease out-put. Their Unions intend to restrict work to five days a week, and the working-day to eight hours, or forty hours in all. The object is to raise the price of coal by, say, ten per cent., and then obtain another rise for themselves. We doubt if they will succeed, as the contracts interfere, and as the cost of the coal itself is only one element in its price. But suppose they succeed completely? They will reduce waste, not raise price. It is perfectly well known that if it were only worth while to rebuild furnaces and fire-places, the consumption of coal could be reduced at least one-third. During the coal famine of a few years since, Sir John Hawkshaw is reported to have said that "coal would never be cheap in England till it was £4 a ton;" and whether he said it or not, the epigram is true. It is not only possible to build a German stove which will warm a large hall on a consumption of six pounds of coal a day, but it has been done. The men may be quite right in seeking higher wages, for theirs is a terrible form of labour; but they will not find it pay to shut up open fire-places. We cannot do without coal, but we can use hundredweights, for tons.

A grave scandal has occurred in Austria. The construction of the Galician Railways has been entrusted to a single contractor, Baron Schwarz, instead of many contractors, against the recommendation of a Committee of the Reichsrath. It is suspected, therefore, that bribery has been at work, and Herr Kaminski, a Member, asserts that he helped to influence officials, and that Baron Schwarz promised him £62,000, which he now refuses to pay. He has even brought his complaint into Court. He has been compelled to resign his seat, but the incident has revived an impression, always current in Vienna, that concessions are not given fairly. There was a tremendous scandal of the kind after the great "crash," and several suicides among persons highly placed. The remedies, we imagine, are to make all payments criminal, and confide the distribution of contracts to a Standing Committee, composed either of men as incorruptible as Judges, or of men too wealthy even to feel temptation.

A curious attempt was made in Winchester yesterday week to revive in England the Oriental fancy for playing chess with living pieces. The object was to raise a certain amount of money for paying off a debt on St. Lawrence's Church, Winchester, and to help the Winchester Association for the care of friendless girls. So, in the Winchester Guildhall 576 square feet were marked off for a chess-board,—in other words, a square yard was given for each piece,—in squares of white and black cloth; while plenty of room was reserved for spectators, both in the hall itself and in the galleries. The pawns, wearing Tudor hats, were got up in the fashion of pages, the white and black shoes marking their colours; the kings were in great velvet cloaks, with jewelled collars and sword-belts; the knights had the morions and breastplates of men-at-arms; the bishops had copes and mitres of white silk, embroidered with gold on one side of the board, and cassocks and birettas of red silk on the other side; the rooks had pasteboard castles as head-dresses. And thus several games were played, a trumpet announcing the check of the king, and the players playing at a table, from which their move was immediately translated into the corresponding change of living pieces. We should think that it would require the inexhaustible patience of the East, seriously to continue this sort of dumb pageantry for several hours at a stretch.

Mr. Herman Merivale sends to Thursday's Times rather curious evidence of the very subjective way in which biographers often describe facts. Mr. Forster, and a more recent student of Dickens,—Mr. A. W. Ward, who wrote the study of Dickens in Mr. John Morley's series,—have both described the last few weeks of Dickens's life as rapidly darkening towards the end. Mr. Merivale, who acted in some private theatricals of which Dickens was the soul, exactly seven days before Dickens's death, declares that there is hardly any truth in this statement; that in the many rehearsals and all the preparations for the play, Dickens was full of animation and life, and went through the whole "with infectious enjoyment." And Dickens's own letters on the subject fully confirm Mr. Merivale's statement. The truth is, that biographers, as they approach the end, naturally pass under the influence of the shadow of Death, and forget that it by no means follows that the subject of their delineation had any similar premonition. Dickens, we believe, died of apoplexy, and it is not uncommon for those who die of apoplexy to have even some accession of good spirits towards the close.

We made an error in noticing last week the appointment of Mr. F. Pollock to the Corpus Professorship of Jurisprudence at Oxford, which we erroneously spoke of as the Professorship of English Law. It is the Vinerian Professorship, held by Mr. Albert Dicey, which is the Professorship of English Law formerly held by Blackstone. Mr. Pollock's chair is of quite modern date, created, in fact, chiefly for Sir Henry Maine. And in speaking of the Law School of Oxford, we ought not to have omitted the very able Chichele Professor of International Law, Mr. Holland, whose "Elements of Jurisprudence" have been noticed in these columns as making a great advance on Austin's book, nor Mr. Markby, the learned reader of Indian Law. Again, Sir W. Anson, though nominally only Warden of All Souls, is really an additional and very able teacher of Law in the University.

Mr. F. W. Cory, writing from Buckhurst Hill, Essex, to Wednesday's Times, appears to show that by the use of the spectroscope a much surer indication of coming rain or fair weather can be obtained than by any other of the habitual criteria. If so, it is a great pity that this method should not be adopted. At present, our weather forecasts are hardly of any use, and more often misleading than not. Only, Mr. Cory's spectroscopic experiments appear to have been made nearer to the beginning of the twenty-four hours to be forecasted, than it would be possible for forecasts which have to be distributed and published in the morning papers, to be taken. Can he get anything like equally good results two or three hours sooner?

Bank Rate, 4 per cent.
Consols were on Friday 102 to 102½.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE PROGRAMME OF THE SESSION.

THE first Cabinet Council has been held, and the order of the measures to be introduced this Session has probably been discussed. We wish to support very strongly the demand made by the Liberal Members who spoke at the Swansea banquet given last week to Mr. Dillwyn, that the first care should be given to measures of general interest affecting the interests of England and Scotland, and not exclusively affecting Ireland; and that for this purpose, the Bill for reforming the Municipal Government of London should not be regarded as a measure of general interest. It is not for us to depreciate the importance or magnitude of that measure. We have always held a real incorporation of the Capital, in the large sense of that term, as a measure of genuinely national importance; and we hold this still. But the constituencies which have waited so patiently for three years to reap even the first-fruits of their efforts in 1880, have some right to see what they in their own locality will recognise as those visible first-fruits gathered in at the end of the present Session. This they will not see, if they only see the Government of London reformed. Great as it is, the municipal life of London is not present to a Northumberland or Cornwall voter's mind during all the vicissitudes of the year. The people of Scotland, England, and Wales are fairly entitled, we think, in this the fourth Session of the present Parliament, to see a great reform carried that will signify something even in the neighbourhood of their own homes, and the reform of the Government of London will not be such a reform. We earnestly press, then, on the Government, as the Member for Swansea and the Member for Wolverhampton have already pressed on it, that the County Government Bill and the Tenant-farmers' Compensation Bill should be regarded as taking rank even of the Government of London Bill,—that is, as needing even more urgent attention and an earlier discussion. That three Sessions should have passed before the English constituencies see anything like the realisation of their hopes, except the somewhat trivial Burials Act and Ground Game Act, is surely enough. The fourth Session at least ought to carry some reform which will bring conspicuously before the eyes of all men, wherever they may live, the significance of a Liberal Administration. We observe the statement that the Government have decided,—very judiciously, we think,—to bring in a Bill for settling the question of compensation to tenant-farmers for unexhausted improvements, and we heartily agree that no measure affecting chiefly a single class in the community, is more urgent. But even such a measure as this hardly satisfies the conditions which we have laid down. The tenant-farmers, of course, have the most undoubted right to a thorough discussion and complete settlement of their claim. None have suffered recently so much as they from causes over which Parliament has no control, and none, therefore, have a better title to have those grievances fully considered over the continued operation of which Parliament may exert a very real control. Still, the tenant-farmers, though they may have a claim to some priority by reason of their serious calamities, constitute only a small class of the people; and of the urgent measures waiting for the opportunity of legislation in this fourth Session of procrastinated hopes, that one may be said to be the first in interest to the country at large which will publish most clearly to the whole electorate the difference between a Parliament of Liberals and a Parliament of Tories.

Now, considering that the extension of household franchise to the counties cannot properly long precede a dissolution, it seems to us that these conditions are best satisfied by the production of the Bill for creating a popular County Government. And we must express our most earnest hope that Mr. Chamberlain's hint at Swansea that this measure, too, might well be delayed till the County Franchise Bill is passed, does not represent the serious intention of the Government. There is no measure which would better stimulate the local activity of the country, or train the people more effectually for the exercise of their larger duties as the electorate of the House of Commons itself. A good County Government Bill would be the best possible preparation for the exercise of the Parliamentary Franchise by the mass of the county population, and therefore the natural herald of the latter Bill. There is no good pretext for delaying this Bill in Mr. Chamberlain's suggestion. On the contrary, we believe that the Conservative party at least, would be less disposed to disappoint every popular hope in dealing with the question of Local Government, if they had yet to make their great fight for Conservatism on the larger measure, instead of having already fought and lost it, for there is no reactionary temper so acrid as that of the representatives of a lost cause. On the other hand, the Liberals would be well aware that if they are to do a bit of lasting work, they must legislate in the fashion which the householders of the counties will approve, and not leave to them a mere legacy of crude beginnings to complete. A good County Government Bill alone, so far as we can judge, would satisfy the country that the Liberal Administration of 1880 had begun in earnest to redeem the promises then made to the electors.

There is, however, the anti-Irish panic to be met. The Times, and those who, like the Times, are always preaching that Ireland wants nothing except a rigid enforcement of the Prevention of Crimes Act, are afraid that if a County Government Bill for England be introduced, there will be a great cry for its immediate extension to Ireland,—where the local government is, no doubt, even worse than in England,—and these organs preach that to let Irish counties govern themselves in local matters, means the same thing as letting them extirpate the landlords and plunder the middle class. In the mind of the leading journal, the panic on this subject is so great that all its ancient literary power deserts it, and articles intended to end in a solemn warning against the danger of stimulating Irish mobs to the work of persecution and confiscation, begin in drivelling statements that Mr. Gladstone and the Prince of Wales cannot properly be regarded in the light of dethroned Sovereigns,—a truism utterly without meaning in itself, and apparently only made in order to drag in an allusion to Voltaire's "Candide," and to convey what was intended as an insidious sneer at Mr. Gladstone. However, the mild fatuity of the opening passage is quite atoned for by the blind anger of the close, where Mr. Courtney, who stated expressly in his speech at Liskeard that he thought a County Government Bill should be produced, and that its provisions should at once be frankly extended to Ireland, so far as they suit the Irish, is referred to exactly as if he had thrown the weight of his authority against that voluntary extension of justice to Ireland. In truth, the article in Wednesday's Times was one of the most curious illustrations of the paralysing and blinding effects of panic that we have ever read. Now, what is the ground for that panic? Mr. Forster, who knows Ireland well, believes that it will be quite safe, and not only quite safe but a measure tending in the direction of safety, to grant Ireland a better local government, so long as you keep the Police under central authority. The Times writes as if County Boards for making roads and canals, discussing lines of rail, looking after the county asylums, entering into exceptional draining operations, and so forth, were institutions in which conspiracies could be hatched and murder threatened. We have little doubt, as we said last week, that they would be safety-valves for letting off a good deal of waste steam against the hated Saxon. England would be vehemently denounced at scores of them as having retarded for ages the physical development of the country, and in the main the indictment, though to-day a little belated, would be perfectly true. But men are not massacred because speeches are made against the Saxon, especially if, as would very often happen, the persons to be threatened took the popular side on local questions of this sort. What we maintain is that it is precisely the want of outlets for this sort of steam which makes the discontent of the Irish people so dangerous. If local patriotism could exhale itself in Boards of this kind, Fenianism would lose a great number of its supporters. The policy which stifles local life in Ireland in order to prevent disloyalty, is just like an attempt to suppress the rash in scarlet-fever,—you drive the heat inwards, and then delirium is the result. The Irish cry so fiercely for Home-rule, in great measure because their local institutions are so wretchedly inadequate, and because it is in local institutions that the shoe pinches most. Mr. Healy's very masterly speech on Wednesday on this subject deserves the most careful consideration. Fas est ab hoste doceri, especially when, as we have a shrewd suspicion in this case, the enemy tells us the truth not in the hope that we shall profit by it, but rather in the hope that his recommendation will prevent all chance of our adopting it. Let the panic-mongers put a little faith in Mr. Forster, whom they are always panegyrising for resenting the release of Mr. Parnell. Mr. Forster says plainly that Ireland needs nothing so much as a little decentralisation, and that if you keep the Police in the hands of the central authorities, a good scheme of local government in Ireland would do more to satisfy Irish wants than any other feasible remedy. Well, Mr. Forster is the last man to underrate the danger of conspiracy in Ireland.

He escaped assassination himself only as by a miracle. He is familiar with all the ramifications of treason in Ireland. But for all that, he can see, as all but panic-mongers see, that it is the worst policy in the world to drive treason inwards, and that a little free-speaking is one of the best possible cures for pent-up wrath.

MR. COURTNEY ON EGYPT.

MR. COURTNEY, in his speech at Liskeard on Monday, shrank from his own conclusion. That is not unusual with him, for, as a rule, his confidence in his own opinion is only surpassed by the courage, not to say audacity, with which he states his conclusions. In this instance, however, he has shrunk. In a most careful and forcible speech, full both of logic and of epigram, he argues that the British Government, after setting the Khedive on his feet, ought to retire from Egypt altogether. Its agent ought to be a mere adviser, whose advice the Khedive may disregard. He is "neither to interfere, nor overrule," but to be a mere servant, whom the ruler of Egypt may dismiss at pleasure. Sir Auckland Colvin is not to be "director, but an adviser; not nominated from without by England or France, but nominated from within by the Khedive; not irremovable, except by consent of England or France, but removable at the pleasure of the Khedive." The British are to leave Egypt, if not to stew in its own juice, at least to "simmer" in it, even if the simmering ends in anarchy. Mr. Courtney utterly repudiates the idea that anarchy is a reason for intervention. Let there be anarchy. Why not? "I am able to tolerate a good deal of anarchy in different parts of the world with perfect equanimity; and if anarchy be inevitable in Egypt, I do not see why we should be unable to tolerate it." Anarchy may be but the beginning of order, but if not, let us leave it alone. "I hope there are some few of us still left in England who believe in the old-fashioned doctrine of the Liberal Party, the doctrine of non-intervention; and we, I hope, are ready to look upon anarchy abroad, and to let nations simmer, and boil, and stew, and yet not interfere, unless we see some most patent proof, such as can rarely be brought forward, that a short and swift intervention would remove the cause of the disease." That is intelligible, at all events as intelligible as "Perish, Savoy!" But why does Mr. Courtney stop there? His logical course is to carry on his argument, and declare that in intervening in Egypt the Government committed a blunder, and ought to be condemned. If a blunder, it was a big one, one of the biggest on record, and Mr. Courtney ought to move a vote of condemnation explicit enough to prevent a repetition of the error. What is his excuse for not doing so? Just this, that the insurrection of Arabi "tended to produce a military tyranny." A military tyranny, besides being a great deal better than anarchy, is, in the East at all events, its invariable outcome. If Egypt fell into anarchy to-morrow, power would pass to the armed class; and that class, if history teaches anything, would set up a military tyranny. The process is as inevitable as cause and effect, and as Mr. Courtney admits that we may intervene to put down military tyranny, his argument just comes to this:—We may not send an expedition to suppress anarchy in Egypt, but may, when it has suppressed itself in the only possible way, send one to suppress its more endurable substitute; but must then again retire, in order that anarchy may a second time recommence. In fact, we may compel the people of Egypt to let their affairs revolve in a vicious and destructive circle, but may not govern Egyptians. We are at liberty to prevent government, but not at liberty to prevent anarchy. That is the conclusion, the preposterous conclusion of Mr. Courtney's speech, but we shall not pin him to his own absurdity. He only invented it in order to avoid the real conclusion in his own mind, that we ought never to have gone to Egypt at all, but to have allowed the Egyptians, through Arabi—or through the Devil, if they preferred him—to settle their affairs in their own way. If he had stated that conclusion, however, he must not only have resigned, which we do not doubt he would have done readily enough, but have attacked the Government, which, for reasons more important in his eyes than the future of Egypt, he was reluctant to do. And therefore, he improvises a special excuse for a special expedition which knocks his own general argument to pieces. If Egypt sinks into anarchy, it will sink under a military tyranny. If it sinks under military tyranny, England may intervene. Consequently, England may always intervene, with the proviso that to be in the right, she must always be just a little too late!

We do not believe that there are many sensible Radicals who will agree with Mr. Courtney, and certainly we shall not. We hold, on the contrary, that while military intervention in independent countries must usually be injudicious, its morality depends always on the object of intervention, and its judiciousness on circumstances varying with every separate case. There may be instances in which intervention is an imperative and supreme duty, instances in which it is at least advisable, and instances in which, for reasons of more importance than the fate of any single country, it is practically unavoidable. Suppose France to fall into hopeless anarchy, one-half the population butchering the other half, all European progress stopped by the calamity, and all that is good and sensible in France entreating an intervention seen to be entirely within our means, and not to involve that national ruin which is, by the law of self-preservation, prima facie reason against any movement whatever, is there to be no intervention? Yet our obligation to France, as compared with our obligation towards our own semi-dependent States, of which, ever since the arrangement of 1841, Egypt has been one, is infinitesimal. We in that year forcibly prevented the independence of Egypt. We defended by the sword that "sovereignty" of the Ottoman caste, which is the source of all Egyptian misery, as of all misery in Eastern Europe and Western Asia. We afterwards set up the Dual Control, which produced the insurrection, and yet we are said to have no right of intervention. We maintain that our previous action, our engagements to the Khedive, our pledges to the people whom we had helped to plunder for the benefit of usurers, bound us to intervene, even if our own people had not been massacred. But they were massacred. Does Mr. Courtney really mean to say that if the natives of India rise upon the Europeans and kill them out, we have no right to intervene? Certainly not, yet where is there a better foundation for our right in India than in Egypt? It is positively a worse one, for in India the majority would be only dealing harshly with an usurping caste, whose right rests on the sword; while in Egypt, the people were dealing with foreign guests, whose right, like their own right to come peaceably to England, rests upon positive treaty obligations. We can see no reason whatever for deserting our own people in that fashion; while we can see very clearly that if we had done it, British residence in Asia would have been impossible, and the world would have lost, among nearly half mankind, the only influence which, even if occasionally misused, tends permanently to reconcile liberty with order. Mr. Courtney might as well argue that we have no right to put down piracy in the Eastern seas, because Chinese and Malays either prefer that piracy should exist in their waters, or are too nearly anarchical in their modes of government to put it down.

We have carefully avoided speaking of English interests, because Mr. Courtney would say, justly, that they are not to be pleaded against higher considerations or interests broader still; but we suppose we may speak of duties, even to the Member for Liskeard. One of those duties is, while we hold India, to give Indians the benefit of good, gentle, and inexpensive government, and the first condition for its performance is that the petty isthmus which interrupts the water-route between Europe and India be kept in decent order. We have as much right, in the interest of the 250 millions of India, to insist that the five millions of Egypt shall not attack us in transit, as we have to put down piracy. That right at least is clear, and the exercise of that right involves the corresponding obligation to see that order is not maintained in Egypt in too oppressive a way, that we do not sacrifice the Egyptians to the Indians. What are we doing more than that? Mr. Courtney says we have no more business with Egypt than with Mexico. He might just as well say that he has no more business with his own doorstep than with the street, with the people of Ireland than with the people of Patagonia. Our business with the Egyptians arises from the fact that we are compelled by circumstances stronger than any theory to ask something of them. We ask nothing of Mexico, and if we intervene there, can do it only from motives of abstract philanthropy, which may mislead or be ill-founded. But we do ask much of Egypt, and must keep on asking it, and in that asking is the root of a moral obligation only less strong than that which binds a Government to its own people. We ask them to maintain order, to keep the Canal from attack, and to make some arrangement with their European creditors; and are bound to see that compliance, which is indispensable, shall involve as little Egyptian misery as we are able to ensure. That obligation, unhappily, involves interference, as Mr. Courtney would see in a moment, if he wanted free right of way through his neighbour's house, and burglars were in possession. He would help the police to transport them, without an idea that he was interfering with the right of his neighbour to mismanage his own affairs.

THE EXPULSION BILL IN THE SENATE.

M. ALLOU'S report to the Senate concerning the Expulsion Bill was, we are told, languidly received by that body, though it probably represents the feeling of the great majority of its Members. The truth is, no doubt, that it is much more like the report of an English Select Committee than that of one of the French Bureaux. It contains a very masterly Constitutional argument, and is almost exhaustive in its exposition of that argument; whereas, the ordinary practice of the French Bureaux is rather to write something of the nature of an epigram on the policy condemned or advocated by the Committee. M. Allou is not epigrammatic, but we may say this of his Report, that if circulated by an English House of Lords against such a Bill as that of the French Government, — were it possible to conceive of our House of Commons as approving anything so foolish as M. Fallières' Bill, — it would do a good deal to rehabilitate that Assembly, and inflict a ruinous blow on the reputation of any House of Commons that had endorsed the unjust and feeble policy of class proscription. M. Allou first states that the incident which originated this most threatening measure seemed to the Committee devoid of gravity, and that any disquietude which may exist in the country on the subject would be much fostered, instead of removed, by the commencement of a policy of proscription, — which would certainly be construed as a proof of weakness. M. Allou then goes on to state that a Government which has stood for twelve years through very serious crises, — which did not alter the law to deal with the Commune, nor to deal with the "Government of Combat," — has no excuse for altering it now; that plots abroad are at least as formidable as those at home, and that a measure therefore which only compels plotters to mature their plots abroad will be useless to prevent them. He declares that the attack made on true Republican principles by a policy of proscription is most formidable, that it is the beginning of a policy of suspicion, and of the punishment of objects of mere suspicion, and that such a policy is pretty sure to end in war upon the middle-classes of France, a war full of menace for the peace of France, as well as intrinsically unjust and anti-Republican in conception. When their country accepted the amnesty asked for by the apologists of the Commune, it intended to let bygones be bygones; but now a return to vindictive policy is advocated, not against those who, like the Communists, had broken the laws of the country, but against those who have been guilty of nothing more than an involuntary descent from persons of Royal or Imperial rank. M. Allou adds that the spirit which is at the bottom of the proposed law, is one which, if ever it triumphs, will certainly make short work with the Senate. The very existence of a second body of that kind, not emanating directly from the same origin as the Chamber of Deputies, will no longer be tolerated so soon as it is found that it pleads for a larger and more genuinely tolerant spirit of Republicanism than any which the suspicions of the violent party are inclined to sanction. The Committee recommend a simple rejection of the Bill.

It seems to us impossible to present a stronger Constitutional argument than this Report contains, nor can we think that if the difference between the two Chambers proves to be insurmountable, and a dissolution ensues, M. Allou's Report can fail to exert a great influence over the constituencies, and to contribute to swell the party of liberty and order, against the party of jealous and cowardly suspicions. If France once consents to make an offence of lineage at all, she will soon be embarked in the disagreeable task of distinguishing the lineages which are dangerous from the lineages which are not; and then all the men of aristocratic birth, and some, perhaps, of the descendants of men of purely political reputation, may well come in for the ostracising brand. Nor will the matter end here. If his lineage is to put a bad mark against a man's name, it will soon be argued, — very justly, — that associations and friendships are at least as powerful as lineage, in tempting a man into dangerous combinations. And so the policy of personal denunciation will be fairly inaugurated. It seems to us that the Senate can hardly do better for its reputation as a political Body, than stand or fall by this declaration of Constitutional principles. If it fall, it will fall with the fall of Republican principles, — with that spirit of comprehensiveness without which a Republic has no glory, — with the credit of the Republic itself. But if it succeeds in either persuading the Chamber, or still better, the country, to reject this most unjust and feeble measure, then it will take a different rank in the Constitution from that time forward. It will have earned its right to pose as the shield and safeguard of the Republic against the frothy fury of popular panic. And a more dignified attitude than this for the second Chamber of the Republic, it is impossible, in our opinion, to assume.

THE COMING TENANT-RIGHT BILL.

IT is quite possible that Tenant-right for Great Britain may occupy an unexpected share of attention in the coming Session. Many influential politicians are pressing a strong Agricultural Holdings Bill upon the Government; Lord Hartington promised that some measure should be brought forward; and many Liberal Members, especially from Scotland, have expressed a fervent hope that there may be no further delay. Above all, the farmers themselves are growing enthusiastic and angry. Their position in many districts, Essex especially, is growing worse than ever. They see no prospect of a good crop this year, prices do not rise, their capital is becoming exhausted, and they have, especially in the South, sold and pledged their live stock, from which alone they expect profit, to a most alarming extent. They are feeding sheep, in particular, from which the dealers alone will reap gain. They are, moreover, suffering more and more from what we may call an imaginative cause. Farmers, though not a sanguine race, are accustomed to encounter a bad year or two, and are well aware that in their business they more than other men must rely upon averages, rather than upon the results of any special year. The long continuance of the present distress has, however, daunted them; they have lost hope, and they are beginning, for the first time in this generation, to dread leases, instead of hankering after them. A long right of occupancy implies a long-continued claim for rent, and they think, if affairs do not improve, "a lease may prove nothing but a millstone." The larger men among them are anxiously seeking, therefore, for a tenure which shall give security, yet not involve a lease; and they have hit upon a formula which they think sufficient. Not only the Farmers' Alliance and its federated branches, but a part of the Central Chamber of Agriculture and its federated Chambers have adopted two demands, — that they shall be entitled to compensation for unexhausted improvements, and that the landlord shall not be permitted, even under contract, to increase rent in consequence of such improvements. The effect of these two measures will be, they think, that they may spend their money secure of its return, and may remain, without leases, nearly secure against eviction.

The tenants will, we imagine, get a strong Bill. Part of their demand, that they should have security for unexhausted improvements, is obviously just. A man can live in a house without improving it, and, indeed, by living there deteriorates it; but a farmer cannot farm properly without improving the farm. It is right that he should be compensated for outlays, and as it is of national importance that agriculture be good, it may be wise to forbid individual farmers from contracting themselves out of their claim. We do forbid all other contracts to the public injury, and if that one can be shown to be injurious, it may fairly be forbidden too. That argument is strong, and so are the tenant-farmers. They send up the county Members, they are angry enough to disregard party politics, and the landlords have for the moment very little influence. They are seeking tenants, not picking them, and can no more reject applicants for holding Alliance principles than they can reject them for carrying flowers in their button-holes on Sunday. The farmers may be perfectly sure that the Government will meet their wishes to the largest extent compatible with justice, and will do their utmost to carry a substantial Bill.

We should say that, after much consideration, the whole demand of the Farmers will be made a principle of law, — that compensation for unexhausted improvements will be granted, even in defiance of contract; and that the serious controversy will rage around the question of suspending freedom of contract, as regards increase of rent upon unexhausted improvements. That is a most grave demand, if, as we understand from the proceedings at the Alliance meeting, it is to be seriously pressed, and one which will rouse interests outside the Agricultural world. That a farmer should enjoy his improvements, if he remains, without increase of rent, based upon his own outlay for the benefit of the farm, may be reasonable—though the vitality of the soil being the basis of improvement, the landlord who owns that vitality has some claim to a share—and may at all events be conceded as a principle of law; but that a farmer should be forbidden to give a higher rent, if he pleases and has contracted to do it, is a serious demand. Let us extend it to houses. J. Smith, with a thirty years' lease of his house still to run, wants a new bath-room, and builds one at his own expense. When the lease has expired, the owner finds that the bath-room has raised the value of the house five per cent., and puts that addition upon the rent. That seems hard, but Smith knew the terms of his lease, knew that when it expired he would have no rights, and still, to comfort himself during his term, made his improvement. Can it be wise, or even just, to forbid both landlord and tenant to make such an agreement? The landlord, it is clear, will be injured, for he will either have to forfeit his right of eviction and his higher rent, or pay for a bath-room he did not want to buy; and the tenant will be injured, for he will be forbidden to build to his own hurt, even when desirous of so wasting his money. The effect of such a rule must be to induce the rural landlord to refuse permission to improve, lest he should lose his right of re-entrance without payment, and so to diminish the tenant's liberty to put capital in the soil. That can hardly be to the benefit of agriculture, and besides, there is a more general principle to be considered. If we are to protect a tenant, always a grown man, presumably sane, and specially acquainted with his own trade, from injudiciously investing his own money, where are we to stop? Is the Legislature to tell Messrs. Swan and Edgar that the fancy for Japanese silks will not last, and that, consequently, they must not contract to buy those silks long in advance? The principle is exactly the same; and unless some great gain can be shown to arise to the community from the prohibition, it cannot be logically defended. Such gain was shown in Ireland, because the principal or sole occupation being agriculture, the farmers could not, however oppressed, throw up their farms, and society itself was endangered by their misery; but can any such argument be pleaded for this country? In England and Scotland, surely, farming is but one business in a hundred, and the least gainful of all; while, as a matter of fact, farms are thrown up by thousands a year, without anybody, except the landlords, even noticing the fact. Society is not shaken, or even alarmed.

We have no wish whatever to condemn off-hand a proposal adopted unanimously by such important bodies of skilled men, but we must point out to them that they are restricting their own liberties very seriously. A farmer who may not make the contract he pleases is a farmer fettered. He may very well wish to say to a landlord, "If you will give me such and such privileges, say, the total extirpation of game, I, on my part, will, at the expiration of my term, accept any rent to be fixed by mutual consent, without valuation." If that suits him, why should he be forbidden to make that arrangement? The farmers answer, "Because, if free contract is allowed, the landlord will compel us to surrender our right;" but where is the compulsion? The farmer has only to refuse to take the farm, and the landlord must give way. The "pull of the market" is with the tenant, and if it were not, farmers can combine. One of the speakers at the Alliance meeting on Tuesday spoke as if any form of free contract was fatal to the farmer, and indeed said, as the Times reports, that "freedom of contract meant 'take the land on the landlord's conditions, or leave it;'" but is that true? Of course if it is true, then, in the interest of agriculture, freedom may be limited; but is it true? The landlords say that at present they can get no conditions at all, and the tenants say that their farms ruin them. Then where is there such compulsion to submit to the landlords, that to make agriculture possible the tenants must be deprived of their own most ordinary liberties? There may be reasons for such demands imperceptible to us, but they certainly seem to involve in principle Fixity of Tenure, and will be resisted by the landlords just as strenuously; while the landlords will be supported by men who very seldom act with them, but will dread other applications of the same idea. Everything in this country is leased out, from farms to public singers, and in all cases the terms of renewal are left to depend either upon contract or agreement. The farmers wish for an exceptional law against contract, and will find that, at first, at all events, the public is not with them. It will understand very well why rent should not be raised on them, because of their improvements, without their own consent; but it will not understand why they should wish to debar themselves from the right of consenting.

THE RITUALISTS AND THE EVANGELICALS.

THE announcement that in the coming election of a Proctor for the Clergy in Convocation to take the place of Canon Wilkinson, Prebendary Cadman will be opposed as too friendly to Ritualism, will surprise any one who has ever been inside his church. Yet the statement seems to be true, albeit it be strange, and coming so soon after the proceedings at the Islington Evangelical Conferences, and the controversy which has sprung out of them, it may be taken to indicate the formation of two distinct groups—using the word in the French sense—in the Evangelical party. Hitherto, the distinction between the extreme and the centre men in the High Church party has been very marked, but there has been nothing corresponding to it among the Evangelicals. Now, the omission is to be set right, and though the great body of the party will vote for Mr. Cadman, a few ardent spirits will seek a representative who has not suffered himself to be led astray by such blind guides as common-sense and Christian charity. The chief sinners at the Islington Conference were Canon Eliot and Mr. Goe, and besides the melancholy defection revealed by their speeches, a correspondent of the Record has lately brought to light the fact that one at least of them practises what he preaches. The point that gave most offence in the Islington speeches was the "levelling-up" policy, which proposes to admit preaching in the surplice, surpliced choirs, and choral services into Evangelical churches. Mr. Goe contended that these practices, being in themselves harmless, and also as imparting "additional brightness and liveliness" to the service, "should be generously acknowledged as consistent with a loyal adherence to Evangelical truth." Mr. Eliot asked the Conference to have done with the huge mistake of "wasting powder and shot against such mere trifles as surplices and choir boys, and the like." It is difficult to go all lengths with Mr. Goe, because to do so would be to admit that a sermon may become brighter and livelier by being preached in a surplice, a conclusion which, for the sake of a large number of Churchgoers, we could heartily wish were true. But it is on no such trivial ground as this that the Extreme Left of the party rest their protest. One of the Record's correspondents says boldly that the wonder at Islington was not that such a man as Canon Eliot should have made such a speech, but that such a man as Canon Eliot should have been allowed to speak at all. Rumours, it seems, from Bournemouth "have often given pain." The church of which Canon Eliot is Vicar has not served the purpose for which it was designed. It was built as a protest against the surrounding Ritualism; it has really become Ritualist itself. Instead of playing the part of a "warning beacon," Mr. Eliot has preferred to be a humble imitator. It is quite natural, therefore, that he should plead for more toleration to Ritualists, and protest against the "disastrous policy of attempting to stay error by prosecutions and imprisonments." He is not really the enemy of the Ritualists; consequently, he has no desire to see them turned out of the Church of England. One of his critics, indeed, has no doubt as to what his ultimate destination will be. He once knew a case exactly like his which ended in Rome, and it is to Rome that Canon Eliot is unconsciously marching. Nobody has yet been found to say that Mr. Cadman is also marching towards Rome, but it is quite possible that before the day of election comes, even this wonderful imagination will have been conceived and brought forth.

The one fact of real interest about this singular controversy is the effect which it will have in the long-run on the relations of the two centre parties to one another. It is plain that there is at present less in common between the Extreme and the Moderate Evangelicals, than there is between Moderate Evangelicals and Moderate High Churchmen. Nearly everything that Mr. Eliot said at Islington might have been said by hosts of men who have always been accustomed to call themselves High Churchmen; and but for the prosecutions, which have greatly increased the fellow-feeling between the Moderate men and the Ritualists of the High-Church party, it would hardly occur to them that they and Mr. Eliot belonged to different Ecclesiastical parties. If the Evangelicals as a body take to preaching in the surplice, to having choral services sung by surpliced choirs, and to emphasizing the positive rather than the negative side of their faith—the points on which they and High Churchmen agree, rather than those on which they differ—it will be very difficult to draw a line between them and the High Churchmen who have precisely the same kind of services, and preach sermons not greatly differing from theirs. If this process were to go on without interruption, the two centres would naturally be drawn together, as against the Extreme Right on the one side, and the Extreme Left on the other. To the latter, the change would be of no importance. The Extreme Evangelicals have always been weak, both in numbers and influence. But the Ritualists have beyond doubt gained a great deal from their forming the extreme wing of a large party, and the amalgamation of the centres would mean that this source of strength would be cut off for the future. Instead of shading off by imperceptible degrees into the general body of High Churchmen, they would stand out in sharp antagonism to an enormous array of Moderate Churchmen, belonging professedly to neither party, and tending, therefore, to regard any party outside themselves as alien from the true spirit of the Church of England. If this rearrangement of parties were effected after the Ritualists had secured toleration, it might not greatly matter. But if it were effected before that time, it might make the conquest of toleration very much more difficult. The motive with which that toleration will be given will be, in most cases, a dislike of the possible consequences arising from the refusal of it, and the magnitude of these consequences will greatly depend upon the number of the clergy who regard themselves as in some sort mixed up and bound to make common cause with the Ritualists. As long as the party lines between High Churchmen and Evangelicals remain where they are, many of the former will regard themselves in this light. 'These men,' they will say, 'go very much beyond me; but, after all, they are High Churchmen, and it is not for me to desert them when they are oppressed.' But if the party lines are drawn differently—and the thing that comes most naturally to the mind of a Moderate High Churchman is his substantial identity with the Moderate Evangelical—he may be more inclined to look upon the Ritualists as simple disturbers of the Ecclesiastical peace. How the problem will work out depends mainly upon the extent to which Ritualism has really leavened the High-Church party. If the extent to which it has done this is considerable, the Moderate Evangelicals, on coming up to the point where the Moderate High Churchmen were yesterday, will find that they have moved a day's journey further on, and that the relative distance between them still remains what it was. Whether this will prove to be the case, nothing but time and experience can show. So far as merely a priori considerations go, the probabilities on both sides are curiously balanced.

LORD RIPON AND THE BLACK ACT.

THE Viceroy of India has not, we fear, been wise in once more bringing forward the old "Black Act," but it is absurd to accuse him of "sentimentalism." Lord Macaulay was no sentimentalist, and the proposal to make Europeans in India as liable to all Civil Courts as Natives are was originally his. Mr. Bethune was the very reverse of a sentimentalist, and the second Black Act, extending the liability to criminal proceedings, was his, and was accepted by Lord Dalhousie, the least sentimental of mankind. The truth is, that for the last half-century every Viceroy, and a great majority of all Civilians, have felt precisely as all reformers in the Eastern Mediterranean now feel about the Capitulations, that exemptions from jurisdiction because of nationality are always indefensible in theory, and occasionally injurious in practice. They create a privileged class, they diminish the motive for selecting Native Magistrates with care, and they make it more difficult for poor natives, when injured by the privileged caste, to obtain swift and inexpensive redress. These arguments, in themselves very strong, are fortified in India by the dislike of the Executive to admit that its agents deserve distrust, by a profound desire to destroy the feeling that natives, even when entrusted with power, are watched more than Europeans would be, and by a distaste, only half-conscious, for the settlers, who are often very rough, and who, whether rough or refined, break the otherwise perfect uniformity of obedience to official decrees. For all these reasons, and perhaps for one more, a desire to be able to say that perfect equality is secured by British domination, successive Governments have stripped away the old European privileges, until only one remains. A European accused of breaking the law can be arrested, committed, tried, and condemned like anybody else; but only by the European officials. If the Magistrate is a native, he can only commit, and not condemn. This privilege, which is, in theory, at all events, offensive to Native Magistrates, it is now proposed to take away.

The non-official Europeans are naturally excited, and as usual with most colonists, and especially colonists unrepresented in the governing body and debarred from political training, indulge in exaggeration. They have, however, a real case to put forward, which is briefly this. The reason which makes it expedient that an accused person in England should be tried by a jury—often a very foolish body—namely, the confidence in the law thus created, makes it expedient that an Englishman in Asia should, when accused, be tried by an Englishman. He has no confidence in anybody else, and in destroying his confidence you make him a bad subject, apt to think it indispensable, in the absence of justice, to defend himself by illegal means. If he distrusts the Court, he will terrorise the witnesses, and, perhaps, the magistrate. We all see how that goes on in Ireland, and though the Anglo-Indian settlers are not like Irishmen, they are very determined, very sensitive, and possessed of very considerable means of inspiring terror. It is better to inspire them, as at present they are inspired, with confidence in the law, more especially as, if placed under Native Magistrates, they would have some reason for distrust. Those Magistrates, as a body, do their work most creditably. The most bitter European does not profess to doubt either their intelligence or their knowledge of law. They are free from direct corruption to a degree which in Asia is extraordinary, and exceedingly sensitive both to official rebuke and to public comment on their proceedings. So far, indeed, from oppressing the Europeans, they would in a great many cases be far more afraid than the Civilians of the angry fuss which is excited by any suspicion of injustice to a European. But, on the other hand, they dislike the non-official Europeans exceedingly, detest their ways, their bearing, their modes of transacting business, and their presence altogether. They are often prejudiced against them, apt to believe complaints, and not unwilling to see their dislike justified by proved charges. They would not, we believe, be betrayed into law-breaking, but they would feel, as Irish gentlemen feel about agitators, no displeasure if the evidence of the Police is very clear. As to the danger of false accusations, on which the Times' correspondent dwells, that would not be much increased by the change. Nothing stops a rich native, if he pleases, from suborning witnesses now; and a European Magistrate can no more detect that they are telling falsehoods than a Native Magistrate can, perhaps not quite so well. Still, the Native is prejudiced, as a Swiss Magistrate is prejudiced, against the noisy, independent, over-visible foreigner, whom he only half understands, and thinks insolent, when he is only wanting in knowledge of behaviour. A perception of that, intensified, of course, by the differences of civilisation, creed, and colour, and by the European's feeling that he is the superior—which is true, or why are we in India?—destroys the settler's confidence, and makes him, instead of a supporter of the laws, a bitter and dangerous enemy of the official system. His desire to escape from the country with a fortune, which is already his greatest disqualification as a good Indian citizen, is intensified, and he develops that unreasoning and incurable distrust and hatred of his Government which, more perhaps than any other single cause, overthrew the East India Company. This distrust, already wonderfully softened, for we can remember when it extended to every servant of the Government, without distinction of colour, will gradually fade away, and it is a pity to revive it, in order to carry prematurely a reform not demanded by any consensus of Native opinion.

If the opinion of the people of India were hostile to privilege, we should say the time for a rigid equality had arrived, but it is not so. The strangest and most interesting feature of the wonderful Indian system of administration, a system which strikes German, American, and French travellers alike with a profound admiration, is that it secures justice and order, while recognising individual rights to an extent which would seem to an ordinary jurist absolutely anarchical. There are said to be more than fifty systems of marriage, divorce, and inheritance legally in force in India, pleadable in our Courts, and dependent on personal privilege,—that is, caste or creed custom; and there are certainly five in active execution in every city. Monogamy, modified polygamy and limitless polygamy, divorce by suit, divorce on conditions, divorce at will, perpetual entail, distribution by will, equal division of inheritances, unequal division, division with females excluded, division with females only included, are systems all in force in the same district, and dependent on caste laws, creed laws, tribe laws, and even family customs. Certain ranks are exempted from certain modes of summons. Certain classes, especially well-placed native ladies, are exempted from certain duties as witnesses; certain families cannot be tried at all,—everywhere, at every turn, privilege, religious, or personal, or official, is formally acknowledged. This particular privilege may, therefore, be acknowledged also, without creating any important anomaly. The Native Magistracy do not like it, —though we should doubt if they are quite unanimous, the relief from responsibility being considerable—the educated Natives of the coast fringe, who have imbibed European ideas, dislike it strongly; but the body of the people, whose acquiescence is our security, care nothing about it, and are either unaware of its existence—for, remember, ninety per cent. of all Natives in the huge interior have never spoken to an European in their lives—or regard it, as the Telegraph, we see, argues, as a natural and becoming privilege of a superior caste. It can hardly be worth while, in the absence alike of popular feeling or of great visible mischief, to destroy the confidence in the law of an immensely valuable class of commercial pioneers. We understand Lord Ripon's motive perfectly well, and have a great respect for the benevolence which resents even a slight passed upon the less powerful strata of society; but it is well to wait, till an opinion already rapidly advancing allows the change to be made almost as a matter of course. India is not the land where equality is a dream of the people, and while, in every country of Asia, we insist by force on the Capitulations, it is well to retain the argument that even in our own dominions we find them useful.

THE EAST-LOTHIAN ELECTION.

SINCE Monday, much ingenuity has been displayed, both in Scotland and here, in explaining the fact that on that day Lord Elcho, who is a follower of Lord Salisbury, but an advanced Land Reformer, polled 92 votes more in East Lothian than Mr. Finlay, who is a follower of Mr. Gladstone, but considers the present relationship between Church and State in Scotland as "beneficial." We are told that Lord Elcho was personally popular, though politically unenlightened, and that his father's tenants, finding him as ready as his opponent to give them "compulsory compensation for unexhausted improvements, where they have added to the letting value of the farm," saw no reason why they should take advantage of the ballot to desert the Wemyss family. Then, it is contended that Mr. Finlay was the right man, but in the wrong place; that the Liberal managers in East Lothian should have secured a candidate pledged, like Mr. Craig Sellar, the Member for Haddington Burghs, or Mr. Buchanan, who, at the last general election polled in East Lothian, on a smaller register, 25 votes more than did Mr. Finlay on Monday, not to oppose Scotch Disestablishment in Parliament. Finally, we are told that the election was decided not by general, but by local questions; that Mr. Finlay was beaten not on Church or Land, but on trawling. But one fact we have not seen any adequate attempt to explain,—that not far from 200 electors did not exercise their rights on Monday, that Lord Elcho's poll was within some 50 votes of a bare majority of the constituency. It is vehemently contended that the Dissenters who abstained from voting for Mr. Finlay were the merest handful, and we sincerely trust that this is the case. Nowhere have we seen the number of these abstainers—or "abstentionists," as they prefer to style themselves—placed at a higher figure than 25, or the difference between Mr. Buchanan's poll in 1880 and Mr. Finlay's on Monday. How are the remaining 170 or so, who did not go to the poll, to be accounted for, as the contest was long and unprecedentedly keen, and desperate efforts, unknown at an ordinary election, were made on both sides to beat-up recruits. However this fact be explained, it must be reckoned as the one consoling fact for Liberals in connection with the East-Lothian election. There is every reason to believe that Lord Elcho's poll of 492 represents the fighting strength of his party in the county. Its advance of twenty-three on his father's vote in 1880 seems to be adequately explained by the natural growth of the constituency and of Conservatism in it,—not to speak of the "unearned increment" of faggot-votes or fictitious residents. Even, therefore, if the County Franchise Act were not passed before another election, there is a sufficiently unpolled and presumably conquerable element in Haddingtonshire to turn the scale in favour of a good Liberal candidate.

As it stands, however, the East-Lothian Election means that in Scotland parties are practically agreed as to Land Reform, and that if the Liberal supremacy is to be maintained at the next general election, a modus vivendi must be established between the followers of Mr. Gladstone who are without and those who are within the Kirk. So far as profession goes, Lord Elcho is virtually in line with the various bodies representative of the agricultural interest that this week have agreed to unite on Compensation for Improvements. It may be said that in Parliament Lord Elcho will forget his East-Lothian creed, and vote as English Conservatives do. But for one thing, it is by no means certain that English Conservatives will not prove as Radical as the Farmers' Alliance itself on the subject of Tenant-right. Even if they are not, Lord Elcho will not vote with them. The history of the abolition of agricultural hypothec, which was the leading Scotch tenant's question, before Compensation for Improvements became his cry, should not be forgotten. Conservative Members and candidates in Scotland opposed it, as long as they could. At last they were educated up to the acceptance of abolition by a series of disasters at the poll. The Scotch Conservatives who were returned at the general election of 1874 were to a man pledged to abolition. They were certainly dilatory in keeping their pledges, but in the long-run they did keep them, in spite of the opposition of their English brethren, who endeavoured—somewhat languidly, it must be admitted—to raise the cry of "The Law of Distress in danger!" As it was after 1874, so it will be now. If tenant-right in some form becomes, as it evidently will become, a leading Parliamentary question in the Session that is about to commence, Lord Elcho will be asked to keep the promises he made in East Lothian,—and he will keep them. In respect of the general lines of legislation, the land question in the Lowlands of Scotland—the land question in the Highlands is a very different thing—is as good as settled, at all events until the County Franchise Bill is passed, and it be ascertained what the agricultural labourer has to say for himself.

There is manifestly a sad want of light, and still more of leading, in regard to the Church question, in the Scotch Liberal camp, at the present moment. We think the Dissenters who on Monday abstained from voting for Mr. Finlay, and so reduced his poll, made a decided, if not a grave mistake, even from their own Disestablishment point of view. Mr. Finlay is a sound Liberal and a capable politician, and in every way a man worth returning to Parliament. His very firmness in declining to vote for Disestablishment is promising; he who declines to yield to pressure, may yield to suasion. From the stand-point of the practical politician, too, his position is unassailable. The question of Scottish Disestablishment cannot and ought not to be dealt with, till the passing of the County Franchise Bill gives an opportunity for eliciting the opinion of those persons most interested in the Kirk. On the other hand, the Scotch Disestablishers deserve all respect and consideration,—such respect and consideration as they have obtained from Mr. Gladstone and Lord Hartington. The United Presbyterian Church, the third most important religious body in Scotland, is distinctly and openly Voluntary, and therefore, cannot fail to support and agitate for Disestablishment. The Free Church has thrown itself into the movement, accepting the Patronage Abolition Act of 1874 as a challenge to it to assail the Kirk. It may have abandoned its original ecclesiastical principles in doing so, but there is no doubt as to the fact. The vote for Disestablishment at the last meeting of the Free Church Assembly was 472, as against a total of 158 in favour of other proposals for letting the Kirk alone and delaying the assault on it. It is perfectly idle to describe a movement so supported in a democratic Church as a merely "clerical" one. No just Churchman in Scotland denies that the Free and United Presbyterian Churches between them contain a large portion of the earnest religious feeling, industry, and respectability of the country. No just Liberal denies that their movement—though it may be premature, and politically a mistake—is in the direction of that complete religious equality which he accepts as one of his ideals.

The conduct of the particular Disestablishers in East Lothian who on Monday abstained from voting for Mr. Finlay, though much to be regretted, is not inexplicable. Rightly or wrongly, they think the Disestablishment question the most important of purely Scotch problems at the present time. They are bent on educating Scotch Members and candidates for Parliament up to their standpoint, and they have so far succeeded, that they claim such representatives of official Scotch Liberalism as the Lord Advocate and Mr. Craig Sellar as converts. They were bitterly disappointed that there should have been chosen as Liberal candidate for East Lothian a politician who, from their point of view, is reactionary, as compared with the candidate of 1880. They justify their abstention finally on the ground that Monday's election was only a bye one, with which the fate of Mr. Gladstone or the Liberal Party was not bound up. We believe that they have acted wrongly, but we also believe that they have acted on principle; and that Mr. Gladstone and Lord Hartington would be the first to admit this. Yet during the course of the election they have been told almost daily by the influential Edinburgh journal whose exertions in the interests of its party are marked by zeal rather than sweet reasonableness, that they are "busy-bodies," "dictators," and "crotcheteers." "If half-a-dozen men in East Lothian may compel the Liberal Party to declare as a whole for Disestablishment, why may not half-a-dozen anti-vaccinators in any other place compel the Liberal Party to declare against vaccination? What 'ism' is there that under such a proposition would not have to be made an article of Liberal faith? As if Disestablishment could, from the Liberal point of view, be placed on the same platform as anti-vaccination! As if a movement which at bottom is one for the establishment of religious equality could be dismissed as an "ism"! Writing like this, though it may be meant to support the Liberal cause, is calculated to do more harm than a score of Nonconformist "abstentions" to a Liberal candidate, even to so courteous and fair-minded a candidate as Mr. Finlay. For it means, not of course in intention, but in effect, the substitution of a Tory policy of exasperation for a Whig policy of opportunism and conciliation.

If such a policy is persisted in, if Liberal Dissenters and Liberal Churchmen are set by the ears, nothing but party mischief, if not disaster, will be the result. We do not, indeed, believe that the Nonconformists of Scotland would, in the event of Mr. Gladstone's having soon to appeal to the country on any fundamental question of Liberal policy, insist on sacrificing him and it to Disestablishment. But they might not be so loyal to any other leader. Above all, they clearly do not consider themselves bound to postpone the national consideration of the question they have so much at heart, sine die. It seems reasonable, however, that they should defer the formal raising of it until after the passing of the County Franchise Act, on the distinct understanding that then the issue shall not be shirked. Such, at least, seems to be the idea of Mr. Asher, the Scotch Solicitor-General, as indicated on Tuesday in a speech to his constituents of the Elgin Burghs,—a speech which, from its candour and freshness, is indicative of something more like a reserve force in Scotch politics than anything we have read for a long time. Is it not possible for a truce to be established between Liberal Dissenters and Liberal Churchmen, on some such terms and for some such period as have been suggested? Here is an achievement worthy of and open to Lord Rosebery, the most popular and conciliatory of Scotch Liberals,—one, too, which would make him Minister for Scotland in an incomparably higher sense than the departmental one.

SACRED ANARCHY.

WE just drew attention last week to the remarkable letter in the Daily News of February 2nd, on the creed of M. Élisée Reclus, the great geographer and socialist, who sympathises so cordially with the Nihilist conspirators of Lyons, and was willing to share his imprisonment with Prince Krapotkine, if he could provoke the French Government to include him among the victims of their prosecution. But the subject well deserves a somewhat closer attention, for it is indeed perhaps the most curious phenomenon of the present day. What M. Élisée Reclus appears to believe is this,—that if once you can dissolve all existing institutions—Government, first of all—and especially get rid of the use of force in any organised way, men will then freely co-operate, first, in working for the production of what all need, and then in sharing—not, if we rightly understand him, equally, but in some reasonable proportion or other, the exact rectitude of which it will not be worth while to dispute—the produce which all have concurred to bring into existence. That we may not be supposed to put utterly incredible opinions into the great geographer's mouth, we will quote his exact language:—"Anarchists object, not to Governments alone, but to every sort of authority. 'What would you do on board a ship in a storm?' I asked M. Reclus. 'As Greek sailors,' he answered; 'choose the ablest mariner amongst us—the one with the best coup d'œil—to take the management of the ship. But we should neither treat him as a captain nor call him one,—simply carry out his directions, as one has to carry out the directions of a surgeon who performs an operation. Every man to his métier.' 'And this great division of property,' I inquired, 'how would you bring that about?' 'We don't intend to bring it about at all,' was his reply; 'we are not so bête as to suppose that it is either desirable or possible to make an equal division of property. But we look upon all property as the common possession of humanity, and we consider that it should be enjoyed in common. There is enough for all, and all should work, and all enjoy the fruits of their labour. But this end can never be attained by Governments, or through irresponsible deputies; we propose, therefore, to put an end to both.' 'How, in that case, would you protect the weak from the strong, how put down crime and punish criminals; for the destruction of authority would imply the abolition of tribunals, police, and soldiers?' 'The man who commits a crime,' he said, 'interferes with my freedom, impedes my liberty of action. He would be brought before one of the groups into which society would spontaneously resolve itself, and—I do not say punished—restrained. But we should not require courts and policemen for that.' The serious belief that all property is to be enjoyed in common, and that there will yet be no scramble for the enjoyment of it, limited as it is in quantity, or at least no scramble which "the groups into which society would spontaneously resolve itself" would not be able "to restrain" without "punishing," is one of those amazing states of mind which it takes a good deal of consideration to distinguish from sheer insanity. The man who said that he was the son of Apollo, and when reminded that he had formerly spoken of himself as the son of Jupiter, promptly replied, "So I am, but by a different mother," was hardly, to our conception, in a more hopeless condition of confusion than the man who at the same time regards all our existing institutions as the mere result of artificially applied force, and yet refuses to see that the disposition to apply such artificial force must itself be natural, else Government could never have reached the dimensions it has. What M. Élisée Reclus and his friends virtually say is this,—'Society, as we have it, is the child of artifice; our desire to return to a happier state of things is the child of Nature,' and when we turn upon them, and say, 'yet we thought you regarded your own violent and exceptional measures for producing anarchy as the children of artifice,' they reply virtually, like the lunatic,—'So we do, but by a different mother.'

Men who are driven into paradoxes of this fierce description cannot, of course, whatever their command of definite knowledge—and M. Élisée Reclus's command of it is said to be absolutely enormous—be regarded as rational beings. It is not rational in any sense to talk of the groups into which society would resolve itself, as soon as existing institutions were dissolved, as having to commence anew the restraining functions of those institutions, and yet to arraign all our present arrangements of that kind as absolutely bad; it is not rational, in any sense, to talk of the impossibility of making any equal division of property, and yet to represent it as the most natural thing in the world that all property and all work should be shared by all, without any arrangements for forcibly equalising the proportions. All this reminds us of the violent incongruity of which we have so much experience in dreams, and so little, as a rule, in waking hours. But, perhaps, the oddest thing of all is to note the highly artificial character of some of the moral obligations to which these Anarchists passionately cling, while they denounce courts of justice, marriage, punishment, police, all the ordinary outcome of our common life, with such unimaginable resentment. In the earlier part of his letter, the Daily News correspondent had explained that Prince Krapotkine is a foreigner who was never domiciled in France, that he might very likely have got his sentence declared void by appealing to the highest Court on this question as to his liability to the provisions of the French law; but, said M. Élisée Reclus, "he would rather die, than take advantage of an opportunity by which his companions in misfortune could not equally profit." And M. Élisée Reclus, it is declared, shares these highly honourable prepossessions to the utmost point. "A few days ago, when in all earnestness he placed himself at the disposal of the Lyons examining Judge, he informed his mother that he might have to go to prison. 'Go,' she answered, 'if you consider it your duty.' He has further proved his willingness to enter the lion's den, by asking the Prefect of Lyons for an order to visit Prince Krapotkine at the Maison d'Arrêt; and if he receives the order, he will go." In other words, while all the ordinary bonds of society seem to these Anarchists bonds in the basest sense, the highly complex instincts which go by the name of "honour," and which appear to impose on colleagues the duty of suffering simultaneously in the same cause, even when they cannot alleviate each other's sufferings by so doing, except so far as the very thought that they are all suffering simultaneously, though not in any actual companionship, for the same cause, may perhaps constitute such an alleviation,—are glorified for them into almost religious impulses. Yet is it possible to conceive any instincts more subtly evolved from the very depth of that social life which produces all the conventions, than this delicate sense of esprit de corps which considers it almost disgraceful to live at ease while a friend who shares all your views is suffering for those views, and while you might, if you pleased, be suffering for them too? There are plenty of primitive social conditions in which such a feeling as this would be simply unintelligible,—in which men who would willingly go to the stake to save a friend, would be wholly unable to see any opportunity of easing his sufferings by merely bringing to his knowledge that another of his colleagues who might be comparatively happy and at rest, had voluntarily elected to be miserable too. Yet this highly artificial thread of honour apparently binds these men who are crying out for the immediate loosing of all the more ordinary bonds of social life.

Nevertheless, the explanation of the riddle—so far as it has an explanation—will probably be found in this highly ideal side of the Anarchists' feelings. The less compulsory, the more shadowy, is the thread which ties them, the more obedience they yield it. We are not quite sure, for instance, that if M. Élisée Reclus could get Prince Krapotkine out of prison by simply offering to suffer for him, he would feel it half as much his duty to do this, as he would to suffer simultaneously with the Prince, so that neither should get any advantage (except, perhaps, some vague sense of spiritual companionship) from the other's sufferings. The moment you render it possible for one of the comrades to think of the other as selfish for taking advantage of his friend's sacrifice, that moment probably you kill the desire in him thus to help his friend. Prince Krapotkine would not hear of availing himself of an excuse which would have rendered him more fortunate than his fellow-prisoners. M. Élisée Reclus is quite eager to go to prison, also. But if either of them thought that the other was really gaining happiness at his expense, would not the shadowy sense of obligation die away in some feeling of reproach? We conjecture that what the Anarchists feel so bitterly is the assumed selfishness of human institutions. Marriage, for instance, they say, is an attempt to supply the deficiencies of the obligations prompted by love and honour. And they declare that there ought to be no attempt to supply these deficiencies by any less delicate equivalent. Courts of justice and police are an attempt to make men do what they ought, for reasons which do not appeal to the consciences, but only to the fears, of men. Such attempts are looked upon as evil. Again, individual property is a sort of selfishness in itself, a desire to shut somebody out from enjoying, that you may yourself enjoy. Such a feeling is supposed to be detestable. The only answer we know to such ravings is that the provisions which make it impossible for two men to be nourished at the same time by the same food and the same drink, appear to involve the impossibility of a perfect communal life, and that the rest of our life is also modelled on lines in which the exclusiveness of various moral and spiritual feelings has an equally prominent share. What, however, the Anarchists appear to feel is the truth that there are certain parts of our human enjoyments which are not thus naturally exclusive of the joys of others, that these are some of the highest parts, and that the arrangements of human society often give an almost coarse prominence to those selfish feelings which assert themselves at the cost of others. That may be true, and it may do something to explain the astonishing paradox that learned and, in a sense, honourable men, indulge so passionately a disgust for society as they find it, that they wish to break down every existing institution, and to start de novo, with nothing but fine feelings for guides. But if it does something—a very little—to explain that enormous paradox, it leaves the greater part of it unexplained. It leaves quite unexplained how it is that these men ignore the fiercely competitive—the scrambling—side of human nature altogether, at the very time when they themselves are compelled to begin the scramble by throwing dynamite about amongst the helpless and innocent victims of their own destructive instincts. It is strange indeed, that these men cannot see that the very imperiousness of their own desire to destroy all the powers that be,—reckless as they are of the consequences to numbers who ought to be as much regarded by them as their own political associates,—is the witness of that selfish fighting and scrambling instinct in themselves which they profess to hope that they may supersede by their communal arrangements for the future. The party of Anarchy uses force to destroy government, in the hope of moulding everything to human good without any further use of force; but in using that force, it betrays the secret of its own necessary failure. It is really appealing to the very instincts now properly organised in government, and appealing to them expressly for the purpose of bringing all government to an end; and a more hopeless wild-goose chase than this, it is impossible for even human ingenuity to invent.

A NEEDED ETIQUETTE.

THERE are plenty of Etiquettes in the world—too many, most reasonable folk would say—but yet we feel inclined to suggest an addition to the number. We want it to be made an etiquette that a man who announces that he is seeking rest should be let alone. Nobody questions that in the hurry and strain of modern intellectual life, a necessity has arisen for periodic rest, such as our grandfathers, whose lives were slower, never felt. The handicraftsman has reduced his stint of labour on the average by two hours a day, but the class which uses its brains works as it never yet worked, and is harassed as it never was harassed before, till physicians are recognising "overwork" as a specific cause of disease, and a few of them are making the effects of over-cerebration, under a hundred names, a distinct specialty. There are, we believe, at least three first-class doctors in London whose incomes flow almost entirely from men with brains which are overworn, but not shattered, who seldom know what is the matter with them, but who one and all confess that their nerves are "over-strung," or "under-strung," or "gone to pieces," or "so excited" that they can neither sleep, nor work, nor remain quiet. They do not say, with Mrs. Gamp, "which fiddle-strings is weakness to expredge my nerves this night!"—but that is their permanent condition. In this last Parliamentary Recess, the public attention has been called to half-a-dozen such cases, the Head of her Majesty's Government, the Leader of Opposition, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the President of the Local Government Board, and two or three other well-known men, having been ill with illnesses of different kinds and degrees all traceable in one way or another to overstrain. They are but samples, and poor samples, of thousands more—English Ministers being almost invariably men of exceptional vitality—from studying whose complaints the specialists have become abnormally discerning. They can tell almost at a glance where anxiety has been the cause of disease, and where, as sometimes, though seldom, happens, it must be sought in actual over-work; where drugs or alcohol have assisted the decay of nervous force, and where asceticism, tried as a remedy, has seriously injured the resisting power, diminishing the fuel, till every day threatens to empty the store. They differ considerably, we are told, in their practice, some having a lingering faith in the milder narcotics, which others have lost; and some in sleep by itself, which others think is only perfectly recuperative when it comes unsought—the phenomena of sleep, and especially the differences in the quality of sleep, are not half investigated—but they all agree in recommending perfect "rest." Their patients, who have instinct to guide them, and some memories of quick recovery during accidental or incidental lulls in life, always agree with them, but always start in reply the question how the rest is to be obtained. It is, as Society is now constituted, the most difficult thing in the world to get, as difficult as "the silence that is in the starry skies" is to secure in London. The professional classes have managed, with much more difficulty and expense than is always suspected, to beat the remainder of the world into allowing them a few weeks' holiday in the year, seldom more than six, during which they may be absent without affronting constituents, or clients, or patients, or business connections; and if the holiday can be made to fit the momentary need, one condition of rest has been obtained. Very often, however, it will not fit, and then rest is nearly hopeless. The pecuniary sacrifice of going away wholly during the busy season is often too heavy to be borne, and rest at home is unobtainable. The work to be done flows in, the world has none of the pity for coming illness which it has for actual illness or for grief, it is impossible to seal up the house—except by persistent lying—and the unhappy man, who feels as if his head were going from weariness, who would be let alone if he had a fever, or spared all intrusion if his wife were dead, is harassed by all around him without remorse, and, indeed, with the feeling that they are conferring favours. If the sufferers are eminent, the case is even worse. The obscure can, if driven desperate, get away, and once away, can lose themselves, out of reach of letters or telegrams; but the great have not that power. For them, there is but one retreat from the storm of communications,—the deck of a yacht, which, once on the open water, is such a refuge, so charming a retreat from the troubles of the world and the pestering of a too perfect Post, that Sir Stafford Northcote, though he is no Viking, or lover of Kingsley's "Wind of God," wisely sought it even in midwinter, and with the dreaded Bay to cross. He was, we believe, quite right; and, as luxury and common-sense advance, we shall yet see hospital steamers in the Mediterranean, and yachts advertised with captains who are "thoroughly experienced in avoiding letters, suppressing telegrams, and prohibiting communications with the outside world." But everybody cannot go to sea. Half of the over-tasked detest blue water, and the noises, and the smells; while of the remaining moiety, eighty per cent. want their wives or daughters to be with them, and will not inflict on patient nurses the purgatory of a chopping sea. Nothing exhilarates those who enjoy it like the water, and nothing so rapidly lowers those who detest its unrest or its noise. For the majority, the sea is no refuge; and in England, or near England, where is there one for those whom the world watches? Sark has not been made, as it should be, the retreat of the weary. Hardly even on the Mediterranean is there rest, for not to mention the followers of the god Dynamite, who roam as widely as the servants of the Sheikh of the Mountains did in the middle ages, and are far more terrible—for, after all, you could defeat a dagger, and are always at the mercy of dynamite—the Mediterranean retreats are as open as London to the post and to the wire. Their infatuated inhabitants are as proud of many deliveries as of infrequent main drains. The letters and the messages are always pouring in, and even if they are stopped by faithful secretaries or loving friends, there is always the thought, absent on board ship, that something disagreeable which you ought to know is being kept back from you in mercy. A grave face means a hidden telegram with a death in it. Then there are the callers, all anxious to compliment; and the officials, all eager to be attentive; and the public, all crazy with an imbecile curiosity, or with the natural desire to see what a great man is like. Continentals do not crowd, but they do stare. Mr. Gladstone has had the training of a quarter of a century, but, except to a King or a great statesman, what a horrible burden, when one is brain-weary, those platoons of eyes must be! Let a theatre look at you suddenly, and see; and in the case supposed, that you are great, that you are weary, and that you need air, every road, every hill-side, every wood is but a theatre the more. There is no escape, save at night, and even then the thought must come that you are living under a microscope, and that over a hundred wires are speeding messages telling mankind all you have done, and said, and eaten and left untasted, what you wear, what you do, to whom you speak, and what it may at all events be imagined that you said. If a Prince comes, he brings a secret message; if a Pretender calls, he is asking permission for a Revolution. The room of the sick American statesman swarms with interviewers, but they can only be just a shade worse than the bulletin-makers, who will not let Mr. Gladstone look down from a balcony on a Carnival without recounting how showers of confetti—nasty comfits, part plaster, part flour, and part dyes—only excited him to boyish glee.

Now, why should not the Doctors, and the leaders of fashion, and the journalists, among them establish an etiquette binding the world, when once a man has announced that he is seeking rest and is in retreat from his fellow-men, to leave him temporarily alone? Could not they make it a social outrage to call on a Quietist—there must be a word, and as the sect is extinct, that will do—to send a letter to him without imperative necessity, to stare at him as he passes, or to record his movements more than once a day, or with the smallest particularity? A dozen men in London, if they only agreed, could shut up the great microscope whenever a Quietist came within its field; and a few physicians, a few great ladies, and a few Club men could soon secure the remainder of the required immunities. They are secured very fairly well for men who are in grief. No one insists on seeing a man whose daughter is dying or wife dead, or writes to a man known to be in deep sorrow, or feels affronted because he is avoided on the day of the funeral of a dear relative. Suppose we extend that pity to the brain-weary, and regard the announcement that "Master is Quiet till the 10th," as a sufficient reason for our friend's temporary disappearance from the world? Let us make it a bêtise to pester the avowedly tired, and "bad form" to intrude, even by a letter, on a time of retreat. He might get rest then, even at home, which is sometimes the best place, without the distracting thought that in seeking rest he is insuring enmity, and that his sleep of a fortnight will be blamed as a fortnight of neglected duty. The etiquette would be no more burdensome to the public than the etiquette which in Catholic countries—are there any left?—once compelled respect for a "retreat," or than the often discreditable fear which secures to a patient with scarlet-fever or diphtheria such admirable immunity from the visits of his closest friends. It would hurt nobody, while it would greatly help to secure to invalids, whose lives are usually valuable, a chance of convalescence, even when they cannot rush to a Mediterranean island, or pay for a steam yacht for themselves. The perfect sanatorium for the weary man would be Roraima: suppose we barricade his dwelling with Etiquettes.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE EAST-LOTHIAN ELECTION, AND ITS LESSONS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—There is no Tory reaction in East Lothian. Mr. Finlay's supporters allege this morning, in their anger, that a considerable number of those who voted for Mr. Buchanan in 1880 went over yesterday, and voted against Mr. Finlay in 1883. The statement seems quite baseless. The real cause of the smallness of Mr. Finlay's poll, in so far as it can be traced, seems to be his position on Scotch Disestablishment. Hence resulted, first, a chill to the Liberalism of the county; and second, positive abstentions at the poll.

You think these refusals to vote were not justified. As a Scotch elector, I venture to think otherwise. I think they were both justified and called for, purely in the interest of the party. If our party, or if any party, had the prospect of getting rid of this Church question in Scotland, or of postponing it indefinitely, the case might be otherwise. But it is not so. The Liberal party in Scotland, by the mouth of Mr. Gladstone and Lord Hartington, has deliberately, publicly, and repeatedly, in Parliament and out of it, adopted this Scotch Church question as a question of existing injustice to be in some way set right. That it can only be set right by Disestablishment, they have by no means said. But that Disestablishment, as one of the possible courses, is to be considered by Scotland, and considered by it even in the course of this Parliament, was explicitly put by the Prime Minister, in his formal answer to the communications made to him on different sides in 1869. I need not say that even were these facts away the position of the non-established Presbyterians in Scotland is such as to make it very certain that they will not submit to the obvious and insolent inequality of the present state of matters. This question, then, is in some form inevitable, and it is not Liberals alone who know it. Dr. Norman Macleod, as Moderator, told Mr. Gladstone that in bringing forward the Patronage Act of 1874, when the Conservative Government was in power they had in view "the reconciliation of the Free Churches," and the Lord High Commissioner to the Church, Lord Aberdeen, has just confessed that the failure of that measure was due to the fact that this view was not more publicly stated, and that Scotch Nonconformists were not frankly consulted about it. The Conservatives had their innings then, and failed, for such reasons. The Liberal party has them now, and it has gone farther than the Conservative party did, by admitting the general question of justice, and referring it to Scotch electors for an answer.

Now, in these circumstances, Mr. Finlay could not have complained even if a Haddingtonshire elector simply said, "You must answer Mr. Gladstone's question by voting, like me, for Disestablishment in Scotland." Such a strong course might conceivably have been the best for the party, as well as for abstract justice. But Mr. Finlay, acting under very bad advice, and thrust without proper inquiry upon a local association, went much farther than declining to vote for Disestablishment. He pledged himself to vote against it, and at the same time gave and suggested no other solution of the question of justice. He seemed throughout to deny that any such question of justice existed. In so acting, he set himself in opposition to the line already taken by the leaders of his party. He not only rejected the answer which East Lothian ought to give to the question, he rejected the question itself, to the solution of which (for Scotland, not for England) the Liberal party is pledged. In so doing, he did his best to split up that party, and, in my judgment, made it the duty of the Liberal electors not to vote for him,—at least, in the recent contest.—I am, Sir, &c., February 6th.

A SCOTCH LIBERAL.

EGYPTIAN SEPOYS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I will only trouble you with a very short note of explanation, in answer to your question about my remarks of last week. I do not wish the English troops to leave Egypt. My remarks under the head of "Mahommedan Self-Government" had regard to the political situation created by the scheme which Lord Granville was said to have adopted. This political situation seemed to me a very happy compromise between absolute annexation by England and absolute acceptance of Arabi's programme. We defeated and removed Arabi, yet we gave—or are about to give—nominal self-government to the Egyptians. My object was to show that the tremendous guarantees secured by England in her command of the Army and Gendarmerie, in her influence over finance and railways, &c., made the nominal or theoretical self-government accorded to the Egyptians of no real consequence. Europe was fully protected, in law, in finance, and in police administration, by the fact that all important offices were in European hands. The Khedive, our faithful ally during last summer's campaign, might well be left the control of purely native affairs, and the reward or punishment of purely native politicians. This is quite another matter to the question of withdrawing our troops. I am not prepared to give any opinion on such a point, without knowing the exact state of the new Egyptian Army, and the exact amount of Naval force that we may intend to keep in Egyptian waters. It has never been thought possible to trust India entirely to Sepoys, nor would it, I suppose, be possible to trust Egypt, for some time to come, entirely to a native organisation. But there is a wide difference between withdrawing altogether from a country, and withdrawing every unnecessary man. A few battalions, nay, even a few companies, of Englishmen, prudently left behind, might be quite enough to give confidence to the Khedivial Army. It must not be forgotten that the red-coat is greatly respected, just now, in Egypt.—I am, Sir, &c., Temple, E.C., February 5th.

J. HILARY SKINNER.

IRISH REFORMS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have read with pain, almost with distrust of the future, your article on "Ireland and the Proposed Reforms." True it is that you advocate that concession of local government which, from your limited field of view, must needs be the most perilous of experiments. But like a great proportion of the English people, per incuriam probably, and of the Revolutionary party from design, no mention is made of Ulster. Yet Ulster is sound in loyalty and obedience to the Imperial idea to the very core. The Imperial Colony of 1644 has begotten the men of the Imperial Province of 1883. And I speak of what I know, and that you may know it also, I enclose the reports of a land conference of delegates of the Tenant Farmers of Ulster, over which a private gentleman presided, the proceedings being opened by two tenant-farmers. Every Tenant-right Association of Ulster sent its delegates. (There was a meeting of importance, just one hundred years ago, by delegation, at Dungannon, with somewhat memorable consequences.) There was neither hint nor prompting from landlord or agent, nor harsh word or rebuke for either; nay, rather sympathy at the results of the present legislation. The attention given to the speakers was profound, and uninterrupted by cry of wrath or denunciation. The verdict,—that of self-respecting men, after the old Scottish and English fashion, of following natural leaders; but if these fail, of selecting guides for themselves. There was abundant evidence that the certainty, rather than the precipitancy, of reforms was desired. Fifty years of political communion with all classes of English and Irish voters—actual and voters expectant—have taught me when men are in earnest. Ulster is in earnest now. Read, and judge. We are determined that within our borders the unclean spirit of Home-rule shall find no abiding-places or rest. But in the three Provinces beyond, the process of conversion to honesty and obedience to law must needs be protracted.

From Goshen and the flesh-pots of Egypt to the pools of Jordan, the journey required the lapse of forty years and the lives of a generation. A generation of Irish life will barely accomplish the redressing of the scale out of Ulster. Yet men's minds are in preparation for reception of neglected truths. The clod is broken up, and it may be hoped that seed-time is at hand. But there must be neither doubt nor pause in applying the means of repression of crime. I say repression, and of developing free, honest thought. Yourself have said that a persistent policy of twenty years is required. I agree, out of Ulster. Ulster is ready.—I am, Sir, &c., WAYNEY.

The Castle, Ballymena, County Antrim, February 6th.

THE MILES PLATTING CASE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You are unjust to the Bishop of Manchester, and your injustice is all the harder to bear, because you attack him on a point on which a man of his high spirit cannot well defend himself. For the present difficulty at Miles Platting mainly arises from the Bishop's past forbearance. When Mr. Green was sent to Lancaster Jail, the Bishop might have dismissed Mr. Cowgill, the unlicensed curate, and placed the parish in the charge of a curate, with instructions to lower the ritual to what Dr. Fraser holds to be the legal standard. It would have been the course usually taken by Bishops. Most people would have thought it his duty. The diocese would have acquiesced. The probable result would have been the dispersion of the main part of Mr. Green's congregation, and the ending of much of Mr. Green's work. But other Bishops to whom the charge of a Ritualist church has fallen have sacrificed the congregation and the work, without scruple; and in so doing, they acted prudently, from their point of view, and avoided future difficulty. The Bishop of London, whom you hold up to the Bishop of Manchester as a bright example of fatherly consideration, has dispersed congregation after congregation. But Dr. Fraser is a different man. His allowance of the ritual which he condemned, for the sake of the Miles Platting congregation and of Mr. Green himself, marks his chivalrous nature, and in judging him, is the most important factor in forming a judgment. No one counselled him, and no one praised him. Practical men called his conduct weak. High Churchmen had no gratitude for the Bishop who had sent Mr. Green before Lord Penzance, and the Church Association, which now does all it can to damage him by its self-interested approval, attacked him bitterly. But a man's character is marked, not by what he does under legal advice, but by his action in matters which, in his mind, rise above the sphere of law. The Bishop is probably wrong in thinking a chimere and a cope are the same vestment, or that a rubric of the Prayer-book can be abolished by the Privy Council; but he spared Mr. Green's work, when interest and "the law" and popular opinion combined to urge him to crush it, and he is a greater man than you give him credit for. He objects to Mr. Cowgill's nomination, and he has a fair right to object. If eighteen months ago the ritual of Miles Platting had been altered and the congregation broken up, a new congregation would have been formed, which, however small it might have been, would be strong enough, backed by the Church Association, to make it impossible for Mr. Cowgill or any one else to reintroduce the vestments. It is only the Bishop's forbearance which makes the continuance of the high ritual possible. But of that forbearance, Sir Percival Heywood makes an ungenerous use. He has a perfect right to present a Ritualist. But as far as I am aware, the Bishop has never said that he will reject any man who does not give him a guarantee to reduce the ritual. If the Bishop took this position, then your contention that he is breaking the Archbishop's truce might be valid. But all we have in evidence is that the Bishop objects to Mr. Cowgill—that is, Sir Percival Heywood nominates the one man who is identified with the disputed ritual in the parish, whose position is due to no other cause than the kindly tolerance of the Bishop in time past, whose nomination is a distinct challenge, and whose institution would be a distinct humiliation. I am as high a Churchman as Sir Percival, and am often sore vexed and grieved by the Bishop's fulminations about "the law;" but here the layman is surely wrong, and the Bishop right. Very probably Sir Percival's nomination is legally valid, and the Bishop will find that he is setting himself up above "the law." But however illegal the Bishop's objections may be, he is quite justified in saying, "You are taking an unworthy advantage of my forbearance, and you would not have had the opportunity of forcing upon me a man who has for two years carried on in my diocese illegal ritual, if it had not been that my idea of the generosity which a Christian gentleman should show is different from yours."—I am, Sir, &c., J. S.

[Our correspondent is a reasonable man, but he is not very strong in his facts. In the first place, we know of no case in which the Bishop of London has dispersed a Ritualistic congregation in the manner suggested. Mr. Lowder's congregation was left in charge of its curates during the vacancy, and an old Ritualist was instituted by the Bishop to succeed Mr. Lowder without remonstrance. The Bishop of London instituted, without demur, to All Saints', Margaret Street, to St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, to St. Barnabas', Pimlico, and to St. Mary Magdalene's, Munster Square, men who were known to intend carrying on the ritual as it was before. Can our correspondent produce a single case in which Dr. Jackson has dispersed a Ritualist congregation, by insisting on entrusting it to the care of anti-Ritualist curates? In the next place, the Bishop of Manchester did supersede Mr. Cowgill after the living was declared vacant, and some weeks before the patron had nominated Mr. Cowgill. Again, we deny that it was a moderate and "chivalrous" policy to leave the congregation in charge of its Ritualist curate, if the Bishop intended to scatter the congregation directly the living fell vacant. Lastly, we have great doubts whether the patron could easily have found another incumbent for so poorly paid and unhealthy a parish as Miles Platting is understood to be, who would have been competent to carry on the good work which Mr. Green is admitted to have done. Indeed, though we have no special knowledge on the point, we have little doubt that the extraordinary difficulty of finding a suitable nominee for such a parish was the patron's chief reason for offering the living to Mr. Cowgill.—Ed. Spectator.]

CONSECRATED GROUND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent agrees with me, I am glad to find, on many points,—possibly we are not so widely at variance as he imagines on the rest. His objection seems to be against the creation, or maintenance, of exclusive burial-places for the members of any particular communion. Let me point out that the rite of consecration has very little to do with the system to which he objects; on the one hand, an unconsecrated burying-ground may be strictly restrained by its trust-deed to the members of some religious body; on the other, ground which has been consecrated may be absolutely free. I have consecrated many graveyards since the passing of the Burials Act knowing that the use of them will not be limited to Churchmen. I have also consecrated ground which has been strictly limited to Churchmen, by the conveyance under which the land passed to its special trustees. Consecration does not decide the matter either way. If Mr. Baldwin Brown should rejoin, "Why, then, do you consecrate at all?" I will answer in his own words,— "We bury our dead with prayer; we commit them to the care of God; we have sacred associations with their resting-place, and we make the sepulchre sure." If he will examine the language of our prayers at consecration, and of the sentence which constitutes its formal part, he will see the exact reflection of his own words,—and no more. He has admitted that consecration could not intend the exclusion of Nonconformists, when such persons did not exist; if the rite of consecration continues to be what it then was, the rite cannot intend it now.

I have tried to rescue the rite of consecration from a not uncommon misrepresentation of its nature. But I do not deny that exclusive burying-grounds are preferred by some Churchmen, and by many who are outside the Church. Such grounds are owned by Jews, by members of the Society of Friends, and by many bodies of Protestant Dissenters. These owners have not, as far as I know, thrown open their exclusive burying-places, since the passing of the Burials Act, to the Ministers and services of other religious bodies. Perhaps they are hindered by the law,—which, after all, "fetters" the owners of property held in trust, whether they be Conformists or Nonconformists, alike. But I must not be led into a discussion on law. I judge, from the writings of Mr. Baldwin Brown, which I have read, that he is conversant with the masters of English literature; and I will venture to refer him to Hooker, for an answer to that part of his letter.

I must add, Sir, that I am conscious of my boldness in asking for the insertion of a letter with the signature which, as appears from your article last week, you hold in very light esteem. But it is too late now to choose a pseudonym which might make me a persona grata in your editorial eyes, and I must remain, as before,—
EPISCOPUS.

HIGH CHURCHMEN AND BISHOPS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Allow me to point out one factor in the causes of the distrust which, as you very truly say, High Churchmen feel for Episcopal expressions of opinion. It is the fact that the State alone appoints to the Episcopate, since the nominal congé d'élire is neutralised by the letter of mandate, so that the Church has absolutely no voice whatever in the selection of its own rulers. Now, the unquestionable truth that Bishops appointed by the State may be just as good as those elected freely, or even better, does not touch this difficulty in the least. The same general motives operate with an electoral body as with a cautious statesman, and the Church in the United States shows us constantly the choice of undistinguished men for the mitre, simply because such men are not prominent enough to have aroused opposition. It is not the best man who is chosen, as a rule, but the man against whom least can be said. But this is the working of natural causes. Such as the American Bishops are, they are the choice of their dioceses, and of the superior ratifying authorities also. They owe their election to their co-religionists, and are accountable to them for their administration, being liable to impeachment, trial, and suspension or deposition, not in theory, but in actual fact, for at least one deposed American Bishop is now living.

Contrariwise, in England, the Bishops have nothing to generate the sense of responsibility. They do not get their office from the Church—I am not here touching on the question of consecration—and they are virtually out of the reach of the law, which they have framed in their own interest, so that it is almost impossible to bring a peccant Bishop to book, and quite impossible to touch a peccant Archbishop. You may remember how they excluded themselves, despite Mr. Gladstone's strictures, from the scope of the Public Worship Regulation Act; and the difference of the measure meted out by the Bishops' and the Incumbents' Resignation Acts is a very curious moral study. Hence, the temptation of the Bishops to show greater deference to the authority which has promoted them, and which alone has any effective hold over them, than to that from which their spiritual character is derived, is strong and permanent, and has very often caused a wide divergence between the Episcopal policy and the wishes of Churchmen as a body.

Add to this the historical fact that Bishops have several times in post-Reformation history been appointed for political reasons only, all other questions of fitness having been subordinated to the one motive of securing votes to the Government, and at once another ground of distrust is formed. Cecil and Walsingham, for example, to conciliate the Puritans, nominated a majority of the Elizabethan Bishops in the Calvinistic interest, at a time when fully seven-tenths of the Clergy were of another form of opinion. William III. chose Bishops whom he thought would further his plans for assimilating the Anglican polity to that of Holland, and the Palmerston-Shaftesbury compact is a story of yesterday.

Now, the force of this fact may be very easily seen. It has happened several times in Tudor and Stewart days that "tuning the pulpits" was resorted to by the Government. The Clergy were instructed to preach certain doctrines which the Government thought expedient. And the inevitable result was that the pulpits were discredited, and became unpopular. It was felt that truth could not be expected, under such conditions. The cases are absolutely parallel, and till there is again free election, English Bishops will be regarded as exponents of political convenience, rather than of eternal truth. It is worth while adding that in the Roman Church a Bishop is not supposed to become a learned and orthodox theologian in virtue of his consecration. He is required, if attending a council or the like, to have a theologian of repute as his adviser, and public opinion is strong enough to oblige him to appoint some one of recognised mark.—I am, Sir, &c.,

RICHARD F. LITLEDIALE.

9 Red Lion Square, London, W.C., February 7th.

BRAITHWAITE AND BUTTERMERE RAILWAY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—We dwellers at the Lakes have been electrified to find that whilst men slept, the proprietors of certain slate quarries on Honister Pass have got a Railway Bill past private inquiry unopposed, have complied with standing orders, and sent it on to the Select Committee of the House of Commons. This Bill is to empower them to do irreparable mischief to the loveliest part of our English Lake scenery. It is proposed to run a railway for the slate waggons down into Borrowdale, thence to skirt the west side of Derwentwater, where it will be impossible, from the nature of the ground, to hide their line of rails—no trees or intervening rocks exist there—to pass under Cat-bells, thence to cross the Vale of Newlands, and to join the Keswick and Cockermouth Railway at Braithwaite.

This will mean that Borrowdale and Derwentwater will no longer be the quiet resting-ground for weary men. The slate waggons will be joined at no distant time by passenger waggons, and the unwelcome, unappreciative navy will make room at his side for the beer-drinking excursionist from Keswick to Honister, "all the way for 6d." Artists will be exiled, and the exquisite terrace lawn of the grassy steep west of Derwentwater will be maddened with shrieks of engines shunting, or heavy trains of slate howling and roaring as they carry their loads to Braithwaite.

When will the State protect the manifest good of the health-seeking majority, against the private-pocket schemes of the adventurous, money-seeking minority? Is not England each year needing more and more its pleasure-grounds "to health and resting consecrate," to be preserved inviolably for its busy, bustling children, who seek rest and, alas! too often find none? Will you not, Sir, help us in this matter to swell the chorus of dissatisfaction, that for a few pence a load extra to the Company who project this Buttermere and Braithwaite Railway, the thousands who come to Borrowdale should find the old haunts of peace and beauty possessed by slate-waggons, and their attendant nuisances? If the slate is really necessary to the public, the public will pay the cartage, as heretofore. If the public will not pay the cartage, it looks as if they could get as good slate cheaper elsewhere. I can do little but urge publicity to be given to the case, and invite the strong co-operative opposition to the scheme that seems to be needed without delay.—I am, Sir, &c., Wray Vicarage, Ambleside.

HARDWICKE D. RAWNSLEY.

"CAÑONS" AND "CANYONS."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the review of my "Camps in the Rockies," which appeared in the Spectator of January 27th, your reviewer passes what, in my humble opinion, are somewhat severe strictures upon the phonetic spelling of the word "cañon," making it appear, as he says, "in the hideous guise of 'canyon.'" Whether this, on my part, quite deliberate literary "misdemeanour" is one deserving at the hands of "the mildest reviewer" such condemnation, I shall leave to others to decide, and only suggest in this place that were your reviewer conversant with many of the American works upon geological researches and explorations in which this word is rendered "canyons," and appears very frequently, he would have hardly much temper left to be put out by what many persons consider a perfectly legitimate literary innovation, i.e., the phonetic spelling of foreign words of involved composition.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE AUTHOR OF "CAMPS IN THE ROCKIES."

"STORM-DRIFT: POEMS AND SONNETS."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—With reference to the notice of my book which appeared in the Spectator of February 3rd, I would ask you, in all humility, if your critic does not "need to be reminded" that a man who cannot correctly transcribe the title of the work he is reviewing, is scarcely the one to call attention to a slip of the pen, or a printer's blunder?—I am, Sir, &c.,

HERBERT E. CLARKE.

Park House, Albion Road, Stoke Newington, N., February 6th.

POETRY.

NEPENTHE.

THE north wind follows free and fills
Our rounding sail, and overhead
Deepens the rainless blue, and red
The sunset burns on quarried hills;
And peace is over all, as deep
As where, amid the secular gloom
Of some far-reaching, rock-built tomb,
The nameless generations sleep;
While, undecayed as on the day
That saw them first, the Kings of old,
In sculptured calm serene, behold
The slow millenniums pass away.
Still, far behind us, as we cleave
Smooth-flowing Nile, the din of life
And passionate voices of the strife
Are hushed to silence, and we leave
The cares that haunt us, dark regret
For wasted years, and wild unrest,
Yearning for praise or pleasure, blest
With life's last blessing,—to forget.
For still in Egypt's kindly air,
Strong antidote of mortal woes,
The painless herb, Nepenthe, grows,
Which she whom fair-haired Leda bare
Mixed in the wine, and stilled their pain
Who wept in Spartan halls for sire
Or brother, wrapped in funeral fire,
Or wandering o'er the boundless main.

A. J. C.

ART.

GEORGE MASON.

IN that small group of artists who may be said to have given a new character to the painting of English country life, and to have shown the possibility of treating that subject both realistically and poetically, George Mason was at once the least known to the outside public and the most respected by his artistic brethren. He died about 1875, only a year before his great rivals, Walker and Pinwell, and thus England lost almost at one blow the three painters who had discovered that her landscape and her children contained all the elements of poetry and beauty for which an artist could wish.

The art of each of these men was of a special, individual kind, and in the case of Pinwell and Walker was most strongly and strangely influenced by personal peculiarities. In Mason's case, the style, though equally distinct, was far less egotistical; his art had a serenity, a breadth, and a freedom from self-consciousness, which could not be found in the work of either of those artists with whom he is naturally associated.

Though so short a time has elapsed since his death, his paintings are little known to the general public; and as most of them are but small in scale and unimportant in subject, they have been but little reproduced by the engravers. Indeed, line engraving is peculiarly unfitted to reproduce the beauty of Mason's work, a beauty which depends less upon resolute perfection of form and skill of hand than upon the intense sympathy which the artist feels for the subjects of his pictures and the manner in which he communicates that feeling to all those who study his work. Throughout his compositions of English rustic life there runs an element of tender roughness, if we may use such an apparent paradox; the beauty of his figures and their actions is consistent with a certain superficial want of refinement, and seems to be derived from the study of an earlier civilisation. But upon this we must not dwell, our object in this notice being chiefly to call attention to the fact that the two finest pictures of Mason's life, "The Evening Hymn" and "The Harvest Moon," have now been etched, and etched most successfully, by M. Waltner and Mr. R. Macbeth (the last elected Associate of the Academy). The former of these has been done some little time, and it will suffice to say that in our opinion it is thoroughly successful. The latter plate has only just been finished by Mr. Macbeth, and the first-proof of the etching is now to be seen side by side with the original picture at Mr. Dunthorne's, in Vigo Street. Mr. Macbeth has done his work supremely well, as all of those who know his powers as an etcher expected; and we can say in praise of this work that it gives the spectator pleasure of a similar kind to that which is gained from the picture itself. A little of the luminous quality of the colouring has been lost, as was almost inevitable, and there is a patch of whitish cloak on the right-hand of the picture, which is unnecessarily out of tune with the rest; but with these exceptions, of which one was unavoidable and the other trivial, the etching is entirely successful, and is, perhaps, the most successful reproduction of a celebrated picture that has been done for many years. It is finer than Waltner's "Evening Hymn," for two reasons,—one is that it has been executed on twice as large a scale, and this enables it to preserve more of the character of the original artist's work,—enables the etcher to have used a bolder, freer manner of interpretation, more akin to the original painting; the other reason is that it possesses that extreme sympathy with the colours of the work it reproduces, in which consists Mr. Macbeth's greatest power as an etcher. The original is full of colour, and so, in its way, is the reproduction. Lastly, it has the feeling of quasi-originality about it, which is hard to define, but which almost inevitably belongs to a copy which has been made, not mechanically or servilely, but by an artist whose own personality was not entirely banished from his work. In saying this, we have no wish to depreciate the worth or beauty of M. Waltner's etching generally, or of that of "The Evening Hymn" in particular. His work at its best is most exquisitely skilful, and far more minutely accurate than Mr. Macbeth's, and perhaps it is because the latter artist has previously only etched his own oil paintings, which has given its peculiar character to the plate of which we have been speaking. We would recommend all of our readers who take an interest in Art to go to Mr. Dunthorne's, and look at this picture of Mason's, and say whether there is so much need to go to France for the filling of our picture galleries, public and private, when we can produce such work as this at home. It must be remembered that Walker, Pinwell, and Mason were all painting at the same time work of similar quality to this, work which owed its beauty to no tradition, and which found its chief subjects in such every-day scenes as a village alms-house, a country lane at twilight, or some reapers and their lasses returning home under a harvest moon.

In both Walker and Pinwell's painting, there is to be traced, by those who care to look beneath the surface, an element of recklessness which, if it does not mar their beauty, at least causes it to affect us strangely. We feel that tragedy is not far off, though "fair laughs the morn, and soft the zephyr blows." This is, perhaps, more evident in Pinwell's pictures than in those of Walker, but it distinctly exists in both. There is a certain touch of "swagger" in the last-mentioned artist's work, a tinge of uneasiness and of weariness in the characters of his pictures. And in Pinwell, as we have said, this is more plainly evident; it is a very strange, half-real, half-poetical world with which he is concerned, and many of his compositions are analogous in the impression they give to the spectator with those old North-country ballads which, commencing quietly with a maiden at her spinning-wheel, or a page riding across the heather, end in shame and death. Though rarely displaying the tragedy, the artist gives us all its elements. We feel that the love so commenced, can, as Lawrence once said, "scarcely end in happiness and honour, even if it be not cut short by the dagger."

But not to dwell upon this point, the mental flavour of Mason's work has none of this suggestiveness, and its chief interest is owing to another view. A more educated and a more cultivated man than either of those with whom we have been associating him, he was also, at the time of his best work, considerably older. He knew, very soon, what he could do, and what he could not. His early pictures of Italy are, with but few exceptions, of little worth, and, so far as we have been acquainted with them, contain no faintest hint of his later success. They differ in no essential way from the work which any moderately intelligent and skilful painter would do in such a country. But with his first pictures of English rustic life, we find that the artist has gained a power which is at once delightful and peculiar to himself. His children stand and run and play as no other children that our artists have painted; there is a reciprocity between his figures and the landscapes in which they are placed, which renders them mutually serviceable. Perhaps the most special characteristic of the work, taken as a whole, is its serenity, its absolute conviction that the thing it displays is sufficient. Occasionally, a subject is painted, such as "The Evening Hymn" or "The Harvest Moon;" but more frequently there is no subject, properly so called, nothing but a child standing in a meadow, or a boy leaning on a stile; a girl driving her cattle home in the twilight, or sitting in the shadow of the pine-woods.

The flavour, however, of these simple pictures is exquisite, and it is a strange fact that, as works of art, they will hold their own in any company. Three causes may partly account for this,—that they give us truly what is almost unknown in English painting, the combination of figure and landscape; not landscape with figures in it, not figures with landscape behind them, but the two in just relation and subordination to each other. Again, they are exquisitely graceful, and that with the kind of grace which is more akin to dignity than to elegance; which smacks of the Parthenon rather than the dancing academy. Again, the pictures show throughout a colour faculty which, though limited in its range, is, within that range, perfect. More lovely harmonies in the minor key have never been executed than those which Mason paints. But, after all, these qualities are insufficient to account for the charm which this painter exercises over many minds, and in criticising his work it is even more than ordinarily difficult to discover in what this charm consists. It seems to us, however, as if it must be somehow connected with the innocence and simplicity of his people, with the fact that he has really been able to grasp pictorially all that makes childhood and girlhood so beautiful,—the freedom of movement, the pauses of wonder, the movements of doubt, the grace of gesture, and the outbursts of feeling,—in fact, to give expression to all that a fair, unthwarted life might feel and show, when it was developing under natural conditions. He has been blamed for making his children too idyllic, for giving too much classical grace to their movements; but after all, what we call classic grace is nothing but the beauty that comes from the free movements of a healthy body. The Greeks were not taught to turn their toes out, or anything of that sort, by an Athenian D'Egville.

To dwellers in the noise and bustle of London, amongst the thousand jealousies, enmities, and falsities of the metropolis, there is something inexpressibly refreshing in these hints of uncomplicated, unthoughtful, rustic life. We ask ourselves with pleasure which is almost pain,—Do children really live such lives as these, somewhere beyond the city's glare and gas? Are there really country lanes down which wander at twilight, hand-in-hand, the girls of the village singing the Evening Hymn, or where the lovers linger amidst the shadows and brightness of the "harvest moon"? Mr. Mason takes us to Arcadia,—that is his power, and his secret is that it is an Arcadia not too remote, not too impossible. If his peasants are more simple, more graceful, and more poetic than experience teaches us, they are at least not so in any conventional manner; they do not ape the graces of "the garish town," they borrow no sham sentiment, and are indebted to no Sunday-school teacher. Just a little too graceful and sympathetic for the average are they, but seen, as he shows them to us, in the twilight, we can almost believe in their truth; they are, at all events, such as they should be, if not such as they are. And of one thing we may at least be proud,—that the work is, in its essentials, thoroughly English. Something of beauty may have been gained by the painter during his stay in Italy, but the atmosphere of his work is wholly and entirely that of his own country. His pictures are little colour-cameos of English life, in which, through the crust of ignorance and superficial ugliness, the artist has penetrated to the fact that our skies and our fields are still as beautiful, and our women and children as graceful, innocent, and true, as any that can be found "across the sea," or that lived in former years. All honour to him, that in a short artistic life he preached so hopeful a gospel; we have enough pessimists in Art, to render it very necessary. Here, at least, is something in painting which savours neither of the boulevard nor the casino, but is as fresh as the air on the Sussex Downs, and as national as "Rule, Britannia."

BOOKS.

THE COMMERCIAL RESTRAINTS OF IRELAND CONSIDERED.*

THIS book is a reprint of a rare, but important, work that appeared at a very critical epoch in the history of Ireland. Mr. Carroll, who has ably performed a task that must have been dear to him as a patriotic Irishman, prefaces the volume with a lively account of the life of its author. "The Right Hon. John Hely Hutchinson was," he tells us, "certainly one of the most remarkable men this country ever produced; and he took, amidst an unequalled combination of brilliant rivals, a very prominent part in the most interesting and splendid period of Ireland's internal history." He was a singular example of the success which sometimes attends a man who, wanting in principle, self-seeking, and ambitious, is possessed of real ability and undaunted personal courage. From a humble position, he rose to the Bar, was made King's Counsel, Member of the Irish Parliament, Prime Serjeant, and Privy Councillor, held some lucrative sinecures, was Major in a cavalry regiment, became Provost of Trinity College, and obtained the office of Principal Secretary of State. Although he did not hold all these positions, with their emoluments, at one and the same time, it is worthy of note that he never gave up any office without securing some considerable advantage; and it is characteristic of the man that, when threatened with a court-martial for neglect of duty as Major, he promptly sold his commission for £3,000. It is as Provost of Trinity College that his name comes down to posterity, and this post, for which he was quite unfitted, owing to his want of academical learning, he gained "by a dexterous intrigue with the Chief Secretary of the day." His offices, of one sort and another, brought him in about £6,000 a year, with a splendid town residence as Provost, in addition to his practice at the Bar and his private estate; and Flood, who often opposed him, says, "he got more for ruining one kingdom than Admiral Hawke got for saving three." In days when almost all public men were place-hunters and jobbers, he stood conspicuous among them for the audacity of his demands, and the success of his bargains. After quoting many contemporary opinions for and against him, Mr. Carroll concludes that his worst faults were greed and place-traffic; for although he could play the part of a rank courtier, he supported all the essential honest measures of the day; and Grattan, who thought highly both of his genius and of his steadfastness to the well-being of Ireland, said that "he was the servant of many Governments, but he was an Irishman, notwithstanding." When he entered it in 1759, "the Irish Parliament was at about its lowest level of degradation;" but before his death, in 1794, things had vastly improved, and this in consequence of the courage, intellect, and vigour of himself and his associated statesmen. With a private conscience of the feeblest, he held sound views on matters of patriotic and Catholic import, and was an earnest supporter of Grattan in his successful struggle for Irish Parliamentary independence, and he took a proud part in the triumph of 1782, when, as Principal Secretary of State, he read out the King's Message, which virtually conceded Free-trade, and independence to the Parliament of Ireland.

This book was published anonymously, but its authorship was no secret. The Government was seriously alarmed by the indictment brought against them, and the common hangman burned the work so effectually that, writes Mr. Carroll, "Flood said he would give a thousand pounds for a copy, and that the libraries of all the three branches of the Legislature could not produce a copy." On the other hand, the Irish patriots forgave Hutchinson for his former truckling to the Court and Lord Townshend. The writer's object is to investigate the cause which has produced the miserable condition of Ireland, and taking up a position as neutral, or rather as a friend to both parties, he goes on to show with great power and conclusiveness that it was brought about by England's interference with the commerce of the country. At this distance of time, when all restraints save for the purposes of Customs and Excise have long been removed from the commerce and manufactures of England and Ireland alike, it should be much more easy to review the question calmly than it was for the Provost, who found himself an actual witness of terrible misery and distress, which to us are matters of history only. Yet it is impossible to read this chapter of Ireland's troubles without indignation, and one is inclined to agree with Mr. Carroll, when he bitterly says, "England has been a constant source of woe to Ireland, and suffering is the badge of all our tribe."

"The state of Ireland," says Hutchinson, writing in 1779, "teems with every condition of national poverty." The value of all produce was greatly fallen, rents very low and difficult to collect, farms empty, and of the manufacturers, no less than 20,000 in Dublin alone reduced to beggary in the two preceding years. It is to be noted that he tries to show that, during the early Stuart reigns and after the Restoration until 1688, "Ireland had made great advances;" and that, to quote one of his authorities, "the strings of the Irish harp were all in tune," but it is patent that affairs were in a very different condition. It was Hutchinson's object to emphasize the effects of England's interference, and as he was himself, to use Mr. Carroll's words, "an insatiable trafficker in places and salaries, and profits and pensions," he takes care to point out that although these causes, together with the evils arising from absenteeism and the American rebellion, had hastened, they had not caused the decline in Ireland's prosperity. The Provost continues:—

"If we are determined to investigate the truth, we must assign a more radical cause; when the human or political body is unsound or infirm, it is in vain to inquire what accidental circumstances appear to have occasioned those maladies which arise from the constitution itself. If in a period of fourscore years of profound internal peace, any country shall appear to have often experienced the extremes of poverty and distress; if at the times of her greatest supposed affluence and prosperity the slightest causes have been sufficient to obstruct her progress, to annihilate her credit, and to spread dejection and dismay among all ranks of her people, and if such a country is blessed with a temperate climate and fruitful soil, abounds with excellent harbours and great rivers, with the necessities of life and materials of manufacture, and is inhabited by a race of men brave, active, and intelligent, some permanent cause of such disastrous effects must be sought for. If your vessel is frequently in danger of foundering in the midst of a calm, if by the smallest addition of sail she is near oversetting, let the gale be ever so steady, you would neither reproach the crew nor accuse the pilot in the matter; you would look to the construction of the vessel, and see how she had been originally framed, and whether any new works had been added to her that retard or endanger her course."

Without any rhetorical exaggeration, the charge he brings against England is sufficiently strong and damaging. Her destruction, first, of the export-cattle trade, then of the woollen trade, for which the encouragement of the linen trade was promised as a substitute, and her effort to ruin that in its turn, are the chief points of his case; and to the two latter he returns again and again, enlarging upon them in a variety of ways, showing that England's action was founded on unreasonable fears, that it had not had the desired result, and that through it, she was herself almost as great a loser, though not so directly, as her sister-kingdom.

Irish cattle, like Irish wool, had long been famed for their quality; for the soil and climate of Ireland, unfitted for growing corn, were well adapted for the production of horned stock and sheep. After came peace in 1652, the export of live cattle into England grew to be the principal trade of Ireland, and became the chief source of her wealth, and its success soon aroused the jealousy of the English landowners. They imagined—erroneously, as events proved—that by it the rent of land would be lowered, and, therefore, in 1663, by an Act "for the encouragement of trade," penalties were laid on the traffic, and in 1666 it was entirely forbidden. "The Irish," says the Provost, "deprived of this, their principal trade, and reduced to the utmost distress by this prohibition, had no resource but to work up their own commodities, to which they applied themselves with great ardour." The number of sheep was greatly increased, so that at the time of the Revolution the flocks were very numerous, and everything seemed to point to the steady growth and prosperity of the wool manufacture. The only attempt that had ever been made to damage this manufacture was an unworthy but characteristic one by Lord Strafford in 1639, to prevent the making of broadcloths, in which, he said, the Irish were well able to undersell the English; and this attempt happily failed. Hutchinson shows that from the earliest times, until 1663, "England was as careful of the commerce and manufactures of her ancient sister-kingdom, particularly in her great staple trade, as she was of her own; and he relates how the Duke of Ormond had in 1667 successfully "advanced the woollen and revived the linen manufactures," which, as a compensation for the loss of the cattle trade, England then encouraged. He recites many English and Irish Acts, as giving "as strong grounds of assurance as any country could possess for the continuance of any trade or manufacture."

* The Commercial Restraints of Ireland, considered in a Series of Letters to a Noble Lord, containing an Historical Account of the Affairs of that Kingdom. By John Hely Hutchinson. Dublin. 1779. Re-edited by W. G. Carroll, M.A. Dublin: Gill and Son. 1882.

At no other period had the circumstances of Ireland been so favourable for the establishment of a lucrative industry; at no other period had so fair a prospect opened for her attaining to happiness and prosperity, as at this time. Ireland had passed through a fearful tragedy of misery and crime, in which over half-a-million of her people had perished; but the night of terror that had so long oppressed and darkened the land seemed, in the last decade of the seventeenth century, to be retiring before the dawn of a happier and more peaceful day. Capital was being brought into the woollen trade, which, although still small, was increasing, and gave employment to a considerable number of people. If things had only been permitted to take their natural course, it is not too much to suppose that the whole of the later history of Ireland would have been changed, and that she might have become, like Scotland, a contented country, with industries and manufactures of her own. But at this critical moment the jealousy of the English again interfered. An iniquitous Act, devoid of any precedent, was forced upon the Irish Parliament, which had no power to resist English influence,

"Prohibiting from June 20th, 1699, the exportation from Ireland of all goods made or mixed with wool, except to England and Wales, and with the licence of the Commissioners of the Revenue; duties had been before laid on the importation into England equal to a prohibition, therefore this Act has operated as a total prohibition of the exportation. Before these laws, the Irish were under great disadvantages in the woollen trade, by not being allowed to export their manufactures to the English colonies, or to import dye-stuffs directly from thence; and the English in this respect, and in having those exclusive markets, possessed considerable advantages."

The blow fell with terrible and overwhelming force. It was as though a curse had come upon the country. Famine became chronic, parts of the south and west became depopulated, thousands of manufacturers left the country, and the wool trade was hopelessly ruined. It was often found impossible to collect sufficient revenue for the purposes of Government. The linen trade, far from being encouraged, as was promised, was hampered by tyrannous restrictions; and although, after some years, it was partially freed, and made some progress for a time, it never took the place of the lost industry. Flax-growing, precarious and exhausting, was, in spite of premiums, found to be a losing game, and the general tillage of the country declined. The Provost says:—

"Notwithstanding the success of that manufacture, the bulk of our people have always continued poor, and in a great many seasons have wanted food. Can the history of any other fruitful country on the globe, enjoying peace for fourscore years, and not visited by plague or pestilence, produce so many recorded instances of the poverty and wretchedness, and of the reiterated want and misery of the lower orders of the people? There is no such example in ancient or modern story. If the ineffectual endeavours by the representatives of those poor people to give them employment and food had not left sufficient memorials of their wretchedness; if their habitations, apparel, and food were not sufficient proofs, I should appeal to the human countenance for my voucher, and rest the evidence on that hopeless despondency that hangs on the brow of unemployed industry."

The Provost goes on to show that England, by ruining Ireland, had completely failed in benefiting herself, examines the arguments adduced and the facts alleged by her as the basis of her course of action, exposes their weakness and fallacy in a masterly way, and concludes by earnestly pleading, on behalf of both countries, for a more humane and enlightened policy. But, our limits being reached, we can only refer the reader more particularly to the treatise itself. Hutchinson's style is often, but not always, clear and powerful, and, from the use of the letter-form, there is a good deal of repetition; but, in spite of its occasional defects, this is a valuable and readable work. We conclude our remarks with an extract from Mr. Carroll's excellent introduction:—

"Two things stand out clearly throughout the treatise,—one is that Ireland, both as a producer and as a consumer, has been immensely profitable to England; and the other is that England has been the source of vast evil and suffering to Ireland. The purport of 'The Commercial Restraints' is to set forth these two great truths, and the record may be read now without prejudice on one side of the Channel, and without panic or passion on the other. The teaching of the book ought to be palpable enough for the men of the present day. It ought to convince Englishmen that it is time for them to distrust their 'resources of civilisation,' and to let this country prosper; and it ought to remind Irishmen that they are the best judges of what they want, and that their road to prosperity is independence of English conceit, together with a sturdy development of their own native resources."

MRS. LORIMER.*

Mrs. Lorimer will attract the critics more than the public. The latter will, we fear, declare that the beginning is full of forced humour, that the ending is needlessly melancholy, and that the absence of incidents—there is, for the regular novel-reader, not one in the whole book—is tiresome and disappointing. That judgment is correct, but, nevertheless, we must offer another and a different one. We have read few novels of late years so obviously the work of inexperienced hands which seemed to us anything like so full of promise, rising occasionally, as in the final proposal scene, into unexpected and satisfying performance. We do not hesitate to predict that if "Lucas Malet" has the faculty of growth in her—for the bisexual nom de plume will not mislead many—she will leave a distinguished name in literature. Mrs. Lorimer is not only brimful of cleverness, profuse and careless cleverness, as of one rich in intelligence, and of genuine, softly reflective humour, such as critics love; but of power of a kind so separate, that it is hard to characterise, without quoting in justification the whole book. It is really, we imagine, the power of suggestion, of producing, as some few painters can, the impression that there is more in the scene or the face before you than is visible to the eye, or than can be made intelligible by report. There is a portrait, for example, of Mr. Mainwaring, a large-limbed, healthy, crusty, hard-riding parson of the old school, who can hardly endure modern tendencies, who is ready to give up hunting because a wealthy tradesman's son makes himself prominent in the field, and who thinks his own doings and belongings things with a kind of divine right to be important. He never from first to last in the book does anything of any moment, except once make a remark to his wife; but you not only see him as clearly as you will ever see any figure in this life, but as you see him you become conscious that in this heavy-riding man there is a fund of unconscious, cumbrous strength, of thickly-covered Christian feeling, of battened-down love of justice and mercy, which you can trust implicitly, you do not know why. The sharpest critic can hardly say how it is done, the touches are so fine, the observation so delicately keen, the hints in action so nearly imperceptible; but it is done, once for all. Parson Donnithorne, though it now seems half an impiety to say so, is only better because he required, from his different nature, so much more delicacy of treatment. The comparison will seem ridiculous to many, but surely these passages suggest comparison, whatever the distance—and we quite admit any amount of distance—with the author of Adam Bede, and no other:—

"It was not only his true fatherly affection for her which made Mr. Mainwaring so dear to Elizabeth; she was a person singularly influenced by her early emotions and impressions. To most people, I suppose, the Rector would not have appeared a very romantic figure; but to Elizabeth's childish imagination, on one of his great raking hunters, clothed with the dignity of hunting-boots and spurs, he had seemed to embody all the gallant spirit of chivalry. The little girl fancied that the heroes of Sir Walter Scott's delightful stories must have ridden just such horses, and had the same air of perfect physical strength and pleasant courtesy about them. Elizabeth, as a child, had never been fired with the idea of military glory; had never seen glittering uniforms, or been moved with a sense of passionate exhilaration at the sound of martial music; had never been overcome with the wonderful pathos of all that brave show with its implied possibilities of horror, and agony, and death. So it happened that fox-hunting country gentlemen, common-place, easy-going people engaged merely in the pursuit of their own pleasure, represented to her the fine disregard of danger and indifference to bodily discomfort and hurt, that is so entirely captivating to most women's minds. It is the fashion now-a-days to deprecate the poetry of broken bones as uncultivated and archaic; but 'higher education,' Board Schools, and certificates notwithstanding, most people are still ruled more by their instincts and feelings than by pure reason, or a delicate perception of artistic cause and effect. A man's voluntary disregard of danger still claims a woman's sincere admiration. . . . I fancy there is no class of men who take themselves, and their occupations and engagements, so entirely for granted as the old-fashioned, English, country gentleman, and the said gentleman's old-fashioned, faithful man-servant. They do everything with a seriousness and an amount of conviction which is at once comic and impressive to the Bohemian 'dweller in tents,' whose tendency is to smile at everything—himself, most of all. But though, to an emancipated mind, it may seem a little absurd that any class of persons should be possessed of such an earnest and sincere belief in themselves, it must be admitted that they have an amount of solid, individual character which is too often wanting in more brilliant men. They are at one with nature, in fact,—though they have little enough

* Mrs. Lorimer. By Lucas Malet. London: Macmillan and Co.

imaginative appreciation of her beauties; and from that at-oneness springs a strength and self-confidence which is rightly very powerful."

After suggesting that Mrs. Frank Lorimer, quite a minor character, had in her something of that clearness and definiteness which Englishwomen often lack, Lucas Malet continues:—

"She was a dainty little person, with a creamy-white complexion, large blue eyes—rather too light in colour, perhaps—and fair, brown hair, arranged low on her forehead in soft waves. Her features were small and neat. Without having any claims to remarkable beauty, she was exceedingly pleasant to look at. There were no mysteries, surprises, or sudden illuminations about her; having seen her once, you had seen her always; she did not enchant you unexpectedly; on the other hand, she never disappointed you, but always produced the same effect of comfortable security and refined self-satisfaction. On the whole, women liked Mrs. Frank Lorimer more than men did. They found her so capable and so supporting. A few of her acquaintances certainly accused her of taking up a little too much room, and having to great a disposition to insert her pretty fingers into every pie: but then, who shall escape calumny altogether?"

The hero, Fred Wharton, is as good as Mr. Mainwaring. This is how he appears on the scene:—

"He was a very pleasant young gentleman, with a remarkable capacity for enjoying everything, himself included. He was a charming companion, and, though not actively or enthusiastically zealous in the service of his fellow-creatures, he had the delightful faculty, too often wanting in greater souls—in saints, and prophets, and reformers, and all those other admirable people whom we admire immensely at a distance, and canonise with sincere veneration when they are safely dead—of never being in the way. . . . Wharton was by way of being an artist. He had considerable talent; but his powers of application were not very highly developed. He really preferred contemplating his fellow-creatures from a stand-point of philosophic calm to any more practical occupation; and only worked earnestly when some particularly attractive subject presented itself to him, or when the state of his exchequer warned him that times of scarceness were not far off. . . . I suppose everybody's sense of humour is more or less intermittent. Wharton's sense of humour was certainly defective where those whom he disliked were concerned. Otherwise, as he stood and contemplated things around him, he was sensible of abstracting an immense amount of amusement from the show. Nothing matters very much, after all. From a secure position people have managed to watch the progress of the bloodiest battles with considerable composure. Sometimes, for a moment, Wharton's cheerful indifference left him, and the underlying tragedy of life lay bare before him, confounding and appalling his spirit. But, as a rule, he watched the strife serenely enough from his own safe and comfortable station, regarding even the painful incidents as so much excellent dramatic material. He was too busy noting every detail and each delicate effect of light and shadow, to be acutely distressed by the scene, however pathetic. A very lively interest often presents the same appearance to bystanders as positive hardness of heart. Wharton's heart was by no means hard, but he was too much engaged in receiving vivid mental impressions to have time for any great display of personal feeling."

One expects that man to say that he trusts he shall never break his heart, and to add, reflectively, "Though, really, Mrs. Lorimer, when one comes to think of it, it might be a very interesting experience!" Is not that delicate painting? The Shakespearian breadth and force are not there, any more than the Shakespearian humour; but it is Silas Marner, and no lesser book, which is called up by this description, which thus isolated is spoiled, for you do not see, as in the whole description of the man you do see, that while he is true pocomurante, deliberate spectator of life, who cannot be voluntarily actor in it, there is in him capacity for deep passion, and for intermittent but genuine bursts of energy and devotion. This is inferior, because it is so slight, but its suggestiveness is nearly as striking:—

"Frank Lorimer was of a very reasonable temperament. As a rule, he had not the least inclination to quarrel with things as they are; but he had often felt it hard that the world had not been constituted on some principle which would have rendered it unnecessary for him ever to have to say anything unpleasant to anybody. You may call this inherent sweetness of nature, or a lamentable want of moral courage, as you please. The more delicate virtues always run the risk of being included under the head of reprehensible weakness of character. Any way, Frank Lorimer found no righteous satisfaction in rebuking the erring brother. And rebuking the erring sister seemed to him, if possible, even more objectionable. He felt that Elizabeth had been very careless and extravagant; but he had not the smallest desire to tell her so. Consequently, he arrived at her house, on the evening of the day following Mr. Leeper's stormy visit, with a sense upon him that he had a most ungracious duty to accomplish."

The heroine of the story, like every one else in it, does next to nothing. Left a widow at twenty-one by a husband she only half loved and only a quarter comprehended, Elizabeth Lorimer returns to her uncle Mr. Mainwaring's house, is bored there, goes to London to live among bric-à-brac, does nothing there except receive half-friendly worship from Wharton and pay visits, wakes in a larger experience of life to a truer perception of what her husband had been, refuses Wharton in a scene full of power, returns to her uncle's rectory, and, visiting the poor, dies of some ordinary fever. That is all, nor does Elizabeth distinguish herself greatly in dialogue, being occasionally snappish, and even hot-tempered; and yet the impression on the reader of a large, rich, self-indulgent nature, with a strain of strength and principle in it, hungering, thirsting, almost frantic with desire for happiness, yet utterly incapable of acting wrongly, or of putting aside an impulse towards a higher life, is indelible. We cannot prove the proposition by extracts, for every sentence about Mrs. Lorimer in the book, every act she does, every attitude she assumes, is directed towards the end, but no one who reads Mrs. Lorimer is in any doubt. She is not completely finished, far from it; there is, as artists say, a want of the suggestion of skeleton under all that dainty flesh, and fine colouring, and flowing drapery; but still, she is a person, and one about whom you make no error. The author makes one, the only one in the book, which suggests possible inexperience of life. Elizabeth Lorimer, née Mainwaring, would not have gone back to Claybrooke, but have accepted Wharton, whom she more than half loved, to try that experiment in her pursuit of happiness. She was not religious, the increased perception of what her dead husband had been would have increased her feeling for his memory, but would not have quieted her inability to face ennui; and the return, if made at all, would have been later, when experience had done its work, and the youthful hunger for happiness had been stilled. The catastrophe is a failure in art; but in the reader's certainty of that, is the evidence of the power which inexperience—or is it some special view of life, like Currer Bell's conception of the hostility of Fate?—has wilfully thrown away. The error is not redeemed by a page or two of rather weak, goody reflections, which, we dare say, are the real outcome of a true feeling, but produce, nevertheless, on the background of so much observation, sometimes almost cynical in its keenness, an effect of unreality. The contrast between the almost malignant sketch of Mr. Leeper, the acrid and earnest clergyman, and the apology for Mrs. Lorimer's latest phase of feeling, is a little too sharp not to rouse the reader's suspicion of over-colouring. That is a defect, like the almost inexplicable strainedness of the first chapter; but it is the defect of a raw, not of a feeble, hand. It is not as a finished story, but as a story of rare promise, alike of humour and of pathos, that we recommend Mrs. Lorimer, not to the public, but to the critics.

CHRIST CHURCH CATHEDRAL IN DUBLIN.*

THE restoration of the two cathedral churches of Dublin, St. Patrick's, and that of the Holy Trinity, commonly called Christ Church, is an event of our time which is to be regarded with great satisfaction. Art and history are both gainers by the rescue from decay of two important and interesting monuments of ancient times and an older faith.

"The Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, commonly called Christ Church," though the smaller building of the two, is more ancient and more beautiful than St. Patrick's. It was about the year 1038 that Sitric,—the Danish king who was gloriously defeated by "Brian the Brave," King of Munster, at the famous Battle of Clontarf, after he had helped that patriotic chieftain to suppress Malachy, of "collar of gold" celebrity,—aided by Donat, who is termed the first Bishop of Dublin—meaning the first Danish Bishop of that see—built the original edifice, in what was then the centre of the city. The incident is of additional historical import, because it affords, as Mr. Seymour points out, the first indications of any active interest in Christianity being taken by the Danes in Ireland. "The good Bishop Donat," says Mr. Seymour, "died on the 6th of May, 1074, and was buried in his cathedral, on the right-hand side of the high altar." He is said to have built the nave and wings, or aisles, of the cathedral, the chapel of St. Nicholas, on the north side of the church, and the adjoining chapel of St. Michael, the latter being subsequently converted, in the fifteenth century, by Richard Talbot, one of Donat's successors in the see, into a parish church, on the side of which the new Synod Hall has been erected by Mr. Roe, for the deliberative assembly of the Church of Ireland. Hardly a trace of Bishop Donat's work remains. We pass on to the history of the cathedral after A.D. 1163, when Bishop Laurence, generally known as St. Laurence O'Toole (Lorcan O'Tuathal), converted it into a priory, and changed the secular clergy into the regular order of Arroasian canons so called from an abbey in the diocese of Arras, in Flanders, a branch of the Augustinian Order long since extinct. To Bishop Laurence, during whose episcopacy the Anglo-Normans invaded Ireland and Henry II. took possession of the island, and to Strongbow, were due the erection of the eastern portion of the cathedral, and the endowment of the priory with wealth and privileges. This work was not long completed when Strongbow died, and, although the authenticity of his tomb, which is one of the few treasures left to "Christ's," is reasonably denied, there is no doubt that "the great and powerful Earl" was solemnly interred in the cathedral, under the direction of Archbishop Laurence, who survived him four years, and died at Eu, in Normandy. Within fifty years Laurence was canonised by Pope Honorius III., but his body was not brought home to his cathedral. Mr. Seymour's interesting record includes a very striking description of St. Laurence O'Toole, whose three immediate successors were all Englishmen, and great benefactors of the cathedral. During the time of the first and second, the beautiful nave, which still remains, was added to Laurence's work. The priory rose in importance as time went on; the Prior was a Lord in Parliament in the time of King John, who granted several privileges to the community, and in the course of the thirteenth century, the Cathedral, whose beauty has been retraced and disinterred by Mr. Street, and is put before us in this admirable book, was completed. Perhaps it was too complete—there is an old superstition about the last stone of a church—at all events, its troubles began immediately. In 1283, certain of the "Irishry" set fire to Skinner's Row, which communicated with the church, whereby the steeple, the chapter house, the dormitory, and the cloisters were destroyed. "It is recorded to the honour of the citizens on this occasion," says Mr. Seymour, "that they made a collection to restore the priory, before they repaired their own dwellings which had suffered by the fire. . . . In 1303, a licence was granted to Friar Henri de Cork to travel through the kingdom to collect alms for the restoration of the cathedral, and the King's letter of safe-conduct on this occasion is still extant among the records in Dublin Castle. At the close of the century, the dispute between the governing bodies of the two cathedrals (St. Patrick's Chapter also claiming the right to elect an Archbishop of Dublin, when the See became vacant) was settled by Pope Boniface VIII., who gave precedence to Christ Church. Mr. Seymour gives an animated account of the fierce contest that raged on the occasion. No doubt, the cathedral was being adorned and beautified all this time; but soon after, it sustained serious damage. In 1316, the steeple was blown down, to be rebuilt in 1329; and ten years later, Archbishop John of St. Paul, took down the original choir, substituted that which every one who remembers the cathedral before its present restoration will agree with Mr. Seymour in pronouncing "elongated and poverty-stricken," and made several other additions. There is not wanting the element of romance, nor, indeed, that of humour, to the history of these ancient walls, for in 1394, King Richard II. crossed, with an army of 4,000 knights and esquires and 30,000 archers, passed several months in Dublin, dazzled the inhabitants by the magnificence of his Court, and conferred the honour of knighthood upon the four principal Irish princes, O'Neill, O'Connor, O'Brien, and McMur Chad. Mr. Seymour quotes the amusing account of this pageant to be found in Froissart's Chronicles, from the narrative of Sir Harry Cristall, who was "charged with the care and teachings of these four kings," and found it hard to make them appreciate the honour, for they stoutly maintained that they were knights already. Nor was this his only difficulty; the Irish princes no more took kindly to breeches than did Rob Roy's folk, and saddles and stirrups were, in their eyes, just so many impediments to the purposes of horsemanship. The cathedral was rich in relics, in addition to the "Staff of Christ" and the shrine of St. Cubius; it was the scene of many pageants, and it was an exclusively English institution. Probably that pre-Reformation characteristic, and the tradition of it remaining, rendered the Irish people so indifferent, as they certainly were, to the appropriation of their cathedrals to Protestant worship, while the Protestant religion made no impression upon them.

* The Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, commonly called Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin. An Account of the Restoration of the Fabric. By G. E. Street, R.A. With a Historical Sketch by Edward Seymour, R.A., and a Dedication by Sir Theodore Martin, K.C.B. London: Sutton, Sharpe, and Co.

So strictly was the English character of the Cathedral maintained by the rigid exclusion of all native Irishmen, even from inferior offices—Mr. Seymour quotes Mr. Gilbert for this—that in 1380, "the Parliament, in which the Prior always held a seat, passed a law that no native should be suffered to profess himself in this institution." In 1486, Christ Church was the scene of a remarkable performance,—no other than the coronation of Lambert Simnel as Edward VI., amid the acclamations of the people, with a crown said to have been taken "from the statue of the Virgin in St. Mary's Abbey." Two years later, the Bishop of Meath had to make atonement for his share in this act of disloyalty to Henry VII., by reading publicly in Christ Church "the Pope's Bull of accursing, and the absolution for the same, and the grace which the King had sent."

It was in the time of Henry VIII. that the old name was abandoned, and the Cathedral became Christ Church. In 1562, the catastrophe occurred that made the building the unsightly object it remained until Mr. Street restored it, according to the munificent purpose of Mr. Roe:—

"Owing to the bad construction of the piers, the massive stone-groined roof gradually spread the walls of the nave asunder, and on April 3rd, 1562, it came to the ground, carrying along with it the greater portion of the southern arcade, the eastern arch of which alone remained, and that in a very shattered and damaged condition; while the northern side of the nave was left standing indeed, but sadly shaken, and much out of the perpendicular. The greater part of the west front, too, was carried away in the crash. The southern arcade was replaced in the same year by a hideous blank wall, and the stone groined roof by mean and naked rafters. These things, happily, now belong to the past, and can only be recalled to mind by the assistance of the photographer's art, from which alone we can judge how completely this sad calamity effaced the former beauty of Christ Church."

There is a hint in this passage, afterwards developed by Mr. Street, that our cherished notions of the Art ideas and the matchless handiwork of the mediæval workman are not quite securely founded. He was not such an intolerable person as the British workman of to-day, but he could, and did, scamp his work on occasions, of which the building of the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity was a favourable one. It was, indeed, an ugly, deserted, "God-forgotten" pile on which Mr. Street's masterly skill and fine taste were brought to bear, with unexampled freedom, under the stimulus of Mr. Roe's munificence. That Mr. Street lived to see his great work completed is matter for rejoicing; and now we have that work supplemented by a variously interesting narrative of the manner and progress of that restoration, and of the discovery, piecemeal, of the old church during the process. It must have been a delightful task to such a mind as Mr. Street's to read the thoughts of his predecessors, to read away the veils of time, to undo the work of ruin, to atone for the blank indifference of neglect. He was hampered with no restrictions, he was troubled with no "fads," either single or collective, he had his own way in all things—that way stands justified by the result—and he has left the record of his task in a narrative which cannot fail to instruct and interest even the reader least well disposed towards technical detail. In Mr. Seymour's historical sketch we find a slight elegiac flavour, mildly mournful, a gentle wailing, as of an Æolian harp put out in not too strong a wind, over the "sad" event of Disestablishment. This is very natural; but then the restoration of a beautiful cathedral, by the act of a private citizen, and its presentation to "the Disestablished Church of Ireland," cheers up the Precentor, as it ought to do, and reduces the decorous dolefulness of the protest de rigueur to the same sort of disclaimer as the Jacobite toasts in the dying-echo period of the last century. It is also very natural that in his re-solution of the ruin of Christ Church into its first principles, Mr. Street should have sought, and found, the supreme importance of the architect everywhere, the subordination of the craftsman in everything; and although we have to part with another cherished notion, we shall not attempt to dispute, from our unlearned and outside position, the limited share that he assigns to the imagination, the taste, and the discrimination of the workman. His narrative is full of interest of many kinds, of exploration, speculation, discovery, glimpses of the history of the past, and of the great satisfaction of an unqualified success.

The dedication of this superb book to Mr. Henry Roe is written by Sir Theodore Martin; it is slightly old-fashioned in style; the periods are lengthy and very much rounded; the tone is courtly; the whole composition goes well with the stateliness of the magnificent volume, whose white-vellum binding, enriched with designs in red and gold drawn by Mr. Street, is the most perfect thing of the kind we have ever seen. Among the illustrations are two woodcuts of great merit, from drawings by Mr. Brewer, representing the Lady chapel and the pulpit; and several other woodcuts, steel engravings, and chromo-lithographs. The latter show us the new stained-glass windows, which Mr. Street praises very highly. We agree with him as to the colours; these must be singularly rich, soft, and skilfully blended, but the designs strike us as meagre and inexpressive. The paper and the printing are of the very best kind; altogether, the book is emphatically "a thing of beauty."

SCIENCE AND SENTIMENT.*

THE question as to the true province of feeling and imagination, as assistants to the intellect in the discovery of truth, has always seemed to us a very interesting one. It is sometimes the fashion among second-rate thinkers to contrast the cool-headed, severely logical, and unemotional man of science with the impulsive, imaginative, weak-headed enthusiast, as though the former had all the qualities needed in the search for truth, while the latter must necessarily live in a fool's paradise, the creation of his own wild imaginings and desires. "Exact thought" seems to such thinkers to imply the elimination of every element of emotion and imagination, as untrustworthy; useful, indeed, as being productive of happiness, but simply misleading in the search for objective truth. It has always seemed to us, on the contrary, quite evident that those feelings which nature has implanted in us may, if properly used and directed, be not only no impediment, but of the greatest service in the acquisition of knowledge, and that they are in some cases indispensable thereunto. Not as though we were to trust them implicitly as final tests of truth, but because they arouse the intellect to investigation, and suggest much to it of which it would otherwise have remained ignorant. A woman's natural tact, her quick perception of what will please one man or what will sting another, is a very obvious instance of this power. She trusts to her natural gift of sensitive sympathy with the particular minds in question. And though her instinct may occasionally tell her falsely, there is no doubt that she will find out, by natural tact, much that is going on in the minds of her acquaintance which mere logic, without this gift of emotional sympathy, could never approach. A great scientific discoverer, again,—a Newton or a Darwin—is not satisfied with cold, logical thought. In the first place, he is fired with enthusiasm for truth, and love for the particular department of nature to whose investigation he has devoted himself; and then, again, he goes through long periods of meditation and reflection which so little resemble orderly, explicit, logical thought, and are so complicated by natural instinct and imagination, that when at the end he hits upon a new truth, he sometimes can scarcely give any reasons for it, and it looks to meaner minds more like a lucky guess than a scientific induction. The truth seems to be that great emotional and imaginative susceptibilities are like a high-mettled horse, which, if kept well in hand and skilfully ridden, will carry you where you want to go in a third of the time which another would take, and clear many a five-barred gate which the other would never get over at all; but if badly ridden, will throw you, or carry you across country where you least want to go. The unimaginative and strictly logical mind, on the other hand, is very slow; nor is it always quite safe.

In making these remarks, we have partly anticipated what we have to say of the very remarkable volume of essays before us by Dr. Porter, of Yale College, New York. The first essay—on Science and Sentiment—the title of which he has wisely prefixed to the whole volume, gives the key-note to the others, although these should likewise be carefully read, as treating in detail and with great ability of the utterances of many of the most distinguished philosophical thinkers of our day. But the first essay gives us an insight into the central feature of the author's philosophy, which may be briefly described as the doctrine that science and sentiment should not, logically speaking, be divorced, but that, on the contrary, they should be combined and harmonised, as mutually assisting and correcting one another, in the endeavour to attain to objective truth in general, and especially religious truth. Dr. Porter commences by drawing attention to the popular contrast which is often drawn between the teachings of science and the promptings of sentiment. Sentiment urges you to relieve the man whom you see in hunger and want, at once and on the spot. Science tells you that in the long-run it is much truer charity to aid in the recognised State provisions for poor-relief. But, as Dr. Porter points out, later on, in this, as in many other instances of apparent contrast, science does not in reality disregard sentiment. It only corrects and directs it. Giving to public charities is just as much a homage to the natural instinct of benevolence, as giving the same amount to a beggar in the street would be. The difference is that in the one case sentiment is directed by science, and in the other it is uncontrolled. In the one case, it is kept in hand by reason; in the other, it takes the bit between its own teeth. Touching on the religious aspect of the supposed contrast between science and sentiment, the author quotes Professor Tyndall as describing religion as simply sentiment, with no relation to real knowledge. As to religious creeds, the Professor remarks that "it may be well to recognise them as the forms of a force mischievous, if permitted to intrude on the region of knowledge, over which it holds no command, but capable of being guided to noble issues in the region of emotion, which is its proper sphere." This most unsatisfactory conclusion is combated by Dr. Porter, though he admits that it seems to satisfy some:—

"To these terms of neutrality not a few are ready to accede. They find in them no humiliation. There are not a few men of feeling who are willing to escape the obligation of giving a reason for their feelings, even if they must concede that their feelings cannot be justified by any reason. Not a few answer the supercilious dogmas of science with their own Stat pro ratione voluntas. But a policy of neutrality purchased by non-intercourse will never satisfy, and ought not to endure, for the simple reason that the heart can neither love nor trust what the head demonstrates to be untrue. An earnest and thorough man must believe in the reality of what he loves and cares for. It is only in the excitement of the moment that a man can love and hate, fear and hope what he suspects may be a phantom?"

Such a divorce, then, between knowledge and feeling Dr. Porter rightly holds to be impossible as a permanent state of things. As Mr. Mallock has said, a boy who has been enjoying gooseberry champagne, while under the impression that it is a rare and choice wine, will not care for it when he finds out his mistake. And in the same manner, the sentiment of religious love and worship cannot be permanently satisfied, once it is plain that its objects are unreal. After urging with much force the claims of sentiment as a spur to the intellect, and as its informant concerning those needs of the human heart which, judging by the analogies of Nature, should find satisfaction somewhere, the author points out that over and above what mere sentiment can do in behalf of knowledge, there is a yet greater work for what is often called "sentiment," as the term is frequently used of much that has in it an element of intellectual perception:—

"Much that passes for sentiment has a positively intellectual element. Many of the so-called sentiments signify strong convictions warmed into ardent enthusiasm, and held with passionate earnestness. The intellectual element in them may not be obtrusive. The truths on which these convictions rest may be seen so clearly, and reasoned so readily, that the presence and activity of the intellect can scarcely be observed. The feelings may flash so quickly into flame, and glow with such intense earnestness, that even the subject of them scarcely knows that he thinks at all. It should never be forgotten that emotion in man rests on belief; that feeling of every sort is the legitimate product of what is taken to be true. The proverb which reads, Wherever there is smoke, there is fire, may be expanded thus, 'Wherever there is fire, there is fuel,' and this may be still further applied, 'Wherever there is the fire of emotion, there is a firm belief of truth.' Now, we do not argue that excited feeling proves certain truth. Nothing would be more absurd. But we reason thus: wherever, from one generation to another, under all circumstances, there have been persistent habits of feeling which have taken the strongest hold of man's nature, and moved it to its depths, animating it to labour and sacrifice, there is certain evidence that some fact or truth is earnestly believed. This belief may often be sadly and seriously mistaken, it may be but the caricature or travesty of the truth; and yet that there is truth about which it is concerned, which man rightly thinks to be important, is most reasonable to be inferred. That truth, whatever it may be, or whatever it may concern, science is bound to search after, until it can find and defend it."

With this suggestive and remarkable extract we take leave of the essay, as we should be carried too far, did we attempt to discuss as it deserves the question it raises.

The other essays are, as we have said, well worth reading. We are disposed to quarrel with Dr. Porter's estimate of John Stuart Mill. We do not think he gives him sufficient credit for his singular candour, conscientiousness, and love of truth. But Dr. Porter draws out with painful accuracy the inconsistency of Mill's creed, the outcome, as it was, of strong religious yearnings, implanted in one whose early training had been such as to render hearty and complete faith next to impossible. In taking leave of the whole volume, we can most heartily speak of it as a very thoughtful and able contribution to the philosophy of religion.

* Science and Sentiment, with other Papers, chiefly Philosophical. By Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D., President of Yale College. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1882.

TRAVELS IN BALUCHISTAN.*

THOSE of our readers who recollect the interesting volumes in which Sir Charles Macgregor described his travels in the Persian province of Khorasan four years ago, will turn to his present book with expectations of pleasure; and we may at once say that they are not destined to be disappointed. Of all little-known countries, Baluchistan is probably the one which presents fewest features of interest, and General Macgregor has had to struggle with no slight difficulties, not merely in preventing his story from becoming dull and monotonous, but absolutely in filling a volume about it at all. General Macgregor's explorations lay, too, in the least interesting parts of this very uninteresting State,—those deserts of the west where the exact frontier lines with Persia and Afghanistan are either unknown or a matter of individual fancy, and whither the most adventurous travellers have failed to find a sufficient inducement to turn their steps. But Sir Charles Macgregor, who had explored a great portion of Khorasan, and compiled a very excellent official gazetteer about the countries adjacent to Western India, felt bound to ascertain the true position of places, and the capabilities of moving caravans and troops through districts, first mentioned by the travellers Pottinger and Christie more than seventy years ago. It was with this object in view that, on his return to India in 1876, he resolved to make his way through Baluchistan from west to east, and to explore the northern parts of Mekran, and the Zirreh Desert. With his companion, the late Captain Lockwood, an officer of promise, he succeeded in accomplishing his purpose, and in giving to the map of Western Baluchistan, which had been almost a blank, the names of many inhabited spots, of some rivers, and of several mountain ranges. But although General Macgregor came across a few places which he thought might be reclaimed from the desert, the greater proportion by far of the country is hopelessly barren, and presents so uninviting an aspect, that we feel sure a perusal of these pages will at once remove all desire to have anything to do with this region or its people.

General Macgregor has the quick eye for details of the observant and experienced traveller, and he accordingly supplies many particulars which bring the natives before us as living and animate creatures. The tribes of the west, living in a state of constant feud with each other, and hardly deigning to take the least notice of the behests of the Khan of Kelat, are composed almost exclusively of the Baluch race, whereas the ruling class and a large portion of the people of the eastern districts are Brahooes. There is a marked difference between these two races, as the following anecdotes, taken at random from General Macgregor's experiences of them both, will reveal:—

"My guide amused me much by his conversation to-day. Like all Baloches, he is deliciously simple in his ideas, and has none of the Eastern habit of putting things sweetly. When I was stooping down to get the slide for my camera, he looked at me and remarked, 'Why do you have your trousers so tight?'—I laughed, and said I thought they were very loose.—'Loose!' he replied, 'I thought they would split; mine are loose if you like,' holding out his to his side.—Next thing he said was, 'Now I have shown you my country, you must show me yours.'—'Very well,' I replied, 'but that would not be a fair exchange; there is nothing to see here, where there is nothing but stones; my country is one large garden.'—'Is it?' said he; and then turning to the men, he repeated, 'His country is all a garden, date trees everywhere.'—I protested that there were no date trees.—'No date trees! whew!' and he looked as if he thought a country without date trees could not be much worth seeing."

Again, General Macgregor writes as follows about his Baluch attendants and guard:—

"I gradually took sketches of each of my brave army, most of which I have since lost. This is a pity, as they made very queer pictures. Some really were quite ruffians, and others looked it. Their habits were anything but soldierly, and they thought nothing of firing off their matchlocks at any moment; but I tried to put a stop to this. . . . Certainly, one trait of the Baloches is their intense avariciousness. If you give them anything, they unblushingly ask for something more. The fate of my present to Muhammad Shah has already been mentioned. Again, some days ago I gave Muhammad my gun, and he came to Lockwood to-day to ask what it was worth; and lastly, I gave the guide a capital clasp-knife; he took it, never said thank-you, but remarked to his rafik (companion), 'It has got neither a sheath nor a sling.' Whenever you ask a Baloch to do anything for you, he invariably says, 'What will you give me?' The other day, one of my paid escort wanted payment for coming to the top of a hill with me!"

The Brahooes, whose origin is so obscure, that, while one great authority declares them to be of Tartar stock, another identifies their language with Tamil, are quite a superior people, with whom General Macgregor's relations were of the most friendly kind. The following scene may be quoted, by way of contrast with those in which the Baluchis figured as the prominent characters:—

"We arrived after twelve miles at a Brahui camp, near a watering-place to the north called Pishak. As we were going along, an elderly gentleman rushed out with a small carpet, and called out, 'Hi! where are you going? Stop here!' And when he saw we still kept on our way, for I wanted to be near the water, he said, 'Hi! stop here. You are my guest! Don't blacken my face! Agha [Sir], do stop! For God's sake, be my guest!' and so on. I was so amused that I halted. Then he came up and seized hold of my leg, and said, 'There, now you are going to stop!' But I protested that I wanted to go on, to be near the water. 'Water! I will give you water, and meat, and milk, and bread, whatever you want.' So I said, 'I am very much obliged, and since you are so kind, I will stay here.'—'Kind,' he called out, laughing, 'wait till you see—Now, what do you want? A little milk? Nothing else? Have some bread?'—'No, I have bread, but if you could get us a little wood.'—'Of course; and you'll have some meat?' I have lots of meat.—'Thanks,' I said, 'I have meat; could you get some grass for the horse?' Before the words were out of my mouth he shouted, 'Hi Shahu! ho Merula! run and get some grass for the Agha's horse. Now, what else do you want?'—'Nothing more,' I replied; but he went on pressing me for a long time to have this and that. This, as a specimen, and a first specimen of the Brahuis, was certainly a great improvement. I was more than a month among the Baloches, and no man ever offered me a glass of water, and the last Baloch I met, Khan Jahan, when I arrived at his camp, told me to go on. The benevolent old gentleman, who was called Shah Dost, continued his attentions late in the night, and in the morning it was just the same; I feel sure there was no arrière pensée, for he never asked for any payment, and when I gave his little daughter a couple of rupees as a delicate way of returning his kindness, he wanted to return them; at which the young lady pouted and was going off into a 'boo! hoo!' I said, 'Let her take them on my account; your kindness cannot be paid for by money.' How different from the Baloch, who, if he does anything for you, always precedes it by an inquiry what his 'hakk' is to be!"

General Macgregor showed throughout his journey, under many trying circumstances, great tact and good temper. The way in which he managed his unruly Baluch escort, will excite the admiration of the reader; and we may say that we have seldom met with a traveller who knew better how to temper firmness with discretion. It is not very likely that a reference to these pages will encourage a desire to visit this quarter of Asia, nor will any future Alexander, sighing for new worlds to conquer, seek to reach India by marching through the desert and waterless plains of Mekran. The Baluch tribes offer no inducement, even to the petty Government of the Khan of Kelat, for direct interference in their affairs. They may recognise, or they may not—just as they choose—the authority of the agents that Chief has placed in some of their villages; but the rights of sovereignty can bring no profit and little honour to Mir Khododad. If there is any actual ruler in the western parts of Baluchistan, it is the bandit Azad Khan, of whom General Macgregor has a great deal to say, although he never met him personally. Azad Khan has established a fort of refuge at a place called Khormagah, in the heart of the desert, whence he dispenses his orders to the surrounding tribes. He has won his way by several successful wars, and by vanquishing many rivals, to a position of superiority over his neighbours. There is some interest attaching to his declaration that he only recognises the authority of the Afghans, and not of the Brahoo ruler of Kelat. In this declaration may be perceived a reminiscence of the old Afghan claims over the country of Baluchistan, while Azad Khan's chief motive in adopting this course is, no doubt, to set-off the name of the Afghans against that of the Brahooes. The affair is one of purely local interest, and the Khan of Kelat is not likely to be so ill-advised as to interfere with a turbulent race, which is sure to give great trouble if meddled with, but which, if left alone, will hurt nobody except itself. At the same time, General Macgregor's information concerning a people through whose country passes one of the principal telegraph lines to India, adds much to our knowledge of our Indian neighbours. It certainly completes the useful data which it is always desirable to possess about the dominions of the Khan of Kelat, and there will be a general opinion that its author has contributed another solid piece of work to that he had previously rendered towards the comprehension of Asiatic questions.

* Wanderings in Baluchistan. By Major-General Sir C. M. Macgregor, K.C.B., C.S.I., C.I.E. London: W. H. Allen and Co. 1882.

MR. ISAACS.*

THIS story contains sufficient of the supernatural to make it a sort of cross between the ordinary novel and fairy-tale. It purports to be narrated by one Paul Griggs, who edits a paper in India, and is Roman Catholic, half-Italian and half-American, and one of those amiable cynics who are constantly giving the lie to the disbelief in human nature they profess, by discovering in all their acquaintances some one or more of the good qualities the possession of which they deny to the race at large. At a hotel in Simla he chances to meet a stranger, a Persian, who has abbreviated his proper designation of Abdul Hafiz-ben-Isâk into Mr. Isaacs, and who is the hero of the book. There is a decided flavour of the Count of Monte Cristo about the description of this gentleman, with his lavish wealth, and wonderful and varied talents, powers, and information; he is romantically brave and generous, an excellent linguist, musician, sportsman, man of business, &c., reads thoughts as though by magic, has a dangerous, mysterious, and infallible remedy for injuries, possesses all kinds of remote knowledge, and is exceptionally beautiful to look at:—

"An easy grace marked his movements at all times, whether deliberate or vehement,—and he often went to each extreme,—a grace which no one acquainted with the science of the human frame would be at a loss to explain for a moment. The perfect harmony of all the parts, the even symmetry of every muscle, the equal distribution of a strength, not colossal and overwhelming, but ever ready for action, the natural courtesy of gesture—all told of a body in which true proportion of every limb and sinew were at once the main feature and the pervading characteristic. This infinitely supple and swiftly-moving figure was but the pedestal, as it were, for the noble face and nobler brain to which it owed its life and majestic bearing. A long oval face of a wondrous transparent olive tint, and of a decidedly Oriental type. A prominent brow and arched but delicate eyebrows fitly surmounted a nose smoothly aquiline, but with the broad well-set nostrils that bespeak active courage."

Yet it was neither by his graceful figure, nor his perfect Iranian features, that he at once enthralled and fascinated the susceptible, would-be cynical editor; but by his eyes, which are described in the following glowing terms:—

"I once saw in France a jewel composed of six precious stones, each a gem of great value, so set that they appeared to form but one solid mass, yielding a strange radiance that changed its hue at every movement, and multiplied the sunlight a thousandfold. Were I to seek a comparison for my friend's eyes, I might find an imperfect one in this masterpiece of the jeweller's art. They were dark and of remarkable size; when half-closed, they were long and almond-shaped; when suddenly opened in anger or surprise, they had the roundness and bold keenness of the eagle's sight. There was a depth of life and vital light in them that told of the pent-up force of a hundred generations of Persian magi. They blazed with the splendour of a god-like nature, needing neither meat nor strong drink to feed its power."

Enamoured (how could he help it?) at first sight of this paragon, Griggs is immediately ready to risk life and death on his behalf, and to do his utmost to promote Isaacs' courtship of an English girl with whom he has fallen madly in love. Considering that Isaacs does not credit women with the possession of souls, and has already three wives (of which fact he frankly informs the young lady he admires), most people would have been likely, in the interests of the girl, to hesitate about helping on this love-affair; but Griggs has no scruples on the subject (and possibly his staunch support of his friend's suit under such extremely unusual circumstances may be intended by the author as a warning of the folly of allowing cynics to interfere in matchmaking). It happens that the irresistible Mr. Isaacs has also captivated the affections of one Ram Lal, an extraordinary personage, whose powers are quite as supernatural as those of the enchanter in any child's fairy-tale, only with the difference that in Ram Lal's case they are attributed, in some hazy way, to a sublime disregard for mortal pleasures and conquest of mind over matter to which he, as one of the order of higher Buddhists, has attained. He is spoken of as an "adept," and though the precise meaning of that term is not given, yet it is evidently equivalent to "magician," since there is no other theory which can explain his ubiquity, mysterious appearances and vanishings, knowledge of things said and done in his absence, and correct prophecies. We will quote an instance of his astonishing power. Three men wish to carry off a prisoner from fifty hostile soldiers, who are resolved to kill both him and his rescuers. In these circumstances, ordinary mortals would hardly expect that the three would be able openly to accomplish their purpose when the soldiers were broad awake and looking at them; but Ram Lal thinks nothing of making such a performance feasible. He causes a sudden dense mist to obscure a clear and brilliant moonlight, and manages the affair so easily, that the only wonder is why he did not do it altogether alone; and the reader thoroughly sympathises with the bewilderment of Griggs, who, having had a considerable share of danger in the adventure, confesses himself "completely at a loss to explain why, if Ram Lal can command the forces of nature to the extent of calling down a thick mist under the cover of which we might escape, he could not have calmly destroyed the whole band by lightning, by indigestion, or some simple and efficacious means, so that we need not have risked our lives in supplementing what he only half did." Buddhists do not seek European converts, and we are, therefore, not a little surprised to find the omnipotent Ram Lal anxious for Isaacs to join the brotherhood to which he himself belonged. Such, however, being the case, one feels that Isaacs is provoking his fate, when he states that if anything were to occur to make him permanently unhappy beyond the possibility of ordinary consolation, he believes he would seek comfort in studying the pure doctrines of the higher Buddhists. Obviously, then, if the earthly joy he most covets should be dashed from his lips, that will tend to bring about what Ram Lal wishes; consequently, the latter withholds information that would have been likely to prevent the downfall of Isaacs' hopes, and the story closes in the triumph of the enchanter, as he carries off the hero to devote himself to endeavouring to attain to neh'ban, that cold and comfortless condition, hardly to be distinguished from annihilation, which forms the final goal of a Buddhist's desires. We have great doubts, however, as to Ram Lal's having thought fit to impart to his neophyte the full amount of non-entity at which the Buddhist hopes eventually to arrive; for when we leave Isaacs, he is looking gladly forward in the future to being, "not alone, but wedded for all ages to her who has gone before me,"—which state of anticipated bliss is not easy to reconcile with the description that a recently published book gives of neh'ban, as an existence where a man "knows nothing of others or of the world, and so is a stranger to all feelings of joy or sorrow." For such a severing of ties and loss of individuality as that, would seem little likely to satisfy the aspirations of one so full of vital energy, and possessing so strongly marked an ego, as Mr. Isaacs.

The foregoing sketch will show that this book has some absurdities; but apart from this, there is much to like in it. It is entertaining, and contains capital bits of description of travelling and general mode of life in India, besides fresh and pleasant writing, and sufficient cleverness and imagination to make us hope that the same pen will produce another story, constructed on a basis of probabilities, and without any admixture of supernatural elements. And, finally, we would caution Mrs. Crawford that it is possible to be too learned. A novel-reader does not generally hanker after conversations which are of the nature of essays on metaphysics, cynicism, philosophy, psychology, and other abstruse subjects, and which give the impression of being intended to display the extent and variety of the author's information rather than to advance the story; nor is the average student of light literature very likely to care for discussions on transcendental analysis, wherein occur such sentences as the following:—

"Consider the theories of Darwin, for instance. What are they but an elaborate application of the higher calculus? He differentiates men into protoplasms, and integrates protoplasms into monkeys, and shows the caudal appendage to be the independent variable, a small factor in man, a large factor in monkey. And has not the idea of successive development supplanted the early conception of spontaneous perfection?"

LAMBETH PALACE.*

THIS handsome volume has attractions and excellences apart altogether from the late Dr. Tait, who wrote the introduction to it. An author at once so modest and so much in love with his subject as Mr. Cave-Browne here shows himself to be, would be the last man in the world to object to this short essay being glanced at before his own work is considered. It is interesting, if for nothing else, as being a specimen of the best style of the late Primate. While essentially a modern man, and

* Mr. Isaacs. By F. Marion Crawford. London: Macmillan and Co.

* Lambeth Palace and its Associations. By J. Cave-Browne, M.A. With an Introduction by the late Archbishop of Canterbury. London and Edinburgh: William Blackwood and Sons. 1882.

seeking to adapt the Church of which he was the pilot to what he terms here "these somewhat democratic times," he had a strong historic sense. His dual nature, indeed, accounts to some extent at once for what robust and more audacious personalities considered his individual weaknesses, and for what all fair critics of his Primacy admit to be his official strength. Here, this historic sense, which, though not so literary, was quite as warm as the late Dean Stanley's, is allowed free scope, the result being what Mr. Arnold—himself full of this same sense—might style archæology touched with emotion. The following, for example, may not be in the grand, but still it is in a good style:—"Even if we confine our thoughts to the time—now nearly seven centuries—during which the Archbishops have lived in Lambeth, we find ourselves connected, by the associations which cluster round these walls, with each step in the onward progress of our Church and people towards fuller light and higher liberty. We can find memorials here of the successful efforts made to secure freedom from the thralldom of Rome, which marked the reigns of the later Plantagenets and of the Lancastrian and Yorkist Sovereigns. We can trace the mode in which Christian influence was maintained throughout the land, in spite of marauding Barons and rapacious Kings. We can see how the professed followers of Christ bore themselves amid the struggles preceding that great upheaval of society, in which the hitherto non-privileged classes asserted their rights as Englishmen. We learn how the Church of England, notwithstanding the grave faults of many of its rulers, adapted itself—under the good hand of God—in all these troublous times, and in the changing days which followed them, to the real wants of the English people. The admonitions of places are, to the student of history, as powerful as the admonitions of books. Men's hearts may well be stirred, and their loyalty to the National Church confirmed, as they trace the many memorials in the architecture, pictures, and ornaments of Lambeth which bring them face to face with the past, and so arouse their high hopes for the future." It may be doubted if any one but a Scotsman, the native of a country trained to the mental realisation of a democratic ideal by the tradition of Presbyterian parity, and full, as Cobden found it, of the rights of man,—as distinguished from "The Rights of Man,"—could have written so contentedly of "that great upheaval of society in which the hitherto non-privileged classes asserted their rights as Englishmen." As for the Church of England adapting itself "in all these troublous times, and in the changing days which followed them, to the real wants of the English people," that is simply the image of Dr. Tait's favourite "comprehension" reflected in the evolution of history.

Mr. Cave-Browne very cordially acknowledges his obligations to former historians of Lambeth Palace, and particularly to Mr. Thomas Allen, a resident in the parish, who some time ago compiled a volume of a popular rather than of an archæological character. As that is now, however, out of print, Mr. Cave-Browne's work supplies a want. His method and style are alike excellent. After telling, in an interesting preliminary chapter, how Lambeth Palace became the London residence of the great English prelates, he then proceeds, somewhat in guide-book fashion, though certainly not in guide-book English, to describe in succession the Great Gateway or Morton's Tower, the Great Hall, the Guard-room, Cranmer's Tower, the Tower of the Lollards, the Chapel, &c. Every corner of the old house will be found full of special interest to special readers, who will naturally have their preferences. For our part, we have found most pleasure in the chapters which tell of the pictures in the guard-room—as a series, Mr. Cave-Browne truly says they are unrivalled—and the MSS., &c., in the library. He admits that the portrait gallery "lacks that telling, yet indescribable charm which variety of costume always gives to a collection in which are mixed here and there portraits of warriors and statesmen with more sombrely clad divines." "Yet," Mr. Browne proceeds to say, in a passage which deserves quotation, as an example of his style,—

"A more careful examination will detect variety even here, and variety not without interest. The close-fitting skull-cap of Warham spreads out at the four corners, on the heads of Cranmer and Parker, till it assumes monstrous proportions over the face of Sheldon, and with Tillotson is stiffening into the trencher-cap, as retained in the Universities of to-day. Again, the plainly-buttoned rochet of the earlier Prelates becomes stiffly frilled round the necks of Abbott and Laud, turns into a plain roll-collar with Juxon, and expands into a broad flat one with Sheldon and Sancroft; and then, being nearly covered by the stole, the collar disappears, leaving only the ends visible, which pass into mere broad bands with Tillotson, and as such are still in use on the Episcopal Bench. With Tillotson came another change. Up to his time, in spite of the universally prevalent lay custom of false curls, which had come in with the Stuarts, the Bishops always wore their own hair, at first very short, and gradually descending into somewhat shaggy curls, as seen in the portraits of Sheldon and Sancroft; but with Tillotson came in again short hair, and the wig with stiff curls; these are somewhat reduced in size by each succeeding Prelate until, as worn by Manners-Sutton, Howley, and Sumner, they hardly deserved the name, which still clung to them, of the full-bottomed wig; with the latter, even this entirely disappeared, except on State occasions."

Mr. Cave-Browne rightly describes the Lambeth Library as "a fountain-head at which the real student of the history of the English Church can drink deeply; and perhaps it is the Biblical scholar who will find here the richest rewards for his labours, in the manuscripts of the New Testament, little known and therefore little used, in which this library is so rich." Among these treasures are an illuminated copy of "The Gospel of Mac-Durnan," Abbot of Derry and Bishop of Armagh, written in Latin, and belonging to the ninth century; "De Virginitate," by Aldhelm, Abbot of Malmesbury and Bishop of Sherburn, which is a work of the seventh century; a copy of Wicliffe's Version of the Old and New Testaments; a variety of Missals; and a singularly beautiful manuscript of the fifteenth century, bearing the title "The Notable Wise Dictes and Sayings of Philosophers, translated out of French into English, by Anthony Woodville, Earl Rivers; finished December 24th, anno 16 Edward IV." Some of the Lambeth Librarians have been notable men, such as Ducarel; Todd, the editor of Johnson's Dictionary and biographer of Cranmer; Edmund Gibson, the Anglo-Saxon scholar; and, first but far from least, Henry Wharton, the pupil of Newton, who was a prodigy of learning, and died when a little over thirty, and at the very time when it might have been expected he would have been able to use that learning for the benefit of his countrymen. Altogether, Mr. Cave-Browne's is one of those books which reverent Anglicans and antiquarians, and others who may be neither, but who yet find profit and pleasure in indulging the historical sense, will gladly give a place to on their shelves.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Except in point of illustration, the February number of Harper's Magazine is rather poor. Mr. Black's story of "Shandon Bells" is becoming, indeed, somewhat more interesting, from the stand-point of human character. Mr. Herbert Tuttle gives a readable paper on "German Political Leaders," though to some extent it is a dilution of his old "Brief Biographies." There are some facts in "Maryland and the Far South in the Colonial Period," by Mr. John Fiske, but they are put in a rather dull way. Mr. Harry Fenn's illustrations of "The Wild Welsh Coast" are worth everything else in the magazine, although the accompanying letterpress of Mr. Wirt Sikes is also good.

The new number of the Magazine of Art is only an average one. There is nothing very remarkable either in the art or the literature of it. The best articles are Mr. Champneys' "The Interior of St. Paul's Cathedral," Mr. Benjamin's account of Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt's house in New York, under the title of "An American Palace," and Mr. Harry Barnett's "The Special Artist," though the last is rather too graphic. The best picture in the number is Schulz-Briesen's "In Auld Lang Syne," a very humorous representation of two old women talking gossip and scandal over their tea, and in the company of their cats.

With the February number, Chambers's Journal enters on its fifty-second volume. The conductors of this magazine deserve great credit for the manner in which they keep up its high reputation. Except the poetry, which is neither better nor worse than ordinary magazine verse, there is absolutely nothing in this number which is not readable. The stories are all good, Mr. Harwood in particular making a promising start, with, "One False, both Fair." The informative and anecdotal papers are excellent, and deal with such different subjects as "Monday at her Majesty's Tower," "Curiosities of the Telephone," "A Roland for an Oliver," and "The Humours of Examinations." The last, indeed, suggests the ingenuity of the hoaxer. Where was the student raised who wrote, "The sweet bread is called the Pancreas, being so named after the Midland Railway Station in London?"

Regimental Legends. By J. S. Winter. (Chatto and Windus.)—Three more volumes of soldiering stories, by the author of Cavalry Life, to which the above remarks equally apply. In "A Regimental Æsthetic," there is a welcome reminiscence of the immortal Frank Webber of "Charles O'Malley," and his personation of Miss Judy Macan. These stories are the very thistledown of light literature, but of their kind they are not bad.

The Gallynipper in Yankeeland. By Himself. (Tinsley Brothers.)—We have not the advantage of knowing what a gallynipper is, but this slim volume affords internal evidence that a great deal of vulgarity, slang, and impudent imitation of certain second-rate American humourists whose own genuine jokes are about as much as we can bear, goes to the composition of that mysterious being. We have not the slightest wish to discover the secret, nor do we think many readers will be tempted to follow the fortunes of a person who thinks it funny to write as follows:—"There was a sweet and verdant youth, of many tender summers. And he had a mother-in-law that was to be, and she vexed him and he vexed her, and life was a vexatious vanity. And he fled away from her on the hop, as the flea goeth, and made a long journey, and sought comfort in a foreign land."

In Locke on Words, with Introduction and Notes by F. Ryland, M.A. (Sonnenschein and Co.), some readers probably will fail to recognise a reproduction of the third part of John Locke's "Essay concerning the Human Understanding." The book, as it now stands, is a reprint from the seventh edition, published in 1715-16, with an introduction and notes, put together chiefly with a view of assisting the man of very ordinary capacity, the average reader, who, as a rule, knows little logic and less metaphysics. The table prefixed to the Introduction, giving the chief events of John Locke's life, will doubtless prove useful.

A Preparatory Book of German Prose, by Hermann B. Boisen, A.M. (Ginn, Heath, and Co., Boston, U.S.), has been added to Martha's Vineyard series of text-books of modern languages. It is well calculated to introduce the youthful student to the best models of the German tongue.

A History of the English Language and Literature, by Dr. F. J. Bierbaum (G. Weiss, Heidelberg; Trübner and Co., London), contains a great deal of useful information in a very small compass. Considering that it is the work of a foreigner, we are astonished to see how faithfully and how exhaustively he has treated not only Shakespeare and Milton, but our less-known "metaphysical" poets. The "novelists" and "epistolary writers" are, perhaps, less successfully treated. The volume contains an account of the liberation of North America, brought down to a very recent date, for it records the death of Longfellow. The list of modern English poets, we observe, includes Mr. Tennyson and Mr. Swinburne, but, if we may trust the index, it ignores Mr. Matthew Arnold.

Chambers's Historical Readers, Book III. (W. and R. Chambers), comprises a series of short chapters on the History of England, from A.D. 1327 down to the Revolution of 1688. It will be found useful in schools, and its simple, easy style will recommend it to young persons generally. The concluding lessons, on "London under Charles II." and the "Social Condition of England under the Stuarts," are largely based on Macaulay; but this is no fault.

P. Vergili Maronis Opera. By T. L. Papillon, M.A. (Clarendon Press Series).—The object of this edition is to provide something intermediate in quantity between those of Conington and Professor Kennedy. The first volume contains the text, together with an introduction in four parts, the three latter of which are devoted to text, orthography, and versification respectively. Under each of these heads, Mr. Papillon has brought together much valuable matter which is not to be found so conveniently elsewhere, and the general introduction, dealing with the life and works of the poet, strikes us as both interesting and suggestive. The second volume is occupied by the commentary, in which, although it is useful and in the main satisfactory, the editor seems to us to have been less uniformly successful. It is an obvious defect that, so far as we have observed, not the slightest notice is taken of the great commentary of Dr. Henry, the result of thirty-five years' work, either in its earliest form, or in the final edition, which has now reached Book viii. This neglect is the more unfortunate, as Mr. Papillon gives considerable space to textual criticism. For instance, in the disputed passage, Aeneid, i., 640, he follows Conington in giving as the only MS. authority for "dii" the Palatine MS., which was ascertained by Dr. Henry to have, like the Roman and Medicean, "dei." On the other hand, "dii" was found by Dr. Henry in two out of the sixty-eight second-class MSS. he examined for the passage; while "die," which Mr. Papillon says is not found in any printed copy, is the reading of the Milan edition of 1492 and the Aldine of 1514. So in Aen., vi., 383, where Mr. Papillon speaks of the "unanimous testimony of MSS." to the reading "terrae," Dr. Henry in five found "terra," and his view that it is a nominative deserves at least mention. In the same way, Madvig's "Adversaria Critica" seem not to have been consulted; e.g., at Aen., i., 455, the reading (from one MS.) "intra se" (= "in his own thoughts") should be attributed rather to Madvig than to Professor Kennedy, or at least to both. A good deal of the philological matter introduced might probably have been replaced with advantage by a fuller exegesis; in the first ten lines of the Aeneid, we miss notes on "primus," "unde," and "pietate."

The notes which may be considered as specially Mr. Papillon's own strike us as occasionally crude and hasty. On Ecl. i., 10, we are told, "The imperfects 'vellem,' 'nollem,' 'mallem' are as it were stereotyped formulæ, and so independent of the ordinary 'sequence of tenses,' which here would naturally demand 'velim' ('permit' being a perfect proper, i.e., a 'primary' tense)." How, then, would Mr. Papillon explain such constructions as that of Cæsar's remark about the Germans, "in eam se consuetudinem adduxerunt ut lavarentur in fluminibus" (B. G., iv., 1)? Ecl. iii., 110, is explained (reading "haut haut"), "every one who shall neither shrink from the pleasures of love, nor experience any of its bitter feelings," i.e., whoever is a bold and true lover." For the two readings of Aeneid, vi., 806, "virtute extendere vires," and "virtutem extendere factis," Mr. Papillon has nothing happier to suggest than "to exert our strength by brave deeds," and "to exert our prowess in brave deeds." On G. ii., 529, we have the note,—"cratera coronant, not a 'mistranslation or alteration of Homer's κρητῆρας ἐπεστῆσαντο ποτοῖο' (Con.);" at Aeneid, i., 724, on "vina coronant" we are told that "with Homer's phrase in his mind, Virgil varied the meaning either unconsciously or from actual misunderstanding," which seems to us identical with Conington's condemned interpretation of the first passage. Minor evidences of haste, such as "sub-junctive genitive" and "punibo," are not wanting. Among these may be reckoned the rendering of "pomo" by "apple" (Ecl. ii., 53), and the illustration of G. ii., 80-1 ("co-ordination, rather than subordination, of clauses"), by "The Lord, he is God," and "My banks they are furnished with bees." Mr. Papillon observes in his preface,—"It often happens that the shortest and simplest way of explaining a passage is to translate it; and I have availed myself freely of this method." We are by no means sure that this plan of "giving a construe" is not also the "shortest and simplest" way of convincing the learner that he fully understands a passage, and so dissuading him from taking any further trouble about it. But what we wish more particularly to protest against is Mr. Papillon's constant introduction into his translations of the rhythm of verse (or even of rhyme, as in, "What sin so grievous had been done by Lapithæ or Calydon?"). "Versum in oratione fieri, multo foedissimum est totum, sicut etiam in parte deformare," seems to us a principle as true for English as for Latin. At Aeneid, vi., 661-3, we have three lines of blank verse; single lines occur on almost every page. Equally objectionable are such rhythms as "whereon each wave from ocean breaks, and parting fills the quiet creeks," and "hence deftly forge their wax anew, and mould their clinging honey," the latter of which will probably remind readers who love and know their Dickens of a refrain sung, or rather stumped, along the streets by Mr. Silas Wegg. As we have found several points on which to disagree with Mr. Papillon, we wish to express once more our conviction that there is much valuable work in these volumes, work which we shall be glad to see rendered more valuable still in a second edition.

Clare Stellar. A Novel. By Mrs. J. Galbraith Lunn. (Remington and Co.)—The chief fault that we have to find with this book is that it is called a novel. This is a misnomer; the story is one merely of and for children. It is rather too romantic; the little heroine is too imaginative to be quite natural, but it is a pretty little story, with many good thoughts in it, and perfectly right and wholesome sympathies. The author brings the heroine up to her wedding-day: that is probably why she has called her book a novel. Taken for what it really is, Clare Stellar is much to be liked. The author is very sound upon the love, care, and study of animals.

Clare Welsman. By the Author of "Pansies and Asphodel." (Remington and Co.)—The "Clare" of this story is a man, and a sculptor. A great deal of sin, sorrow, death, parting, and unmerited misfortune is piled up in the one small volume to which the writer has restricted herself; the shadows are rather too deep, perhaps, for a pleasant picture, but the story has a certain merit, and the gleams in it of Quaker people and manners, and of quiet country life and the queer ways of some Dissenting bodies, are agreeable. The author will write well, when she has learned that abruptness is not always forcible, and that brevity is not necessarily wit.

Samos and Samian Coins, by Percy Gardner, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.), is a reprint of a most valuable article, which many of our readers may have noticed in the Numismatic Chronicle last year. That it is scholarlike, learned, and exhaustive, is shown by the name of the "Disney Professor of Archaeology at Cambridge," which appears on its title-page. The first-half of the volume is really an epitome of the history of Samos as a State; and Professor Gardner reminds us that it was in the days of Polycrates, its "Tyrant," one of the most powerful States of Greece, and a formidable rival to that of Athens. The Samians of a later date are praised by Pausanias for their excellence in athletic exercises and sea-fights. That they were skilled in other arts is proved by the six pages filled with illustrations of Samian coins, with which the volume is enriched.

French Examination Papers (D. Nutt), is, perhaps, a misleading title. The book contains a collection of papers in French grammar and literature, including passages for translation into and from French, set at the University of London, at Woolwich and Sandhurst, at the Staff College, at the competitive examinations for the Indian Civil Service, and at the local examinations of the Universities (not as printed on the title-page, "University") of Oxford and Cambridge. In this age of cramming and constant "exams," such a work is likely to find plenty of supporters. It is edited by Professor C. Rühle, late German Master at Woolwich.

Wanderings in the Land of Lorne, and the Outer Hebrides. By Robert Buchanan. (Chatto and Windus.)—We do not understand why a book the preface of which was written in October, 1882, and which was already in the hands of the public in November, should be described on the title-page as published in 1883. But though the title-page is slightly inaccurate, we must congratulate Mr. Buchanan on the appearance of this new edition of this graphic volume, the contents of which were first published in 1872, and dedicated to the Princess Louise. This dedication appears at the end of the present edition, and however sad and true the allegations contained in it may be, we cannot but think that the sentiments it contains, as addressed to the Princess Louise, were, and are, devoid of tact and good-feeling. Mr. Buchanan himself seems to be aware that he has transgressed the limits of courtesy, when he says (page 325),—"After this dismal recital, so necessary to my purpose, yet almost ungracious, on a bridal morning." No doubt, if the facts alleged be correct, there are many abuses to be amended in the land-tenure of the Hebridean Isles. And we can sympathise with Mr. Buchanan's burning zeal to have all things put right, but we are afraid that in the minds of most people who have, during the last ten years, read his dedication, a prejudice will be created not in favour of, but against, the author's convictions. The book itself is a prose poem. Here are no dull descriptions of scenery, such as may be found in the pages of Johnson; or even, shall we say, in the poetry and prose of Sir Walter Scott? We have taken the trouble to compare Boswell's "Journal" and Johnson's "Tour" with these wanderings of Mr. Buchanan's. One cannot but be amused by the "Journal," for it is such an account as Snodgrass would have written about Pickwick; and Johnson's "Tour" is a mere itinerary, transcribed from Boswell's "Journal," and translated into the language which Macaulay aptly terms "Johnsonese," which consists of long sentences so equally balanced, that a word more or less would destroy the equilibrium of a whole passage. But in Mr. Buchanan's work we find short, terse sentences, vivid descriptions of loch and mountain, and bright narratives of adventure along the wild sea-coast of the Outer Hebrides. It is said that there are two classes of orators, those who master their subject, and those whose subject masters them. It is to the latter that our author belongs. He stands looking at a scene till the inner meaning of it dawns upon his mind, and this inner meaning he has the power of communicating, more or less, to his readers.

Ups and Downs of Spanish Travel, by H. B. Graham Bellingham (London Literary Society), are lively and amusing enough, but can scarcely claim to be more. The author takes us not only to Madrid, Malaga, Granada, the Escorial, and other places constantly visited by tourists, but also to the Balearic Isles, and his descriptions of life in Majorca will be new to most English readers. He quotes occasionally from previous writers on Spain, such as the Rev. H. J. Rose; but he may be glad to be reminded that the author of the inimitable "Spanish Ballads" was called, not "Lockhart" (as the name is spelt on page 50), but "Lockhart."

Witch Stories, by whomsoever they are collected and compiled, will always be sure of attentive and eager readers; and we may be sure that they will not be the worse for being told by Mrs. E. Lynn Linton. Messrs. Chatto and Windus, therefore, did wisely in adding this book to their "May-Fair Library," and we are glad to see that in this shape the book has reached "a new edition." As might be expected, a large proportion of the stories are Scotch, and scarcely a single tale of witchcraft that we have ever heard is absent from this collection. Full justice, however, is done to the counties South of the Tweed; and no more interesting chapters occur than those headed "The Witch-finding of Hopkins" and the "Manningtree Witches," both connected with the Eastern Counties. Most readers will be surprised to find, from the concluding chapter, how very little more than a century has passed since witchcraft was capitally punished in England.

Our Iron Roads, by Frederick S. Williams (Bemrose and Sons), is the title of a brief popular history of the rise and progress of railways in this and other countries, for which there has been found so wide a demand, that it has reached the honours of a second edition. It is evidently the result of much well-directed research, and is put together in a careful and scholarly manner, so that it is very readable, though here and there it bristles with statistical information. The illustrations are much to the point, and strike us as very fairly done. The paper and printing are first-rate. Mr. Williams gives us some good anecdotes, especially on the subject of the birth of our Railway system. Here is one,—"You must be making handsomely out of your canals," was once remarked by a friend to the celebrated Duke of Bridgewater. "Oh! yes," replied his Grace; "they will last my time. But I don't like the look of these tramroads; there is mischief in them." "The observation of the Duke," justly remarks Mr. Williams, "was in a sense prophetic, for those wooden roads to which he referred were the foreshadowing of the railway system of the present day." We commend to the notice of the antiquarian reader Mr. Williams's account (pp. 5-7) of tramways in use at Colebrook Dale, Ashby-de-la-Zouch, &c., in the days before Outram was born.

MAGAZINES, ETC.—We have received the following for February:—L'Art, many of the illustrations in which are very fine.—Part 1 of a serial illustrated edition of the English translation of Victor Duruy's History of Rome and of the Roman People, edited by the Rev. J. P. Mahaffy. (Kelly and Co.) The illustrations and maps are well executed, and the text is clearly printed on superior paper.—Art and Letters, a good number.—Part 1 of a reissue of the serial edition of Henry Morley's Library of English Literature.—Part 1 of an illustrated serial edition of The Franco-German War. (Cassell and Co.)—Part 15 of Cities of the World.—The Manchester Quarterly.—Journal of the Statistical Society.—The Month.—The Gentleman's Magazine, the "Science Notes" in which contain some useful hints to those engaged in literary pursuits.—The Army and Navy Magazine.—Colburn's United Service Magazine.—The Nautical Magazine, containing the first of a series of articles on "Canal Projects."—The Antiquarian Magazine.—The Oxford Magazine.—The Presbyterian Review.—The Theatre, which contains some well-timed remarks on the decadence of modern pantomime.—Science Gossip.—The Folk-lore Journal.—Belgravia.—London Society.—Time.—Aunt Judy's Magazine.—Cassell's Magazine.—All the Year Round.—The Sunday Magazine.—Good Words.—The Leisure Hour.—The Sunday at Home.—Part I. of the new series of Africa, a Missionary Magazine. (Partridge and Co.)—The Continent.—L'Art de la Femme.—The Ladies' Treasury.—The Melbourne Review.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK.

Arnold (G. M.), Robert Pocock, the Graveyard Botanist, or 8vo (S. Low & Co.)	5/0
Besant (W.), All Sorts and Conditions of Men, or 8vo (Chatto & Windus)	3/6
Black (W.), The Shandon Bells, 3 vols. or 8vo (Macmillan)	31/6
Bridges (T. D.), Journal of a Lady's Travels round the World (J. Murray)	15/0
City of Three Spires (The), 2 vols. or 8vo (Bemrose)	13/0
Cook (W.), Poultry, How to Make It Pay (Journal of Horticulture Office)	2/0
Dale (D.), Family Failing, or 8vo (Blackie)	2/6
Duffy (C.), Four Years of Irish History, 8vo (Cassell & Co.)	21/0
Encyclopaedic Dictionary, Vol. 2, Part 2, 4to (Cassell & Co.)	10/6
Enripides, Medea , edited by A. W. Verrill, 12mo (Macmillan)	3/6
Fairburn (A. M.), The City of God, and other Sermons, or 8vo (Hodder)	3/6
Göthe, Götz von Berlichingen , edited by H. A. Bull, 18mo (Macmillan)	2/0
Gust (E.), Orizines Critica , 2 vols. 8vo (Macmillan & Co.)	32/0
Harris (W.), Insanity, its Cause, &c. , or 8vo (Wymann)	2/6
Hay (M. C.), Bid Me Discourse , 2 vols. or 8vo (Hurst & Blackett)	31/6
Hayward (W. B.), The Colonel's Daughter, 12mo (Macmillan)	2/0
Imperatoris Justiniani Institutionum Libri Quatuor, 8vo (Oxford Univ. Press)	21/0
Landels (W.), The Marriage Ring, or 6vo (Cassell & Co.)	6/0
Lawrence (Lord), Life of , by R. B. Smith, 2 vols. 8vo (Smith & Elder)	36/0
Lillingston (F. A. C.), Self , 12mo (Marshall Brothers)	2/0
Macdonald (G.), Paul Faber, Surgeon, 12mo (Chatto & Windus)	2/0
Murdock (A. J.), Scottish Poets, Recent and Living, or 8vo (Hamilton)	6/0
Our Marriage Vow, Service, &c., 18mo (Sutcliffe)	2/6
Portia; or, by Passions Rocked, 3 vols. or 8vo (Smith & Elder)	31/6
Riddale (C. H.), Chemical Percentage Tables, or 8vo (Lockwood)	3/6
Roberts (A.), Old Testament Revision, 12mo (Hodder)	3/6
Sutton (A. E.), A Manual of Marine Engineering, 8vo (Griffin)	18/0
Smith (A. M.), Political Economy, or 8vo (Williams & Norgate)	3/6
Smith (G. T.), Mendicant Wanderers through the Streets of London (Nimmo)	4/6
So As by Fire, 3 vols. or 8vo (Macmillan)	31/6
Stanley (A. P.), Recollections of, by G. G. Bradley, or 8vo (J. Murray)	3/6
Thomas (B.), The Violin Player, 12mo (Chatto & Windus)	2/0
Townsend (F.), The Flora of Hampshire, or 8vo (Reeves)	15/0
Windisch (E.), Compendium of Irish Grammar, 8vo (D. Gill)	6/0

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

It is particularly requested that all applications for Copies of the SPECTATOR, and Communications upon matters of business, should not be addressed to the EDITOR, but to the PUBLISHER, 1 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

HINDLEY'S CHINTZES.	ORIGINAL DESIGNS, FAST COLOURS. From 9d per yard. WALL PAPERS AND CURTAIN STUFFS. C. HINDLEY and SONS, 290 to 294 1/4 OXFORD STREET, W.
LIBERTY'S ART FABRICS.	LIBERTY'S ART CURTAINS, CHINTZ AND UPHOLSTERY STUFFS, NOVEL IDEAS IN LADIES' WINTER CLOTHING AND TOILETTE FABRICS. LIBERTY'S COLOURS. EASTERN AND EUROPEAN DESIGNS, PURE FINISH, INEXPENSIVE MATERIALS. East India House, & Chesham House, } REGENT STREET, W.

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,851.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1883. [REGISTERED FOR } PRICE.....6d.
TRANSMISSION ABROAD. } BY POST, 6½d.

THE WEEK	201	BOOKS—
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		Myths of Hellas	217
The Government Programme.....	204	Annie Keary	217
The Tory Spokesmen.....	205	An Infant Kingdom	218
The Grave Situation of France ..	205	Professor Holbrooke's "Annals
The Government Plan for London ..	206	of Tacitus"	220
"Informers" in Ireland	208	The Modern Applications of
The Perils of Water	209	Electricity	220
The Late Professor Henry Smith ..	210	CURRENT LITERATURE	222
The Pains of Exile	211	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	224
Dialike	212	ADVERTISEMENTS.....	224-232
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.
Local Bating and Tenant-right ..	214	Ultima Thule	235
Consecrated Ground	215	Giacomo Leopardi	236
The Promotion of Liberal Clergy ..	215	A Golden Bar	237
A Strange Survival	215	Nature and Thought	238
"Methrathon"	215	Thoreau's Example	239
ART—		The British Navy	240
Macbeth and Gregory	215

* * * The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NOTICE.—With this week's SPECTATOR is issued, gratis, a LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Fourth Session of the Queen's Tenth Parliament was opened on Thursday, with the usual Message from the Throne. The Queen informs the Houses that tranquillity has been restored to Egypt, that the reconstitution of Government there is proceeding, and that the arrangements needed have been submitted to the Sultan and the Great Powers, who, there is every reason to believe, will approve them. The withdrawal of British troops is, therefore, proceeding as expeditiously as circumstances will admit. Her Majesty has restored Cetewayo to Zululand, and trusts "that good relations will be maintained between the Zulu nation and Natal,"—a significant sentence, fatal to the statement that Zululand is now a dependency. The Queen believes that the improvement in the social condition of Ireland continues, as agrarian crime is diminishing, and the law is everywhere upheld; but adds that dangerous Secret Societies in Dublin "call for unremitting energy and vigilance." Measures will be brought in for codifying the Criminal Law, for creating a Court of Criminal Appeal, for amending the laws of Bankruptcy and Patents, for preventing Corrupt Practices, for the better government of the Metropolis, and for other reforms of local government, "if time permit;" for the Prevention of Floods, for Police and Education in Scotland and Wales, and for Compensation to Tenants in England and Scotland. "You have provided in recent years, by a liberal devotion of your time, for the most urgent among the needs of Ireland," and may now regard the claims of general legislation and of "other portions of the United Kingdom."

The Bradlaugh meeting in Trafalgar Square, which many people regarded as most formidable, went off quite quietly. The attendance of delegates was considerable, and the roughs gathered at one o'clock in such numbers that the square was completely filled. The meeting, however, was orderly, Mr. Bradlaugh expressly deprecating riot, and no intention was manifested of forming a procession. The Member for Northampton was the only speaker, and he informed the crowd that he considered Mr. Mundella's and Mr. Firth's speeches as proof positive that the Government intended to bring in an Affirmation Bill, and it was therefore his duty to wait and see whether that Bill was accepted, or not. If it was rejected, he should claim his seat as Member for Northampton. He then went away in a cab, and the assemblage dispersed. The sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh is, in London, very slight, though there is a general impression that he is entitled to his seat, and a general approval of the Affirmation Bill. As Sir Stafford Northcote has repeatedly advised that Bill, in the hope that he may quote it as proof that the Government sympathises with Atheists, it ought to pass easily, but it probably will not. The Tories are aware that the "Bradlaugh" cry might help them at an election, and will, if they can, keep the dispute open until the dissolution, a policy they may find reason to repent.

The opening debate was dull in both Houses. In the Lords, Lord Durham, who moved the Address, was complimented by Lord Granville as a worthy representative of the Lambtons, and Lord Reay, who seconded it, made an impression by his special knowledge of foreign politics; but Lord Salisbury indulged in a flood of bitter epigrams, rather than in arguments. He said the "headless trunk of a Ministry" showed symptoms of paralysis, that it was impossible to attack anything so "formless" as the Queen's Speech, and that it reminded him of the ordeal by fire, moving about through burning questions, but touching none. He hinted that the Speech was the "mask to a battery of destructive legislation," and quoting from a report of Mr. Gladstone's talk with M. Clémenceau, obviously full of misunderstandings—for example, it is directly wrong about the police of London—said Mr. Gladstone intended "to make of the humblest Irishman a governing agency." He condemned the Liberal policy in Ireland utterly, declaring that the Government had swept away the landlord power, and was now face to face with a disaffected people who demanded Home-rule, about which the Government in reality spoke with two voices. He made, however, some just comments on the future the Government hoped for in Egypt, showing that their influence alone upheld the Khedive's throne; and that when the troops were withdrawn, the Government would rely for that influence on prestige, which had broken down, even when the prestige of France was associated with it. That is sound criticism, as is the remark that in the present weakness of Government in France, French agents become independent, and are more dangerous, not less, than they ever were before.

Lord Granville began with a fair joke,—his full agreement with the Marquis that there was nothing to criticise in the Queen's Speech,—and proceeded to deny that Government was divided about Home-rule. Nobody was for granting Home-rule, and nobody denied that there were local powers which ought to be conceded to Ireland. As for Egypt, he did not see his way to an annexation, which Lord Beaconsfield had always repudiated (yes, because Lord Beaconsfield, with his strong race-feeling, wanted Syria instead), or to a Protectorate; while he was certain that if we washed our hands of Egypt, other Powers would intervene. It would be an act of treachery to Egypt to withdraw our troops too soon, but he entirely declined to say how long they were to remain. The British proposals had not been accepted by France, or rejected, but they were favourably regarded by Germany, Austria, Russia, and Italy; while the Sultan had sent nothing, except an approval of the abolition of the Dual Control. The rest of the discussion raged round Ireland, and that subject in Ireland which specially interests the Peers, the operation of the Irish Land Act. Their point is that the Valuers were dispensed with by Mr. Trevelyan because they were favourable to the landlords.

In the Commons, after Mr. Labouchere had promised that Mr. Bradlaugh would not claim his seat if an Affirmation Bill were introduced, and Lord Hartington had announced that such a Bill would be proposed, and Sir R. Cross had stated that he should give it the strongest opposition, the discussion became Irish. The Parnellites desired to make Mr. Healy's arrest a question of Privilege, but Lord Hartington and the Attorney-General showed that in 1697 the House of Commons had distinctly disclaimed privilege, as against an order to enter into recognisances. In spite, therefore, of bitter speeches from many Members, and of an able one from Mr. T. P. O'Connor, who quoted the Judge's decision in the Wilkes case as evidence that a Member could not be arrested, except for treason or actual breach of the peace, the House affirmed that it had no privilege by 353 to 47. The general debate was then allowed to open, and Sir Stafford Northcote, who, of course, made much of Mr. Bradlaugh and the Affirmation Bill, asked why we went to Egypt, and when we were going away; and declared that Ireland ought to be governed firmly, and not "excited by a prospect of obtaining something more." He objected, too, to the hint, which he declared he found in the Speech, that nothing would be done to relieve agriculturists in the matter of local taxation, until a future County Government Bill had been adopted.

Lord Hartington began his reply by stating that Mr. Gladstone was now in such a condition of health that he could return, if his presence were absolutely required; and continued by saying that the Affirmation Bill would have been mentioned in the Queen's Speech, if it had been of importance enough. As to Egypt, he declared that all available information was before the House, that the troops would probably be withdrawn after six months more had elapsed, and that the gloomy anticipations of many writers were not warranted by the facts. He declared that the Bill for the Government of London would be of an "extremely definite character," and not applicable to other places, denied that remissions of local taxation benefitted the farmer,—using on that subject very distinct language,—and then addressed himself to Ireland. The Government fully believed that crime was diminishing, and would go forward in their course of executing the law, while they did not intend this Session to bring forward any Irish measures of importance. Lord R. Churchill continued the debate in a spirit of fierce criticism, describing the Bill for London, for instance, as an experimentum in corpore vili; declaring that "this apostolic Government" rejoiced in military violence; and that in Ireland their only credit was that they had "hanged up five or six miserable wretches," another curious aperçu into the strict alliance between Lord Randolph and the Irish Extremists. Then Sir W. Lawson asserted that "the policy of this country in Egypt was to keep an Oriental despot on his legs, against the wishes of his people,"—which is a capital argument for annexation,—and brought forward a definite vote of censure on the Government for the employment of British troops in Egypt, on which a division must be taken.

The French Senate has not rejected the Proscription Bill, but has accepted a substitute making it a Bill for the regular trial of Pretenders. The Judges on Friday week declared that there was no legal case against Prince Napoleon, and ordered his release; and on Saturday, therefore, M. Devès eagerly urged the Bill, on the ground that without it the Government was "disarmed." He was, however, willing to accept a scheme proposed by M. Barbey, under which the Government could expel any Prince who, as Pretender, performed any act hostile to the Republic. The Moderates, however, led by MM. Waddington and Léon Say, proposed that such a Pretender should be made liable to banishment, after a trial before the Senate or before a Court of Assize. This proposal, which, of course, is perfectly regular, and only makes the Princes liable to banishment for treason, was carried, by 172 votes to 89, and the Bill was sent back to the Chamber. There M. Jolibois, Bonapartist, proposed "the previous question," that is, rejected the idea of even considering the Senate's proposal; but this, which would have been an open declaration of war, was rejected, by 402 to 97. A variety of compromises were then suggested, but M. Barbey's Bill was at last accepted, by 326 to 188. It is believed that the Bill, which must now go back to the Senate, will at last emerge as a Bill permitting expulsion when a Prince has done any act which can be interpreted as posing as a Pretender, and when the decree has been accepted by both Chambers.

Meanwhile, M. Fallières has been declared by his doctors too ill to resume office, and has resigned, and the President is seeking a Premier. According to the best reports, M. Brisson has refused office, M. Jules Ferry has declared that he cannot make a Ministry, and M. de Freycinet, though very willing to serve, cannot find colleagues. M. Grévy is, therefore, looking round, amidst some agitation. The rich traders of Paris have informed him that all business is suffering from want of a stable Government, and the bankers are signing a petition to the same effect, while he himself replies that he is more concerned than anybody. The Monarchists of all parties have opened a furious attack upon him, as a man without resolution and governed by personal favourites; and he is adjured to send a Message to both Houses, or to demand a dissolution. He is said to have given some pledge when he was elected President not to resort to the latter course, but he is evidently in great perplexity, the Chamber being now divided in a way which almost forbids the formation of a majority. So many of M. Gambetta's followers have joined the Extremists, that whenever they vote with the Right, or the Right with them, the Government must fall; and that may happen twice a week. No Deputy just now is able to believe that after the best, the next best is the best, and so every Government falls.

The Queen's Speech promises a new Patent Law, and it seems to be understood that fresh facilities will be given for obtaining patents. They will be made much cheaper, and be obtained from special Commissioners. Sir F. Bramwell, a great authority, on Wednesday, in a paper read before the Society of Arts, greatly praised the American system; but he failed, like everybody else, so far as we are aware, to explain how the Americans guard patentees from crushing legal expenses. Is there an opinion among Judges and juries favourable to patent-holders? The regular system in this country is, that if Smith makes a discovery, say, of a new sewing-machine, he takes out a patent; and if he is rich, and his machine is a good one, he makes a fortune. But if he is not rich, he sells his discovery for two-pence halfpenny to a capitalist, or he goes into a workhouse. Every firm which wants his machine pirates it, and the inventor is ruined by law expenses. There have been many cases like Henry Cort's, in which a discovery was so valuable that a whole trade combined to steal it, and struggle was almost an impossibility. The suits never ended. What seems to be most wanted is some summary way of preventing piracy, subject to the objector making good a counter-claim before the Scientific Commissioners. With such a method, the poorest patentee would be safe, and the only needed rider would be the right of the State to purchase any patent, if of high public value, and throw it open, for a moderate royalty, to be levied by stamp.

We are happy to perceive that Mr. John Morley, who has been accepted as the Liberal candidate for Newcastle, makes it a distinctive note of his addresses that while he will maintain his independence on all important questions on which he may differ from the Government, he accords them, in the main, a cordial support. Reform, he says, is always in the air when Mr. Gladstone is in power, and this Government, though not so advanced as he would wish, is the most advanced that has ever appeared in England. That is the true tone for all Radicals who wish to avoid the weak point of modern Parliamentary government. Everybody has such definite opinions, and thinks so much of himself, that parties tend to dissolve into "groups," each with its crotchet, and steady administration becomes almost impossible. The French Chamber is ruined by this disintegrating force, and matters are not much better in Germany and Austria. If the evil continues, European Liberals will be forced to reconsider their preference for the Parliamentary over the Presidential system. The latter is in many respects inferior, as Government and people may at any moment be hopelessly out of accord; but it has at least the advantage that it allows of a stable Administration. We have all of us yet to learn what a Democracy is like, when every separate man is intelligent enough to form an opinion, and opinionated enough to wish before all things to make it prevail. One has heard of a town council with twenty members and twenty-one opinions, the youngest and most infallible member—who must have been an undeveloped Cowen—having two, varying with his chance of standing alone. Whatever colour, for instance, was proposed for the pump, he voted mauve, unless another member accepted that hue. Then he voted against paint.

There has been a great rush this week of belated speeches addressed to constituencies by their Members, of which we cannot pretend to give any adequate account. But we may remark that Mr. Herbert Gladstone's speech at Leeds on Monday was remarkable, first, for discussing Irish Home-rule "on its merits," which Mr. H. Gladstone did not think to be great, though he admitted that there were circumstances under which such a solution might be feasible; next, for denying that, at the present moment, even needful local reforms could be extended to Ireland, the fermentation there being what it is; lastly, for intimating that whenever it is possible,—though that could not be at present,—the control of the police should be left to the local authorities, even in Ireland. We are inclined to think that in this speech Mr. H. Gladstone,—who has a great number of Irish constituents,—refused too much for the moment, and conceded too much for the future. We do not believe that an Irish Parliament could, in any conceivable case, be consistent with the Union. And we do believe that a good local Government, even though given at once, would be the opening of a safety-valve for discontent, and not the dangerous and revolutionary step Mr. H. Gladstone thinks it.

Mr. Trevelyan's speech at Hawick yesterday week was in the highest possible tone, and contained as well a very impressive summary of the difficulties and facts of the Irish situation. He gave a frightful description of the amount of work which the excessive centralisation of the Irish Government throws upon Lord Spencer and himself,—the Home-Office work, the local-government work, the distress, the administration of the Land Act and Arrears Act, the education, and the State dealings with agriculture. In connection with many subjects, crisis follows crisis, exhausting the energies of the most indefatigable staff, and matters of the most delicate concern come before fagged intellects not up to the highest mark. Nevertheless, Mr. Trevelyan spoke with great confidence of the agrarian improvement. Of the classes of crimes that are murderous in intent, excluding mere threats, there had been in the last four months of 1881, 130; in the first four months of 1882, 125; in the middle four months of the same year, 79; and in the final four months, but 14. Mr. Trevelyan exposed the gross calumny that the Crimes Prevention Act was passed in the interest of the rich. It was poor herdsmen, families on the brink of starvation, poor old men and poor children, who had been massacred by the secret societies, that the reign of terror might be prolonged. And it was in defence of such as these that the Crimes Prevention Act was passed, and was being effectually worked.

Mr. Trevelyan denied indignantly that the Irish Government had in any case interfered with the freedom of the Press and with free discussion. As an illustration of the gross misrepresentations made, Mr. Trevelyan explained that in one very bad district where terror and murder had been rife,—eight most deliberate assassinations had recently taken place there,—persons calling themselves reporters, and perhaps really reporters, but better known as dangerous agitators whose speeches had constantly been followed by crimes of a grave kind, had not been allowed to address a public meeting, and this had been represented as a most arbitrary interference with the liberty of the Press. If they had been allowed to speak, the Government would have been responsible for the crimes that would almost certainly have followed. A freer Press than that of Ireland, and one availing itself more fully of its freedom to assail the Government as it pleases, Mr. Trevelyan intimated that he did not believe to exist.

Lord Cranbrook delivered yesterday week, at Maidstone, a very lively attack on the Liberal Party, particularly on Lord Derby. Lord Derby, he said, was quite incompetent to do anything so energetic as take "a leap in the dark." "We admit all the coldness and calculation in what he did, and that he has gone 'creeping on with the creeping hours' to the position which he now holds." "When they [the Liberals] brought on their measures with respect to the land, which, by the way, were thoroughly distasteful to him, he analysed the foulest ingredients in their mess, before he swallowed it." In a word, Lord Cranbrook dubbed Lord Derby "a political refrigerator," and wished the Liberals joy of him in very bitter language. Certainly, a party whose test of energy is the disposition to take "a leap in the dark" is not likely to value Lord Derby. The Liberals, however, though they sometimes take leaps, prefer taking leaps in the light; and for that purpose, Lord Derby will be very helpful.

Mr. Raikes, M.P. for the University of Cambridge, made a notable proposal, in his speech at Bury St. Edmund's, on Monday. It was that household franchise should be conferred, as proposed, on the agricultural labourers, but that instead of voting for county divisions, they should all be assigned as voters to the nearest Parliamentary borough; so that we may have a vast number of rural districts resembling Shoreham or Retford, mis-called boroughs, while the counties should remain as before, the preserves of the middle-classes. Of course, if that extraordinary proposal could be adopted, Mr. Raikes would hardly be prepared to decrease the number of county representatives and enormously increase that of the boroughs, in a proportion corresponding to their electoral strength, for if that were done, it is not clear that the Tories would gain by this inconceivably grotesque arrangement, while it would certainly pit the middle-classes against the masses in an exceedingly menacing manner. Does he, however, seriously suppose that if the masses of the counties were absorbed into the boroughs, the boroughs would be content to retain no more than their present voting-power? If so, even in the history of that "Rake's progress" of which Mr. Talbot talked so amusingly the other day at Swansea, there never was a more remarkable instance of living in a fools' paradise.

Yesterday week, too late for our last issue, died, at the age of fifty-six, Professor H. J. S. Smith, Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford, and the greatest authority living on the theory of numbers. He was almost as distinguished as a linguist as he was as a mathematician, and, perhaps, better known for the versatility of his talents, and especially for his wit, than any man at either University. We have spoken fully of him elsewhere, but may add here that the procession near a quarter of a mile long which followed his body to the grave on Tuesday, bore singular testimony to the universal regard and affection which a man who had nevertheless the power to make himself so formidable, had inspired. Men of all schools alike will long feel the blank which Henry Smith's death has left, both at Oxford and in London.

The floods all over Europe are very bad, but they are insignificant, compared with those of America. The Ohio, in particular, has risen sixty-seven feet, and Cincinnati, with many other cities, has been submerged. The factories have been closed, the people are out of work, and it is said even the criminal classes keep order, being appalled by the destruction,—and being also, perhaps, aware that under such circumstances Respectables think Judge Lynch very wise. It is said that the loss of property in Cincinnati alone exceeds $6,000,000, and the loss of life is very great. The Mississippi has also risen to a dangerous height, and the calamity is aggravated by the consciousness that the tremendous masses of water which in America are called rivers are practically beyond human control. A Bill to regulate the Mississippi would be like a Bill to regulate the fires of Etna. No explanation is offered of the floods, which, over such vast tracts, can hardly be due, as in England, to increased drainage.

The inquest on the body of the child which had been forced into a starch-box, and sent by carrier to a person of the name of Green, 3 Abbey Road, St. John's Wood (where no such person resides), was concluded on Tuesday by Sir John Humphreys, at the Hope Tavern, St. Luke's, without leading to any discovery, either of the identity of the child, or of the persons who disposed of the body in this way. The only new evidence of importance was that of the chemical analyst, Professor Charles M. Tidy, who had discovered traces of morphia in the child's stomach, and thought that morphia might have been in part the cause of death. There was also some evidence given by a person of the name of Green, the wife of a carman, living at St. George's-in-the-East, to the effect that she had seen such a box as was described being carried by two men on December 11th (the day when it was booked for Abbey Road) in Watney Street; and that three weeks ago she had seen the same two men in Back Road, Shadwell, and that she knew them again, though they were dressed differently, and that they seemed to recognise her. Of what use, however, this evidence can be, except to put the men, if they really were seen by her, on their guard, it is not easy to see. The verdict was that death was due to "privation, combined with a dose of morphia," but under what circumstances the morphia was given, there was no evidence to show.

The Times of Thursday affirms that Prince Napoleon, after his release by order of the Court of Accusations, came to England, and visited the Empress Eugénie. The result of the visit was that the Prince was formally recognised as head of the Bonaparte family, and his policy of demanding an appeal to the people in virtue of the plébiscite of 1869 was distinctly approved. If this statement, which can only have come from the Prince himself, is correct, schism among the Bonapartes is partly healed.

Bank Rate, 3½ per cent.

Consols were on Friday 102½ to 102¾.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE GOVERNMENT PROGRAMME.

THE Government programme, as revealed in the Queen's Speech, is not inspiring. The Ministry have evidently felt keenly the interruptions and postponements to which their plans for useful legislation have been subjected during the past two years, and as they hope for a working Session, they have brought forward a number of useful Bills, to the exclusion of more purely political proposals. Most of these are exceedingly valuable; two of them, the Bill for the Reform of London and the Bill for Compensating Agricultural Tenants, are of the first importance, and the Floods Bill is indispensable; but none of them will awaken political enthusiasm. We are all delighted to see that, the "most urgent needs of Ireland" having been provided for, the claims of "other portions of the United Kingdom"—"Skye, and the neighbouring Island of Great Britain," as the Hebridean preacher said—are this year to receive attention; and most of us will acknowledge that among those claims, the demands for the Codification of the Criminal Law, for a Court of Criminal Appeal, for a Bankruptcy Act, for a Bill against floods, and for another preventing corrupt practices at elections, are undeniably urgent. The Government promise them all, and we trust they will all be good Bills, and that, whether through the good sense of the House or through the operation of the Closure, they will all be passed unmutated in reasonable time. But though bread is the staff of life, a dinner of bread only is a dull dinner; and of meat the provision is not large, while the wine is nowhere. There are only two first-class political Bills, and of these, one, for all its importance—which we entirely acknowledge—is only a local Bill; while the other, though almost imperative, relieves only a single interest. It was most wise, in the present position of agriculture, with the last hopes of the farmers fading away under the incessant rain, to bring forward a measure giving them more security for their outlays; and the Bill for the Government of London has for ourselves the strongest imaginative attraction. We have always maintained that in combining London, with its population of over three millions, and its total revenue, as the Economist calculates, of ten millions sterling, into a single Municipality, the Government would call into existence a new Power, which might prove as efficient for good as Parliament itself. An unorganised mass of human beings would, we contended, be organised into a nation, with new life, new energy, new powers, and new objects for their expenditure. A Council governing London will be a new and a splendid force. We approve, too, the Government scheme for evoking a nation in London, as securing the maximum of improvement, while rousing the minimum of interested resistance. But though we admire the Bill, and the self-devotion which proposes such an improvement without any acute demand for it among the electors, we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that London is not England, still less the United Kingdom; that the Bill will not interest the whole community, as a Bill reforming County Government would; and that the wishes of the whole population—that of London excepted—are again disappointed or postponed. The Government, it is true, hint, in the Queen's Speech, that the County Bill may be forthcoming, "if time permits;" but we all know time never does permit of business which can be postponed, and entertain no hope that half-way down the Session Sir Charles Dilke will rise in his place to ask leave to introduce the missing measure. We are the more disappointed, because we fear the true reason of delay has been a difference of opinion in the Cabinet as to the advisability of extending County Self-government to Ireland. Lord Hartington is opposed to the plan, Mr. Chamberlain is friendly to the plan, and the two sections whom they represent have agreed to wait, in the hope that, with Ireland restored to order, the difference between them may become of no importance. As we believe that it is easier to deal with organised disaffection than with anarchical disaffection, and that organisation of itself often removes discontent, by providing it with an outlet, we prefer Mr. Chamberlain's view; but we would rather Ireland waited, than that the whole United Kingdom did. We might have had the County Bill, even with Ireland omitted from it. We believe the disappointment throughout the country will be sincere, and will not be assuaged by the spectacle of the severe, and therefore interesting, battle which is sure to be waged over the reform of London.

We question, we must add, if it is wise, even in the interest of business, to give the House of Commons so little interesting work. Members may be willing to work hard at useful measures, but experience shows that they hunger for excitement, and that when it is not forthcoming in the shape of work, they seek it in the form of play. Exciting scenes, personal debates, motions made solely to annoy or to distract, are all more numerous in Sessions not occupied with exciting matter; while sections of the House, like the Parnellites and the Fourth Party, luxuriate in the absence of the pressure created by the preoccupation of the House. It is not half so easy to talk nonsense about Egypt or India when the House is intent on a measure which interests all constituencies, nor can Mr. Cowen ever perorate with such effect as when Members feel that his rhetoric is, at all events, a relief from routine. Members become impatient when interesting matter is delayed, and when five hundred men are impatient, bores and obstructives alike are apt to grow intimidated or ashamed. There will, we fear, be plenty of wasted nights, even if we do not class nights occupied by the Irishmen among them. They, however, are sure to seize the opportunity. Ireland is to them the "hub of the Universe"—we are sure some of them expect a separate Irish Heaven, though we cannot imagine what it would be like—and even if it were not, it is their policy to make themselves important, and their country an impediment to English business. That brings home to us all that they are asking permission to take themselves away. They are already announcing that Ireland, being refused a legislature of her own, has a right to all the time of the common Parliament; they have eleven Bills ready prepared for discussion, one of them being Mr. Healy's Home-rule Bill; and we do not feel confident that, in spite of the Closure, they will not consume an inordinate proportion of the time of Parliament. They must be allowed their share of attention, and, full as they are of anger at the imprisonment of Mr. Healy, at the working of the Crimes Bill, and at the success of the Government in tracking the Secret Societies, they will, we fear, succeed in forcing themselves to the front to an extent which the framers of the New Rules did not anticipate. Much will depend, of course, upon the working of those Rules, and much more upon the presence or absence of Mr. Gladstone, whose personal ascendancy was last year the real motive-power of Parliament; but an empty building invites occupants, and the work of the Session may be less than the Departments, all eager for "substantial" improvements, fondly hope. They ought to have their Bills, but they would have had them all the sooner, if the Liberals had been bound into a compact body by the promise of some measure which neither they nor their constituents could allow to fail, and which could have moved along pari passu with the business Bills.

It has been said that no Session ever goes as the Ministry intend it should go, and though that is not quite true, as witness the Session devoted to the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, it is true sufficiently often to make men speculate what the intruding element, if it appears, is this time likely to be. It may, of course, be Ireland, whose history is as full of surprises as that of France; but then Ireland, like Death, though it often startles us, can never be said to be unexpected. The Bradlaugh question, which is always on the horizon, is to be settled in the only reasonable way,—by allowing every one to swear or affirm, as best pleases himself or his convictions. Egyptian affairs are, for the present, tranquil, the great proposals being before the Sultan, who is never in any hurry; and though there may be future surprises from Cairo, still, as the troops can hardly be withdrawn before September, we need not anticipate any catastrophe till then. Abroad, though there are plenty of clouds in the sky, there is nothing which threatens Great Britain, and we do not believe that Zululand can furnish Parliament with anything but a most tiresome debate. Nevertheless, it is the unexpected which arrives, and the almost ostentatious devotion of the Senate to work which will be most useful, but a little dry, provokes the thought that men do not see very far, and that it is just when you are most resolute to clear up neglected business that the friend and his unlooked-for budget are certain to intrude. The Ministry have ordered a house-cleaning, and while we fully admit that it is needed, we should dearly like just for a minute to glance at the portentous article in which, about mid-September, the Times will sum-up the legislative achievements of the Session. That article may not be an expansion of the Speech with which the Session opened.

THE TORY SPOKESMEN.

IT is evident that the Tories have no more notion of their plan of campaign this year than they had last. The stormy petrel of their Party, Lord Randolph Churchill, has got only one clear idea, and that is, that some capital may be made out of Mr. Trevelyan's recent speech at Hawick. He accuses him of condemning the policy of his colleagues in Ireland in the most trenchant way, up to the time of his own entrance on the Government of Ireland last May, and he thinks that it may prove possible to set Mr. Trevelyan and his colleagues by the ears on this subject. A more barren state of mind, for such a sower of dragon's teeth as Lord Randolph Churchill, has never been disclosed; his speech really amounts to a declaration of impotence for mischief; and if Lord Randolph Churchill is impotent for mischief, we may be sure that Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote will not prove very potent. Lord Salisbury, so far as we can judge, is deeply impressed with the inadequacy of the Ministerial policy in Egypt, and would like to make as much of it as he can. And we do not doubt that he could make a good deal of it,—some of his criticisms on the deficiency of force which is likely to betray itself whenever our troops evacuate Egypt, appear to us sound enough,—if only his own ideas of a counter-policy were not so wholly perverse. But Lord Salisbury is as much possessed as he has been for some years past with the notion, not always held even by him, that Turkey should be our great ally or instrument in the East, and that without the favour and confidence of Turkey, we can do nothing effectual. And while his mind remains on that track, we feel profoundly convinced that Lord Salisbury's assaults upon the Government will fall as dead, and be as utterly fruitless of result, as Lord Randolph Churchill's brilliant notion of sowing discord between Mr. Trevelyan and his colleagues. These are not the lucubrations of serious politicians. So far as we can judge, nothing thrown out by either Lord Salisbury or Lord Randolph Churchill suggests the slightest prospect of a Tory line of attack containing the least promise even of harassing consequences to the Government.

Sir Stafford Northcote, as usual, shows more knowledge of the English people than either Lord Salisbury or his own pretentious rival, in the suggestions which he throws out. Sir Stafford Northcote thinks that a good deal may be made of the Bradlaugh case, and being perfectly unscrupulous in the matter, is quite prepared to make it. Having previously invited the Government to deal with the Oaths question formally by legislation, he now taunts them with their intention to do so, and promises the most grave and determined resistance. Well, we do not doubt that Sir Stafford Northcote is in this matter wiser in his generation than either of his Tory colleagues. He will produce the effect of standing on strictly Conservative principles in his opposition to the Affirmation Bill, and will appeal to a much stronger feeling in the country on that subject than Lord Salisbury will appeal to in relation to the Egyptian policy of the Government, or Lord Randolph Churchill will appeal to in his attempt to prove that Mr. Trevelyan has "assassinated" his colleagues. There is a very strong English prejudice against Mr. Bradlaugh, which would never have been entertained in any degree against the late Mr. John Stuart Mill, had he refused to take the oath, as he well might have done,—perhaps ought to have done,—on the same grounds. The feeling against Mr. Bradlaugh is not caused chiefly by his avowed intellectual doubts, but by his publications on other subjects; and as far as mere feeling is concerned, that feeling is justified. If the Opposition can show that there is no general mischief in the present law of Oaths, so far as it affects the position of Members of Parliament, to be removed,—that this Bill is nothing in the world but a Bill to cover Mr. Bradlaugh's individual case,—the Opposition will score an important point in the country, and perhaps turn more than one by-election. As a matter of fact, however, they cannot show this. It is, to our thinking, a great mischief that so false an importance has been given to Mr. Bradlaugh's position, by the deliberate attempt of the Conservatives to make a martyr of him. It is a very grave mischief that, when any constituency returns a man whose creed happens to be what is now known as agnosticism, he should not be allowed to take his seat without going through a hollow form to which a serious-minded man would object. Yet that is the present state of the case, and it is mischievous, without any reference at all to the injustice which it inflicts on the electors of Northampton. But it is mischievous also on account of the injustice it inflicts on the electors of Northampton, who, if they have chosen a Member some of whose opinions we all condemn as immoral, ought all the more to be relieved from the injustice of having their chosen Member kept out of the House, because that injustice lends a certain false distinction to the man of their choice. We do not believe that any of those Liberal Members who,—illegally, as we believe,—refused to let Mr. Bradlaugh "profane" the oath by taking it simply as he would take an affirmation to the same effect,—will refuse to vote for a Bill which is applicable not only to Mr. Bradlaugh's case, but to that of many other Members whose doubts would incline them to prefer the form of an affirmation to the form of an oath. This at least is certain, that any Liberal Member who deserts his party on this subject is distinctly voting for an abstract theological test, and that is a vote which few Liberal constituencies would be disposed to approve. On the whole, we believe that though Sir Stafford Northcote's hopes of an effective Conservative opposition to the Government this Session, are more reasonable than those of his colleagues, they have not any sound basis. He will hardly succeed in convincing the country either that a genuine theological test for Members of Parliament is desirable, or that, if not, an accidental theological test should be applied to the disadvantage of a particular constituency, which cannot be applied in general.

But how poverty-stricken seem the resources of Opposition, when they are confined, as they would seem to be from the first night's debating, to the prospect of censuring the Government for not leaning on Turkey for its Egyptian policy, of censuring it for wishing to abolish what is admitted to be a purely accidental theological test, and of proving that Mr. Trevelyan has "assassinated his colleagues." A more miserable array of empty boxes was never yet paraded by an Opposition before an amazed Parliament.

THE GRAVE SITUATION OF FRANCE.

WE see little that is satisfactory in the recent news from France, and have still an uneasy impression that mischief of some kind is in the air. The Senate, it is true, has behaved with sense and dignity about the Proscription Bill, and a compromise will, therefore, probably be attained. Instead of flatly rejecting the Bill, which might have produced a collision with the Chamber, and would have been regarded as a defiance to the Government, which had ardently recommended compromise, the Senators, after a brief, but thoughtful, debate, transmuted the Faure Bill, accepted by the Ministry, into a comparatively just one. They substituted for the proscribing clauses a single clause declaring that Princes "who publicly acted as Pretenders, or made a demonstration designed to jeopardise the safety of the State," should be liable to banishment, after a trial, either before the Assizes or the Senate sitting as a Court of Justice. There is no objection whatever to that, except that it places the Princes in a position different from that of other citizens, and therefore implicitly recognises that they possess by right of birth certain claims. The proposed law is simply the law of treason, as it exists in all States, with an unusually lenient penalty, and with a proviso which ensures to the Princes a fair and completely public trial. It could not pass, of course, especially after Prince Napoleon's fresh manifesto in the Times of Thursday, which, if acknowledged by him, is certainly a declaration of hostility to the Republic; but it will afford a basis for some sort of arrangement, or lead to the dropping of the whole affair. The Senate is evidently not afraid of resisting the Chamber, and the Chamber shows by its vote of 402 to 97 in favour of considering the Senate's amendment, and its acceptance on Thursday of M. Barbey's proposal, which allows expulsion when the Princes have done some definite act, that it is not prepared to push the quarrel to any dangerous length. The Barbey Bill goes back to the Senate, and it is known that the dispute will be patched-up in some way—probably, as time presses, in the most irrational way—by the addition of a rider to the Bill authorising the expulsion of the Princes, that the decree must have the assent of both Chambers. As the two Chambers can, if they please, pass a vote of urgency, and expel the Princes or anybody else in three hours by special statute, that would leave matters exactly where they are, with this exception, that the Princes are carefully warned of the insecurity of their tenure, and taught in the most public fashion that if they could conspire successfully, they would be safer than they have yet been. That however, they probably knew before, and, unless the Chamber passes some foolish vote, the whole subject will drop into the shade, in the presence of new and more formidable difficulties.

It is becoming increasingly clear that M. Gambetta was right, and that the present Chamber is making the formation of any solid or dignified Government in France an impossibility. Whether the cause is, as M. Gambetta believed, the mode of election, or, as he feared, the hunger of the Deputies for patronage, which causes them to combine in irregular and fluctuating "groups" often guided by self-interest, or the confidence felt at the time of election in M. Gambetta himself, which induced many electors to accept bad candidates because they pledged themselves to follow him, the fact is becoming past all doubt. The Chamber is cleft by hatreds so deep that a steady majority is not to be obtained by any party or person. The Chamber desires to govern for itself, like a Convention, but will not or can not organise itself so as to direct the Ministers as its clerks. It will neither form a Government which can lead, nor a party capable of dictating to a Government willing to obey. To employ the old nomenclature, which is sufficiently accurate, and is still the one best understood in England, the Royalists of all kinds, in their passion of distrust, are capable at any hour of uniting with the Mountain in their passion of hate, in order to destroy any Girondist Government whatever, while the Gironde, in its passion of dread of the other two, will allow neither of them to rule. As the Royalists plus the Mountain number about 270, or a fraction more than half the Chamber, but could not combine with the Mountain to govern for five minutes, and as the Gironde has no permanent majority, that is in the constitutional sense an anarchy, and an anarchy we fear it will be discovered to be. The single chance of forming a majority is for the Girondists to accept as many of the Mountain as seem fairly reasonable, and then, though M. de Freycinet will, it is believed, attempt it, can only be done by postponing all burning questions, and carrying on affairs in that timid and colourless way, with no foreign policy, a weakly and expensive home policy, and an inadequate because hesitating lead in debate, which no Chamber in France has ever borne for long, and which this Chamber will certainly not bear for many weeks. Some member will make some dangerous proposal, some group will detach itself, the common enemy will seize the occasion, and once more there will be a Ministry to seek.

Under these circumstances, the only reasonable hopes are the rise of some commanding figure within the Chamber, or a dissolution avowedly intended to produce a governing body; and while no chance of the former is visible, the prospect of the latter grows more dim. No one takes up M. Gambetta's fallen mantle. M. Clémenceau has attracted a few, perhaps fifty, of the deceased leader's followers; but he has not attracted the Chamber, or a majority within it. M. Brisson, the President of the Chamber, and supposed, we hardly know why, to be the strongest man in it, with the usual selfishness of French politicians, declines to "exhaust his reputation" by standing in the gap; and M. Jules Ferry so far has followed his exceedingly prudent example. M. de Freycinet, it is true, will take power; but M. de Freycinet has but a limited following, he cannot control the Chamber upon any serious subject, and his accession to office would be regarded by the financial interests, which are so strong in the Senate, with undisguised and well-founded dismay. No new man has attracted any marked attention, nor, though all customary rules may be broken, as was shown in the selection of M. Fallières, is there any man to whom any strong party in the Chamber looks with confidence or hope. Under these circumstances, men turn naturally to the President, and we confess with pain that the grounds for confidence in M. Grévy do not increase. The furious attack upon him just now raging in Paris may indeed be explained as an attempt to drive him into a course of which he disapproves, and many of the charges made against him are due only to political rancour. His whole life contradicts the assertion that he is a self-seeker, intent only on keeping his place, with its emoluments; and we see no reason to believe that he dreads the Princes, or is governed by M. Wilson—his son-in-law, and too much of a financier—or that he is jealous of independent men. M. Grévy remains what he has always been,—a man of high character, unambitious, and convinced that the Republic should be "Constitutional" in the English sense. But we fear it is certain that M. Grévy lacks one faculty for his position, and doubtful, though the doubt may be dispelled, whether he does not lack another. He clearly has not a King's first attribute,—he is not great in choosing men. He has picked out no new man, and the tried men whom he has chosen for office have usually been failures. With all the world before him, he selected M. Jules Ferry, who envenomed the quarrel with the Church, yet failed to conciliate the Reds; M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, who first broke the English alliance, yet roused no patriotic feeling; M. de Freycinet, whose wild projects have plunged France into financial difficulty; M. Duclerc, who could manage neither diplomacy, nor the Chamber, nor his own Cabinet; and M. Fallières, whose health broke down on his first day of office. Now he is evidently in utter perplexity for a Premier, and with a dozen courses open to him, is disposed, it is said, to fall back on M. de Freycinet, who is dominated by his wish for engineering fame, whose hurry to cover France with public works frightens all sound financiers, and who, having had his chance, failed to make for himself any manageable party. The Senate, led by M. Léon Say, would pronounce him dangerous at once. Let us grant that it is all the Chamber's fault, and that no one could have mastered it, and we are only forced back upon the second and quite novel doubt about M. Grévy, his possession of political nerve. Why, if he distrusts the Chamber, does he not ask the country for a better one? Because, some say, the next Chamber might be even worse; but that is precisely what he has to see, and the objection goes too far. If France cannot select a working Chamber, France cannot govern itself, and any working form of Republic is practically hopeless. Because, say others, M. Grévy pledged himself, when he took the Presidency, never to ask the Senate for a Dissolution. The pledge, if it ever were given, which we doubt, in that absolute sense, could only bind him not to seek such an occasion voluntarily, and is not applicable to the circumstances; but in the worst case, it is only a pledge to the country, binding him, if the country at the election accuses him of breaking faith, to resign. There can be no contract of that sort which the other contracting party could not abrogate. It would be ridiculous to affirm that M. Grévy wants vigour, and misreads his constitutional position, when next week he may show that he only waited his hour, and that he understands France much better than his critics; but it is just to say that his conduct since he was set free by M. Gambetta's death has not increased the hopes of those who, like ourselves, held steadily that in his silence and inaction there was a reserve of power. He has not selected capable men, and he has not as yet contributed what he might have done to extricate France from a situation which, embarrassing enough in itself, excites a still more embarrassing fear. We trust he may yet cut the withes, but we trust with diminished confidence, and an internal fear that M. Grévy will stumble on with hand-to-mouth Ministries, till all France begins to feel, what the traders of Paris have openly expressed, that the absence of a settled Government produces an embarrassment in all affairs that the country can no longer bear. It is not a good sign in France when the selfish, to whom order is everything, remonstrate with the Head of the State, and he only replies that he is as much perplexed as they are.

THE GOVERNMENT PLAN FOR LONDON.

THE main question which confronted any Government approaching the reform of London was, whether to constitute one extended Municipality, or a Federation of smaller Corporations. The latter alternative had the high authority of Mr. Mill, and there must, therefore, be something to be said for it; otherwise, we confess we should have thought it indefensible. It is true that the several Parliamentary boroughs which Mr. Mill proposed to incorporate are large towns. As regards population, it would be possible to subdivide still further, and yet create Corporations of greater numerical importance than those of most provincial towns. But what is lacking to Marylebone, Westminster, Finsbury, or the Tower Hamlets, is any separate collective existence. Who knows, until he inquires, in what parish or borough of London he is living; and who cares, when he knows? These great districts known by separate names are merely Wards of London. Whatever separate existence they once had has been utterly lost, through the constant spread of the town. Their corporations, if constructed, would be merely dignified vestries, or, to use an old word, wardmotes; and would fail to elicit that sentiment of citizenship which has hitherto lacked means of expression in London, but which it is hoped the construction of a real Municipality will give tongue to. Moreover, were any such system of ward municipalities to be constructed, it is inevitable that real interest would centre in that Federal Council which must, under such circumstances, be called into existence for questions of administration affecting London as a whole. The result would be merely a Metropolitan Board of Works under another name, with all the vices which attend a system of delegation from bodies representing the interests not of the Metropolis generally, but of a particular quarter. With a number of sectional corporations, and a central council of delegates, London would be in much the same position as that in which it is now, and the time of Parliament would have been wasted in calling old things by new names. Further, the teachings of experience would have been disregarded, for London has, in fact, been treated as a whole for most purposes of administration during the last five-and-twenty years. In 1855, thirty-eight Vestries and District Boards were incorporated to superintend the state of the streets in different parts of London, and at the same time a central Board was created to drain London. Since that time scarcely a Session has passed without legislation on some question or other connected with the management of the Metropolis. To which body has the care of these questions been confided? To the thirty-eight local bodies, or to the one central one? Without exception, they have been relegated to the Metropolitan Board of Works, so that while the power and influence of the Vestries have remained stationary, the Central Board has increased in importance year by year, till it is difficult to enumerate the Acts of Parliament it administers. There could be no more convincing proof that London must, for most purposes, be treated as one city; and it is satisfactory to learn that the Government has taken this view.

The Government seems also to have acted wisely in determining to reform and extend the existing Corporation, rather than altogether to supersede it by a new creation. The Corporation of London actually exists. It is a body with a history, with ancient privileges and a certain picturesqueness of associations. When it really represented the Capital, it did its duty, and rendered signal services to the State. Its fault has been that, instead of enlarging its borders, it has hugged its wealth and its dignities, and refused to give the benefit of them to the real City, as it grew. To do now, once for all, what should have been done by internal reform, or, at least, by judicious legislation from time to time, is to take a course which the Corporation themselves will find it difficult openly to condemn or resist. Individual members may lose their seats in the Common Council; for it will, of course, be impossible, when representatives of the 123 square miles included within the Metropolis have places on the Board, to allot 206 Common Councilmen and 26 Aldermen to the City. But the Corporation will attain a dignity and power it has never before possessed. Retaining its Guildhall, its Mansion House, its wealth, and the dispensing of its munificent hospitalities, it will assume in addition the reins of Metropolitan Government, and become in a sense it has never before aspired to the first Municipality in Europe. It is inevitable that the able men upon the Corporation should feel this, and should be disposed at heart to welcome rather than to resist the proposed change.

The enlarged and reformed Corporation thus constituted will undertake all the duties of a municipal character now performed by the present Corporation, and all those at present discharged by the Metropolitan Board. Few Londoners probably know how extensive these duties are, even under the present imperfect system. They range from the main drainage of London, to such matters as the inspection of cowsheds and the registration of houses where infants are taken to nurse. The embankment of the Thames, the provision of free bridges, the extinction of fires, the superintendence of the gas supply, the clearing-out of insanitary neighbourhoods, the formation of parks, and the preservation of open spaces, are some only of the principal subjects engaging the attention of the Metropolitan Board. To these will be added by the City Corporation the care of markets, the property in and responsibility for the three City bridges, and the charge of the magnificent open spaces secured by the Corporation in recent years, compared with which the parks and commons of the Metropolitan Board are a bagatelle,—Epping Forest, Burnham Beeches, West Ham Park, and the Commons of Coulsdon, in Surrey. Some functions, or rather prerogatives, exercised by the Corporation at present will not be placed in the hands of the reformed body. The Aldermen could not, in reason, be asked to furnish a Bench of Justices for the Metropolis. That in the City at present the administration of summary justice is in the hands of an un-elected, an elective, and an irremovable Magistracy, is sufficiently anomalous. The extension of such a system to London generally would, of course, be intolerable. Neither is the reformed Corporation likely to have the election of Judges to sit at the Central Criminal Court, or to preside over the County Court of the City, the choice of Judges by popular election having long been condemned. But if these functions of the Corporation are no longer performed, there will be new questions of a magnitude sufficient to satisfy the most voracious appetite for work. The question of water supply has, as we all know, been shelved, because there was no disinterested body sufficiently commanding public confidence to be entrusted with the necessary powers. If examples are wanted of the advantages which corporate existence confers upon a town, it is only necessary to cite the cases of water and gas. The great northern towns have a constant supply of water, and so sensible are their governing bodies of their responsibilities, that long before the existing supply has been found deficient, they ask for new and enlarged powers, and are not deterred from such spirited enterprises as tapping a lake more than a hundred miles away. Again, in the case of gas, some of the great manufacturing towns make a handsome profit for their ratepayers; while others, proceeding on different lines, sell light at cost-price. One has only to turn to the Electric Lighting Act of last Session to see how great is the influence of the Northern and Midland Corporations in protecting the interests of the consumer. But for the position occupied by them, that Act would probably never have seen the light, and most certainly it would never have contained that right of purchase which secures ratepayers against the levy of black-mail, and enables them to take the supply of electric light into their own hands, as soon as it has been proved a practicable undertaking. When London possesses corporate existence, we may expect her to take the lead in such questions as these.

There is one subject which stands on a somewhat different footing from those we have referred to,—the care of the streets. This duty was, in the main, entrusted to the Vestries and District Boards in 1855, and the decision then come to has not been disturbed, except in the case of a few central metropolitan improvements. To reverse this decision entirely, and to hand over to the Corporation the direct charge of the paving, lighting, and watering of the whole Metropolis, would probably ensure greater efficiency in the work than is at present displayed. But, on the whole, the existing bodies do not discharge their duties very badly; and the question is whether it is worth while, for the sake of improvement, to deal so heavy a blow at local self-government as would be involved in dispensing altogether with the voluntary services of several hundred ratepayers, who may most usefully serve on local bodies, but could not aspire to a seat on the Central Board. The Government, it is understood, intend to take a middle course. Leaving the local bodies in existence, but assimilating, no doubt, where necessary, the method of their election to that of the central council, they will endeavour, by strengthening the control of the latter body, to prevent those inconsistencies, both in execution of work and expenditure, which may at present be pointed out, and to ensure a harmonious treatment of the Metropolis as a whole, while retaining the advantages of local knowledge and zeal. The exact mode in which this end is proposed to be attained will probably not be known till the Bill is in print. Much will depend upon the means employed, and we trust the power of dispersing any Vestry which will not obey orders will be conceded. Indeed, we would much rather have kept only the vestry-clerks, who are able and experienced men, as local agents of the central body.

The formation of London into a separate County is undoubtedly of less importance than its incorporation; yet it will be attended with solid advantages. That the Middlesex Magistrates have been from time to time the butt for ridicule in connection with their licensing proceedings is probably due, in great part, to the impression that they are exercising a jurisdiction conferred upon them by accident, and have no real connection with the Metropolis, for which, in this matter, they legislate. It is a still greater anomaly that the heavy, criminal work of Quarter Sessions for the large and populous districts south of the Thames should be performed entirely by an unpaid County Magistracy. And in financial matters there is no good reason for embarrassing the Budget of a county like Surrey or Kent with the heavy receipts and expenditure of Metropolitan Districts. The provision of a Metropolitan Bench of Justices, appointed in the manner customary in boroughs, with a Recorder and other salaried Judges, will simplify the performance of judicial work; while such anomalies as the appointment of the High Sheriff of Middlesex by the Liverymen of the City Companies will incidentally drop out of existence.

Whenever the question of London Municipal Reform has been broached, the control of the Police has been ominously alluded to by opponents as forming an insuperable difficulty. It will probably be found that on close inspection the difficulty altogether vanishes. In the first place, the Imperial Government is in possession of the Metropolitan Police. If London had been incorporated in 1830, possibly the control of the Police might have been entrusted to it. But, if so, it must pay the penalty, if penalty it be, for clinging to obsolete forms and institutions, and for the apathy it has shown with respect to the attainment of corporate life. As it is, the Government found anarchy in the Police arrangements of the Metropolis; it introduced order and efficiency, and its administration of the force entrusted to it has been unexceptionable. Something more than the sentimental utterance that London is entitled to the control of its Police will be wanted, to disturb the existing order of things. Some definite advantage must be shown, and no attempt at such proof has yet been made. Again, the question is complicated in a way which is not alluded to, probably is not known by, the advocates of the claim of the Reformed Corporation. The Metropolitan Police District is not coterminous with the Metropolis which it is proposed should be incorporated. It is about three times as large. Between the smaller and the larger boundaries are all the river-side suburbs above Putney and Hammersmith, such places as Wimbledon, Kingston, Croydon, and Tottenham. What is to be done with the police in this outer zone? It can hardly be recommended that the reformed Corporation should go outside its own limits, and burden itself with the protection of a district three times as large. Yet this is the only defensible alternative. For, to cut the Metropolitan Police District into halves, and give the outer and less important area to the Imperial Government, while depriving it of the central space, where all the Offices of State are situate, is out of the question; while to hand over the suburbs to the counties, is impossible. If anything is wanting to complete the case for the existing state of things, it is supplied by the consideration which naturally occurs to every one,—that the seat of Government stands in a different position from any other town, and must be dealt with, in relation to the preservation of order, with reference to its own circumstances, and not to the course which has been followed in other places. The fact that the police in a minute area in the centre of the Capital has hitherto been in the hands of a corporate body cannot, of course, seriously affect the consideration of the question.

"INFORMERS" IN IRELAND.

IT is impossible to feel more strongly than we do how melancholy a fact it is that the Government in Ireland cannot punish even heinous crimes like assassination, without recourse to the aid of Informers, all of whom are paid in some way, either by rewards, or pardons, or promises of special protection. It is, perhaps, the very worst of all the symptoms of social disorder in that unhappy land, that means so utterly detested alike by the rulers and the ruled should, nevertheless, be found indispensable. If only the instinct of justice could be relied on in Ireland, if only juries were certain to keep their oaths, and witnesses to speak the truth, and the population to aid in punishing all offences against the universal conscience, all other evils would be curable, and the Government might wisely determine to rely solely on ordinary law, to overlook or learn from discontent, and to make war on treason only when it descended armed into the streets. Political offences matter nothing, comparatively, if only men will refuse to confuse criminality with politics. Five-sixths of the deep distrust which impedes the discovery of a modus vivendi between England and Ireland would disappear at once, if the jurymen who invariably acquitted an agitator as invariably convicted a criminal; and Irishmen would be left to manage, at all events their own social order, in their own way. It is not so, however, as everybody knows. Whatever the cause, whether the struggle of centuries has really impaired the moral sense of a section of the Irish people, till they cannot see that even war has moral limitations, or that the dread of the Secret Societies has paralysed their consciences, or that the hatred of authority has risen, as among the Anarchists of France, to a height at which the social virtues temporarily disappear, the fact remains that however great the crime, however wide its ramifications, however deplorable its consequences, if it can but be described as political, voluntary testimony is unprocurable, and the Government is driven back upon aid which its own people have a special and quite separate reluctance to accept. Englishmen hate espionage, the use of informers, the pardon of guilty witnesses, and regard resort to such means as the most distressing of all necessities. They allow hundreds of offences to pass unchecked which espionage would put down, and utterly refuse all sanction to the Continental system of mouchards and "sheep of the prisons."

We acknowledge a dislike for Informers as strong as that of Irishmen, but the acknowledgment is not an acknowledgment that the use of evidence obtained by reward is, under all circumstances, wrong. There is no evident moral wrong, though there is evident humiliation, in paying a witness to speak truth who otherwise would remain obstinately silent. The moral guilt is with him, for refusing to aid justice, not with the State, which simply pays him, as it would pay police, or gaolers, or Judges, or any other part of its indispensable machinery. All it is bound to do, if it pays him, is to use extra care in ensuring that he only speaks the truth, to see in a special manner that his evidence is fully corroborated, to guard that he is in no way solicited or tempted to improve his evidence. Nor is there any moral wrong in accepting Queen's evidence, when the evidence of the innocent is unprocurable. The man who gives it may be a traitor, or a scoundrel, or a villain of any depth of dye, or a repentant criminal, or a timid man,—a question depending almost entirely upon his motive, which only God and himself can accurately know,—but the State is asking no villainy from him, only the truth, about a crime which it is its admitted duty to punish, if it can. No Church, and especially not the Catholic Church, has ever admitted that an oath to commit wickedness could bind the soul. If the truth is worth more to society than the witness's punishment, it is the right of the State to say that punishment may be remitted, just as it would be the right of a Sovereign, if a convict had saved his life, or done any other act of great service to the State, to remit that convict's punishment. An act would have been done which, socially—we do not in the least say morally, that depending on the convict's secret conscience—amounted to an atonement. Neither reward nor pardon is morally wrong, while special protection is a simple duty, the evidence which benefits the State being the crime which endangers the man's safety. Nor is there anything unusual or abnormal in either reward or immunity. Englishmen are so confused by the pseudo-political character of these trials, that they half forget that most discovered plots in history were revealed by informers, that every undetected murder is followed by offers of reward, that every guilty man who assists justice is allowed to have a "claim" to immunity total or partial,—the very plea of "guilty" diminishes punishment—that in numberless instances, for example, in every case of bribery at elections, and every case in which Queen's evidence is accepted, witnesses are promised pardon beforehand; and that in at least one analogous case, that of the trade assassinations in Sheffield, the actual murderers were assured of immunity by special statute. Their confession, by a strange stretch, we admit, of an old practice, and one which we should be sorry ever to see repeated, was treated as social atonement. That such means should have to be applied in a country where, owing to its special history, fidelity to comrades in crime is regarded as a virtue, and an "informer" held in such detestation as to create sympathy for the object of his information, even when he is unpopular, is one more of the innumerable misfortunes created by the conflict between English and Irish ideas; but this, though it immensely adds to the inexpediency of accepting such evidence, in no way affects the morality of its acceptance. Truth, so it be but exact truth, is truth, even if it be paid for.

But, say the extremists, or rather insinuate the extremists, a Government allowed to use such weapons as Informers is under strong temptation to manufacture them. Knowing, perhaps, the guilty, it may desire to punish them by evidence which, though not false as to the guilt of the accused, is false as to the proof of that guilt. That is the real insinuation underlying every attack in Ireland upon Informers, and we are not prepared to say that there have not been countries and times in which it was fairly justified. We distrust such evidence extremely when given by agents provocateurs; when terror is the object; or when, as in the Titus-Oates trials, or in some trials under both the Red and White Terrors, a class is the object of attack. Our Irish history is stained so deep with unjust trials as half to excuse the Irish feeling that law is an unscrupulous foe. But that stain has passed from our Administration. In political trials in Ireland at present, there are no such agents; no terror is sought, and no class, as such, is even an object of suspicion. Apart altogether from the question of the personal character of the statesmen who compose it, it must be the first object of the Irish Government to ascertain the truth. It can by no possibility be of the faintest importance to any official in Ireland to convict any John Smith of killing Mr. Burke, any more than any John Brown. There is not a trace even of a wish to convict Catholic more than Protestant, native more than stranger, a poor man more than a rich one. No unjust conviction, if it were possible, could do the rulers the slightest good, enlarge their authority, or increase their reputations, or diminish in the slightest degree the personal dangers amid which they are compelled daily and hourly to walk. On the contrary, they would gravely increase the latter by any injustice, by rousing that special animosity which invariably follows in any country any twisting of the law. The present rulers of Ireland are at least able men, by the confession of those who assail them, and able men must know that in a society so disorganised, so suspicious, and so full of traditions of wrong—true traditions, many of them—even the punishment of the guilty would be less efficacious than an overwhelming conviction in the Irish mind that the actually guilty had been found. The execution, or even the conviction, of a single innocent man would give new heart and a new motive to every possible assassin in the country, would lift half the weight from his conscience, and fill him with the conviction that an Administration which had been so blinded as to the innocent would not be sharp-sighted as to the guilty. Every consideration of policy, as well as of conscience, binds the Irish Administration, when the evidence of Informers is received, to make sure that it is true, to give the accused the fairest conceivable trial, to hearken earnestly to any rebutting evidence as to identification; and we do not doubt that this will be done, all the more because the Government, in the discharge of its duty to society, has been compelled, contrary to its instincts, to rely upon the necessarily suspected, if not necessarily tainted, evidence of Informers.

PERILS OF WATER.

THE verdict on floods used to be, "Noah's first and the rest nowhere;" but if the weather we have been enjoying for nearly six months goes on much longer, it will have to be revised. The Deluge will still claim its place at the head of the list of floods, but 1882-3 may at least hope to be a bad second. Probably in living memory there never has been such a winter. With floods occasional and partial we are familiar, but this year they have been continuous and universal. Europe cannot compete with America, where great cities are drowned, railway stations subside, while the torrent in some streets is so fierce, that "navigation in Second Avenue is impossible;" but still, we may say that in Europe there has been a flood wherever there has been a river. Our little English streams have run over at once, as it was to be expected they should do. They are never much too big for the work they have to do, and the moment at which they can hold no more usually comes after twenty-four hours' steady rain. A great German river rolls down so vast a body of water to the far-distant sea, that it might seem that the sea itself was hardly more likely to be affected by any addition to its volume. But the Rhine and the Danube have been as unable to carry off the contents of the soaked lands around them, as though they were the mere threads which we are accustomed to call "rivers." In France, the dry beds amid which even a stream as vast as the Loire makes its way in summer seem to suggest an inexhaustible capacity for the storage of reserve waters. But by degrees even these have been filled up, and this winter a river in width like an arm of the sea has been carried along at the pace of a mountain-torrent. In parts of Italy, the destruction has been worse, perhaps, than elsewhere, by reason of the peculiar conditions of the northern places. Terror lest the rivers should burst their banks has been added to alarm lest they should overflow them.

There are few people who will not be surprised, if they add up the multifarious variety of human sufferings which may be traced to these great floods. The direct results, of course, are disastrous in a very high degree. There is great loss of life, and still greater loss of property. Men and women are drowned before they can escape from their houses; the flocks and herds that are pastured round a river-side village cannot be removed in time; the submerged dwellings prove when the waters have subsided to be unfit for human habitation. Above all, even when only the lowest storey is submerged, the drainage is driven back upon the houses, and the inhabitants of the healthiest dwellings find themselves living above a poisonous cesspool. In many cases, during the past season, these experiences have repeated themselves. The suffering of the autumn has been reproduced in the winter, and bids fair again to present itself before the spring has passed away. All this, however, is only a part of the mischief that is done. The unexhausted consequences are less conspicuous, but they are more abiding. When the waters have retired, they leave behind them a strange desolation. Whatever was in the ground has been destroyed, and what is worse, the ground itself is not in a state that will admit of anything being done to make the consequent loss good. In the towns, the foundations of the houses have been sapped, and when the inmates come back, it is to find that the work which it would have taken years of slow decay to accomplish has been done in as many days by the floods. Added to all this is the slow misery of disease,—the damp that eats into frames weakened by exposure, the malaria that finds an easy entrance where damp has opened the way. Some two or three years back, it was noticed by doctors that in London the west winds brought more sickness in their train than is ordinarily brought by the east winds which bear so very much worse a character. The explanation was that in the Valley of the Upper Thames the soil was so saturated, and the air, in consequence, so unwholesome, that the winds which usually give freshness and elasticity to the air of London only exaggerated its worst qualities. That suggests a pleasant prospect for Londoners in the spring of 1883. Happily, March is drawing near, and unless the climate has changed for good and all, the prevailing winds of the next quarter must come from the east. But, even at the best, the heart of a farmer in the flooded districts must be heavy indeed, as he thinks of his balance-sheet next Christmas. The autumn rains came just in time to prevent his doing much with his land before Christmas; the winter rains promise, before they have done, to make it impossible for him to do anything with it before Easter. If the present weather continues—and the signs of its mending seem only to grow fewer—he cannot count upon getting in his seed until the summer has almost come. Wet weather means disease to sheep and oxen, as well as to men; and even if he is able to give them shelter, he has to keep them alive on food that costs him more than he is accustomed to pay, in a year when he is likely to have less means than usual out of which to pay it. It would not be safe to say that 1883 will make an end of that great interest which has already suffered so much, for farmers seem able to bear more than other men. But it is plain that unless things change very quickly and very completely, 1883 is likely to make the heaviest addition to their burdens that can be traced to any single year. How it stands with other countries, we cannot profess to say. But if like causes produce like effects, the agricultural depression of the coming season must be painted in colours which apply not to England only, but to Europe.

In one respect, however, England differs from some other countries. With them, the rivers are too large to be easily managed; in England, it is not manageableness that is wanted, but management. The floods from which we suffer are almost all such as might be prevented. They come, not because there is no means of keeping them back, but because there is no machinery ready by which these means can be applied. A great deal of money has been laid out for many years past in relieving land of water, but all that seems to have come of it is that the water finds its way very much more rapidly to the rivers. No attempt has been made to carry it off when it gets there. The channel, the locks, the reservoirs, which were enough when much of the higher land in the river valley was waterlogged, are held to be enough now that this same land is like a squeezed sponge twenty-four hours after rain has fallen. The water is all poured into the rivers at once, and when there, it has no choice but to spread itself over the low-lying fields on each bank. Thus the drainage of the land that crowns the valley slopes has been effected at the cost of the land that lies in the valley bottoms. The kind of outlay that is required to meet this state of things is of a wholly different kind from that which sufficed for the original drainage of the higher ground. Be a farm small or large, the drainage of it is ordinarily within the power either of the owner or of the occupier. One or the other of them has sufficient means at command to meet a necessity so universal and so unmistakeable. If he has not the actual capital, he has at least the credit on which to raise it. But when it comes to making provision for getting rid of the surplus thus poured into the rivers, the case is altogether different. The prevention of floods demands organisation. The outlay must be distributed not merely over the lands which suffer from floods—so far self-interest would do a good deal in the way of persuasion—but over the lands which cause the floods. The owners and occupiers of these last are not disposed to recognise any such obligation. That the farmers who have land on the river-bank should club together to keep the stream within its proper course is perfectly natural. They see their profits destroyed by floods, and they are very properly anxious to prevent them. But floods do no harm to a man whose land lies at the top of a hill; why, then, should he be called upon to bear the cost of deepening the river channel or improving the mechanism of the locks? That is a question which it takes an Act of Parliament to answer properly, and the only wonder is that the farmers, who are the real sufferers, have not done more to force a Prevention of Floods Bill through Parliament. No question comes nearer home to a large section of English agriculturists, and if they are more alive to their own interest, they would not allow another Session to pass without bringing the necessary pressure to bear, alike upon the Government and upon their own special representatives in Parliament. They have only to say distinctly that if the Floods Bill is not passed they will vote for new county Members, and it will be passed by a stampede, as the Bill compensating them for the preventive slaughter of their cattle was. They are far too quiescent.

THE LATE PROFESSOR HENRY SMITH.

GR^{EAT} statesmen, successful generals, famous authors, distinguished men of science, eminent theologians—all those who have been raised by industry, talent, or the caprice of fortune, to prominence in a profession—become by degrees actors on whose movements our attention rests, and whose familiar figures are part of the spectacle of life. The public they have interested during their time bids them, when they die, a kindly and sympathetic farewell, retraces their career, counts up their successes, and assesses their general apparent value. Professor Henry Smith, whose loss this week casts a shadow both over Oxford and through many circles of educated men and women, belonged to none of these categories. To by far the greater number of Englishmen, his name is probably unknown. Some will vaguely recollect it as that of a candidate put forward unsuccessfully a few years ago by Oxford Liberals for the representation of the University. Many even of those who are aware that a man in the fullness of his powers is just dead, whose brilliant intellectual attainments have probably not been surpassed by any other of their English contemporaries, may, nevertheless, be surprised at regret so widely felt and so loudly expressed over the loss of one who wrote no great books, patented no great invention, amassed no fortune, made no famous speeches, and led no conspicuous movement, political or social. Measured by the popular measure of publicity and fame, Professor Henry Smith would hardly seem, to most of us, to have been one of the great men of the time. Yet it would be difficult among the world's celebrities to find one who in gifts and nature was his superior. Generally speaking, there is a rough justice in the sentence passed upon intellectual men who achieve no definite worldly success. We surmise, and often with truth, that some weak spot somewhere in their powers has been the cause of their failure to acquire those sublunary distinctions and rewards which coarser and more practical people manage to secure. To the case of Professor Smith, this kind of criticism would be inapplicable, for he possessed both the qualities and the character which might have made him famous in many active walks of life. His mental attainments were of the highest order. A finished classical scholar, a mathematician, in some respects of European distinction, a considerable metaphysician, a trained master of most branches of knowledge, literary, economic, and scientific, an adequate linguist, and a man of sound judgment, perfect temper, and wise aptitude for affairs, he combined with his other special excellences a delicate gaiety of spirit, a brilliant conversational power, which made him one of the most accomplished and attractive ornaments of any educated company in which he moved. To what eminence in public or professional life accomplishments so varied might not have led him, it is difficult to feel sure, if only he had ever plunged into the stream of competition or adventure. But some delicate touch of indifference to worldly success mingled itself with his genius, and he remained to the last content with playing, and with playing well, whatever part fortune brought to him to play. Incessantly occupied in the discharge of duties both of a public and a private kind, that thickened round him as years went by, he was satisfied with what had fallen to his share in the lottery of life, and neither solicited nor ostentatiously avoided anything beyond. The "note" of personal ambition seemed absent from his composition. And so it happens that the great public which takes its knowledge of men from newspapers and books, from debates in Parliament and the records of our Law Courts, hardly knew—if, indeed, it knew at all—Professor Henry Smith.

As the personal "note" was wanting in Smith, so, on the other hand, the intellectual or academic "note" was one which he possessed in, perhaps, its most attractive form. Vanity and self-seeking, every form of mental intemperance and extravagance, seemed to have no place in anything that he ever said or did. The last, the rarest triumph of education, is when it destroys the desire of self-assertion in a man of genius, and substitutes in its place the crowning flower of perfect moderation and equanimity. The greatest of Greek philosophers, in the greatest of moral treatises, has elaborated a theory that virtue consists in a golden mean, and in the avoidance of dangerous extremes; but when driven into a corner for a standard by which the mean is to be measured, the illustrious moralist has no better compass to furnish for our guidance than this,—that the golden mean in each case must be that which is defined by the reason of some thoroughly temperate man. The result of Henry Smith's genius and culture combined seemed to make him the very man required by a philosopher for his human measuring-rod. A University life sometimes spoils and sometimes perfects natural capacities, but it usually leaves its mark upon them, whether it be for good or evil. Nobody could doubt but that Henry Smith, as he issued from the Academic mould, was a natural genius, with an impress of his University stamped distinctly upon him; and Oxford has, perhaps, never had a more happy specimen to produce of her best influence than the late Savilian Professor of Geometry.

Smith came from Rugby to the University as a remarkable boy, and won the blue ribbon in all the great intellectual competitions of his Undergraduate days. He became in due course a Fellow of Balliol, and joined a Common Room which consisted of a small group of very distinguished men. The present Master of Balliol was already conspicuous in the society of Balliol Fellows, as the most successful and most energetic tutor of the first of the Oxford Colleges of the period. Among the rest were names of academic fame—Mr. Lake, the present Dean of Durham; Riddell, an accomplished hero even among Shrewsbury scholars, whose beautiful character and refinement of mind were prematurely lost to the University by an early death; Archdeacon Palmer, not the least distinguished of a trio of brothers of all of whom Oxford had reason to be content; Lonsdale, Wall, Woolcombe, Walrond, and a few years later, Newman and Green. These were the days when Oxford, always passing through some phase or other, was entering on a new situation. The Tractarian movement had subsided, but the University was not at rest. A reforming Parliamentary Commission was troubling the waters. The old system of close Scholarships and Fellowships was slowly giving way, and like the rotten boroughs of a past political period, the close preserves of the Colleges were being either extinguished, or thrown open to public competition. But Oxford was still Conservative at heart. Leaders of the old school and their followers held the University pulpits, dominated Congregation, monopolised the best preferments, resisted to the best of their powers all local change, and were ready on provocation to ostracise unorthodox reformers for being, like Socrates, the corrupters of youth. Married Fellows were as yet unknown; it had not yet become necessary to build whole suburbs of semi-detached villas to receive the feminine colonists of the future. But there was a stir and an agitation throughout the Academic world which the sense of changes, present and to come, had produced. University politics and polemics were, as always, of absorbing interest. Mansel and Goldwin Smith tilted against each other in debate before an admiring and competent academic audience. Oxford was, in fact, at war,—a war, it is true, polite, polished, and courteous. Into this atmosphere, charged as it was with considerable personal electricity, Henry Smith was thence-forward absorbed; for nearly thirty years, no more attractive, brilliant, or genial figure was to be found in the perturbed society of the University. Some happy combination of judgment and temper made him acceptable even to those with whose opinions he had nothing in common. He succeeded in being a politician, without wearing the obnoxious colours of a partisan. He had the great art of never pressing a victory home, and of bearing defeat with pleasant equanimity. His business powers, his modesty, his wisdom, and his entire freedom from egotism and dogmatic presumption, a delicate gaiety that never flagged, wit that sparkled without wounding, and which rose incessantly to real brilliancy, made him not merely an effective personage in the Oxford world, but universally acceptable in any society, whatever the shade of its opinions. His finished persiflage, his pleasant epigrams, will long be remembered, though the brightest conversation is often the most evanescent, and the finesse of wit, like a musical laugh, disappears with the occasion, and cannot be reproduced upon paper or in print. As by degrees his attainments were recognised, both in England and abroad, his influence at Oxford naturally deepened; but neither within nor without the University did he grasp at opportunities of notoriety. Such power and authority as he possessed he held without an effort, without solicitation, apparently without any personal satisfaction in them. In offices of friendship, he was constant; in such public or civic duties as came in his way, assiduous; no good or benevolent work ever needed a helping hand, but his was at its service, without ostentation, and without any expectation of personal advantage. He was a good speaker, without being a rhetorician; his death, indeed, last week was hastened by a chill caught or increased while he was addressing a gathering of agricultural labourers.

A life like Henry Smith's, of exemplary moderation, far removed from even a suspicion of worldliness and vanity, is seldom found in these days in combination with intellectual powers and practical ability on so considerable a scale. There are, no doubt, many nooks and corners in which at times may be seen flowering the "wise indifference of the wise." Students, divines, men of science or of letters, not seldom seem content to retire from the world, as if they had measured the true value of the things we most of us eagerly compete for, and were perfectly satisfied, of deliberate choice, to remain spectators of the fever of mankind. Some physical inaptitude, or some constitutional tendency, not unfrequently lies at the bottom of this apparently philosophic temper. Patient self-possession, and a sober estimate of the world and of what it can give, are rarely found in a man who lives in constant contact with other men and their affairs, who shares in the interests of his generation, occupies himself with its business, and whose genius seems to bring high honour and success almost within his reach. Professor Henry Smith was not buried away from his fellow-creatures in literature, or study, or contemplation; he was no recluse or invalid, but a man of the world, active, competent, social, only, —not ambitious. Personal serenity of such a type is rather a classical than a modern virtue; perhaps an age different to our own may yet regard it as one of the highest forms, not merely of intellectual, but of civic excellence. It is the characteristic of recent civilisation, that in almost all its aspects it seems based upon a theory of personal competition. The prominent figures on every stage are the result of a struggle, not for existence, but for success. It is a contest which all seem satisfied to recognise as one of the conditions of ordinary life; which constitutes the essence of our politics, of our commerce, of our political economy, of our laws of property themselves. In the general race to possess more than the average share of wealth, power, fame, it is, perhaps, a wholesome lesson to turn for a short breathing-time to the uneventful example of the life of a man of genius, who was fitted for most distinctions, if he had cared to seek them, but who was unaffected by the universal fever, possessed his soul in perfect patience, and remained to the last content to discharge all the duties which Providence allotted to him, without affectation, and with that composure of soul to which great gifts are not always allied. The secret of the philosophic temperament, exhibited in this its most manly shape, is one which is not easy to explore; but when the phenomenon is seen, its charm attracts us the more in proportion to its rarity. Essayists and moralists for the last two thousand years have preached it, and inculcated it; some have gone so far as to boast of its acquisition,—its praise, certainly, is among all the prophets. Probably it is the product neither of Nature, nor of education singly, but of a happy, and of an admirable combination of the two. Among the many friends, acquaintances, admirers, whose thoughts have in the last few days been saddened or sobered by the unexpected death of a brilliant man of genius, there are none who will not readily accord to Professor Henry Smith the tribute of unaffected respect for what without extravagance may be termed his extraordinary powers of mind, his gentle and Lælian wisdom, and the sweetness of character which never made an enemy, lost a friend, or sought a personal advantage for itself. But besides this and beyond this, it may not be out of place, before a personality in many ways so complete fades into indistinctness, and a life ceases to be familiar to us which must hereafter be treasured rather in the memory of his contemporaries and friends than in the history of his time, to recognise in the Professor Oxford has lost that special type of wholesome and of manly virtue the growth of which is not much favoured by the rush and turmoil of these times. Great mental gifts can be found, when occasion demands them; talents grow on every tree. But the serenity of heart which enables its possessor to wear the gifts of genius with sobriety, and to use them nobly and well, without seeking to expend them in the purchase of fame, or wealth, or of advancement, is a quality which modern society little cultivates, and seldom sees.

THE PAINS OF EXILE.

IS not the world beginning to under-estimate the suffering caused by compulsory exile, particularly to Continentals, who, for reasons we state below, suffer much more in banishment than Englishmen usually do? We think we detect traces of such a feeling, of a belief that banishment is, after all, a very endurable penalty, throughout the recent discussions on the French Proscription Bills; and it is quite natural, more especially in this country, that it should be so. The world, with its new facilities of communication, is rapidly growing smaller; countries are becoming more alike, the cultivated travel about everywhere, and so many people settle in foreign lands for years at a time, or for their lives, that banishment strikes the upper class as, after all, nothing very serious. If you may not live in France, you may in England; and where is the substantial difference? This feeling was repeatedly expressed in the French Chamber, one Deputy in particular laying it down as his opinion that exile involved suffering only for those who had to earn their living. They might suffer, of course; but the Orlean Princes, he said, had been enriched by the restoration of their fortunes, they would be wealthy nobles in England, and what could they want more? That idea is also current in this country, in spite of the horror with which laws of proscription are regarded, and is greatly increased by the accidental circumstance that for Englishmen, and for the lower classes especially, banishment has lost much of its terror. The Englishman, unless very well placed indeed, is habituated to think of life in America as an alternative and not unpleasant destiny; and banishment means to him little more than an emigration to another land tenanted by a kindly branch of his own race,—which is not without attractions for his mind. To the Englishman, banishment means residence in the United States, and he would as soon reside there as not. The conception that banishment is quite a tolerable penalty is growing, and as it is a dangerous one to take root in Europe just at the present time, when political passion is very keen, and when a notion of the convenience of ostracism as a political device is making way among classes which are rising rapidly to power, it may be worth while to inquire for a moment into its perfect accuracy.

We believe the idea to be substantially false, and this in spite of the fact that banishment inflicts much less direct suffering than of old. Formerly, the rich man who was exiled suffered from a sudden and enforced change of society, diet, and method of life, to such an extent as often permanently to affect his health, and produce a nostalgia indistinguishable from positive disease. He could not endure the foreign food, the foreign houses, the foreign people, and would risk anything or suffer anything to be back again "at home." Now, however, that the cosmopolitan class live so much alike, eating the same things, inhabiting the same houses, and taking the same precautions for health, direct suffering is reduced to a mere change of climate, not necessarily injurious. The Orleans Princes can be as comfortable in London as in Paris, in York House, Twickenham, as in the Château at Chantilly.

The professionals, again, who formerly always starved in banishment, living miserably in garrets at the Hague, or other free places, now find it easier to get a living; the world is before them, and they frequently prosper, till they have, considered merely as cultivated animals, nothing in their country to regret. They are well fed, warmly clothed, and, barring the climate, sufficiently well housed. It is not given to every one to prosper as the Financial Secretary of the Confederate States did in England; but other exiles can be named, both in England and America, who, pecuniarily, have nothing to regret. The poor, again, who formerly died in banishment of want, now go to America, English or Spanish, or to the great cities of Europe, and find employment in their own trades at rates quite as remunerative as at home. Indeed, a majority of them would probably benefit physically by exile, and find, like the Germans who fled in 1848, or who retreat even now before the rigid laws of conscription, that America offers them, if not a pleasanter home, at least a richer one than the Fatherland. The physical evils of exile have, in fact, been modified till they scarcely exist; but that is not the case with the mental evils. To the men likely to be exiled for political reasons, banishment means the loss of all things which make life sweet, except bodily comfort. Their mental interests are either snapped short, or have the savour taken out of them. They are like politicians condemned by ill-health to inaction, forced to change the rôle of actors who are forwarding the play, and are, therefore, not only interested in its success, but occupied by it, for that of mere spectators, weary with desire to be once more on the stage, and seeing in those who supersede them only imbeciles. Occupations may not cease, but the occupations which were chosen as by instinct, which made life delightful, and filled it with the pleasant sense of efficiency and use, are all closed; and the others taken up to diminish ennui are like gardening to a city man, or novel-reading to a man who has shared in "the triumph and the vanity, the rapture of the strife," of political debate. The Princes of Orleans, for example, may still in London be interested in French politics; but they cannot advance them, cannot even see them as quickly as of old, are like citizens driven into remote villages against their own consent, always conscious of being behind the time. They can have society at will, but it is not the society of those who are making history in the only country they care about, not, as it were, the society of the living; they can have conversation, but either they or their interlocutors must use a foreign tongue, and so lose half their spontaneity; they can engage in affairs, but the affairs are not their own. The mere fact that they cannot enter their own land is of itself a pain, aggravated by the truth, always patent to intelligent exiles, that every year of absence makes them more strangers; and that when they return, some powers, some kinds of knowledge, some habitudes of mind essential to their careers, will have been sadly, it may be fatally, diminished. They lose, while in exile, the use of their heaped-up treasure of experience, and feel while they stay away that they make no additions to it. Their careers are, in fact, ended before old age has set in. The loss of friends, too, is heartbreaking. Men cannot keep up friendships by correspondence, still less continue that founding of new friendships without which life is certain to become in its end so solitary. No man, however cosmopolitan, quite finds that foreigners replace to him his own countrymen, least of all Frenchmen, whose country has for them a charm like that of Rome for a patrician. The Roman noble under sentence of death had usually the alternative of exile, and often accepted the quick penalty, rather than the slow one. Life under such circumstances loses flavour, and in its insipidity is a penalty which often produces true tedium vitæ—that most exhausting of all forms of melancholy—and always something of that ennui which is the great burden of a long imprisonment. Exiles, it is noticed, hunger for occupations, as prisoners do, and not unfrequently prefer, like prisoners, those occupations which prevent thought, rather than compel the mind to apply thought to the full. The sentence of banishment, where it is felt at all, does not take away life; but it takes away most of its happiness, and that is a severe penalty, and is the heavier in proportion as the sufferer has in his own country made his life full, and active, and beneficial to all around him. Men can dream anywhere, but for those who do not dream, some reality in the objects of life, and fittingness of relation between them and their surroundings, are essential not only to happiness, but even to the maintenance of their powers. A large proportion of men who retire from business grow rapidly and perceptibly weaker, and banished men are business men condemned to perpetual inaction. The suffering differs in every individual case, but the best proof of its reality is the inability of the exile ever to do anything serious or great, unless it be to intrigue for his own return. Prisoners of war are not accounted happy men, nor are they; and exiles by compulsion are but prisoners of war, with a few material comforts and liberties, but also, to counterbalance them, with a bitter sense of oppression and disappointment. Every exiled man has had hopes, dreams, affections, often the solace of entire lives, all inextricably bound up with the native land, which, as Danton said, one does not carry away on the sole of one's shoe. You cannot carry away, for instance, that which to most men is part of their own identity, namely, your own precise place in the world, your own title to recognition or regard, or it may be deference. That place has been given to men by their history, and is as inextricably welded into the social system of their own country as any stone into a building. Without the building, its look, its use, its very meaning, are all entirely changed. Even Princes feel such a fate most painfully, and European Princes are of necessity, by connections, by pursuits, and by habits of mind, the most cosmopolitan of men, and should, therefore, feel exile the least.

DISLIKE.

CONSIDERING how large a part the impulses which divide human beings take in this imperfect world, it is somewhat surprising to reflect how small a space has been accorded to them, in those pages from which many persons derive their chief knowledge of character. Fiction, painting so largely the sympathies by which human beings are bound together, has taken but little account of those antipathies, equally real, which not only divide them, but also, it must be confessed, do to some extent tend by external pressure to unite more closely for a time those who are united already. However, we somewhat exaggerate the feeling we mean in calling it antipathy, and it is by no means easy to name it without exaggeration. Almost all synonyms for it are stamped with blame, so that it seems impossible to mention an incapacity for satisfactory intercourse with another person as a mere fact about one's relation to him, and not as some contribution to an estimate of his own character. The word which has least of such a suggestion is "distaste," and it is a significant fact that the sense from which we borrow the expression is the most idiosyncratic of all means of communication with the outer world. Speaking broadly, we may say that a disagreeable sound or colour is disagreeable to every one, while we have to inquire after our neighbours' tastes, before we know what flavours they would consider agreeable or disagreeable; everybody dislikes the screech of a slate-pencil, and nobody is surprised at another person's not sharing his own preference for a particular flavour. The contrast between the peculiar separateness of taste, and the common element in the other senses, so that many may gaze at once on the same picture, and crowds may listen to the same low note, while no two persons can taste the same morsel, has thus become a symbol of that individuality, that subjectivity in the region of personal feeling, which allows us to describe attraction or repulsion without implying judgment.

Miss Cobbe, in the useful expression introduced into one of her essays, "Heteropathy"—the opposite, that is, not the contrary, of sympathy—has bestowed on us the means of bringing forward and realising this moral neutrality of distaste. We are not necessarily influenced against the person who is distasteful to us, we are conscious merely of a heterogeneity of affection, a different response to the same excitement, which makes us mutually unintelligible. Where distaste becomes disapproval, indeed, it is a mixed feeling, and the only important instance which we can call to mind of an attempt to paint this "heteropathy," which in the world of experience is so common, Goethe's "Torquato Tasso," seems to us somewhat impaired by the amount of justification with which the impartial poet has provided the man of the world who finds himself out of sympathy with the man of genius. Tasso, we presume, is meant to be an exhibition of the weakness of the poetic temperament abandoned to itself, and there is no character the unreasonableness of which more jars on the taste of a sensible man, practised in affairs, and ready to adapt himself to almost any other character. And there is no feeling more jarring to an imaginative man, when he perceives it, than the tolerance which Antonio expresses when he tries to be just. "Yet often with respect he speaks of thee," says Leonora Sanvitale, when she is trying to soothe Tasso's irritation; and most of us can sympathise with his answer,—

"'Tis even that disturbs me, for his art
Is so to measure out his careful words
That seeming praise from him is actual blame."

The words convey an admirable suggestion of the withering effect of distaste drying up all that aims at being appreciative, and leaving nothing so distinct as the effort it costs the speaker to find any excellence in the object of his praise. The relation, perhaps, was the model of Miss Yonge, in her pretty creation, "The Heir of Redclyffe;" but she seems to us to have inverted the mistake of Goethe (if we may be so profane as to find mistake in Goethe), and to have spoilt the situation by painting the person who inspires dislike as too faultless. Dislike, under such circumstances, becomes envy,—a feeling quite different from heteropathy. There is, in an unfinished romance by Hawthorne (not the one just published), a delicate little touch, exactly realising this feeling, in the description of the two persons intended in the first sketch of the story for lovers, bringing out, with all the author's subtle power, that sense of sudden recoil which sometimes strangely interrupts even a mutual affection not founded on a true harmony of character, and which is felt most distinctly just after the moments of closest union, just as the most intolerable discord is nearest to unison. The relation was found unmanageable, and drops out of the story, much to the disappointment of at least one reader, to whom it appeared a promise of a most characteristic display of Hawthorne's peculiar genius. But it is almost unfair to bring the half-obliterated sketch for an unfinished romance into the same page with one of the best known works of Goethe, even under the exigencies of a search for specimens of the rarest kind of dramatic delineation.

The relation which Hawthorne found too delicate to paint may well, indeed, have been avoided by the artist. Perhaps it is not one very well suited to dramatic elaboration,—at least, the feelings with which it is often associated are much more dramatic than itself, and tend to throw it into the shade. Envy, jealousy, and resentment are broad, simple emotions, easily described; distaste, no doubt, opens the way for them, but is perfectly distinct from them, and does not, in a liberal and cultivated mind, imply even any sense of condemnation. "Tis, I am barbarous here, my tongue unknown," was the complaint of a polished Roman, made to realise the true meaning of the word "Barbarian;" and perhaps Ovid may have learnt in his exile to appreciate the arrogant spirit with which the Roman applied it to all the world but his countrymen. Any one can feel, when he is himself the barbarian, that unintelligibility supplies no material for judgment; but it takes qualities of a high order to perceive this, when the case is reversed. Yet it is a familiar experience that distaste may appear unreasonable, even to him who feels it. The very associations which cluster round the epithet "well-meaning," testify to the familiarity of the struggle between distaste and an acknowledgment of qualities that should ensure respect; and probably many selfish and indolent persons arouse far less sense of heteropathy than a large proportion of the enthusiastic and the benevolent. Most people have felt at some time or other what was expressed by the dying man who, when told that he was going where the wicked would cease from troubling, responded, earnestly, "And the good, too, I hope!" For our own part, we have sometimes thought that if the good would cease from troubling, we would gladly take our chance of the wicked. Even the hero may inspire the feeling, as well as the saint. The faults of a large, impressive character are often peculiarly galling to those who stand very close to it; and when the biographer has said all he has to say, we sometimes discover, if we learn more about his subject, that the relation assumed as one of grateful subordination was, in reality, that of a continuous protest. We are very apt to be unjust to those who find a large character distasteful, in assuming their blindness to its nobility. If we suppose that distaste never enters a relation till love quits it, we shall fail to appreciate many of the most faithful and dutiful relations by which human beings are bound together. Distaste is no mere growth of the acquaintance world, where we have nothing to do but to yield to it; it shows itself in many a faithful friendship, it springs up on the fertile soil of family affection, it is by no means a stranger even to the sacred enclosure of marriage. No other atmosphere, indeed, is so propitious to it as that cooling affection which often both joins and separates many a pair who never cease to love each other. Gratitude for life-long services does not exclude it, nor do the services which have earned that gratitude; it may mingle with self-sacrificing devotion, even with strong admiration. There is almost no feeling by which man is bound to man which it may not dilute; and he who should refuse to continue any friendship or affection which involved a struggle with it would find himself, at some time or other, almost alone.

No one will deny that the experience of feeling or inspiring distaste is common, but many will consider that we do not want it made more definite by description. To put it into words gives it a permanence which it might lack, if left in the vague region of feeling; and whoever gives as much expression to it as to the opposite feeling, not only exaggerates it in appearance, but greatly increases it in fact. Moreover, the expression certainly tends, to some extent, to justify the feeling. The discovery that in proportion as any one gives utterance to those feelings and opinions which are most characteristic he hurts some sense of fitness in his company, strangely bars the entrance on common ground, even when this is close at hand. And then, too, dislike, with all that it implies, is not pathetic, or striking, or tragic, it is only disagreeable; and why, it may be asked, should Art mirror the part of life that is only disagreeable? We should misrepresent some of those we loved best, if we were to recall even with the most careful accuracy how little they loved each other, and a late famous example surely forms the strongest argument for the rule that no biographer should attempt to leave a record of the distastes of his hero. It is indeed impossible to give the feeling the same proportion in the record that it had in life. The gamut of expression has not that compass which such an utterance demands. The faintest and gentlest hint at any lack of sympathy has a force and distinctness that eulogium is wholly without. It always suggests a good deal behind.

We heartily agree to the rule that any record of actual life should give as small a place as possible to Distaste. But it is precisely the fact that biography cannot give distaste its due proportion, and should not therefore make any attempt at embodying it, while yet it is an important part of actual experience, which makes us desire to see it represented in the only kind of literature where all that is meant can be expressed. A good picture of a difficult situation gathers up a large part of whatever advice might be given for dealing with it, and it is often the only form in which such advice is possible. It makes an era in the hidden autobiography which we peruse in silent hours, when some voice from a larger nature has recalled and retouched—thereby wonderfully diminishing them—our own perplexities; and a large part of the charm of fiction consists in the fact that this is often the only possible channel of such a confidence. The rare glimpses which we attain of the attitude of a large, richly-endowed nature, conscious of distaste returned where friendship was sought, is such a lesson of tolerance and magnanimity as no sermon could convey. Once or twice in a lifetime we may come upon a glimpse of such a state of mind, perhaps as we decipher the faded characters from a hand that has long been still, for oftenest all that makes the relation intelligible is only visible afar off. Or a few words at some crisis of life and death, reveal that what looked like blindness to dislike was a self-suppressing oblivion of it. But for the most part, the more completely vanity or sensitiveness is conquered in meeting such a feeling, the more the victory is hidden, and we rarely learn from any experience of actual life what would afford the greatest help in some of its difficulties,—how a noble mind meets distaste.

The best substitute for such aid, though it be a poor one, is to remind ourselves that the region of distaste is, after all, confined to a narrow part of our whole being. The world of our animal nature is one of resemblance; and so is that of our spiritual nature, if we can but reach it. We are similarly affected, on the whole, by all things outward. We all dread pain, hunger, weariness, while food, rest, warmth, and the like, in different proportions, are desirable to all. And there is a region of the inward life which is as characteristic of humanity as is the outward life, though it is far less accessible, and much more liable to be confused with heterogeneous elements. But between the region of the physical life and that of the spiritual life lies that borderland of idiosyncrasy—that which we specially mean when we speak of a person's nature—which is the region of heteropathy. On this domain we are often as hopelessly at a loss for any practical expression of goodwill as we should be, if suddenly transported to a planet where fatigue was cured by active exercise, and hunger by fasting, so that to offer a tired person an easy-chair, or provide food for one who declared himself faint with hunger should be a malignant action. If a humorous view of the situation is to you a potent auxiliary in enduring its difficulties, while to me it adds insult to injury, your benevolent attempt to lighten some common vexation by putting it in a ludicrous point of view will only make me feel it more bitterly. If, in a common loss, you are striving to forget our friend, and I to remember him, the very fact that we both loved him will make us bad company to each other. How many such miscalculations we see, feel, or make, in our endeavours to console each other! "Time softens every grief," we say, to one who feels it the supreme agony that the beloved image must fade. Or we try to soothe some proud heart, racked with the thought of compassion, by the assurance that others feel for its pangs! Under such "heteropathy," all affection, all active good-will, becomes an engine of torment. The victim flies to indifference, as a welcome exchange for such benevolence, and feels the atmosphere of slight acquaintance a delightful variety, after that intimacy which has given his friend a right to inflict an amount of suffering that would have satisfied the heart of an enemy. The golden rule, in such circumstances, becomes useless. To do unto others as we would they should do unto us, is to sharpen their discomfort in our neighbourhood, unless, indeed, all we desire from them is their absence; and distaste, when it is sufficiently important to attract attention, is rarely capable of so simple a solution. For it is sometimes woven in with the web of life's duties, and even of its cherished possessions. Surely, in such circumstances, it should be a great help towards justice, both to those we dislike, and towards those who dislike us, to realise that this kind of antagonism is confined to a certain limited portion of our being; and that if we could carry on our intercourse within either that simpler world of the senses where men want all the same thing, or that deeper world of moral conviction where they all reverence the same thing, we should find distaste suddenly vanish; and though, practically, this is impossible, the fact that it is not inconceivable is by no means an unimportant one.

This sense of some possible fugitiveness or error in the feeling of Distaste should be materially reinforced by the discovery that it is by no means invariably mutual, and by what is another side of the same truth, that it sometimes lies very near to perfect sympathy. It may be excited by those who, just because they are unlike us, are best able to help us. Leonora says of Tasso and Antonio,—

"Two foes are there who should be closest friends,
For nature formed in each but half a man,
And in their union were the perfect whole."

And though in such cases the need be mutual, the perception of that need is often not so. We often understand the language that we cannot speak, and so mysterious is the chemistry of human relation, that the same difference which on one side tells as a repulsive strangeness, is on the other welcomed as a delightful variety. It is but the change of a couple of letters which converts the hostis to the hospes, and it is a change almost as trifling—a mere shifting of spiritual attitude—which shows us the spiritual foreigner as friend or foe. We sometimes see this change curiously brought out in the feelings of the same person towards different members of the same family. You meet the son of your old friend, you recognise in almost every word some trace of the companion whose presence made life delightful to you. Perhaps in your sober judgment you would acknowledge that the son is, on the whole, worthy of his father. But you discover that some slight change of proportion, or some almost imperceptible introduction of a new element, is enough to destroy all spiritual affinity. There is nothing more disagreeable than to dislike one who reminds us of those we have loved; but the experience is full of instruction. Or again, we may realise the marvellous effect of this change of proportion in the nearness of heteropathy itself to sympathy. The first experience of an entire mutual understanding is the best thing in life, and many a one has felt that it was also the first experience of self-knowledge. For we completely understand ourselves only when we find an interpreter in another soul; and there can be no revelation of the self, except by one who resembles the being he reveals. It is as true of the things of Earth as of Heaven, that we must be like any one, if "we shall see him as he is." But how slight a change here brings us from the closest union to something that almost resembles hatred! The society of one who mirrored all the weaknesses and difficulties of our own character, would be quite as intolerable as the society of one who understood neither our weakness nor our strength. "There are but three fingers' space," says the Talmud, "between Heaven and Hell." It is a profound sentence, and its truth is nowhere more evident than in the varied and mysterious world of human relation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

LOCAL RATING AND TENANT-RIGHT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Knowing the influence which the opinions of the Spectator exercise upon the minds of politicians, especially Liberal ones, will you allow me to state the views of the Farmers' Alliance upon the above two subjects, which you treated of last week? From the outset, we have distinctly recognised the doctrine that the rates of a farm fall ultimately upon the owner. Great efforts have been made by the Alliance to educate farmers upon this ratal question, and the following old couplet was resuscitated with this object:—

"The higher the rates, the lower the rent;
The lower the rates, the higher the rent."

Rates, however, are not a fixed quantity; for instance, the highway rate and the education rate have considerably added to the rates levied upon many farms. Although ratal is mainly and in the long-run an owner's question, landlords would very naturally object to pay the whole amount of the burden, seeing that tenants exercise greater power than themselves over the expenditure of rates. It may be argued that as rates increase or decrease, there should be a readjustment of rent; but those who understand farming affairs know that such an arrangement would be troublesome and distasteful to both parties, hence the Alliance has contended that a division of rates between owner and occupier is the most practical as well as the most just arrangement; its advocates have, moreover, the advantage of being able to point to the fact that in Scotland the plan has long been in force, and that it works satisfactorily. When, therefore, you assert of this proposal that "though very dear to the farmer, it is a cry for the moon," I am compelled to conclude that you have not looked very narrowly into the arguments we have put forth.

With reference to our demands for tenant-right, I would observe that they are grounded entirely upon public policy. A great part of the land of the country has never been highly farmed, and in the opinion of the Alliance never will be, until the whole interests of tenants in their holdings are secured to them. In the past, a tenant's interests in his holding have been liable to confiscation in two ways:—(1.) Withholding compensation to an outgoing tenant for the capital he has put into or upon the soil, and which is not removable. (2.) Raising the rent after a tenant has increased the fertility, or value of the holding, styled "a revaluation." The latter has been a far more common mode of procedure than the former, and has, moreover, exercised a far more deterrent influence upon the enterprise of tenants. The Farmers' Alliance has maintained that if it is necessary, in the interests of the public, to secure outgoing tenants against injustice, there is even greater necessity to secure that much larger class who desire to remain upon their farms, after they have effected the improvements they deemed necessary for its profitable occupation; and on this point all that is demanded is that a tenant who has improved his holding shall have a power of appeal to an impartial tribunal against an arbitrary rise of rent upon his own improvements,—nothing, be it remarked, is demanded for the bad or the unimproving farmer. With respect to freedom of contract, I would simply remark that if the question of tenant-right is to be argued on these lines, and the doctrine is to be upheld, there is no need to trouble the Legislature; but surely the day has gone by for taking a stand upon this ground, the experience of the Agricultural Holdings Act, the Report of the Royal Commission, and the opinions of statesmen formerly opposed to compulsory legislation, are conclusive on the point. I started by asserting that the demands of the Farmers' Alliance are grounded upon public policy alone. The right of the State to put limitations upon freedom of contract in cases where the welfare of the community will be thereby subserved is too generally accepted to need enforcing, and herein lies the difference between the case you draw of "a new bath-room" and the improvement of the land; the general public have no interest in the multiplication of bath-rooms, nor in the question whether tenants who add these conveniences to the houses they occupy are, upon quitting, compensated or not. But the public have a very direct interest in any legislation which would tend to the fuller development of the resources of the soil; and if a well-considered system of tenant-right is calculated to effect this object, as unquestionably in time it would, then the State is justified in adopting the most efficient system for the purpose, and this notwithstanding that it may control the freedom of both landlord and tenant, especially if the just rights of the owner are not invaded.

I refrain from going into the question that property in land differs in other respects from that in houses, further than to point out that houses may be increased almost indefinitely to meet the requirements of the community, whilst land is both a fixed and an ascertained quantity.

In conclusion, I would observe that the farmer at the Alliance meeting whom you quote, and who said that "freedom of contract meant, 'Take the land on the landlord's conditions, or leave it,'" is, even at the present time, far nearer the truth, in respect of farms worth occupying, than you appear to imagine; and if it were not true so far as the present depressed times are concerned, I would simply remark that laws are not made for abnormal periods.—I am, Sir, &c.,

JAMES HOWARD.

Clapham Park, Bedfordshire, February 12th.

CONSECRATED GROUND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me to express in your columns my sense of the courteous kindness of your correspondent, "Episcopus," and my thankfulness that the more we get beneath the surface of the question in controversy, the more we find ourselves at one? Must it not always be so, if we simply seek to know and to do the truth? This is the true unity, of which all acts and deeds of Uniformity are counterfeit presentments, mocking by their false promise yearning hearts.—I am, Sir, &c.,

J. BALDWIN BROWN.

THE PROMOTION OF LIBERAL CLERGY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The Church appointments of Mr. Gladstone have been so admirable, that one is very reluctant to find fault, but you have undoubtedly hit a blot in pointing out that the Liberal Clergy are, as a rule, passed over. When you consider that nearly all the Broad-Church school and most of the younger members of the High, including such well-known names as Messrs. Headlam, Horsley, Stanton, and Shuttleworth, are Liberals, and that even in the Low-Church party, Messrs. Bickersteth, Cadman, Calthrop, and D. Moore are also on the popular side, it seems that there is little reason for giving the Tories all the great positions. All the men I have mentioned are able and zealous workers, and one, Mr. Calthrop, had the courage (in a minority of one among the clergy of Islington) to support the Irish-Church measure of Mr. Gladstone.

I am an earnest supporter of the English Church Union, but, for all that, should like to see some of the moderate Evangelicals, like Mr. Cadman, promoted; it would not do, perhaps, in the present crisis, to make any of them Bishops, but a few Deaneries and Canonries given to the (not many) able and scholarly members of the school would benefit the Church as a whole, and help to raise the tone of a still important party.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GEORGE PLANK.

252 Crystal Palace Road, Dulwich, February 12th.

A STRANGE SURVIVAL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The letter from Dr. Littledale in your last issue contains one statement against which it is surely the duty of every English Churchman to protest. He says, "It is the fact that the State alone appoints to the Episcopate." Now, considering that the source of selection in the nomination of a Bishop is the Crown, and that it is the Crown which directs the flow of the appointment until its confirmation, we may be allowed to hold that there is direct spiritual authority given by this means.

If there be one thing upon which the Church in these days should lay stress, it is that there is in the anointing of the Sovereign at the time of coronation a sacred setting-apart of the Ruler. The value and intention of this unction are well explained in the Collect used in the "Form of Prayer for the Twentieth of June," instead of the ordinary Collect for the Queen in the Holy Communion Service. The adviser of the Sovereign in regard to the nomination to a Bishopric may be a Minister of the State, but the Ruler appoints, as anointed Governor of the Church in this realm.

The vein of general distrust of Episcopal appointment running through Dr. Littledale's letter, coming from one to whom we younger clergy are wont to look for advice, has a depressing effect. But some of us may think we have a right to ask him not merely to tell us of objections to the present system of nomination, but to add some information as to what past method he would revert to. We read our Church history only to find that whilst the succession has been retained through the act of consecration, the manner of appointment has been varying from age to age. We have, first, Apostles nominating to an office neither positively named nor quite accurately defined, we have cases in which one Bishop has suggested a candidate for a vacant see, we have cases in which Court influence is the main cause leading to an appointment, we have eventually Sovereigns dispensing bishoprics. With the exception of the first method, can any of these named be preferred to that existing in our national Church? Is it wise, when those outside the fold are sneering at Episcopal authority, for trusted friends within to minimise its value?—I am, Sir, &c., Swancombe, Kent.

H. R. WAKEFIELD.

[We publish our correspondent's letter with great pleasure. It is a most curious illustration of the truth that ideas, true or false, never die.—Ed. Spectator.]

"METHRATTON."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You will, perhaps, allow me to confirm what was said in your article under the above heading regarding the survival in our midst of much superstition. I am at present correcting the sheets of a small book shortly to be published by the Folk-lore Society, under the title of "Folk-Medicine," and while engaged in collecting and approximately classifying various charms relative to the prevention or cure of disease, I have come across not one, but very many instances of superstition, which still exercise great influence upon the life and thought of the people. It is certainly true, as you say, that although true education kills magic, "what is called education" does not. How otherwise are we to account for such an evidently modern superstition as this,—that it is unlucky to keep black-edged note-paper in a house. The writer of your paper testifies to positive faith among fairly educated persons still existing in astrology, fortune-telling, and palmistry, and I can add to this that I know a man of very considerable means who makes no secret of his carrying an exceedingly primitive amulet against rheumatism; that I heard from a farmer, whose politics are of the most advanced description, of a recent case of witchery in Lanarkshire; and that charming for toothache and the mysterious tooth-"worm" is scarcely yet an extinct business. When we regard the widely varying civilisation in our islands, viz., in London and in the caves of Wick Bay, how can we wonder at the difference of thought and reasoning which exist together? The latter is, in my opinion, less wonderful than the former.—I am, Sir, &c., 1 Alfred Terrace, Glasgow.

WILLIAM GEORGE BLACK.

A R T.

MACBETH AND GREGORY.

THE news of the last Academy election has taken every one by surprise, and those are most astonished who are best acquainted with the ordinary Academy elections. That either Mr. Macbeth or Mr. Gregory should have been introduced into the Academic ranks would have been startling enough, but that both artists should be elected Associates at the same time is simply wonderful. The new leaven is working with a vengeance beneath the roof of Burlington House, and the Council of the Academy will probably, in a few years' time, have recognised the existence of the art of etching, and no longer confine their representation of the art of water-colour painting to the one small room through which the wearied visitor passes at the end of his sight-seeing.

But it is of Messrs. Gregory and Macbeth that we desire to speak. And first, let us state why we find the election so unexpected. The truth is, that neither of these artists has been supposed to be held in high estimation at Burlington House. Mr. Macbeth exhibited there with considerable regularity, but he was rarely, if ever, well hung; and his work received but little general attention, for that reason. At the Grosvenor Gallery, where his pictures could be fairly seen, he was better appreciated, but even here his painting was scarcely popular, and appealed to a comparatively small section of the public.

Mr. Gregory was, practically, unknown on the walls of Burlington House, and he has, if we remember right, only twice exhibited there; and, as our readers are no doubt aware, it is the practice for the Academicians to elect as members of their body chiefly those who have for years sent to their exhibition. But it is not only because Messrs. Macbeth and Gregory are little known at the Academy that their friends feel so surprised at their election, and whilst they rejoice at the fact, can hardly believe in its reality; it is because their work is so totally opposed in its technique and its conception to what is generally considered Academic. Both are innovators of a singularly bold and daring character, and both are by no means likely to grow into accordance with the traditions of the Schools, as exemplified by the works of those Academicians by which their pictures will now be surrounded. One cannot help wondering with a half-cynical pleasure what Mr. Frith and Mr. Horsley, Mr. Armitage and Mr. Thorburn, Mr. Cope and Mr. Wells, will think of their new compatriots; and how grievous it will be to many another worthy Academician, who has been "nothing, if not respectable," to find his works side by side with those of these Bohemians of the brush, who make up in power and originality what they lack in refinement.

For us, who have been praising Mr. Macbeth and Mr. Gregory for half-a-dozen years, the election is, of course, a pleasant surprise; but to many of the older Academicians it must be a very sore trial, and in some ways, we confess that they have reason on their side. The work of both these artists lacks refinement of feeling; is, in different ways, frequently coarse and hurried in execution; it disdains what is understood by the word "painting"—at all events, in its more usually-accepted meaning—and is accompanied by a bizarrerie difficult to describe, but resulting partly from temperament and partly from the education of the painter. Both have done a good deal of work in black and white, and Mr. Gregory was first introduced to the public through the medium of the Graphic newspaper. Mr. William Thomas, the editor of that paper, may be said to have discovered Herkomer and Gregory, and much of the latter's finest work was done in the Graphic, before his pictures became at all known to the general public. Mr. Macbeth is at least as well known as an especially skilful etcher as an original painter, and it was only last week that we had occasion to notice his reproduction of George Mason's "Harvest Moon."

A few words on the chief characteristics of these two latest recruits to the Academy may be interesting. Let us take first Mr. Macbeth, the only artist alive who can be said in some ways to inherit the mantle of the late Fred Walker. The relation between them is, however, at best, as equally noticeable for difference as for likeness. Both are idyllists,—we use the word in its plainest sense, to signify the tellers of plain, simple stories. But Walker is probably the gentlest story-teller that ever lived; his sense of beauty, his sense of pathos, and his sense of transitoriness, all linking together to produce pictures which are occasionally tragic or intense in their feeling, but are never rough, coarse, or slovenly. Mr. Macbeth is sometimes all three,—is deficient in gentleness, if we may use such a word. He paints a man, and paints him well. He paints a woman of the people, and gives her a great deal of strength and a curious sense of freedom and life; but when he takes types in which coarseness is out of place, he fails, as Dickens failed, though in a different way. Mr. Macbeth's young ladies belong either to the Stage or the Tottenham-Court Road; the artist does not touch them delicately enough, and has apparently but little sympathy with them. But his peasant women and men are of a different mould, and in the painting of these he has no rival. Such pictures as "The Lincolnshire Gang," "The Rush-cutting in the Fens," "The Potato Harvest," "The Coming from St. Ives Market," and the "Flood in the Fens," have all the truth and beauty of Nature, and are, perhaps, the best statements of English rustic life which have ever been made pictorial. That they are quite true, we do not assert; there is more dignity of form and grace of action than we are likely to meet with in any one scene, but they are essentially true; and Mr. Macbeth's peasants interest us greatly, from the fact that he does not obscure their peasant origin,—does not dress them in fancy costumes, or endow them with suburban graces, but sets them down, thick-waisted and thick-angled, with faces tanned by sun and roughened by breeze, and not too much emotion or thought in their healthy faces. The painting of English life is his best vocation. As we have said, his Society young ladies and gentlemen are either feeble, unreal, or affected; he has no sympathy with the restraints and no feeling for the subtleties of the social world, and when he paints it, his powers disappear. For the rest, he is a workman who suffers from a too great facility of production, or rather of execution. What he can do in painting, he can, so to speak, "do at once;" and in his pictures this results sometimes in a sort of insolence of workmanship, approaching perilously near to coarseness. His work, too, is occasionally spoilt by a deficiency of interest, a lack of concentration, for he is somewhat incapable of giving individual interest to the actors in his pictures; they are too frequently like a group of people on the stage, waiting for the entrance of the "star" actor. He is an idyllist, in fact, who does not care to tell a story, paradoxical as such an assertion may seem. About the best of his pictures, there is the charm of a vigorous, healthy manhood, a little violent in its prejudices, a little limited in its sympathies, and a little headstrong in its assertions, but full of genuine life and genuine feeling. As an artist, he has many admirable qualities. His draughtsmanship is not subtle, but effective, and, in the main, correct; and his sense of colour, though varying greatly, is occasionally fine, and never sinks below a high average of merit. No one paints certain phases of rain and sunshine with greater truth, and no one of our English painters can impart a greater sense of movement to the action of his figures. He will, at all events, bring fresh air and life into the Academy, and keep alive there the tradition, already nearly extinct, of his predecessor, Fred Walker.

Mr. Gregory is an artist of a very different stamp—a stamp that we hardly know how to describe both shortly and fairly—for he has little in common with any one but himself, and, perhaps, some of the wilder spirits of the French school. He has all the elements of genius, without its fusing power. His work is often splendid,—never right. The last words that could be applied to him, artistically speaking, are, "Mens sana, in corpore sano." This was evident from the first in his work, and is evident still, though not so obtrusively as of old. There is certainly an affinity in some ways between him and Macbeth, but many more dissimilarities. Mr. Macbeth has in reality, though he would probably deny it, some artistic morality, some gospel of nature and man which his pictures preach. Mr. Gregory has neither one nor the other. He does not care what he paints,—he does not care how he paints it. Instead of the stalwart rustics of his fellow Associate, he leans towards a certain long, weedy, worn-out type of citizen,—a cross between a dyspeptic diplomat and a "Criterion" waiter. Instead of wind and sunshine, he prefers close rooms and gaslight; the carpet is his native heath; the mantel-piece his favourite resting-place, and a hot-house azalea his substitute for a daisy. The other day, we spoke of George Mason's work, and said it had no flavour of the boulevard or the casino. Well, this work has a flavour of both. It smells of the streets and the gas-lamps half a mile off. But its power is absolutely undeniable, and if it does not obscure its faults, at least atones for them. The pictures are concentrated to an extraordinary degree, they are as compressed as "Grandcourt's" thoughts, and somewhat after the same fashion,—daring, reckless, and as powerful in conception as in execution, crammed with artistic dexterity, which is used apparently chiefly to show how much better this artist could paint if he took the trouble, and full of a complete disregard of all ordinary methods of treatment, and all consideration for the prejudices of those who behold them. These works strike us as being at once the most remarkable, and in some ways the most disappointing pictures we have ever seen. The coarse strength of the drawing and the dirty splendour of the colouring are quite in accordance with the mental aspect of the work, and Mr. Gregory, who might do almost anything he liked on the tragic side of Art, appears to us to find his chief pleasure in feeling that even when he paints as recklessly as he can, and takes the first subject that comes to his hand, we are still bound to admire his work. And admire it we must, from one point of view, for it is the work of a genuine and most capable artist, though of one who is needlessly wasting his powers. As we have been amongst the number of those who have omitted no opportunity of calling attention to the many remarkable qualities of this painter during the last half-dozen years, he will, perhaps, pardon us for hoping that, now he is elected an Associate, he will give us work which is really worthy of his ability. We have many a painfully industrious, hopeless artist, and many a successful painter who is not an artist at all; but we cannot afford to waste, or allow its owner to waste, such power as Mr. Gregory possesses. If he wants the dark side of life, let him give us London,—the life of street and square and river, of refuge, of workhouse and prison, which has never yet been painted, but which should have a meaning for Englishmen as great as its motives are human, and its incidents are true.

BOOKS.

MYTHS OF HELLAS.*

WE expect that thousands of young readers will welcome this new presentment of the beautiful legends of Greece. Told simply, without any arrière pensée of a purpose, ethical or scientific (for surely the solar myth is as vexatious as what Mr. Arthur Sidgwick in his excellent introduction calls the "medicinal flavour of a moral"), they are sure to please this generation, as they have pleased many generations before. The Lemprière which some of us knew in our youth was not scientific, and, we fear, not edifying, but it was certainly entertaining. Here we have again the entertainment, freed from the objectionable element.

His subject-matter Professor Witt has collected from a variety of sources, making his choice with a judgment and taste with which very little fault can be found. We could wish, perhaps, that he had not included among his stories the horrible legend of Œdipus. This legend belongs to another region of Greek thought than that in which the myths properly so called grew up. The sense of an overpowering doom, not called forth, indeed, by human pride, but tragically contrasting with it, was essentially a religious feeling, the result of a profounder observation of the problems of life; and, we may conjecture, late in growth. However this may be, its gloom fits it for the drama rather than for the lighter narrative of romantic adventure. We may remark that, as the story is told here, it wants what may be called the motive of its dénouement, the plague that overtook the land of the Thebans, and set their king on inquiring what might be the hidden evil that was sapping the foundation of his prosperity.

The author's treatment of his subject is judicious and effective. He has found it sufficient, for the most part, to let the stories, so to speak, tell themselves, and to limit his own share to choosing the details and incidents that were most suitable for his purpose. Sometimes he adds a picturesque touch. Here is the picture of Theseus and his fellow-prisoners in the Labyrinth of Crete:—

"About mid-day they heard the monster bellowing in the distance. He was still some way from them, but he scented human blood, and as he came nearer, his bellowing grew louder and louder. The others crowded together in a corner, each wanting to be the last to meet him; but Theseus stood forward in the middle of the room, with his naked sword raised, waiting for his approach."

It is natural to wish that a hero so thoroughly sans peur should be also sans reproche. Accordingly, we find that Theseus leaves the beautiful and loving Ariadne in Naxos, not from fickleness of mind, but because Dionysus had warned him in a dream that he desired to have the maiden for his own wife. The tragic story of Medea, too, is softened in some of its details. Glauce, her rival in Jason's love, perishes, indeed, (did the poisoned robe, by the way, "burst out into flames," or—surely, a more terrible idea—cling to the flesh, and devour it with a secret heat?) but her old father is not involved in her doom, as he is in the famous play; while the great enchantress relents at the last, and carries off her children, instead of slaying them.

Now and then, we feel inclined to wish that a story had been given in more detail. There is nothing that boys at least—of girls, we do not venture to speak—more enjoy reading about than a good stand-up fight. An opportunity of delighting them is missed when the writer comes to the boxing match between Pollux and Bebrycus. Both Theocritus and Apollonius Rhodius tell it at length, and make of it a very picturesque scene.

Of the style in which these stories are told, there is little to be said. We are not acquainted with Professor Witt's original, but Miss Younghusband's English deserves the praise of being simple, straightforward, and easily intelligible. It is wanting, perhaps, here and there in dignity (such a phrase, for instance, as "the King was horrified," jars a little upon the ear); but it is possible that the dignity could not easily have been added without some sacrifice of plainness of meaning. It is an open question whether this tinge of archaism which it seems natural to give to writing of the kind is not suited for older readers, rather than for those whose needs should be first consulted, the young. Here is a specimen, from "The Quest of the Argonauts:—"

"After rowing for a long time, the heroes came to the land of Crete. They would have liked to go on shore, but there was an iron watchman, who refused to allow any one to land without the King's express permission. His name was Talos, and he had been made out of iron by the blacksmith-god Hephaestus, who gave him to Minos, the King of Crete. Minos used him as a watchman, and made him run round the whole island three times every day, and drive away any stranger who might approach it. He was all iron, excepting a single vein that ran from his head right down to his feet, and was fastened underneath with iron nails, which held in the life-blood that ran through the vein and kept him alive. When Talos saw the ship full of heroes coming, he stood still and threw great stones at her. It would have been of no use for the Argonauts to shoot spears and arrows at him in return, for he could not be wounded; so Medea called out to him over the water, 'Talos, if you will be kind to us and let us land, I will show you how you may become immortal.' Talos was pleased at this, and he began to make friendly grimaces, and shouted back his answer in a voice that came out of his iron body like the sound of a great trumpet. He said, 'First, tell me how I may become immortal, and then I will let you land.' But Medea answered him deceitfully, and she called back, 'Draw out the nail that is in your foot, and all that is mortal in you will flow out.' Talos believed her, and he sat down on the shore and drew out the nail with some difficulty, for it had been well hammered in. Then the red blood flowed out, and Talos was glad, for he thought it was his mortality which was leaving him; but he became weaker and weaker, and when the last drop of blood had flowed out of his body, he was dead, and there was nothing left but a cold lump of iron."

ANNIE KEARY.*

THE first thing needful to be said of this touching and beautiful memoir, which has been written by the person best qualified to write it, is that it stands in need of no apology, but justifies by its existence its right to exist. We have never been able to see why biography should concern itself mainly with people of noteworthy achievement, or to feel the justice of the remark, so often made, that the performances of such or such a person have not been sufficiently remarkable to make his life an object of interest to the world. It would, indeed, be far from difficult to defend the seeming paradox that those whom we call distinguished people are the least fitted to be chosen as subjects for biography. The politician's enactments and the soldier's victories belong to history, the painter's pictures and the poet's verses provide material for criticism; but, as a man, the politician or the soldier, the painter or the poet, may not be more interesting than his fellows; and it is far from improbable that the amount of force expended in "work" which is before the public has left the private remainder of his life somewhat impoverished. Carlyle, in a well-known sentence, attributes the charm of biography to the fact that "all men are, to an unspeakable degree, brothers;" and it can hardly be denied that the sense of brotherhood is appealed to most strongly by lives which, in virtue of their simple humanness, touch our own lives oftener and more keenly than they can possibly be touched by the records of those who have been called from the crowded highway to the solitary mountain path.

Annie Keary's was one of these highway pilgrimages, and this simple history of her uneventful progress through the dusty lanes of life seems while we read it to make the very same lanes less dusty for us who follow, the familiar hedge-rows greener and sweeter than we have been wont to think them, the blue of heaven intenser and its grey tenderer than they have ever seemed before, the whole journey a more solemn, and yet a gladder and a sweeter thing. As we close the volume, the life spreads itself before us, like a picture such as William Blake

* Myths of Hellas, or Greek Tales. Told in German, by Professor O. Witt. Translated into English, by Frances Younghusband. London: Longmans, 1883.

* Memoir of Annie Keary. By her Sister. London: Macmillan and Co.

might have painted,—the picture of a little procession, with the angels of Faith, and Hope, and Love leading the way for Annie Keary who, holds by one hand a tiny child and by the other one of the little servant maidens of the Bessborough Home, and is followed by a crowd of friends, whose hopes, and fears, and joys, and sorrows are all her own. Readers of her pleasant novels, and of her delightful stories for the children whom she loved, find them full of tender touches and gleams of happy insight, which they would not willingly let slip from grateful recollection; but those who knew her in life, or who learn to know her from these pages, will think of her not as the author of Janel's Home and A Doubting Heart, but as the "Aunt Annie" of so many nurseries, the "Sister Keary," who brought a flush of welcome to pale little faces in the East-end Children's Hospital, the woman whose heart was rich enough to meet every claim, not of love only, but of need.

No one who knows anything of, or cares anything for, the inner life of little children, will think that Miss Eliza Keary has made a mistake in devoting so many pages to the exquisite sketch of Annie Keary's childhood. Since Mrs. Gaskell told the story of the four marvellous children who wrote romances and talked high-Tory politics in the lonely Haworth parsonage, we know of no more realizable picture of those fascinating chambers of imagery in which the imaginative child lives so much of his life than that which is painted for us here. The surroundings were indeed different, the solitary moorland Yorkshire parsonage had little in common with that other parsonage in the crowded Yorkshire street; but a child's fancy can deal as potently with unpromising material as the fairy godmother with the pumpkin which served for Cinderella's state-carriage, and even in Hull the little Annie created a fairy-land, a perfect region of romance. It was she who called out of the realm of nothingness into the nursery myth-kingdom that mysterious fairy-potentate, Mrs. Calkill, who since those days has been the delight of innumerable little ones; it was she who set on foot the conversational stories of which the heroes were Alcibiades, and Plato, and Pericles (concerning whom were told many things not recorded by Plutarch), and Themistocles, and Socrates, who met for the first time in the Hull playroom, and became friends at once; while to her childish imagination was due the fascinatingly terrible story of the persecuted nun, who was imprisoned in a subterranean passage in the very house where they were living, and of whom—delightful thought!—she and her playmates were the appointed rescuers. The carrying-out of this achievement was attended by one little incident, so beautifully characteristic of the strength of a child's faith and the utter simplicity of its natural piety, that we must find place for it. Miss Eliza Keary tells how, when the hour for the great enterprise had fully come, and,—

"The sceptics had been talked into something like the submission of their private judgment, and had agreed to assist in the great act of the drama, twilight had given place to darkness, and a chill, eerie feeling was creeping over us all. There was one sweet little girl in the group, Fanny by name, who had been among the first to take the matter seriously, and yet had not given way to childish fears; she soothed and strengthened her sisters and cousins, she looked so sweet and wise and reliable that the halts began to look up to her as a sort of leader, and when the darkness drew us all into closer fellowship, she made us kneel down, while she offered up a prayer for the success of our undertaking. After this, with lighted candle, with chisel and hammer, we all, Annie and Fanny leading the way, proceeded to the scene of danger."

Among all the pictures of child-life with which we are acquainted, we can recall none prettier, or, in a way, more touching, than this of the little group kneeling in the fading light to ask the aid of the great Helper in their deed of high enterprise.

As Annie Keary grew older, she passed from the life of the Hull playroom to that of the boarding-school, a narrower life, on the whole, but made happy to her by the love of her companions, and not seriously troubled by want of appreciation on the part of her teachers, who regarded with sad severity her loose renderings of "dear Mr. Baker's sermons," which deafness prevented her from hearing, and mourned over the worldly-mindedness which indulged itself in frivolous conversations on such unspiritual topics as "gravitation and the stars." It was during these school years that Annie Keary's life of human service may be said to have begun. One school custom, which gave a certain graciousness to an otherwise unsympathetic training, was the adoption of the younger children by their older companions, who filled, in a sweet, girlish way, the place of mothers to their little charges. There were many who loved to call Annie Keary "mother," and her sister tells us that the children who came to her share were the very troublesome ones,

"those whom everybody else had tried and been tired out by, and she loved them quite as well as if they had been so many cherubs. It might seem to outsiders that they imposed upon her good-nature, but, after all, the unruly spirits did grow tamer with her, and the weakly ones stumbled less often in her company. It was astonishing how many good points came to the front, how teachers and scholars alike began to hope where she had first believed."

It was this all-believing and all-hopeful charity which made every one who came near to Annie Keary feel that it was good to be there. And it was good, for love has the happy alchemy which makes or tends to make its objects loveable; and it is not hard to believe that the understanding gentleness which never saw the worst side of others chiefly, or first, or indeed at all, or could ever be persuaded "that any one was out-and-out base, hypocritical, unworthy," had a wonderful sanative quality, and was full of health and strength and stimulation. Accompanying this boundless trust in others, which must have added largely to her happiness, was a haunting distrust of herself, which at times was, doubtless, a source of pain, or at any rate of disquiet. This revealed itself most clearly with regard to her literary work, and "whenever the voice from the world outside seemed to confirm the mistrustful voice within, a slight recoil upon herself began, which arrested to a certain extent her progress, and drew a veil of reticence over her spirit which was injurious to her as an artist." But this distrust was interwoven with the whole fabric of her being; she was altogether wanting in self-sufficiency, in the good, as well as the evil sense of the word; but had, nevertheless, a beautiful sanity and reality of nature, which prevented her attitude of dependence from assuming the appearance of unworthy weakness. Her spiritual history is full of peculiar interest. She never altogether lost her feeling of the need of help, of some external sanction for her own spiritual instincts; and she found such help and sanction in places far removed from each other, and in views which seem at first to have no common ground. She found help, or teaching, or spiritual stimulus in the words of Charles Kingsley, touching the larger hope, which at first she held lovingly, but tremblingly; in the more sharply outlined teaching of the Sisters with whom she worked so devotedly among East-London slums; in the counsels of perfection uttered by teachers from the Western hemisphere, who came with their gospel of entire sanctification; and even from the thaumaturgic revelations of spiritualism she was able to extract something which in a passing mood was, in its way, nutritive, and not poisonous. A bald summary of these things does her injustice; the book must be read, in order to feel how natural and right were these seekings after perfect light in her journey through the shadows. We do not think of her as blown helplessly about by every wind of doctrine, but rather as wandering calmly through a fair orchard, guided by a sure instinct, and finding each fruit in its turn pleasant to the eye, and good for food.

Of Annie Keary's work in literature we have said nothing, for there is nothing that it would now avail to say. It has a delicate charm, like the charm of wild-flowers; but we do the wild-flower better justice by enjoyment than by praise, and there is a kind of artistic product which stands not above or below the range of ordinary criticism, but simply outside of it. Nor has our space allowed us to make any extracts from the letters which add so much to the value of Miss Eliza Keary's memoir. Some of the most beautiful are among those addressed to young girls who had gone out to service from the Home in Bessborough Gardens in which Annie Keary took such loving interest; and it is noteworthy that in them the literary form is as exquisite as in the work which she finished for a critical world. Even to a little "general servant," Annie Keary could give nothing less than her best; and if we may in conclusion make one suggestion, we would express a decided opinion that a selection from these and other letters, such as could be purchased for a few pence, could hardly fail to find a large welcome among the perplexed, the tempted, and the sorrowful, to whom the "Life" as a whole will be specially precious.

AN INFANT KINGDOM.*

ALTHOUGH the ignorance of the British public in matters geographical is undoubtedly very great, we should hardly have thought it possible, unless assured of the fact by such incontrovertible authority as that of Mr. Samuelson, that a writ from a superior Metropolitan Law Court could have been directed to Bucharest, in the Kingdom of Egypt. Yet, as the author remarks, although Roumania at the present time possesses more interest for us than any other European country, there are few intelligent English readers who could describe precisely off-hand where the little kingdom is situated, and still fewer is the number of those who are at all well acquainted with its present state or past history. In the volume now before us, of which the writer speaks in such modest terms, so clear an account is given of the ancient and modern history of the Moldo-Wallachian Provinces up to the time of their fusion into an independent State, as well as of their geography, ethnography, and topography, that there remains no longer an excuse for our not being perfectly well acquainted with the country upon whose experiments in the way of social regeneration we should bestow the most attentive consideration, for is she not working out before us, and, to all present appearances, successfully, the difficult problem how peacefully and equitably to settle the land question? That this settlement must be much more easy in a country which, with an area equal to that of England, possesses but one-fifth of her population, is not to be denied; still, whoever will peruse attentively Mr. Samuelson's sixth chapter, and his short appendix on the "Peasant Proprietary," will probably feel convinced that we might, if we chose to do it, arrive without great delay at a satisfactory solution of our difficulty.

* Roumania, Past and Present. By James Samuelson, Barrister-at-Law. London: Longmans, Green, and Co.

The author is probably correct in his opinion that more interest will be felt by most persons in the Roumania of to-day than in her past struggles, and he is therefore justified in putting, as he expresses it, "the cart before the horse," and placing at the end of the volume the six carefully-written chapters which form a connected history of the country from the earliest period, namely, the Dacian era, down to the coronation of King Charles in 1881. Nevertheless, these chapters are, it may be said, the most valuable portion of the work, giving us, although necessarily in a concise manner, a complete review of the national life of the people, many portions of it, especially those which relate to the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, being of extreme interest.

When we come to the part played by Russia with regard to the Principalities, we meet with a statement that will be warmly controverted by many persons,—namely, that though the ultimate design of that Power was to secure and incorporate them, as part of her general scheme of aggression, her interference, nevertheless, invariably resulted in the amelioration of their condition, this assertion being strengthened by the official declarations of Consul Wilkinson, who was by no means disposed favourably to look upon Russian encroachments. In his sketch of the war of 1877, however, Mr. Samuelson finds it impossible to do otherwise than blame the conduct of Russia towards the brave ally "who had saved her honour, if not the integrity of her Empire;" and evidently looks forward to a period when the plains on both sides of the Danube guarded by the Balkans and the Carpathians may not impossibly constitute a strong Roumanian kingdom, although he declines to enter minutely into the Eastern Question, or to attempt to predict the future relations of Roumania with regard to it.

Taking the form of an irregular, blunted crescent, the general configuration of the country may, according to Mr. Samuelson, be described as an irregular, inclined plain, sloping down from the summits of the Carpathians, which rise to a height of 6,000 feet or 9,000 feet above the sea, to the northern or left bank of the Danube, presenting in most parts a very striking appearance, although consisting, to speak roughly, of three zones, the region immediately abutting on the Danube; the diversified, smiling landscape which succeeds to it; and the singularly picturesque mountain range, needing only to be visited by a few Western tourists to become, so says the author, an extension of the playground of Europe. It is here that we find Sinaia, the summer residence of the Court, the sanatorium of the people of Bucharest,—a spot not merely extremely beautiful, but with a town so situated as to have every promise of a brilliant future. The plains by the Danube, which, by the way, the author assures us is anything but blue, and by no means a romantic river, are covered with willows, alders, poplars, tamarind, and other fruit-trees, and by fields of maize, wheat, millet, as well as gourds and various vegetables; but the whole has a slovenly and neglected appearance, while the peasantry of these parts, living in semi-subterranean dwellings of the most primitive description, though a fine, healthy body of men and women, lose many of their children by marsh fever. Further from the river, the country produces almost every plant-growth of the sub-tropical and temperate zones, and is described as leaving nothing to be desired, the people and their habitations alike wearing the appearance of comfort and prosperity, and food being cheap and plentiful. The subterranean dwellings are here replaced by cottages, built of wood, brick, and plaster, and roofed with tiles or slates, but bearing some resemblance to the Swiss chalet, and groups of peasants, men and women, may be seen at work on the roads and railways, the women having a long, narrow spade, like the one in use in Ireland. The mountain scenery is, to a certain extent, Dolomitic in character, the summits being very jagged. The colouring is, however, different, for the Carpathians are dark grey. As in most Alpine ranges, their lower slopes are pine-clad; and to them succeeds a region of grass and flowers, before arriving at the Rossezähne, or "Horses' Teeth," of the superior elevations. Mr. Samuelson tells us that many beautiful tours may be made in the higher parts of Roumania, where the traveller will find, in combination with lovely scenery, picturesque costumes, primitive manners, and many interesting phases of Oriental life.

Salt, petroleum, lignite, and, in connection with this latter, ozokerit, or fossil wax, are the only minerals at present worked in the country; but as it is well known that gold was anciently found in Dacia, and as there are strong indications of the presence of iron, as well as of copper, sulphur, arsenic, and cobalt, it is believed that metallic riches will soon be largely developed. A very interesting account is given us of a visit to the Telega salt-mine, about half-way between Ploiesti and Sinaia, of which the author says:—"We have been in a good many strange localities, and have witnessed many impressive scenes, both on and under the earth's surface, but we confess that none has ever been comparable to this one." The mine is reached by a succession of staircases, arranged in a vertical shaft to a depth of about 110 feet, hollow voices, accompanied by the clanking of chains, making themselves heard from time to time as you descend; and, after passing along a horizontal gallery, where all is darkness, save for the fitful glamour of the candles you carry, you arrive at a platform, guarded by a railing, and look down into a cavern, where homicides, burglars, and the very dregs of the criminal ranks of Roumania are cutting the rock-salt. Into this strange vault Mr. Samuelson also descended, and for a few moments its vast proportions were exhibited by a mass of lighted tow being dropped down through the shaft. It is said that the electric light is about to be employed in the mine. Up to 1848, the convicts—all men—never once quitted their underground prison, until death released them from their labours, or their sentences had expired. Now, however, they spend their nights in the penitentiary, about a mile off, and their condition—with the exception that nothing is done to educate them—does not appear to be very bad, as the labour is not as severe as that of our colliers; and they are never whipped or ill-treated, although there is considerable dirt and neglect. There are five salt-mines in Roumania, of which two are penal.

Mr. Samuelson complains not a little of the exaggerated descriptions given by certain writers of the state of men, morals, and civilization generally in "the City of Joy," as Bucharest is called by the Roumanian people, although his own account of things there is not in every respect prepossessing. Its trees and gardens, the hospitality and sociableness of the upper and middle classes, and the cheapness of living, render the capital a pleasant place of resort; intellectual life, too, is by no means wanting; but, on the other hand, the laxity of the marriage tie, exorbitant taxation, and the fact that the people are but emerging from a state of semi-barbarism, are circumstances that counterbalance its advantages. Mr. Samuelson's book, however, shows most clearly the rapid strides which the infant kingdom is making, especially of late years, in every kind of solid improvement; and we cannot perhaps better conclude our notice of his interesting volume, than by quoting the words in which he sums up his account of Roumania:—

"When we look upon her sufferings, reflecting how for ages she has lain beneath the claws of savage enemies, quailed under despots who sucked the life-blood of the nation, and then compare her constitutional democracy with ours, nay, if alone from a material point of view we weigh the interest we have in her prosperity, we cannot fail to see that in the East is rising up a Power, in part of our creation, young and weak as yet, but full of hope and promise; and therefore we heartily commend her future to the earnest watchfulness of every English friend of liberty."

PROFESSOR HOLBROOKE'S ANNALS OF TACITUS.*

AN edition of the Annals is a formidable undertaking, on which, since Mr. Frost published his volume in the Bibliotheca Classica, no English scholar has cared to embark. The Clarendon Press, which at last promises us one, has been strangely slow in adding to its list a classic of so high a rank. The truth, probably, is that the greater part of the Annals lies outside the ordinary range of Academical reading, and that the Press, as one of the mainstays of University finance, has been content to confine its operations to more profitable publications. It is somewhat humiliating to Englishmen to find so obvious a want supplied by a scholar from the other side of the Atlantic. We can hardly, indeed, regard Professor Holbrooke's work as final, but its value and utility are beyond question. The student who uses it along with Orelli, whose edition, for certain purposes, will scarcely be superseded, will find himself well equipped.

Professor Holbrooke begins with a biography of the historian, which, though brief, tells us all that is known of him. Some particulars, that really rest on conjecture only, are put a little too positively; but the only statement that is seriously open to criticism is that which gives the number of the books of the Annals as sixteen, and that of the Histories as fourteen. These numbers should surely be eighteen and twelve. Chapter xxxv. of the sixteenth book brings us down no further than A.D. 66. Two years and more, full of important incident, remain to be narrated; and these could hardly have been compressed within half the average limits of a book. It is a much more probable conjecture that the whole work consisted of three portions, each of which contained six books, and which respectively narrated the reigns of Tiberius, of Caius and Claudius, and of Nero. This would assign about twenty-three years to the first, seventeen to the second, and fourteen to the third, and allow for the increase of detail which we should naturally expect as the historian comes nearer to his own time. If he was born, as Professor Holbrooke thinks, as early as 53, he may well have been a competent eye-witness of much that happened in Nero's last days. An abridgment of Dräger on "Peculiarities of the Language and Style of Tacitus," and tables of the "Family of Augustus," follow. The prolegomena, on the whole, are somewhat meagre. There are many things in Tacitus, and especially in the Annals, where all his peculiarities appear in their fullest development, which call for a treatment more extended than can be given in a running commentary. We must give, however, a word of praise to an excellent index, which is not a bare list of names and references, but an epitomised classical dictionary, supplying, temporarily at least, much that the reader wants, without sending him to books of reference. The four useful maps which the volume contains ought not to be passed over without acknowledgment.

Of the continuous commentary, of which it remains to speak, we may say that it seems to be, as far as we have been able to examine it, careful, sound, and, on the whole, judicious,—judicious, that is, in what it gives, and in what it omits. Whatever fault, indeed, it has, is fault of omission. It is obvious to any one who knows how much annotation may be piled up, so to speak, on Tacitus, without a single superfluous line being written, that the space within which Professor Holbrooke has contracted his notes is scarcely adequate to what may be called absolute necessities. For this it would be unfair to blame him. Reasons, which are not less cogent because they are quite remote from literary considerations, may compel an editor who would gladly extend his work over two volumes to content himself with one. He can be called to account only for the use which he has made of the space which circumstances may have permitted him to use. This use has to be governed by a discretion which needs continual exercise. The most ingenious of editors cannot hope to say much that may not be found in books of reference by those who are able and willing to use them. But no one who comes to his work with the benefit of practical experience will commit the mistake of supposing that he is working for ideal students, with an unlimited command of books, and unlimited time for consulting them. He will consult needs that are actually likely to occur, and his usefulness will be in proportion to the judgment with which he discerns and estimates them. Judged by this standard, Professor Holbrooke's work may fairly be given high rank. We miss, indeed, the interesting and valuable illustrations from Dio Cassius and Suetonius with which Orelli supplies his readers, but feel that exigencies of space are a sufficient excuse for their absence. References without quotations are of very little use, and quite as well omitted. Of difficulties that occur in the interpretation of the text, we do not observe any serious neglect. Here and there—and we do not profess to have examined the whole of Professor Holbrooke's work—we have noticed passages to which notes might have been given with advantage; but the whole result is satisfactory. The chief defect which we would point out is the failure to take adequate notice of the peculiarities of the Tacitean diction. Such peculiarities must be pointed out as they occur, and not left to be discovered from a general treatise, however admirable, and even exhaustive, if the wants of the average student are to be adequately supplied. We may give a few instances of what we mean. In vi., 3, "summum supplicium decernebatur in progressus indicium foret" might well have a note on the use of the imperfect indicative, though, of course, this is not peculiar to Tacitus. And space might have been found by striking out the comment, "Gaio Cæsari = Caligulae." A reader could hardly have got so far in the Annals without learning so much. In the next chapter, "Ut vero Latiniū Latiarem ingressus" is translated, and probably rightly, by "when he began with Latinus Latiaris," but the usage of ingressus is peculiar, and demands notice. In c. 9, the strange brevity of "Immiti rescripto venas resolvit" is passed over. In c. 12, the force of per, in "Lecto per magistros et æstimatoque carmine," might easily escape the attention of a student. In c. 14, "Nullas probabiles causas longinquæ peregrinationis adferebat" (said of a Senator who was arrested in the Straits of Messina), is passed over without comment. It is an interesting expression, as bearing on a passage of disputed meaning, in i., 53 (also passed over), where Tacitus says of Tiberius that he calculated that the death of the elder Julia, "Obscuram fore longinquitate exilii" (Julia had been exiled to Rhægium). This seems conclusively to fix the meaning of longinquitate as "distance," though it is not easy to understand how the Straits of Messina could be considered distant enough from Rome to cause an exile to be forgotten. The curious word versura (16) seems to require a note. Doubtless, it means here, as it is translated, "compound interest;" but it is not obvious that this is so, because the capital and interest are treated as a fresh loan, not because such a loan is actually made by the debtor having recourse to a new creditor (the true meaning of the word). In c. 24, "Extrema vitæ alimenta" is translated by "the barest sustenance;" should it not rather be "meanest, vilest?"

It will be seen that we have little or nothing that is serious to object to Professor Holbrooke's work, nothing, certainly, that should hinder the general acceptance which we hope it will find from English students.

THE MODERN APPLICATIONS OF ELECTRICITY.*

ELECTRICITY, as applied to purposes other than telegraphy and plating, has taken such a firm stand amongst us, that, to use Dr. Maier's own words, "a book like the present one requires no introduction and no recommendation." We, nevertheless, have pleasure in recommending the book. M. Hospitalier's work is of a popularly descriptive character, which has been well sustained by Dr. Maier in his revisions and additions. The English is good, and the subject is simply and pleasantly laid before the reader. The work is divided into four parts:—1, The Sources of Electricity; 2, Electric-lighting; 3, Telephones and Microphones; 4, Various Applications of Electricity. Part I. commences with the usual description of Voltaic batteries, and contains some very good analogies, which we quote:—

"We can form a fairly exact idea of a battery by comparing it to a focus of heat; for instance, the furnace of a boiler. This focus produces, by the combustion or chemical combination of coal with the oxygen of the atmosphere, heat, which raises a certain volume of the products of combustion to a certain temperature. The amount of heat produced by the combustion will partly serve to produce a certain volume of steam at a certain pressure. The furnace of our boiler is nothing but the battery itself; zinc is the fuel, dilute acid is the burning agent. By their chemical combination, an electric current is produced, having a certain tension or electro-motive-power, and a certain intensity, as vapour has a perfectly distinct volume and pressure."

In describing "tension," we get another good analogy:—

"The tension of the current corresponds to the pressure which causes water to circulate through a conducting tube. The analogy is complete, for the intensity of the current in the circuit is analogous to the volume of water delivered by conduction. The conductor forming the outside circuit is nothing else but the conducting tube; this conductor offers a resistance to the electric current, as the tube offers a resistance to the running of the water. There are, therefore, with regard to a given electrical circulation, three distinct characteristic elements:—1. The pressure of the current, tension, electro-motive-force, or difference of potentials—whichever you like to call it—the force through which the electric current is established. 2. The volume of the current, its intensity, or the quantity of electricity traversing the circuit in a given time. 3. The resistance of the circuit, the resistance which the conductor opposes to the circulation of the current, taking into consideration its dimensions and its nature. The rate of discharge of a flow of water corresponds to the intensity (as, for instance, 100 litres per second), and the volume discharged in a given time corresponds to the electric quantity in a given time. This electric quantity is called 'current.' As regards the word 'intensity,' it corresponds to what the French call 'tension.' These analogous terms lead to confusion, against which we have to guard ourselves."

* The Annals of Tacitus. Edited, with Notes, by George A. Holbrooke, M.A., Professor of Latin in Trinity College, Hartford. London: Macmillan and Co.

* The Modern Applications of Electricity. By E. Hospitalier. Translated and Enlarged by Julius Maier, Ph.D. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.

The foregoing extracts give a good idea of the manner in which the subject is handled; everything is stated clearly and distinctly. It is not for us to say whether Potential, Tension, and Electro-motive-force represent three attributes of electricity, or only one; it is evident that our author believes in but one, and for simplicity's sake, we trust he may be correct. Doubtless, the good time is coming when one electrician speaking to another on matters technical will be understood; at present, there is far too much ambiguity attached to the meaning of many words to render such a desirable result by any means certain. No less than thirteen forms of battery are described, and others alluded to. In speaking of the Smee cell, "platinised platinum" is mentioned; we presume "platinised silver" is intended. The phenomenon styled "polarisation" is well explained. Next follow thermo-electric batteries; and here we regret the absence of anything new. Nothing could more effectually solve the difficulty of "household electricity" than a cheap and good thermo-pile. With the chapter devoted to magneto and dynamo machines we are a little disappointed; there is no originality,—indeed, where their inductive action is gone into, the works of Du Moncel are simply quoted, even to describing the Schuckurt machine as a bad copy of the Gramme; and here we beg to differ both with Du Moncel and Hospitalier. We fail to see that the armature of the Schuckurt machine is more expensive to wind than that of Gramme; and we do distinctly see that its flattened form presents a considerably greater proportion of the length of wire on its coils to the direct action of the field magnets; and we do not see why the electrician of Nürnberg should not have the credit of his improvement. We are far from under-rating the Gramme machine, but we decline to believe in its infallibility.

The fourth chapter is neatly entitled, "Apparatus for Transforming Electricity," and in it are described secondary batteries and induction coils. To Planté's battery is justly given the first place, and that of Faure receives a shorter notice, much of course, which is said of the first being equally applicable to the second. The description of the chemical action produced between the leaden couples is given in M. Planté's own words, and is exceedingly interesting, though too lengthy to be reproduced here. We are glad to see that Mr. Sutton's battery receives a notice, and we trust soon to hear of its practical application, there being, we believe, no patent-rights attached to it.

Then follows a brief description of nearly all the arc-regulator lamps and candle lamps, with a historical sketch of the various semi-incandescent lamps, leading up to the incandescent lamp of the present day; and here the difficulty of bringing the work up to date begins to show itself, the Swan lamp, if we mistake not, having a somewhat antiquated form of attachment between the carbon filament and the conducting wires, whilst the Lane-Fox lamp is also of an antique pattern. A good cut and description is given of the Lane-Fox regulator; but we are surprised that no notice is taken of the singular similarity existing between it and that of Maxim, exemplifying, as it does, in a wonderful degree the manner in which two minds, working in the same direction, at nearly the same time, in different countries, have arrived at the same solution of a difficulty, by means of apparatus almost identical. The last chapter of Part II. treats of the application of Electric-lighting, and is a résumé of all that has gone before. We would suggest here that writers on Electricity are distinctly wrong in endeavouring to minimise the danger from fire in the use of this subtle agent. As a matter of fact, it is dangerous, unless carefully handled, though perhaps not more so than gas. A frank acknowledgment of this fact would reap a twofold advantage,—1st, Fires arising from the contact of wires would be less frequent; 2nd, when they did occur, the damage done to the good name of Electricity would be less. On the vexed question of the cost of electric-lighting, we will allow our author to speak for himself:—"Nothing," he says, "is more variable than the cost price of electric-lighting; it may be ten times less expensive than gas, or ten times more, as the case may be." Here is room for reflection. This portion of the work concludes with a fairly full description of the systems of Maxim and of Brush, the latter being an extract from Engineering; and here we have serious fault to find with Dr. Maier. Fig. 102, which is a diagram of the connection between armature bobbins and magnet coils of the Brush machine, and likewise the description of the same, are correctly copied from Engineering, but, unfortunately, Engineering is completely wrong in its diagram and description. Mr. Maier is not the only one who has fallen into this trap, the Scientific American has done the same thing; but it reflects little credit on any of the parties concerned. A newspaper error reproduced in a standard work is too bad.

Part III. is devoted to Telephones and Microphones, and will doubtless be considered by many non-professional readers to be the most interesting part of the book, for not only is the subject one of engrossing interest, but there is a charming simplicity about it, which does not obtain in so great a degree in other branches of electrical science. The simplicity is, of course, confined to the "how," the "why" being by no means obvious. Telephones are arranged under two heads,—1st, musical telephones, which transmit sounds only; 2nd, articulating telephones, which carry the human voice. The string telephone, which as a toy is doubtless known to most of our readers, is mentioned as being more than two centuries old. We were under the impression that amongst the natives of India this device was of still greater antiquity. It appears that Page, an American, in 1837, first noticed the sounds produced in iron by rapid changes in the intensity of its magnetisation. In 1855, Leon Scott invented an apparatus called a phonantograph, consisting in part of a stretched piece of skin vibrating under the influence of the human voice, and this instrument is said to have been "the origin of the vibrating plate in the telephone." This, we think, can scarcely be correct, seeing that the same vibrating skin was used in the string telephone. Be this as it may, Reiss in 1860 combined the vibrating skin with the magnetic pulsations, and produced the first electric telephone, which was a musical one, and which was improved upon by Gray in 1874; these instruments, however, are now chiefly interesting as a matter of scientific history. The first really articulating telephone was invented by Bell, and patented on February 14th, 1876,—though it appears that Gray had patented a somewhat similar arrangement on the very same day, and alluding to this our author says:—

"In the apparatus patented by Gray, the undulating currents required for telephonic transmission were obtained by varying the electrical resistance of the circuit, and consequently the intensity of the current in this circuit. Bell's and Gray's speakers are identical as regards principle, and similar as regards construction. Whilst Gray has persisted in constructing telephones with a battery and a liquid speaker, Bell has first constructed a magnetic telephone without battery. He is entitled to be called the inventor of the telephone, and nobody now contests his claim."

Although it is impossible to overrate Bell's invention, we still think that he cannot fairly be called the inventor of the telephone, inasmuch as that of Gray dates from the same day. Articulating telephones are again subdivided,—1st, those employing a battery; 2nd, those worked by means of magnets only. Bell's telephone is the only one of the latter class, though numerous alterations, and in some cases, perhaps, improvements, have been effected by others. The first or battery class comprise microphones, and most of the numerous adaptations:—"Every telephone consists of two parts,—(1), the speaker (usually called the transmitter), which transforms the speaker's word into undulating currents, which are sent along the line. (2), the receiver, which, as its name implies, receives the undulating currents, and transforms them again into sonorous vibrations." We give the following description of the action of Bell's magnetic telephone:—

"The successive transformations which take place in the inappreciable interval between the moment when the sound issues from the mouth of the speaker, and the moment when it strikes the ear of the listener, are most interesting. They are seven in number:—1. The vibration of the air sets the plate of the speaker in motion. 2. This motion changes the magnetic division of the magnetic bar. 3. The change in the magnetic division develops induced currents in the bobbin of the speaker. 4. These induced currents traverse the line and the bobbin of the receiver. 5. These currents produce changes in the magnetic bar of the receiver. 6. These changes of magnetism act on the plate, and cause it to vibrate. 7. The vibrations of the plate are communicated to the air, and strike the tympanum of the listener's ear."

Our author goes on to describe all the more important modifications and improvements which have been effected in these wonderful instruments, and illustrates his subject fully as he goes. Various other ingenious applications of electricity are described, which, though exceedingly interesting, are too numerous to receive a mention here.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

A Pictorial and Historical Handbook to Warwickshire (Ward and Lock) is just what it pretends to be. Without entering into competition with large and learned county histories, it gives fairly exhaustive notices of the antiquities of that most interesting of our Midland counties, describing its principal literary and historical associations, its chief towns and villages, its manufactures and industries, and the resorts of tourists and travellers. It is fortunate in having three such subjects as Stratford-on-Avon and the proud castles of Warwick and Kenilworth as pièces de résistance; but the anonymous author of the book has taken equal pains in his account of Stoneleigh Abbey, of Leamington, of fair Coventry, with its three tall spires and its many mediæval memories of religious guilds and miracle-plays, of Birmingham, with its factories, of Tamworth, and its historic castle, &c. Many of the rural parish churches are well described; and, although the work is comprised in one duodecimo volume, yet it is illustrated with nearly one hundred wood engravings, some of them of high merit, though others are hard and stiff. It strikes us that the four coloured plates had better have been left uncoloured.

An Impromptu Ascent of Mont Blanc. By W. H. Le Mesurier. (Elliot Stock.)—This simple narrative will be read with interest by many tourists; but it appeals principally to those whose love for mountains, eternal snows, glaciers, and dangerous adventure, equals that of the hero of the seven-hundred-and-sixty-eighth ascent (from Chamounix) of Mont Blanc,—that is, reckoning from Balmat's, in 1786. Long before the more prudent reader has followed the expedition to its goal, the perils so vividly depicted will have suppressed all desire to emulate the example of the two travellers, whose visit to the Grand Mulets, one fine July evening, led to their successful and more daring exploit the next day. The illustrations, though rough, add much interest to the story. In the appendix is found a résumé of the principal ascents of Mont Blanc since De Saussure's visit to Chamonix in 1760.

Schelling's Transcendental Idealism. By John Watson, LL.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy, Queen's University, Kingston, Canada. (Griggs, Chicago; Trübner, London.)—This is the second of a series of "German Philosophical Classics for English Readers and Students, edited by G. S. Morris." The "Critique of Pure Reason" has already been redacted by the editor, and more of Kant's, together with works of Hegel, Fichte, Leibnitz, (in this order, according to the programme), are to follow. The English readers and students for whom these Philosophical Classics are intended must be pretty well read in German philosophical history, if they are to use a book like this present one to any purpose. It is a rapid précis by way of essay, and the writer, after cheerfully remarking that "everybody is familiar with the saying of Hegel" about Schelling's philosophical development, continues presumably to address these everybody in his 250 pages of "critical exposition." At least, it is only to such, we imagine, that he is intelligible in his immediately following references to Kant and Fichte. If the book is meant as a study in philosophy, addressed to readers on the same level of acquired knowledge in the subject as the writer himself, it is unnecessary; if it is in usum tironum, it is inadequate. The tyro, even if it is good for him to be talked to as a past master in philosophy, should not be treated with the painful haste which eschews references, and cannot stay to make an index.

The History of Wallingford. By John K. Hedges. 2 vols. (Clowes and Co.)—Wallingford is one of those ancient towns which have comparatively fallen out of sight in recent times, partly because it lay off the great high coach-road, and now lies off the great high railroad to the west, and partly because it has had no special trade or manufacture to support it. In the Saxon and Norman times, however, Wallingford played a prominent part in our national history, especially in the reigns of Stephen and Henry I., when the Empress Maud found a home within the walls of its castle, which had been built on the ruins of an earlier structure by order of the Conqueror. But even a greater antiquity is claimed for Wallingford by Mr. Hedges; it was probably the Calleva Atrebatum of the era of the Roman occupation, and Roman roads met at it, or near it. Roman coins and urns have been found on its site, and there are also other proofs of the presence of the Roman eagles. Indeed, Mr. Hedges sees reason to believe that, wherever Julius Cæsar crossed the Thames, he probably pushed on his march as far westward as Wallingford. The castle is connected in subsequent history with the names of King John and his Barons, Simon de Montfort, Piers Gaveston, Queen Isabella and Mortimer, and Richard and Edmund, Earls of Cornwall, whose favourite residence it became, and who spent large sums on adorning it with almost royal magnificence. For its subsequent history under the Tudors, for its architectural, and ecclesiastical antiquities, and for its history as a Parliamentary borough, we must content ourselves by referring our readers to the pages of Mr. Hedges, to whom the students of English topography are much indebted for a most complete monograph on a town that, as yet, has not had a worthy historian.

Zeller's History of Greek Philosophy: the Pre-Socratic Schools. Translated by S. F. Alleyne. (Longmans.)—Zeller's great work has appeared in piecemeal translations hitherto, as the studies of the translators or the requirements of students determined. Miss Alleyne, who began by translating the sixteen chapters that deal with Plato, now gives us the sections covering the Pre-Socratic philosophy, and may be congratulated on the honour of having thus brought the largest portion, and certainly not the least important, of the book to the knowledge of English students, "who are, perhaps, less familiar with German than Greek." The translation, as a whole, did not need the deprecatory words of the preface in which Miss Alleyne pleads "the requirements of the English language, and its deficiency in precise equivalents for German philosophical terms," as an excuse for shortcomings in her achievements. It may fairly be doubted whether such deficiency exists, and the expression "German philosophical terms" looks something like a surrender of philosophy to the Germans. But Miss Alleyne shows herself quite capable of expressing in intelligible English Zeller's exposition of Greek thought; and in the frequently polemical and minute notes the help of Mr. Abbott of Balliol, which she mentions in her preface, has enabled her to present her author's meaning fully, and at the same time rather less roughly than in the original. Zeller's style is hardly ever inspired or inspiring; and if the translator does not go beyond her author in this respect, at least she does not fall behind him. Style, however, is a subordinate consideration in a philosophical work, and the clearness and thoroughness of Zeller's treatment (it is superfluous to speak of the high qualities of a work so well known as his) are well represented in this English version. It is much to be wished that an uniformly revised edition of the English translations, with Zeller's co-operation, could be made. We should get more continuity, and have the advantage of the author's manus ultima. And Miss Alleyne would probably be the best editor.

Records of St. Giles's, Cripplegate. By Rev. W. Denton, M.A. (G. Bell and Sons.)—In this volume, Mr. Denton has done for the parish of Cripplegate what Mr. Diprose did so successfully for St. Clement Danes a few years since. He has placed on record the history and antiquities of one of the most interesting of City parishes without the walls; and it is no slight matter for such parish to boast that it holds within its church the bones of Milton. Considering that such is the case, the only wonder is that more pilgrimages are not made yearly to the tomb of the author of "Paradise Lost." It is just possible that the publication of this work may tend to create and foster an interest in a parish which, though it was only a wild moor in the reign of Henry II., and was not reclaimed and fitted for building purposes till early in the fifteenth century, has become one of the most industrious and thriving, after having commenced, like old Rome, with a somewhat lawless population as its founders. Besides the old City walls, some fine bastions of which still bound the south extremity of the parish, the chief interest centres naturally in its church, which happily escaped the effects of the Fire of London, and the scarcely less destructive hands of amateur restorers of the "churchwarden" type. The original structure would seem to have been Norman, the work of one of the officers of the neighbouring Hospital of St. Bartholomew; and its dedication to St. Giles, as the patron saint of cripples, lepers, &c., was most appropriate, as in almost every town St. Giles's Church was erected just outside the walls. In 1545, the church suffered severely from a fire, which destroyed most of the fine monuments erected within it in the Plantagenet and earlier Tudor reigns, including those of the Greys, Earls of Kent, the Egertons, and the Lucys of Charlecote. Among the illustrious dead who lie within its walls are John Foxe, the "Martyrologist," John Speed, the chronicler, and the gallant Martin Frobisher, the first of Arctic voyagers, and the hero of the time of the Spanish Armada. As Bunhill Fields are within the borders of the parish, the name of John Bunyan should be added to this list of its illustrious dead. Of Milton we have already spoken. Mr. Denton gives us many interesting extracts from the parish registers and other records; but we think that he might have described at greater length the plate in the vestry, which, though somewhat late in date, is among the finest to be found in the churches of London.

What Shall We Do with Them? (Nisbet and Co.)—"Them" refers to the overtaken and invalidated workers who are fainting under the burdens of life, for whom the rest for which they cannot pay is a necessity. To provide sea-side "homes," where these weary labourers may freely or cheaply obtain the possibility of recruiting their strength, is becoming more and more an imperative duty. The object of Miss Corke's book is to draw attention to the able management of at least one such home, and though we cannot commend the style in which she has executed her task, we wish the cause she has at heart abundant success.

An Old-Testament Commentary for English Readers. Edited by C. J. Ellicott, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. Vol. I. (Oasell and Co.)—It is noteworthy that a demand presumably sufficient should exist for another work on Scripture on much the same lines as those on which the "Speaker's Commentary" was conducted. The first volume of this undertaking is before us, and includes the first four books of the Pentateuch. Dean Plumptre has contributed a "General Introduction," written in the cautious, yet liberal spirit which we should expect from him. It is an admirable summary of the main facts which relate to the origin and the classification both of the Canonical and of the Apocryphal books, to the original text, and to the chief ancient and English versions. The commentary on Genesis is from the pen of the Dean of Canterbury, that on Exodus by Canon Rawlinson, that on Leviticus by Dr. Ginsburg, while that on Numbers was contributed by the late Canon Elliott. The critical stand-point occupied by Dr. Ginsburg is different from that of his collaborators. He does not think that the book with which he deals, "in its present form, was written by Moses," and he draws his illustrations of it from what is, indeed, the only available source, the service of the Second Temple. The writer of the introduction to the Pentateuch, on the other hand, has this for his final sentence,—"The conclusion seems sure that we have in the Pentateuch the work of Moses, and that we have it substantially as it left his hands." He even believes that the "Book of the Law" read in the Temple in the days of King Josiah was the "autograph copy of Moses." This does not prevent him from allowing that there "never was, until the return from exile, any age in which the Law of Moses commanded the universal assent of the people." We are very far from objecting to this divergence of opinion. On the contrary, we welcome it. The freedom which Dr. Ginsburg has enjoyed will greatly increase the value of the whole work. We can only wish that other contributors may be disposed to use it. Something has been done in this direction already. Dean Payne Smith is strictly conservative, but his annotations compare favourably with the comments on Genesis in the Speaker's Commentary. Canon Rawlinson's contribution is especially valuable in the portion which refers to Egypt. On the whole, the "English reader" will find this a very useful book of reference.

Eli's Children. By George Manville Fenn. 3 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—That Eli's children should come to a bad end is a thing quite to be expected, when they are such very bad subjects as are the sons of the Rev. Mr. George Mallow, the Eli of Mr. Fenn's story. But why should the doom fall on his daughter, Julia, who does not seem to have been spoilt by any parental indulgence? And why should it extend to a number of other innocent people? However, it is Mr. Fenn's spécialité to deal in horrors, and as he follows the honest course of forewarning his readers as to what they may expect, by describing his novel as "The Chronicle of an Unhappy Family," no one has a right to complain. Still, we cannot help thinking that he might employ his undoubted ability, of which this tale, repulsive as it is, gives sufficient proof, in a more pleasant and profitable way. Why should he speak, by the way, of the shooting of an escaping convict at Dartmoor as a "judicial murder?" If the men are to be sent in working parties outside the prison-walls, there is no other way of deterring them from attempts at escape; and it is right, not wrong, to deter them at any cost.—Exchange no Robbery, and other Novelles. By M. Betham Edwards. 2 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—The short story which gives a title to these two volumes is very good. The daughter of a farmer changes places with a girl, her foster-sister, who belongs to a German grand-ducal house, an exchange made possible by circumstances. The young lady has lived remote from Court. She was the child of an inferior marriage, and is suddenly brought into importance by the difficulty of finding a proper match for the heir of the duchy. The scheme, a jest at first, though not without an arrière pensée of earnestness on the part of the ambitious plebeian, becomes a reality, and both parties, after a period of trial which is skillfully managed by the novelist, fill their new positions with admirable fitness. None of the other stories are at all equal to this, though "The Three B.A.'s" is a bright little sketch of the life of activity which will, doubtless, become more and more common among the young women-students of the day. What a contrast between the full, cheerful life of the teacher Eugenia, and the dull and objectless existence which thousands of young women uselessly drag out at home! The collection would have been distinctly better for the omission of "Priest and Maiden."

In a neat little volume of neat little sermons, bearing the title of Towards the Sunset; or, Teachings after Thirty Years (Isbister), the now veteran author of "The Recreations of a Country Parson" puts one not a little in mind of one of the heroines of Lord Beaconsfield's "Endymion." When her husband died, she "went into very pretty mourning;" "A. K. H. B." has gone into very pretty seriousness. We had almost said pessimism, for our author thinks "there are now-a-days divers ominous signs, social, political, moral, that point towards the decline and fall of Britain," and, speaking specially of church attendance in Scotland, says:—"It has been very strongly pressed upon me, in these last years, that not merely the old in many cases wish to have as little of public worship as is decently possible, but that the young—I mean children, and lads and girls—have lost much of the old, simple-minded enjoyment in going to church." But, in spite of such statements as this—which ought to have a grave significance for Scotland, if its author is correct in holding that the preaching in Scotland now-a-days is "incomparably better" than it used to be—and in spite of half-pathetic references to "the days when I was a boy," and to "my Ayrshire bringing-up,"—we have much of the old and careful daintiness, the old air of artistic lounging among the Eternities and Immensities. Who but "A. K. H. B." could have begun a sermon on "the spirits of just men made perfect" in this fashion:—"Late one night, not long ago, I left the room in which I work, the day's work being over. I put out the lights before going, and there was sudden and complete darkness. Many times before, one had done the same thing, with no special thought in one's mind. But on that night the thought came upon me—some day, all outward light will go from these eyes in like manner." The solemnity of the incident is spoiled by the lapse into the feminine and unreal self-renunciation involved in "one" and "these eyes." When should a man be himself, if not when in the presence of death, or when filled with the idea of it? Yet there are shrewd and sound things in Towards the Sunset, as in all "A. K. H. B.'s" volumes. If his language is sometimes rather too ladylike, his sentiment is always healthy.

It is impossible to be very severe on Mr. Alan Muir, the author of Hearthrug Farces (Hegg), even though he says such strange things as "I believe laughter and religion to be the two things that chiefly make life bearable." He is not pretentious. He says he is no humourist, and that one page of Dickens, or "one sentence of a Weller, or a Gamp, or Bailey Junior, or other of his comic immortals, has provoked more laughter than all I shall ever write or speak." He is full of what he himself would probably call "honest" animal spirits. There is originality, too, in one of his Farces, which he styles "Selina's Revenge." The idea of a widow making a man who had jilted her in her maiden days give up Liberalism, Nonconformity, and teetotalism, before she will marry him, is at least fresh. Mr. Muir's fun is, however, rather too broad, and in the longest of his Farces is very thin as well. He is justified in his admiration of Dickens, but why speak of "his friendly, cleansing mirth?" The phrase has a disagreeable "patent-medicine" look.

The City of London Directory. (Collingridge.)—This is the thirteenth annual issue of a useful business directory, and it contains, in addition to the usual contents, information, corrected up to February 3rd, in connection with the new streets and buildings recently erected in the City. A list of the fire hydrants, alarm posts, and fire-escape and hose stations are given; and a new coloured map has also been added. Merchants and traders especially will find the information given in this compilation valuable.

The Newspaper Press Directory: Thirty-eighth annual issue. (Kelly and Co., Red Lion Court, Fleet Street.)—May's British and Irish Press Guide: Tenth annual issue. (F. L. May and Co., Piccadilly.)—May and Co.'s Press Manual: Sixth annual publication. (C. H. May and Co., Gracechurch Street.)—Although the titles of these carefully compiled and useful guides give no intimation of the fact, in addition to the lists of newspapers and periodicals published in Great Britain and Ireland, they all contain nearly complete lists of the newspapers and periodicals published on the Continent and in other parts of the world. There are now 1,982 newspapers issued in the United Kingdom and British Isles; 1,530 are published in England, of which number 386 are issued in London. There are nine journals recognised as "Sunday newspapers" (all except one being published in the metropolis), but in fact there is but one newspaper—the Observer—published in London on Sunday only, the other eight issuing editions on days preceding or following Sunday. The Magazines and Reviews number 1,311, of which 326 are of a religious character. Politically classified, the numbers of newspapers and periodicals published in Great Britain and Ireland, are as follows:—Professedly Independent or Neutral, 1,150; Liberal, 569; Conservative, 376; Liberal-Conservative, 61; National, 16. Great care and ingenuity have been exercised in the arrangement of the localisation maps and the subdivisions of the books. In the same connection we acknowledge the receipt of The Philosophy of Advertising, by H. Sell, a useful compilation for advertisers.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK.

Braddon (M.), Golden Calf, 3 vols.....	(Maxwell)	31/6
Braddon (M.), Mount Royal, 12mo	(Maxwell)	2/0
Bryant (W. C.), Popular History of the United States, 8vo	(S. Low & Co.)	15/0
Buchanan (R.), Love Me for Ever, cr 8vo	(Chatto)	3/6
Carlyle and Emerson, Correspondence of, 1834-72, 2 vols. cr 8vo	(Chatto)	24/0
Church, Precious Stones in their Scientific Relations, &c.....	(Chapman & Hall)	2/8
Clare (A.), A Child of the Manoir, 3 vols. cr 8vo	(Tinsley)	31/8
Colour-Sergeant's Ledger, folio	(W. Clowes)	5/0
Cowan (G. D.), Moorish Lotos Leaves, 8vo	(Tinsley)	10/6
Douglas (M.), Countess Violet, cr 8vo	(W. H. Allen)	6/0
Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. 15, 4to	(Black)	30/0
Grindrod (C.), Plays from English History, cr 8vo	(C. K. Paul & Co.)	7/6
Hooile (C. H.), Poems, 12mo	(Parker)	6/0
Hull (B.), Contributions to Physical History of British Isles, 8vo	(Stanford)	12/6
Inter Flumina, Verses Written among Rivers, cr 8vo	(Parker)	3/8
Jeffcott (W. S.), Helps for Latin Students, 12mo	(Longman)	2/0
Josephus's Works, cr 8vo	(Ward & Lock)	3/8
Letts' Consular Atlas, folio	(Letts)	21/0
McLachlan (J.), Student's Handbook of Surgical Anatomy	(Livingstone)	2/0
Malley (A. C.), Micro-photography, cr 8vo	(Lewis)	5/0
Minstrelsy of the Scottish Borders, cr 8vo	(Ward & Lock)	3/8
Morgan (H. F.), Summary of Tactics, 12mo	(Marcus Ward)	5/0
Morton (A. S.), Refraction of the Eye, cr 8vo	(Lewis)	2/6
Practical Canoeing, by "Tiphys," 8vo	(Noris & Wilson)	5/0
Præd (C.), An Australian Heroine, cr 8vo	(Chapman & Hall)	6/0
Report of the Smoke-Abatement Committee, 4to	(Smith & Elder)	15/0
Russell (W. C.), The Lady Mand, cr 8vo	(S. Low & Co.)	6/0
Sims (G.), The Lifeboat, and other Poems, cr 8vo	(Fuller)	2/6
Stockton (F. B.), Rudder Grange, 32mo	(Douglas)	2/0
Teale (T. P.), Economy of Coal, 8vo	(Churchill)	2/6
Tennyson (A.), Poems, 2 vols., 12mo, parchment	(C. K. Paul & Co.)	12/0
Villiers (C. P.), Free-trade Speeches, 2 vols., 8vo	(C. K. Paul & Co.)	25/0
Warburton (R. B. C.), Twenty-two Sonnets, 4to	(Pickering)	15/0
Watson (R. A.), Good Luck of the Maitlands, 12mo	(Wesleyan Conf. Office)	2/0

This day, in crown 8vo, price 3s 6d (not 7s 6d, as previously printed).

OLD TESTAMENT REVISION; a Handbook for English Readers. By ALEXANDER ROBERTS, D.D., Member of the New Testament Company of Revisers; Author of "Companion to the Revised New Testament," &c.

London: HODDER and STOUGHTON, 27 Paternoster Row.

LIBERTY'S ART FABRICS.

ALL PATTERNS POST FREE.

JAPANESE LEATHER PAPERS.

OSLER'S CRYSTAL GLASS AND CHINA SERVICES.

ELECTROLIERS, CHANDELIERS, AND LAMPS.

100 OXFORD STREET, W.

APOLLINARIS.

THE QUEEN OF
TABLE WATERS."

LIBERTY'S ART CURTAINS, CHINTZ AND UPHOLSTERY STUFFS, NOVEL IDEAS IN LADIES' WINTER COSTUME
AND TOILETTE FABRICS.
LIBERTY'S COLOURS.
EASTERN AND EUROPEAN DESIGNS.
PURE FINISH, INEXPENSIVE MATERIALS.
East India House, }
& Chesham House, } REGENT STREET, W.

FOR DADOS, WALLS, AND SCREENS.
From 15s per piece.

WALL PAPERS AND CURTAIN STUFFS.
Artistic and Inexpensive.

O. HINDLEY and SONS,
200 to 204 144 OXFORD STREET, W.

"EARL SPENCER, K.G.,
Pres. International Med. Exhibition, August, 1881, referred to APOLLINARIS as a TYPICAL BEVERAGE, AP-PROVED by the FACULTY."
Sanitary Record, March, 1882.

ROYAL SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.

The TWENTY-FIRST WINTER EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN. 5 Pall Mall East. From 10 till 5.
Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

WILL SHORTLY CLOSE.

WATER-COLOUR EXHIBITION,
53 Pall Mall, containing 350 Works by Well-known Artists in Water-colours. Three great Works by John Martin, K.L., and 50 others in oil. Now Open.
—Admission, 1s. ROBT. HOPKINS, Manager.

TRANSFER of LADIES' SCHOOL.

A Good Opportunity offers for a Lady with some Capital to take over a First-rate School, well situated; or Partnership.—SECRETARY, S. C. and
M. Association, 8 Lancaster Place, Strand, W.C.

STONEYGATE SCHOOL, nr. Leicester

The Misses FRANKLIN receive Boys between the ages of Seven and Fourteen, to prepare for the Public Schools. They are assisted by Expe.rienced Resident and Visiting Masters. The Classics are taught by a Graduate in Honours of Oxford, and careful instruction is given in Elementary Science. The House was built for the School, and is about a mile and a half from the town. Reference is kindly permitted to the Right Hon. A. J. Mundella and the Right Hon. Sir John Mellor.

FRAULEIN HEUTSCHY will be glad to receive a Few more Young Ladies, for instruction in German, French, Music, and other branches of education. Prospectus and references on application.—Tannegg, Solothurn, Switzerland.

THE GRANGE, BUXTON, DERBY- SHIRE.—BOARDING-SCHOOL for LADIES.

conducted by Miss GEEDS. Indian Children would here find a bright, happy home. Ladies wishful to prepare for the Higher University Examinations received.

SEDBERGH SCHOOL.—ENTRANCE

SCHOLARSHIPS. £40 and £20. Candidates may be examined in London or Manchester.—Apply to H. G. HART, Esq., School House, Sedburgh, before March 10th.

THE Rev. C. J. ABBEY, Rector of

Cheekendon, near Reading, late Fellow and Lecturer of University College, Oxford, wishes to READ with TWO or THREE PUPILS for University or other Examinations. Highest references.

CHELTENHAM COLLEGE.—

TWELVE SCHOLARSHIPS, Eight £40, Four £20. Election third Tuesday in May.—Apply to the SECRETARY, the College, Cheltenham.

A HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL for GIRLS, in One of the Healthiest Suburbs of London, close to the Crystal Palace. Preparation for Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations.

Among the Professors are:—F. Ryland, Esq., M.A., late Scholar St. John's College, Cambridge; C. J.
Frost, Esq., Mus. Doc.; C. H. Midforth, Esq., South
Kensington. Large garden. Prospectus on application to the PRINCIPALS, Welland House, Forest Hill.

HEAD MASTER, M.A. (Double High

Honours), First Prizeman in Applied Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, of great experience and invariable success, RECEIVES A FEW PUPILS, for special personal training with his own Son, or for immediate Preparation for Examinations. High successes in Civil Service Exam., London; Matricula-tion, &c. Terms moderate.—Apply, HEAD MASTER, at the Office of this Paper.

VIGILANCE ASSOCIATION

FOR THE
DEFENCE OF PERSONAL RIGHTS, AND FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

WILL BE HELD
ON THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22ND,

AT THE WESTMINSTER PALACE HOTEL,
At 2.30 p.m.

The Right Hon. JAMES STANFELD, M.P., will take the Chair.

Mr. C. H. Hopwood, Q.C., M.P.; Mr. O. B. B.
McLaren, M.P.; Mr. J. P. Thomasson, M.P.; Miss
Bewicke; Mrs. F. Fenwick Miller, M.L.S.B.; Miss Müller, M.L.S.B.; Mr. Joseph Aroch; Mr. S. G. Johnson, Town Clerk of Nottingham; Mr. W. A. Hunter,
M.A., and others will address the Meeting.

JAMES S. BAILY, Secretary.
2 Westminster Chambers, London, S.W.

ROYAL INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE, Cooper's Hill, Staines.

This College has been recently placed on a new basis, and the advantages afforded by it as a training institution for those who purpose adopting the Civil-Engineering profession in India or elsewhere, are now offered to all persons desirous of following the course of study pursued there.

A number of Students, not exceeding 60, will be admitted to the College in September, 1883. Candidates for admission must, on July 1st, 1883, be over 17 and under 21 years of age, and must give satisfactory proof of their having received a fair general education.

The Secretary of State for India will offer 13
Appointments in the Indian Public Works Department for competition among the Students entering the College in September, 1883, at the termination of their prescribed three years' College course, that is, in the summer of 1886. The Secretary of State for India will further offer Two Appointments in the Indian Telegraph Department among the same Students, after two years' course of study, that is, in the summer of 1885.

In the event of there being more candidates for admission than the College can receive, the preference will be given to qualified candidates according to dates of application for admission.

For all further particulars, apply by letter only to the Secretary, Public Works Department, India Office, S.W.; or to the President, Royal Engineering College, Cooper's Hill, Staines.

JULAND DANVERS, Secretary,
Public Works Department.

India Office, October 28th, 1882.

EDUCATION.—A Lady wishes

strongly to recommend Mdlle. FRITSCH'S
SCHOOL for YOUNG LADIES, 108 Lansdown Place,
Brighton. She can speak most highly of Mdlle.
Fritsch's good influence on the characters and dispositions of her pupils. Mdlle. Fritsch is assisted by Resident English and Foreign Governesses and by Professors, and is herself an excellent linguist and musician. Further references to parents of former pupils.—Address, "C. W. S. E.," St. Paul's Place, St.
Leonard's-on-Sea.

LONDON SCHOOL of MEDICINE

for WOMEN, 30 Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square, W.C. ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, one value £30 a year, for 3 years; one £20.—Apply to Mrs. THORNE, Honorary Secretary.

THE MANCHESTER HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS.

The Committee are prepared to receive applications for the post of HEAD MISTRESS, which will be VACANT in July. The New Head Mistress will be required to enter on her duties in September.

Negotiations for a scheme are pending with the Charity Commissioners, under which the Head Mistress may receive a fixed salary of £150, and a Capitation Fee of not less than 10s nor more than £2 on each pupil attending the School.

The Committee offer for the present a fixed salary of £150, and a Capitation Fee of £1 on each pupil above the number of 150, and up to the number of 500. There are now about 540 pupils in the School.

Applications from Candidates should state their age and qualifications, and are to be forwarded on or before March 15th, together with 20 printed copies of testimonials, to Mrs. ROBY, Woodhill, Pendleton, Manchester, from whom further information can be obtained.

THE SALT SCHOOLS, SHIPLEY,

YORKSHIRE.—ASSISTANT MASTER
WANTED, at the beginning of next Term, May 8th, for the Boys' High School. He must be a Graduate of an University and a practical Teacher, able to take Latin, French, Mathematics, and General
English Subjects, both Advanced and Elementary
Classes. Science and Art qualification not requisite.
Salary, non-resident, from £100 to £120 per annum, according to experience, &c.—Apply to the HEAD MASTER.

FELSTEAD SCHOOL, ESSEX.

TWO SCHOLARSHIPS of £18, and TWO of £10—one of each for Boys under Sixteen and under Fourteen years of age—will be OFFERED for OPEN COMPETITION in APRIL, 1883.

These Scholarships will reduce the total of the School expenses in the one case to £32, in the other to £40 per annum.

The value of the Scholarships may at any time be raised by the Governors, if the holders are reported by the School Examiners to show distinguished merit.

For further particulars, apply to the Rev. the HEAD MASTER, School House, Felstead, Essex; or to A. CUNNINGTON, Esq., Solicitor, Braintree,
Clerk to the Governors.

A LADY of considerable experience in the education and management of Children, assisted by a younger Sister, is desirous of undertaking the entire charge of TWO YOUNG

ORPHANS, or of Children whose Parents are abroad.
Her house is in a healthy locality, with garden attached. Good references: given and required.—
"M. N. H.," 1 Edith Grove, Fulham Road, London,
S.W.

ILFRACOMBE.—The ILFRACOMBE

HOTEL, on the verge of the Atlantic, with the mild winter climate of western Devon. Rooms facing south, overlooking the Hotel gardens, specially fitted for winter use.—Apply to MANAGER.

Gold Medal, Paris. Medals: Sydney,
Melbourne, Christchurch, N.Z.

FRY'S FRY'S CARACAS COCOA.

"A most delicious and valuable article."—Standard.

PURE COCOA ONLY.

FRY'S COCOA EXTRACT.
"Strictly pure."—W. W. Stoddart,
F.I.C., F.C.S., City Analyst, Bristol.
SIXTEEN PRIZE MEDALS.

Literary Supplement.

LONDON: FEBRUARY 17, 1883.

BOOKS.

ULTIMA THULE.*

It was in the summer of the year before last, that Mr. Coles, with two friends, made the journeys across Iceland which are described in the book before us. Most visitors to this wonderful country are well pleased if they succeed in reaching Thingvellir and Geysir, for a journey across the island is a serious undertaking. Except in the districts within a short distance of the coast, this land of frost and fire is dreary and inhospitable to the last degree; and a glance at the map will show that the boundaries separating the eighteen Syslur, or counties, start from the coast, and in many instances, after running some distance inland, vanish, there being, it would seem, nothing in the unpeopled deserts of the interior worth dividing. These deserts consist "of barren table-land, which attains in some places an elevation of 2,500 feet above sea-level."

The party left Reykjavik early in August, with three guides and twenty-two horses, two for each rider, and the rest for baggage, for only the roughest horse-tracks are to be found in the country, and tents and provisions have to be carried on pack-horses. Geysir, a name which applies only to the chief, and not to the whole system of hot-springs, was visited, and a careful survey of the series was made. Judging, says Mr. Coles, from the reports of travellers at the commencement of this century, these springs do not appear to have the same intensity as then, whilst their number and positions seem to have changed a good deal. Iceland is a land of changes, resulting from the constant volcanic action which has been going on from a remote antiquity to the present day, discharges of lava altering the courses of streams, overflowing fertile valleys, and covering whole districts with waste and desolation. The island is three-fourths the size of England, but of its 38,000 square miles, 33,000 consist of volcanic desert, with numerous ice-mountains, called "jökull," and the largest of these, "Vatna Jökull," has, Mr. Coles tells us, an area equal to that of the county of Cornwall. The Census of 1881 gave the number of the inhabitants as only 73,000, showing an increase of about 3,300 in the preceding ten years. And yet Iceland, desolate and sparsely peopled as it is, and always has been—the number of its people never, probably, exceeding 100,000—offers features of no less interest in its history than in its geology. Its scenery is grand, and in places terrific, and whilst the geologist may ponder over the effects of past stupendous upheavals, an exhibition of Nature's most powerful machinery in motion may be found close at hand, yielding in its investigation plenty of excitement and no small degree of danger. In this island, far from the political convulsions which tore Europe asunder for hundreds of years, undisturbed by their turmoil, and holding no spoils to tempt an invader, the descendants of the Norwegian nobles who first settled on its shores gave themselves with wondrous energy to the pursuit of learning, produced a native literature which is among the oldest in Europe, and have left a domestic history more complete than that of any other European nation, whilst their country became during the dark ages the seat of learning and of religion. Abroad, their doings were still more wonderful. In the tenth century they discovered and colonised Greenland, along whose western coast, even as far north as Disco, their settlements flourished until 1409, when they suddenly and strangely perished, and their very sites were forgotten. Within the last 150 years, however, ruins of their churches, with urns, implements, and Runic stones, have been found. That the Icelandic mariners discovered America early in the eleventh century is also certain, and although it is difficult to say at what exact points of the coast they landed, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia were known to them. There is little doubt, too, that these Northmen knew of Massachusetts, under the name of Vinland, or Wineland, where they found, as the first English settlers found also centuries later, vines growing wild on the hills, and Indian corn on the lowlands. Traditions of these lost colonies remained after they had vanished, and in 1477, Columbus arrived at Reykjavik, in a Bristol ship, anxious probably to gather all information obtainable about the lands beyond the western seas.

But to return to Mr. Coles. Hekla was visited, and we are told that its ascent involves no climbing, but owing to the loose sand which must be crossed before reaching the snow-line, it is a matter of very hard walking; and the guide, Jonson, who is famous for his fast walking, goes too fast for many persons, and will not be induced to slacken his pace. So only one of the party, Mr. Morgan, got to the top of this volcano. The two chief dangers met with by travellers in Iceland are the fording of the numerous small, but treacherous, rivers which flow from the ice-mountains, and the perilous bogs and quick-sands which everywhere beset the routes. Every now and then, one of the horses would step into some trap of this sort, and come down as if shot; or stick fast in mud, and release itself with great difficulty. As a rule, practice makes the Icelandic horses, like those of Norway, very sure-footed; and these wary little beasts, if left to themselves, will avoid dangerous spots, whilst they will gallop at speed over ground that it would baffle the efforts of an English horse to walk over. "Use doth breed a habit in a man,"—and in a horse also. There are only two guides who will lead a party across the Sprengisandr desert, by which route it was desired to reach the northern coast. Mr. Coles gives an excellent account of the scenery and incidents met with on this journey over the wastes of the interior, during which many observations were made, and angles taken. The actual passage of the desert itself occupied ten hours, and Mr. Coles, with plenty of experience, says that the Sprengisandr is "one of the most barren and forbidding places in the whole world." Mr. Morgan ascended Askja, a volcano that in 1875 destroyed six farms, and covered a wide district with showers of ashes and pumice, whilst the smoke from the mountain was seen one hundred miles away. In his risky climb to these still active craters, he was guided by Jón of Vidrkær, a man who, during the last great eruption, first organised a party to visit the then unknown region of Askja, and it was owing in large measure to his representations that a scientific expedition was sent by the Danish Government to explore the volcano and report on its action. Although Hekla is the only volcano in Iceland whose name is known to the generality of people, it is by no means the only one; nor, although it rears its snowy head higher than its rivals, is it, in these days, the most important. There are no fewer than thirty volcanoes in the island, and of these, five have been active during the present century. Hekla was in violent action in 1766, and did enormous damage; but by far the most terrible catastrophe on record was caused by the eruption of a far-distant mountain, Skapta Jökull, in 1783, whereby thousands of cattle, horses, and sheep, and probably some thousands of human beings, were destroyed.

It is not only from terror by fire that Iceland suffers. If northerly winds prevail for a long period, unwelcome visitors "from Greenland's icy mountains," in the shape of huge masses of ice, arrive on the northern coasts, and cause intense cold and fogs; and the harvest of hay, at all times miserably scanty and precarious, fails, famine ensues, and cattle, sheep, and horses perish. At the present time, Iceland is threatened with a calamity of this kind. During the winter of 1880-81, we are told that the cold was intense, the thermometer standing for some time at 25° below zero, (Fahr.) At Akreyri, the chief port on the northern coast, Polar bears became quite common. They were quite harmless when on land, making off when any one went near, and at the approach of spring they swam away. It is worthy of note that Akreyri means "corn land," but at the present time not one acre of corn is grown in Iceland; hence, it is inferred that formerly the climate was more genial than at present. But in spite of all hardship and privation, the Icelanders have a deep love for their country, and are, judging from Mr. Coles's account of them, hospitable, kindly, and honest, whilst they keep up their old love for learning to a remarkable degree. Our author says:—

"Arriving at a farm, we stopped to change horses, and get our mid-day meal of skyr, coffee, and black-bread. In the room where we were sitting, I noticed a book-shelf, and being curious to know the kind of literature which found favour with the small farmer of this country, I took a book down, when, to my astonishment, I found it to be a Danish edition of Lockyer's Solar Physics. Our host, an elderly man, who had just come in from his work, was good enough to show me some other books in his small collection, amongst which were some of the works of Darwin and Lardner; he had also a Virgil. They had evidently been well used, and so far as I could understand him, he seemed to be well acquainted with their contents. I was afterwards informed that it is by no means uncommon in Iceland to come across men of this class who are extremely well-read scholars."

* Summer Travelling in Iceland. By John Coles. London: John Murray. 1882.

Mr. Coles pretends to be no extraordinary mountaineer himself, but he met an American gentleman, whose account of his feat in climbing Herdubreid, a mountain hitherto deemed inaccessible, and published later on in the New York Tribune and in the Weekly Detroit Free Press, was as follows:—

"The only way to ascend for 1,500 feet was to fly a large kite with an anchor attached, and a rope fastened to the anchor. After securing the anchor to the rocks above my head, I could pull myself up by means of the rope. By repeating this operation many times, I made the ascent in thirty-eight hours."

And this "when it was blowing and snowing so that he could not see fifty feet from him." The readiness of resource shown by this gentleman reminds us of another story, of an American who was boasting that in his country they had the biggest of everything,—biggest rivers, lakes, fires, railway accidents, &c. His listener, an Englishman, assented to all this; but added that there was one thing—perhaps only one—that the States did not possess at all,—a volcano. Silenced but for a moment, the other replied with cheerfulness, "Well, that's so; but I guess we have a Niagara that would put one out in a minute!"

In an appendix to his narrative, which is clear and unaffected throughout, Mr. Coles gives much useful advice to intending travellers in Iceland; and the whole book is full of hints and information, all the more valuable since Mr. C. Warnford Lock's work, The Home of the Eddas, is out of print. A translation of three sagas—and without something of the sort, a book on Iceland would hardly be considered complete—is given; whilst a very full index and an excellent map bring the volume, by no means a lengthy one, to a close.

GIACOMO LEOPARDI.*

THE volume before us contains translations of the chief prose works of one of the most remarkable of modern Italian writers, and is, therefore, of considerable value and interest. As to its own qualities, they are not unlike those of a photograph which gives us correctly enough the outlines of some beloved face, but gives them to us so harsh and cold, that we would not have it seen by those who do not know the original. And yet Mr. Edwards is evidently an ardent admirer of his subject,—a far more ardent and uncompromising admirer than we can profess to be. "The name of Giacomo Leopardi," he says, "is not yet a household word in the mouths of Englishmen;" but he desires that it should be so, and to that end has "Englished" (according to the old phrase) the finest of the Italian's writings. We do not greatly share the desire, nor at all the hope, which has inspired his labours. For even if the extreme beauty of style which charms us in the original could ever survive the process of translation, if the delicate fancy could preserve its wings unclipped, the pure thought be unweakened, still, we would no more choose to feed the minds of our countrymen and women with the despairing utterances of the pessimist poet, than we would their bodies with hashish. Such melancholy as his, clothed in such eloquent words, may be the luxury of the idle; it is poison to those who have work to do in the world. It shuts out hope, the very spring of energy; it makes the cheerful, steady pursuit of duty a thing utterly beyond human powers. For we can none of us stand alone. Either in human or divine love, we must find the mainspring of all life worth living. There must be something outside of ourselves, which we regard not with despair, but with hope.

Giacomo Leopardi was born at Recanati, near Ancona, in 1798. His family was noble, but not rich, and he was one of several children. The precocious boy, at eight years old, "set himself the task of reading in chronological order the Greek authors in his father's library," and at barely twenty writes, "I have for a long time firmly believed that I must die within two or three years, because I have so ruined myself by seven years of immoderate and excessive study." He was by this time known to many of the foremost men in Italy as a scholar and a writer, and was impatiently longing to escape from home into the great world. In 1822, after a series of disputes with his father, he went to Rome, only to find disappointment and weariness. Though he had despised his townsmen while he remained at Recanati, he now declared the stupidest of them wiser than the wisest Roman. Yet among those who were kind and admiring friends of the young poet were such men as Niebuhr and De Bunsen, and, as not uncongenial work, he obtained an engagement to catalogue the Greek MSS. in the Barbarini Library. Less than a year of life in Rome sufficed for him; he returned home, and henceforth seems to have had but one pervading thought,—the infelicità—the boundless, hopeless misery of human life. In 1833 he became the guest of a friend, Antonio Ranieri, in whose house, tended with constant affection, he remained until his death, in June, 1837. In his last days he was afraid lest posterity should attribute the gloom of his philosophy to the state of his health, and tried to defend himself from such an accusation. But a self-deception of this kind is the commonest thing possible, and his defence does not seem to us to be of much account. Rather, indeed, we are disposed to say, "Qui s'excuse, s'accuse."

We fancy that Leopardi has given his view of himself in the dialogue between Nature and a Soul. Perhaps he did not intend to do so, but as he was unquestionably alive to his genius, he most probably found the original of the portrait in his own consciousness. We have, therefore, translated the passage:—

"Soul.—Tell me, are excellence and extraordinary unhappiness the same thing? or if they are two things, cannot you separate the one from the other?"

"Nature.—In the souls of men, it may be said that these two things are almost the same, because excellence in souls implies greater comprehension of their life, and this in itself implies also keener feeling of their own unhappiness, or, as I might say, greater unhappiness. . . . In the same manner, the fuller life of souls includes greater strength of self-love. . . . which means greater desire for happiness, and consequently more discontent and weariness in the deprivation of it, and more pain in the adverse circumstances that hinder it. . . . Moreover, the refinement of your own intellect, and the liveliness of your imagination, will in a great measure deprive you of self-mastery. . . . Men such as you, constantly wrapped up in themselves, dominated, as it were, by the greatness of their own powers, and helpless against themselves, lie most of their time under a burden of irresolution, both as regards their thoughts and their actions; and this is one of the heaviest miseries of human life. Add to this that, while by the excellency of your talents you will easily and quickly surpass others of your race in profound knowledge, and in the most abstruse studies, it will, nevertheless, be extremely difficult or even impossible for you to learn or practise a thousand things, trifling in themselves, but most necessary in intercourse with other men. All the souls of men, as I have told you, are given up as a prey to unhappiness, without fault of mine."

What wonder is it, if the soul, threatened with such a fate as this, cries out, "Place me, then, in the lowest of creatures, or give me, I implore you, death, rather than immortality!"

But though we should be sorry to see Leopardi's pessimism exercising its baneful influence over the young and imaginative natures which would be most likely to be fascinated by it, we are not blind to the truth and greatness of his genius. It is difficult to imagine a more exquisite piece of writing than the Cantico del Gallo Silvestro, more delicate humour than that of Copernico, or more beauty of thought than shines through the Dialogues in general. We should like to give many extracts, if space permitted; but we must limit ourselves to two, one verse, one prose. The first is taken from the Dialogo di Federigo Ruysch e delle sue Mummie, and is the conclusion of the song with which at midnight Ruysch is awakened by the dead in his studio:—

"CHE FUMMO?"

Che fu quel punto acerbo
Che di vita ebbe nome?
Cosa arcana e stupenda
Oggi è la vita al pensier nostro, e tale
Qual dei vivi al pensiero L'ignota morte appar. Come da morte
Vivendo rifuggia, così refugge
Dalla fiamma vitale
Nostra ignuda natura;
Lieta no, ma sicura.
Però ch'esser beato,
Nega ai mortali, e nega ai morti,
il fato."

MR. EDWARDS'S TRANSLATION.

"What is that life we lived on earth?
A mystery now it seems to be Profound as is the thought of death
To wearers of mortality.
And as from death the living flee,
So from the vital flame flee we.
Our portion now is peaceful rest,
Joyless, painless. We are not blest
With happiness, that is forbid,
Both to the living and the dead."

Our second extract is from the Dialogo di Torquato Tasso e del suo Genio Familiare. The imprisoned poet, talking to the familiar spirit which visits him in his cell, tells how at each recollection of his Leonora a flash of joy darts through his whole being:—

* Essays and Dialogues of G. Leopardi. Translated by Charles Edwards. London: Tribner and Co.

"Thus, while thinking of her, there revive in my mind certain pictures and certain emotions, such that for a little time I seem to be again the same Torquato I was before I had made trial of sorrows and of men, and whom now I so often weep as dead. . . . I marvel in myself how the thought of a woman can have force enough to renew, so to speak, my very soul, and to make me forget so many calamities. And if it were not that I have no longer hope of seeing her again, I should think that I had not yet lost the power of being happy."

"Which of the two things do you fancy would be sweetest, to see the woman you love, or to think of her?"

"I do not know. It is true that when she was present she seemed to me a woman; absent, she seemed, and still seems, a goddess."

The translation in the right-hand column is by Mr. Edwards. The one on the left we have ventured to supply as being more literal.

A GOLDEN BAR.*

THIS is a work in some respects like, and in others unlike, many of those at present popular. Like them, it aims at imparting interest less by a complex plot than by good descriptions, skilful delineations of character, and scenes that illustrate modern life both in its familiar and its picturesque details. Whether this be a wise aim or not, is matter now much in dispute. Those who object to it, point to the carefully constructed plots of Fielding's novels, and of "the wonderful works" of Sir Walter Scott, as Leigh Hunt calls them. Those who prefer the style now most in use would probably cite The Vicar of Wakefield, the separate scenes in which, especially scenes of humour, can never be forgotten, while a considerable part of the story is remembered by few. The Angel in the House, begins by the exclamation, "We'll have no incidents!" and but few occur in that poem; but the vivid pictures of modern life, which succeed each other so rapidly, prevent us from regretting their absence. In this work the interest derived from incident is confined to narrow limits, but within these limits the story is worked out with much art and a happy discrimination.

Old Squire Haseltine is a county magnate, with a grand park and house, which bear the name of their lord. As death draws near, he meets for the first time pecuniary embarrassments. He cannot leave his property to his eldest son, who has died; nor to his younger son, with whom he has quarrelled; and he cannot take it with him. The widow of his eldest son has long lived with him in the great house, and also one who made it look to the last as bright as when he dwelt there in youth, viz., Iris Durant, the daughter of that son's wife by a former marriage; for by the second marriage there have been no children. He makes a will, leaving his property to Iris. The girl, who is as just as she is proud and beautiful, will not consent to this arrangement, and at her entreaty the old man bequeaths his wealth to the son of his younger son. The squire and his son both die soon after, and the grandson becomes the lord of Haseltine. Iris makes up her mind to hate him, since her grandfather, whose memory she idolizes, hated his father. Her mother, however, Mrs. Haseltine, a still handsome and somewhat designing woman of forty, has other plans. She does not wish to be turned out of the manor-house, and resolves that Iris shall marry the "Intruder." Iris resents the plot. She had been brought up in splendour, and she has become comparatively a pauper. But she has never valued wealth, nor feared poverty, and she does not want to be married.

Haseltine arrives at his home; he invites his aunt to remain at it for some time; admires her daughter for her witching ways and lively wit, and hears her one day tell her mother that she detests him. He had been previously half disposed to seek her, and now, of course, resolves to win her. He is unlike the young triflers Iris has often repelled,—reserved, dignified, and somewhat sad, for he has had troubles. By degrees she grows to love him; but she is very angry with herself for loving the enemy, very angry with him

"My mind, too, becomes inflamed with certain imaginings and longings, that seem for the time to transform me. I cannot think that I am the Torquato who has experienced so much misfortune, and I often mourn for myself as though I were dead. . . . In short, I marvel how the thought of a woman should have sufficient power to rejuvenate the mind, and make it forget so many troubles. Had I not lost all hope of seeing Leonora again, I could almost believe I might still succeed in being happy."

"Which do you consider the more delightful, to see the dear woman, or to think of her?"

"I do not know. It is true that when near me, she seemed only a woman; at a distance, however, she was like a goddess."

for making her do so, and fully resolved that he shall never know of her affection. The girl is proud; but love is humble. It does not occur to her that Haseltine can have found in her anything worthy of his love; and she will never allow him to marry her merely that she may not be turned out of house and home. The more the pair grow attached, the more they manage to wage war against the happiness each of the other, much assisted by the mother of Iris whose ingenuity is always frustrating her own ambitious schemes, and also by two fashionable sisters of Haseltine, who wish to reign as mistresses of his house. He pursues her still; but Iris is worthy of her name, and the rainbow moves ever before him, but to mock him.

The charm of this book is much enhanced by its lightness of touch in those descriptive passages so often spoilt by being laboured. Here is an average specimen of such:—

"Losing patience one evening, Haseltine exclaims, 'No; if we are to be friends, let us begin at once.'—'What is the first step?' she asked, half in jest, half in earnest. So speaking, she leant a little way from him, shaking the bench upon which they sat, and a daisy in full flower behind it; a cloud of sweet-scented snowy petals fell in a shower upon her dusky hair, and flecked her black dress with white. Twilight was gathering round them; the red azaleas looked like tongues of flame amongst the leaves; only one stream of light from the door which opened into the house lay along the pavement, and trembled in the lilies of the valley,—and at their feet. 'What is the first step?' repeated Haseltine. . . . He broke off, as steps and voices approached them, the lady-like steps and the well-modulated voices of the Miss Haseltines."

A sudden gleam of delight on the countenance of Iris when Haseltine unexpectedly returns after an absence makes him almost sure that his affection is not unreciprocated. That afternoon he goes forth to meet her:—

"It was a day when wealthy summer had spread out all her treasures of earth and sky with careless lavishness. As he reached the last gate leading on to the high-road Haseltine paused, looking down from the sapphire heavens above him to the little blue flower at his feet. There was a faint line of light upon the western horizon, where, a few hours later, the sun would set in regal splendour; the birds still twittered, but faintly, and under the woods already the flowers, with drooping heads, were shutting up their leaves."

Iris approaches without seeing him, but accompanied by one in whom Haseltine, from the words that reach his ears, strongly suspects a successful rival. He again takes refuge in reserve. The mother of Iris, by way of mending matters, lets him know that but for Iris he would have been disinherited. Her daughter deeply resents the betrayal of this secret, and with increasing coldness repulses his advances, which she attributes to gratitude, not love. She persuades her mother to take her away from the old house. "So you will put your woman's pride and self-will before all else. . . . And yet I believe that you liked me." . . . "I cannot," she faltered. "Are you quite sure," he said, in a changed voice. "Quite sure," she answered. They separate.

An amusing contrast to this perplexed love-making is supplied by the prosperous courtship of Sir Louis Stretton. He falls in love with an amusing little girl not half his age. She is not deep-hearted, but neither is she like Iris, the victim of high-flown scruples. She likes him all the better because he has broad acres to offer her. A week before the marriage they converse on the bright prospects before them:—

"'After I am married,' continued his fiancée, 'I shall, of course, have my own way in everything!'—'Well! I don't know about that,' said Sir Louis, dubiously.—'But I must know. It must be settled beforehand. I am sure it is quite as important as the settlements. If you are not free to make yourself happy——'—'But it is I who am to make you happy. Will not that be much better?' asked Sir Louis. But Letty was looking out of the window.—'I don't think you would know how,' she said candidly. 'I am sure you would try; but how should a man know what a girl wants? I might as well try to choose your cigars or your after-dinner claret.' A quarrel breaks out; Letty pronounces herself insulted, and laments that she has not a brother old enough to challenge her future husband. Sir Louis's boy-brother, Raymond, comes in, 'How wretched you both look! How glad I am that I am not going to be married.'"

This light-hearted youth of seventeen is one of the best-conceived characters in the book; he is full of wit, while he fancies himself nearly a fool, and so friendly, that every one loves him. On one occasion, he amusingly consoles a little boy accused of cowardice, by assuring him that he himself, though now bold as a lion, was such a coward when first sent to school that once, when on the point of being flogged, he fumbled in his pocket for his last shilling, and offered it to his angry master on condition of being spared. The contrast between the brightness of this sketch and the tragedy which follows so suddenly, is at once original and suggestive. If the main story tells us of the woes unreal, yet slowly healed, which we bring upon ourselves, this touching episode reminds us of the magic might by which the deeper sorrows sent to us are consoled. Raymond has received an injury while out hunting. In his sickness his spirits never flag. It is still of others that he is always thinking. He gets the children from the lodge into his bedroom, amuses them, and replies to anxious inquiries with a jest, which a devout friend fears may be a sign of irreverence. "She had found herself awed by Raymond's bright, dark eyes, so that she left the room as she found it, littered with all those incongruous tokens of his past pursuits; a shrill, gay bullfinch and a playful kitten for his companions." The change he alone had not feared comes:—

* A Golden Bar. By the Author of "Christina North," "Under the Lime," &c. 3 vols. London: Hurst and Blackett.

"With the suddenness of a tropical night, the great darkness was to close in upon his sunshiny life and quench it for ever. No, no; what was he saying? He knew that his brother should dwell for ever in the light, but it was 'a light which no man might approach unto.' It seemed almost more strange than sad, that he should be called all at once from his violin and his tennis-playing, from the companionship of Jacko and his dogs, to take his place amid angelic choirs, amongst the heavenly host."

Mr. Crane, the good clergyman, thinks,—

"It was very hard upon the young fellow, just at the outset of his career. . . . but it was, no doubt, the young man's duty to resign himself, and meet his fate bravely. He spoke to Raymond after he had read and prayed with him, somewhat to this effect. Raymond only turned those great, lustrous eyes of his upon him, and smiled. He thought it strange that God's minister should pity him who was about to be admitted, all unworthy as he was, to the heavenly Jerusalem, and all those good things which the heart of man cannot conceive."

Then comes the end. The boy and his elder brother have all their lives been devoted to each other:—

"Let it be,—when only we two are alone together," Raymond had said, with halting, labouring breath, turning his sweet, gleaming eyes for the last time upon his brother. Then Sir Louis had shut the door upon them all, and taken Raymond's head upon his breast, and so, till the night passed slowly into day, they waited, they two together."

To Raymond belonged, without his knowing it, the blessing promised to the peace-makers. Between Sir Louis and his light-hearted young wife frivolous contention had early begun to supervene upon frivolous gaiety. The death which brought to each a sense of the realities of life, brought peace to the troubled household. Raymond's life had been innocent, and his faith had never been shaken or clouded. This was the simple solution of what to those who wondered at his calmness seemed strange. But this solution is suggested only. It is one of the merits of the book that there is no preaching in it, while the spirit is ever sound and salutary; and doubtless such spiritual suggestions as must ever come from a good work of imagination, are most acceptable when they make their way to us, like the visits of the Gods, "in leni aurâ," not in dusty gusts of teaching, obtrusive and unseasonable.

With time the difficulties of the lovers but increase. The proud beauty cannot be got to believe that Haseltine loves her, and will not be married out of compassion. At last the worldly mother raises a second obstacle, no less fatal than the first, to her own designs. The old squire had drawn up another legal document later than his will, which, though it does not leave Iris his landed estate, provides that the rest of his property, far the larger part of it, is to be hers in case she does not marry. Iris spurns the gift, and burns the legal paper which conveys it; but her mother has a second copy of it, and shows it to her lover. The tables are turned. It is now his turn to be proud. He will not woo further a lady who, besides having refused a Haseltine twice, has the additional guilt of being an heiress. He cannot, with this change in his fortunes, continue to keep up his family mansion, and he resolves to leave it for ever. Iris, who had scorned humiliation, has to humiliate herself. He is to depart the next morning. She has ceased to doubt his motives, and believes in his love. She casts her pride away, visits him in the grey dawn, tells him that she will never avail herself of his grandfather's gift, and in an agony of grief and penitence reveals the long-hidden secret of her love. But it is now too late. The proud man, disinherited, will not believe in her affection, and will not profit by her generosity. He answers, "You would give me back Haseltine even at the cost of giving me yourself," and departs. The peace-maker on this occasion is not a dead youth, but a dying child. During a part of his wandering life, of which little is told us, Haseltine had been married to one little worthy of him, who died a year after their marriage, leaving him a little boy, Claude. Claude is but five years old, and has recently resided in the abandoned manor house. The child catches an infectious fever, and is at once deserted by Haseltine's fashionable sisters. Iris leaves her cottage hard by, nurses the child till he is out of danger, and is found by Haseltine, who has been summoned, one morning just before sunrise, asleep on a sofa, not far from the little patient, whom his father had expected to find dead. Suddenly they come to understand each other,—but whether through an increase of wisdom,—each of them having learned that pride is not a thing to be proud of, and that true love is not a thing to be spurned,—or through some skilful device of the lawyers allowing each to be happy, in spite of the newly-discovered codicil, and without either of them condescending to humiliation, we shall not record. The readers of this book, and it will probably have many, will prefer to make the discovery for themselves. The tale is wholly free from the pretensions bad-taste now so common. It is written with singular felicity of style and uniform purity and refinement; it abounds in lively dialogue and vivid description; and while it is free from all that is "sensational," it does not lack scenes of passion, in the higher sense of that often misused word.

NATURE AND THOUGHT.*

THE old problem which has from the days of Pyrrho exercised the ingenuity of philosophers, the attempt to justify theoretically the beliefs which none can practically shake off in the avowments of our faculties, and in an objective external world, has here been restated and discussed by Mr. Mivart, well known as a writer on anatomy and physiology. His work is intended, he tells us, as an introduction to a "natural philosophy,"—that is, as he explains, to a system which, "as justifying the spontaneous natural dictates of man's uncultured reason by philosophical analysis, and as seeking to make plain the concord of the world of Nature with the world of Thought, may perhaps be allowed (if it succeeds in its task) to have made good its claim to the honourable title of a Natural Philosophy." We hold the book to be a serviceable one, as containing a pointed and intelligent résumé of much that has been said by the best writers, on both sides, about questions of the deepest and most practical interest; and as offering, here and there, an original thought or suggestion of some value. It can hardly be considered, however, as a whole, an original contribution to the literature of the subject. There are, no doubt, incidentally, acute and telling remarks, but the evident absence in the writer of any power of sustained philosophical thinking, and the consequent incompleteness of his treatment of most of the many questions which he passes in review, are fatal to any high pretensions in that direction. When we say incompleteness, we do not mean simply incompleteness of development. This is, of course, to be expected in a work of the dimensions of Nature and Thought, which, as only professing to be an "introduction," would disarm criticism on that score. What we rather mean is the evident absence of that power to see all round a subject, to note at once the consequences of each view, and its bearing on the rest of his system, which is essential to the work of a true philosopher, though it is not necessary that he should draw these things out explicitly and in detail, in all that he writes. Cardinal Newman, for instance, in his essay on "Assent," although some might say that he did not quite exhaust an almost inexhaustible question, nevertheless makes it plain to his readers that he has thought his subject through and through. No objection can arise in their mind which is not anticipated by him; and even where his limits prevent him from fully developing the reply of which he indicates the direction, it is so clear that all considerations which arise in the minds of his students as difficulties have been already felt by himself, that their trust in him as a teacher is strengthened by the very force of his statement of prima facie objections. In reading Professor Mivart's work, we felt the very opposite of this. No doubt, incidental objections are stated by him with great force—objections raised by recognised writers on the subject—but his thought is wanting in maturity; it has not been long enough "in bottle," and he consequently fails often to see the bearing and consequences of his own views, beyond those which are most superficial and immediately evident; and makes no attempt to harmonise principles which appear to conflict. A notable instance of this is his hasty conclusion that, because a good "First Cause" must certainly have made happiness depend, in the long-run, upon goodness, we may, therefore, accept Herbert Spencer's doctrine of the evolution of the moral sentiment by "past pressures of utility." His language on this point seems to us quite express; but we place it before our readers, that they may judge whether or no we have represented him fairly:—

* Nature and Thought: an Introduction to a Natural Philosophy. By St. George Mivart. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1882.

"We may fully accept Herbert Spencer's views as to the means by which materially moral habits and feelings have been evolved, and have thus prepared the way for the existence of formal morality. His error is to mistake the mere instrument of evolution for the cause, as a cockroach might regard only the broom, and be blind to the mistress of the house, who had ordered the housemaid to sweep it away. Thoroughly analysed, Herbert Spencer's view is eminently satisfactory, for two reasons. One is (1), his teaching that conduct should be conformed to an end; the other is (2), that we are to act with confidence upon moral sentiments which have become innate in us, trusting to the good effects of evolution. But such teaching implies the existence of a deep purpose in nature, and this purpose must harmonise with that inextinguishable desire for beatitude which is also innate in man. A good First Cause must, then, have given to man, as the end of his being, a perfect beatitude coincidentally with a perfect moral development."

Now, we do not forget to bear in mind the distinction which Mr. Mivart draws between what is "materially" moral, and what "formally." But this does not really affect the case. The only difference between the two—using the terms in the scholastic sense—is that what is materially moral implies only objective morality, without regard to the motive of the agent. Thus, Mr. Mivart really accepts Spencer's view as to our perception of what is or is not objectively right. Now, no doubt, according to God's Providence, what is objectively right coincides, in the long-run, with what is for our greatest happiness; and, if Herbert Spencer's view amounted to no more than this—that in the course of evolution an instinct has been formed, by the past experiences of the race, which now tells at once what is and what is not for our ultimate happiness,—it might possibly be defended, as consistent with the Christian view of morality. But Mr. Mivart seems to forget that Herbert Spencer's view, "thoroughly analysed," as he puts it, involves very much more than that, and something very distinct from it. In the first place, that series of experiences which has, according to Spencer, generated the moral instinct, is, of course, exclusively confined to experiences in this world,—and it is certainly very far from true that good actions invariably, or even generally, bring the greatest happiness in this life; so that no permanent association between goodness and ultimate happiness can have been bred or transmitted on such a principle. But secondly, and more importantly, the whole of Mr. Spencer's ethics rests on a purely biological basis of evolution. By natural selection, those survive who have the keenest sense, and habits founded on this sense, of what tends to the ultimate furtherance of life. This sense, and the resulting tendency, is transmitted to their posterity, and forms what we call the moral instinct. We have no space here to examine this theory, or even to state it as a whole; but what we would draw attention to is that it changes the objective morality of actions. We have frequently pointed out that our moral perceptions aver many an act to be right which does not tend to the increase or preservation of life, and vice versa. In many cases in which the effects of an action on the lives of the individual or of the race are clearly visible—and such cases must be the crucial ones—our spontaneous moral approbation is far greater for that which fulfils Mr. Spencer's conditions imperfectly, than for that which completely satisfies them. His highest instance of right conduct is a mother suckling her child, because "there is at once to the mother gratification, and to the child satisfaction of appetite, a satisfaction which accompanies furtherance of life, growth, and increasing enjoyment." Now, does this act arouse our moral approbation in any degree approaching to the admiration which we feel for one who could save the lives of himself and his family by betraying the friend who has trusted him, and yet refuses to do so? No doubt, there are virtues which tell in favour of the life of the race, such as prudence, fortitude, temperance, and so forth. But it is plain that our spontaneous feeling of moral approval cannot be accounted for on principles which would result in an ideal of morality which does not arouse that spontaneous feeling. Either the "suckling mother" is not the ideal saint, or else the moral instinct tells untruly, and is not, as Mr. Spencer says it is, to be trusted. The truth is, of course, that the ultimate coincidence of goodness and happiness is not wrought out, as Mr. Mivart says it is, by the First Cause working through evolution, supposing evolution to be a substantially true theory. That coincidence is in a sphere quite external to evolution,—in a future state, of which Mr. Spencer takes no account.

In making this criticism, we do not at all forget Mr. Mivart's avowal, earlier in the volume, that moral goodness is a simple idea, distinct from utility, personal or tribal. We do not believe that he can reconcile this with his later statement; but anyhow, it is beside the question. The point we are examining is not how far the goodness of the agent involves an idea incapable of further analysis, but how far that course of objective action which our conscience tells us to be right coincides with the course which will tend to the "highest life" of the race, excluding any future state, and having regard only to the good results of evolution. Unless this coincidence exists, as Mr. Spencer supposes, the theory of the evolution of the moral sentiment fails. We have done our very best to understand Mr. Mivart on this important subject, and we cannot but come to the conclusion that he has not quite thought out his own view. There is, somewhat earlier in the book than the passage we have quoted, a sufficient account of the evolutionist explanation of conscience, which makes his later statement the more remarkable.

There are, as we have said, various excellent and acute remarks here and there throughout the volume, but we could have wished that the author had concentrated his thoughts longer upon any one of his five chapters, instead of giving us a number of remarks, insufficiently woven together, and scarcely developed, though occasionally brilliant in themselves, upon so wide a philosophical field. We are not opposed to the form of "question and answer" which he has adopted; but when we find a love-story and a scene with chit-chat about indifferent topics, we wish that the dramatic form had been more sustained. Fancy a friend, walking with one in a Yorkshire valley, who, on being asked what he considers the advantages of the philosophy he advocates, answers at once, and without hesitation, as if perfectly prepared for the question, "It has, I think, ten advantages," and proceeds to enumerate them. Here is a fine passage on asceticism, as the test and expression of love:—

"The voluntary sacrifice of pleasure is valuable as a test of human love, and may be eagerly sought for by him who practises it as the best expression of the devotion he feels for another. Does not Emily [his fiancée] value you the more on account of your disregard of certain worldly advantages you willingly forego for her, and do you not rejoice at being able to give her this evidence of your regard? Would you forego it, if you could? If this relation applies to human love, how much more to our love for God,—a God in whom all our highest ideals are realised. If in his service we may be permitted to undergo humiliation, pain, and suffering, who that understands the theistic conception does not see that it would be reasonable for us to welcome such humiliation and suffering? If, in the pursuit of all that brings us nearer to him, we can gratefully and lovingly deny ourselves lower pleasures which tend to impede or slacken us in such pursuit, who that believes in God can doubt but that he ought to spurn such pleasures, and be grateful to God for having granted him the opportunity of so spurning them? Thus you see the principle of asceticism is as deeply implanted in human nature, as is the perception of virtue, and the feeling of love."

THOREAU'S EXAMPLE.*

THE "Life" of Thoreau which has been written for the American Men of Letters series, by Mr. Sanborn, is too slight to merit much praise. The facts of Thoreau's life are not set in sufficiently consecutive order to present him as a whole. Mr. Sanborn has, however, given some interesting sketches of the society to which the town of Concord owes its fame. The Transcendental movement which found its utterance in the philosophy of Emerson and Alcott had its home in Concord, and in that enthusiastic atmosphere, if anywhere, human existence might hope to break through existing traditions, and frame for itself new social laws, unweighted by the fetters which society slowly forges for an old country. No one in Concord was ashamed to unite manual with intellectual labour. These men were farmers and shopkeepers, and yet produced intellectual work for which the world will always be the richer. Thoreau himself, when not dwelling in the woods, in order, as he says, "to live deliberately, and front only the essential facts of life," was manufacturing lead pencils, or, what suited him still better, working by the day at any labour that came to hand. But whatever the employment was, it was only the setting to the real life itself. Under each aspect in turn he was following the bent of his own genius. He was not a manufacturer, nor a day labourer, nor a woodsman, but he dared to show the world that he was free to be any one of these, if he so pleased. Thoreau was essentially the Apostle of Freedom. No word has had more current use for the last hundred years; but, looking round, who can say that the word has any practical meaning on its social side? How few dare to seem poor, however poor they may be. How few feel themselves free to follow any special taste or talent, if it draws them to adopt a life differing in any marked degree from that of the social circle in which they happen to find themselves. What educated person, for instance, would not be left on one side by that society whose unwritten laws he broke, if he deliberately chose to have very few material wants, and elected to satisfy those wants by manual labour? And yet with some men, their finest intellectual work can only be done for love, and manual labour may be to them refreshment and delight. If the character with which a man is born is said to be unchangeable, how far more unchangeable are the requirements which civilisation enforces. Like a spider, she enwraps her winged prey with silken threads, knowing well that her strength is but gossamer, unless she stifles her victim. If she cannot persuade him with words of promise, she will terrify him with imaginary fears. Civilisation does not always move in the same groove, but she always moves in one direction. She does not always require men to be rich or cultured, but she requires them to be like one another. Her fate may be to give birth to a phoenix, but she will excommunicate her unnatural son, although one day he may be destined to provide her with a fresh point of departure.

* American Men of Letters: Henry D. Thoreau. By F. B. Sanborn. London: Sampson Low and Co. 1882.

The peculiar merit of Thoreau lies in his being a philosopher in action, as well as in word. Most men never realise the logical deduction from certain premises. They profess to have weighed in a just balance worldly success and freedom for individual taste to develope, but they blind themselves to the fact that here, as elsewhere, you cannot serve two masters. If worldly success is to be greatly honoured, it must be at the expense of your individuality, which, perchance, may contain a spark of genius. The common-place, money-making existence offered Thoreau no attraction. He saw through it, and no gilding hid the fact that its ingredients were anxiety and deadening care. His taste was for Nature and intellectual pleasure, but, like so many of that brotherhood, he had little or no means to gratify this taste. With most of us, the problem admits of only one solution. We must make money to live, so we practically end in living to make money. With poverty in the scales, Nature and intellect will weigh very little. Indeed, does not the intellect herself help to betray us? How can we gratify her needs, if we fall short of that social position to which our birth and education entitle us? But we forget that the intellect is within a man, and not without, and it will count for very little, provided we keep it alive, what the special food has been by which it has been nourished. So we still the restless craving after a freer life, by picturing to ourselves a time when accumulated wealth shall set us free to follow our own bent. Age shall revive what youth lets go so lightly. But then the choice will have been made which can never be rescinded. We shall have rejected Nature and Freedom, which in our youth offered us their gifts with royal largeness. When we were young, Nature might have endowed us with her own creative force, and shown us of her secrets, which Nature, like the gods of old, loves to show to youth and strength. Why should she soothe the old age of those who have never sacrificed themselves to her? Do we expect her to be content with a worship which would confine her within the limits of possession, when we rejected her pleadings to know her on mountain and stream? Rather let those of us who were endowed at our birth with a love for Nature and "the land of thought," and choose to ignore this love—to hide it under a life of anxious money-making, to quench it with a stream of worldly care—at least choose with our eyes open. Let us understand that, when we come to be old, we may find, to our cost, that age can only enjoy the pleasures with which it is familiar.

The life of Thoreau during the two years he passed at Walden was liberty, expressed in the clearest language. He could live gaily on what most men would call starvation. By this means, he was able to reconcile his keen intellectual craving, and his still keener love of Nature, with the law of existence. No labour came amiss to him which was honest and straightforward. All he asked of it was that it should set him free to live after his own particular taste. That taste included long periods of absence from labour. Solitude, and what men call idleness, were necessities to him. He was a child of Nature, and drew his nourishment direct from her. Woods and water spoke to him a language in which he delighted, and he responded to them again with living words of love. He built his own hut, and caught his own fish, and tilled his field; but through it all he lived the life which he could honestly say to himself was the best. That is the lesson Thoreau teaches: Live the life you believe in your heart to be best,—your own belief, not another's. It may be that we have not learnt our alphabet, and can hardly tell the meaning of both "belief" and "best." Still, it is better to be conning our own lesson than, parrot-like, to keep repeating some one else's. If the bent of a man's temperament leads him to elect comfort and social success, by all means let him strive for them. The only thing we plead for is freedom, freedom to be poor, freedom to be rich, freedom to be cultured, freedom to be rustic. So long as each one's liberty injures no one else, all are gainers through that liberty. In a society of advanced civilisation, life is necessarily dull. Anything that breaks the dead-level of its flow gives a sense of refreshment and strength. How much encouragement originality of speech and action brings. We had thought we had seen the limits of what was possible, but the freedom of another shows us that we, too, are free. In the middle stage of life, this encouragement is especially needed. Our hearts are not in doing what we see others do, but we can see no hope of doing differently. Life has lost its charm, for we have sounded its possibilities, but the outlook of a fresher mind gives a new impulse to ourselves. But from time immemorial, liberty of action is the one thing of which men will never cease to be jealous. The freedom of the one is a direct challenge to the wisdom of the many. For a man to be unlike his fellows, is to imply that he thinks them in the wrong, and no rebellion is justified until its success is assured.

Once, while in his solitude at Walden, his life appeared to Thoreau trivial, in the light of school and college, and it came over him that he, too, like others, had perhaps chosen the bread that satisfies not. "But," to quote his own words, "as I ran down the hill towards the reddening west, with the rainbow over my shoulder, and some faint, tinkling sounds borne to my ear through the cleansed air, from I know not what quarter, my good genius seemed to say,—Go, fish and hunt far and wide day by day—farther and wider—and rest thee by many brooks and hearth-sides without misgiving. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth. Grow wild according to thy nature, like these sedges and brakes which will never become English hay. Let the thunder rumble; what, if it threaten ruin to farmers' crops? that is not its errand to thee. Take shelter under the cloud, while they flee to carts and sheds. Let not to get a living be thy trade, but thy sport. Enjoy the land, but own it not. Through want of enterprise and faith, men are where they are, buying and selling, and spending their lives like serfs." And so shall the fears of each one of us be laid to rest, if we follow faithfully what we hold to be the highest life.

THE BRITISH NAVY.*

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY has done good service to the Naval profession, and to all connoisseurs in the art of shipbuilding for purposes of war, by the publication of his great work, entitled, The British Navy. It may fairly be called a great work, for it embraces within its scope not only a history of the growth of the British Ironclad Navy, but careful descriptions of individual ships, showing their respective faults, peculiarities, and improvements. And notwithstanding the title, so far is the book from being confined to the British Navy, that it gives us full accounts of the more interesting and formidable of those foreign ships upon the existence of which our Admiralty authorities must keep so jealous an eye, and to outnumber and outweigh which is the constant duty of our Constructors. Elaborate tables at the end of the first volume enable the inquirer to ascertain at a glance the tonnage, speed, armament, and thickness of armour of every ironclad ship, British and foreign; and there are interesting plans of several of the most important ships, which show very distinctly which are the parts protected by armour-plating, and the thickness of iron used for the purpose. To laymen, these plans are particularly instructive, for the public at large has generally but the haziest notions of the manner in which armour-plating is laid on a vessel; and it is probable that most landsmen, when informed that the 'Inflexible,' for instance, is protected by twenty-four inches of armour, imagine that the sides of the ship from the keel upwards are wholly composed of iron of that thickness. The controversy which raged over the 'Inflexible' while she was under construction is forgotten by the public, and it will probably surprise many who look at these plans when they realise how large a proportion of the mighty ship is left without any impenetrable armour. We speak thus of "the public" advisedly, because the book, far from appealing to the professional eye alone, is essentially one of general interest, and will be of the greatest service to that perhaps not inconsiderable class which takes an interest in Naval affairs, and would like to take more, but is hindered by the technicality of much that is written on the subject of Naval architecture.

* The British Navy: its Strength, Resources, and Administration. By Sir Thomas Brassey, K.C.B., M.P., M.A. London: Longmans, Green, and Co.

We are grateful to Sir Thomas Brassey for the plates with which the book is liberally supplied. An examination of these will do much to convince those whose opportunities of seeing ships are infrequent, that grievous injustice has been done to some very noble specimens of architecture by the indiscriminate use of hard names. If enough dirt be thrown, some of it is sure to stick; and the insulting appellations of "tin box" or "iron kettle" which heralded the introduction of ironclad ships, have persuaded many people to believe that an armoured vessel must of necessity be ugly. Some vessels there are, certainly, which are ugly enough, and no defence need be attempted of the beauty of the 'Glatton,' for instance, as she appears in the book before us. But if we cannot admit the outward attractions of a turret-ship, it is impossible to deny that many of the broadside ironclads are of singularly handsome appearance, and belie the justice of the invidious comparisons often so sweepingly drawn between the "wooden walls" of old and the iron bulwarks of to-day. To the French belonged the distinction of producing the first ironclad, which was 'La Gloire,' commenced at Toulon in 1858. England, though at first somewhat disposed to scoff, soon perceived the necessity for following suit, and though later in the field, had by 1865 no less than thirty ironclads. So early as 1862, Sir E. J. Reed, then Chief Constructor, introduced the cellular system, which is presumed to be the greatest safeguard against the sudden sinking of a ship, in case of its striking a rock or being attacked by a torpedo. The unfortunate 'Captain' was among the earliest of our turret-ships, and it was her loss which decided the Admiralty to abandon the system of full-rigged turret-ships, in favour of the mastless monsters which now constitute the most important item in our Naval strength. In the 'Shannon,' we begin to see signs of a reduction in the extent of heavy armour-plating, the protection being confined to an iron belt along the water-line, and this not extending to within sixty feet of the stem. The same principle was followed in the 'Nelson' and 'Northampton,' and the highest expression of the concentration of armour has been reached in the 'Inflexible,' of which all but the central citadel is left without the protection of iron-plating.

It is natural to turn to that portion of the book in which the author compares the strength of our own and other Naval Powers. He devotes an elaborate and interesting chapter to this subject, in which he compares, not only the ships of the various Powers, but their guns, arsenals, dockyards, and personnel. Sir Thomas Brassey divides the armoured vessels into four groups, the first two of which, taken together, comprise sea-going ships with armour of seven inches and upwards. Of these, Great Britain possesses twenty-six, carrying forty-eight heavy, rifled guns. Taking the same two groups, we find that France and Germany together could produce thirty-three ships, with forty-three heavy guns; France and Italy, thirty ships, with fifty-three guns; and Germany and Austria, twelve ships, with ten guns. To appreciate these figures, we should make the further comparison of the interests to be protected by our own and foreign Navies respectively. Leaving the defence of our coasts for the moment out of sight, let us see what defence is necessary for our Mercantile Marine, the existence and safety of which are essential, not only to our commerce, but to our means of subsistence. The tonnage of English trading steamers alone, in 1877-78, was 3,465,000 tons; while that of the United States, France, Germany, Russia, and Italy combined amounted to only 1,387,000 tons. Nor must our Colonial shipping be forgotten, and this in 1876 exceeded the whole mercantile marine of France, Germany, and Italy. In view of these facts, it becomes the duty, not only of the authorities, but of the public, to consider whether the British Fleet is sufficiently preponderant at sea, especially in the all-important factor of numbers, to be able to cope with any probable coalition of foreign Navies. No doubt, it is satisfactory to reflect that in the 'Inflexible' we have a ship whose power is greater than that of any individual vessel which could be brought against it, for it may be questioned whether the monster turret-ships of Italy, despite their great size, are more efficient; but the 'Inflexible' cannot be in two places at once, and what if, while the 'Inflexible' were absent in pursuit of a 'Duilio,' a 'Dandolo' were to appear off our coasts? Theoretically, we should have no ship able to approach within range of her, and no gun afloat able to inflict any fatal blow. Our turret-ships 'Dreadnought' and 'Thunderer' might heroically hurl themselves into the breach, but theoretically they would be pierced through and through by the 100-ton guns of the invader, and in sinking would carry down with them large ships' companies, and the results of an enormous outlay of money. Of course, this is an extreme supposition, for shots do not always hit the mark; and their effect, even if well directed, depends greatly upon the angle at which they strike. Moreover, the two smaller ships might conceivably by adroit manœuvring and skilful use of the ram or torpedo turn the tables on the stranger. But the fact remains, that in theory, and possibly in practice, the enemy's big ship could play havoc at its leisure, because the only vessel in our possession which was a match for it was not on the scene. And now let us imagine the 'Inflexible' replaced by the thirteen or more gun-boats of the 'Alpha,' 'Beta' class, which some authorities tell us could be produced for a corresponding sum of money. It is, perhaps, not extravagant to assume that three of these terrible little craft might be forthcoming on the appearance of our imaginary hostile turret-ship. Each of them would be armed with a gun able, like the guns of the 'Inflexible,' to pierce the enemy's plates; each would present a comparatively small target, and be of comparatively insignificant value if lost; while the advantages to be gained from good seamanship and skilful use of the torpedo and ram would be increased threefold. We do not mean to imply that Sir Thomas Brassey advocates the substitution of small vessels for large ones. He enters into no such controversial matter in the book before us, though he quotes many authorities on the subject; but the question is one of growing importance, and the reader who has followed the descriptions in these volumes will be in a position to form an opinion on the matter for himself. It is curious to think how important it must be in Naval warfare to determine the identity of an enemy's ship met with at sea. Whereas, in the olden time, an English frigate was prepared and anxious to attack almost any force which might fall in its way, it will presumably be the duty of the commander of the future to use every effort to learn the name of his antagonist, and then refer to his books to ascertain her armour and armament, before deciding whether to engage. While, however, the commanders of large vessels must thus consider their ships as "machines," and coldly appraise the fighting value of the hostile "machines" they may encounter, it may be consolatory to those who believe that England's chief Naval superiority lies in her men, to reflect that the increasing use of torpedo-boats and torpedoes will assuredly involve those "cutting-out" expeditions and hand-to-hand combats in which skill and audacity will have their full weight.

Sir Thomas Brassey has certainly spared no pains to collect information, and the book is full of opinions from all kinds of authorities, British and foreign, extracts from newspapers, and selections from speeches. It is instructive to note how much has been culled from foreign works of a similar nature, making it clear that our neighbours, if possessing smaller fleets than ourselves, are at least thoroughly acquainted with our resources.

Sketches of Our Life at Sarawak. By Harriette McDougall. (S. P. C. K.)—Mrs. McDougall shared her husband's pains and perils as a Missionary in the great Eastern island for some twenty years, during twelve of which he had charge of the See of Labuan, which ill-health compelled him to exchange for a quiet English vicarage in 1866. What with pirates and head-hunters, Chinese rebellions and Malay outbreaks, and the continual bickerings of a mixed population of Dyaks, Malays, and discordant Chinese clans, all hating each other cordially, the task of administrator and missionary in Borneo during the last thirty or five-and-thirty years has been by no means an easy one. If Sir James Brooke was somewhat of a filibuster, he was at least a well-meaning one, and his success is attested by the loyalty of both Malay and Dyak—that of the Chinese is less certain—to the Sarawak Government. With the pirates, whose extirpation, not even yet accomplished, he relentlessly pursued, it is impossible to feel the slightest sympathy. They made a trade of murder and plunder, and seemed to care more, indeed, for the former than the latter branch of their métier. Such of their captives as were not at once “krissod,” or tossed overboard, they were in the habit of beating with a flat bamboo till they could not move, in order to “tame” them; then they harnessed the miserable wretches to the oars of their “prahu,” and to keep the night relays awake, “cayenne pepper was rubbed into their eyes, or into cuts dealt them on their arms.” Head-hunting is a far more excusable avocation than piracy. In some parts of the island a paddy-farm cannot be occupied by a tenant who has not the due tale of heads to show, and the possession of a certain number of these ghastly trophies appears to be, if not the only, the surest avenue to the heart of a Bornean girl. Earth-hunger, and the desire for a wife, are among the strongest of human inclinations, and as the Dyaks of to-day did not make the customs they have such powerful inducements to follow, their passion for heads ought scarcely to be visited with much blame. One result is that human heads are unpleasantly common objects in Borneo. During the Chinese outbreak of 1857, Mrs. McDougall took refuge with her children in a boat, and noticed a “nasty faint smell” pervading the corner she occupied. The next morning she found a Chinaman’s head in a basket close by. It was the property of a “fine young Dyak, who had come on board to help pull the sweeps.” Looking about during the disturbances for the chance of picking up a head, he noticed a Chinaman admiring himself in a bit of looking-glass stuck against a wall, and creeping up behind the unlucky son of Han, coolly decapitated him with one blow of his sword. Not long after, at a native entertainment, a mess of pulut—rice cooked in bamboo stems—was placed before her. “I was just going to eat this delicacy,” Mrs. McDougall tells us, “when my eyes fell upon three human heads standing on a large dish, freshly killed and slightly smoked, with food and sirih leaves in their mouths.” “The fact,” she adds, not unnaturally, “seemed to part them from us by centuries of feeling.” Yet the Dyaks are by no means cruel, and have shown themselves more open to the humanising influences of Christianity than Malays or Chinese. They adopted the children of their enemies slain in the Chinese riots, but expressed their annoyance to Mrs. McDougall “at the little ones standing looking up at their parents’ heads hanging from the roof, and crying all day.” So completely may custom blunt the natural feelings of pity and horror. Of the famous Tailed Men, the Bishop obtained a detailed account from some natives, who reported their existence some fifteen days’ journey up the country of Bruni, between Sarawak and North Borneo. The tails are about two-thirds of the length of the middle finger, fleshy and stiff, and very inconvenient to their owners, who are civilised enough to own a fort defended by nine iron guns! The book is full of curious and out-of-the-way experiences, told with considerable force and humour; and the descriptions of tropical scenery, albeit in simple language enough, are among the most telling we have met with, the picture (p. 90) of the short, tropical twilight in the jungle, where a “dead stillness reigns by day, but at sunset almost every leaf becomes instinct with life,” being especially true to nature. In short, Mrs. McDougall has given us a capital glimpse of Bornean life, habits, and history. The book shows much shrewdness of observation and an appreciative comprehension of native character by no means common in works of this class. The simple, tender, home record that is interwoven with the narrative adds an additional charm to these unpretending “sketches” of “the land of sunshine and flowers,” to which the author still finds it pleasant “to return in fancy,” when days are foggy and dull, in November and February.

The Book of Entries of the Pontefract Corporation (R. Holmes, Pontefract Advertiser Office), is one of those efforts at bringing to light the buried history of provincial towns in which we cannot fail to read a result of the many local meetings of our two Archaeological Societies in their summer congresses. It covers an interesting period in our national history, namely, from the time of the Commonwealth (1653) down to the reign of George II. (1726.) It treats, as may be supposed, of mayors and mayoralties, aldermen, leading inhabitants, inspectors of markets weights and measures, leases, fines, charters, building operations, fee-farm rents, births, deaths, marriages, guardianships and apprenticeships, church registers, the persecution of Papists and Nonconformists, the making of roads and bridges, the building of hospitals, the repair of churches, the Parliamentary elections, and all those other lesser occurrences which go far to make up the daily and early life of a borough in a remote part of the kingdom, under our Stuart Kings. The book contains a great amount of genealogical matter, mostly relating to Yorkshire families. It should be added that considerable parts of the work have appeared in the columns of the Pontefract Advertiser, and that they are now republished as a whole, at the cost of Mr. Thomas W. Tew, a member of the Yorkshire Archaeological Association.

The Laws of Life. By J. L. Milton. (Chatto and Windus.)—Disease is here defined as “intensified performance of one or more parts of some function or functions the vital power being attracted to the disordered part.” The recent advances in our knowledge of blood-poisoning and disease-germs are ignored or assailed by Mr. Milton. The experiments of Pasteur, Burdon-Sanderson, and others “do not cast a ray of light upon the scene.” By several means, but not by calm reasoning, sound learning, or exact observation, the author of these lectures endeavours to uphold and develop many exploded fallacies, and even to invent a few novelties of the same order. The value of his own views may be gauged by the diagrams and descriptions on pages 142 and 146, and by his caricature of the germ theory of disease on page 77.

Plays and Poems. By Keningale Cook, LL.D. (Pickering and Co.)—The plays are but two, and the poems are not numerous, yet this small volume contains more of thought and true feeling than many larger ones. The first play is a little tragedy, supposed to have happened in the reign of King Offa, of Mercia, and the author has, on the whole, succeeded well in the difficult task of transporting himself and his readers, or spectators, some centuries back. The main passions of human hearts are the same in every age, but the mode of their expression varies so much, that it is difficult for an author of the nineteenth century to close his eyes to all that has happened between, and to think with the narrowed horizon of the eighth. The difficulty does not occur in the other play, “Love-in-a-Mist,” which is quite modern and true to modern manners, except in the case of the naval officer, who has his wife with him on board. It should have been thrown a little farther back in time, if that incident was inevitable. Of the poems, “The Suppliant Zeus” is the most striking. The “Field in Domesday Book,” too, has much of interest for the thoughtful; but in all of them we have to lament that the form is not equal to the spirit of the lines. There is a rugged disregard of sound, as when the author allows himself to write such a line as, “Make plasm plastic to your will;” and many are the lines in which a little care would make the halting metre run more smoothly. It is, perhaps, with a worthy desire to avoid the prevalent error of sound without sense that the author has fallen into its opposite. We will give a short and characteristic specimen of his style:—

“THE EPITAPH.

“Here rest, in dust, far from life’s flame,
Old garments and a perished name.
Press hard, lean hand of Time, cast down
The greenest garland, brightest crown.

A rose-tipped, beckoning finger leads
The man himself o’er new-world meads,
Where, ardent-soul’d, he lies along
With fresher robes and newer song.

Crooptoward him, Time; perchance, shall fall
This fine dress also to thy thrall.
Press on at speed,—nought canst thou sack,
Save cast-off cloaks and lamps burnt black.”

Health Lectures, Delivered in Manchester. Fourth and Fifth Series. By Dr. A. Ransome, and others. (J. Heywood.)—The Sanitary Association of Manchester and Salford, under whose auspices these lectures were delivered, is doing excellent work. Its functions do not end with telling people about cleanliness, food, clothing, nursing, disease, infection, and houses and their management, but it gives practical aid in sanitary matters to the local authorities, and provides a practical system of house inspection. Lectures form a part only of its scheme, but they are of particular service in drawing attention to the needs of greater care and sounder knowledge as to domestic and sanitary matters, and the conditions of personal health. The seventeen lectures here printed include a wide range of subjects, and are one and all clearly written, and full of sound advice.

Lectures on Medical Nursing. By Dr. J. Wallace Anderson. (Maclehose.)—The ten lectures here printed were delivered before the nurse-probationers of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary. The sections of the very important subject which they discuss are severally treated with clearness, precision, and sound judgment. Enough, not too much, is said concerning such matters as lie upon the border territory which separates the domain of the physician from that of the nurse, the proper place and work of the nurse in observing symptoms and in carrying out faithfully the treatment prescribed by the doctor being firmly insisted on. The general duties of the nurse, as well as her special work in connection with the care of patients suffering from special diseases, occupy the greater number of these lectures, but there are many pages devoted to such subjects as food and its digestibility, invalid cookery, medicinal weights and measures, poisons and antidotes, medical terms, baths, temperature, ventilation, &c.

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

The Spectator

FOR THE

No. 2,852.]

WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1883. [REGISTERED FOR } PRICE.....6d.
TRANSMISSION ABROAD. } BY POST, 6d.

THE WEEK	245	Mr. Spencer's Ethical Views	256
TOPICS OF THE DAY—		Promotion of Liberal Clergymen	257
The Revelations in Dublin	248	BOOKS—
The Irish Debate	249	The Dean, on the Dean	257
Growing Electric	250	The White Pilgrim, and other
The New Ministry in France	250	Poems	258
Mr. Goschen on the Price of Gold	251	Mr. Wallace's Edition of the
The Salvation Army in Switzer-		Psychology of Aristotle	260 land	252	English Scenery and Local His-
The Secret Motive of Secret		tory	261
Societies	253	The Late Samuel Palmer	263
The Power of Fashion	254	Mr. R. W. Dale on the Ephesians	264
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		The National Review	264
Why Mr. Forster Resigned	255	CURRENT LITERATURE	265
The Prospects of English Land	255	PUBLICATIONS OF THE WEEK	268
The Miles Platting Case	256	ADVERTISEMENTS	269-276
The Prevision of Rain by the
Spectroscope	256

 The Editors cannot undertake to return Manuscript, in any case.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE United Kingdom has been occupied this week with the evidence of an Irish informer. James Carey, a contracting carpenter, and a Town Councillor of Dublin, who was nearly elected Lord Mayor, who had been a suspect, and who was recently arrested on suspicion of being concerned in the Phoenix Park murders, has been admitted as Queen's evidence. His testimony, given on Saturday in Kilmainham Police Court, is astounding. He declares that the Society to which he belongs, called "The Irish Invincibles," was organised in November, 1881, at the instigation of a North-of-England man, named Walsh, to act as agent for a London Society, which had decided on the "removal" of Mr. Forster and Earl Cowper. Large sums were paid and promised, and he, with others, arranged the attempts to murder, which, however, after four efforts, failed. He then, on the instigation of a man known as "Number 1," and apparently an officer, decided on killing Mr. Burke, and with the prisoners whom he named carried out his intention, as the world is aware. The assassins had, however, no knowledge of Lord Frederick Cavendish, and no intention of killing him, the actual murderer stabbing him because he defended his friend with an umbrella. Carey arranged all details, and watched the butchery, which he described, giving revolting details with the utmost sang-froid, and with the minuteness of memory which it is known Thugs invariably display. His callousness, his treachery, and his pretence of piety have created an emotion of horror towards him rarely witnessed in Ireland,—rarely, we must add, so well deserved. The man was the first to write a letter of condolence to Miss Burke, and proposed in the Town Council of Dublin a vote expressing horror at his own crime.

Carey has not explained where the money, of which the Invincibles had plenty, came from, but he implicates officers of the Land League. Especially, he declares that T. Brennan, Secretary of the Land League, and Mr. Sheridan, whom Mr. Parnell so trusted that he promised to use him in putting down outrages in the West, were members of the Society of Invincibles, which, as a whole, was composed solely of Fenians, though it was outside that organisation. The Dublin Committee was only one of four, each of them engaged in terrorising by murder, and all of them directed by a central association in London, the chief of which is alleged to have been "Number One," who is now actively hunted by the Police. It is believed that a great number of recent murders were arranged by the Invincibles, and that much more evidence as to the real chiefs of the conspiracy has been obtained; but we would warn our readers to consider all statements not obviously corroborated by circumstantial evidence with some suspicion. The disposition to credit a criminal society of this kind with ubiquity is very strong, as is also the disposition to forget that treason and assassination are morally different crimes, committed by widely different natures. Let us have the most searching inquiry, without the slightest respect of persons, the highest being the most guilty; but let us wait, also, in all cases, for evidence. It is the jealous subordinates of a party, not its leaders, who usually are under temptation to plunge into crime, in order to prove that they are the persons to be trusted. Casca stabs harder than Brutus.

On Tuesday, Mr. Gorst moved an amendment to the Address, which was debated during that evening and the whole of Wednesday and Thursday, expressing a hope that the recent change in Irish policy would be maintained, "that no further concessions would be made to lawless agitators," and that secret societies would continue to receive the energetic vigilance of the Government. His object was to make out that the Cabinet had been divided, like the Irish Invincibles, into an inner and an outer circle, and that Mr. Gladstone had been made the dupe and the instrument of an inner circle in the Cabinet, whose object was the moral assassination of Mr. Forster. Sir William Harcourt replied with much warmth and ability, showing that there had been no difference in the Cabinet as to the failure of the first Coercion Act, and that all alike were compelled to ask for fresh powers. Mr. Forster differed from his colleagues in desiring to impose conditions on which alone Mr. Parnell ought to be released, but not at all on any fundamental issue of Irish policy. Mr. Gibson took up Mr. Gorst's charges in more respectful language, and challenged the Irish party to clear themselves from the accusation that they had allowed Land-League funds to be appropriated to the purposes of the outragemongers.

On Wednesday, Mr. O'Brien, the new Member for Mallow, made of his maiden speech a furious attack on the administration of the Crimes Prevention Act, which he declared to be used for the condemnation and execution of innocent men by packed juries and judges whose ferocious partizanship disgusted and revolted public feeling. He defended his support of James Carey as a municipal Councillor of Dublin, and even judging by the light of recent events expressed no regret for it. His speech, which was received with the greatest sang-froid by the House, was one of the most threatening ever heard in the House of Commons. Mr. Plunket, of course, supported the demands of Mr. Gibson; while Mr. George Russell, following the line he has always taken on Irish affairs, deprecated any further grant of local self-government to Ireland for an indefinite period, which he appeared to fix at something like thirty years; while Mr. Jesse Collings went even further into error in the opposite direction,—that is, on the side of imprudent concession to Home-rule. Wednesday's debate was not marked by a single statesmanlike speech.

The debate of Thursday, which was introduced by a speech of Mr. Lowther's,—and a speech of Mr. Lowther's needs no description, for it is always the same; he always thanks God that he did what he did in Ireland, and did not do what his successors have done,—was rendered remarkable by a very fierce attack on Mr. Parnell by Mr. Forster, in which he directly accused Mr. Parnell of either "conniving" at outrage, or taking care not to know what it was his business to know, as to the doings of his subordinates and colleagues. This attack was supported by a great deal of solid proof as to Mr. Parnell's proceedings before he was shut up in Kilmainham, and some proof, not at all so solid, based on the assumption that after he was shut up in Kilmainham he was still kept informed as to what his Land-League agents were about. In the course of Mr. Forster's speech, Mr. O'Kelly was suspended, for characterising one of Mr. Forster's statements as "a lie," which threw the House into some excitement. Further, Mr. Forster denied that the Cabinet to which he belonged had ever accepted the Crimes Prevention Bill,—a denial in which Lord Hartington subsequently showed that Mr. Forster was mistaken,—not unnaturally mistaken, considering the great number of his urgent and perilous journeys to Ireland during the period to which reference was made.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor, who at last replied to Mr. Forster, and whose speech was so delivered as to win a great many cheers not only from the Irish, but from the Conservative benches, charged Mr. Forster with tolerating the existence of the Land League far too long, if he really entertained the opinion of its outragemongering which he had expressed. It was put down eventually under the ordinary law, but not till many months after the Land Act had been passed, in spite of the Chief Secretary's firm belief that it was engaged in spreading terrorism and murder all over Ireland. He taunted Mr. Forster with keeping the leaders of the Land League, after their imprisonment, in complete ignorance of the statements in the Press for which he now held them responsible; and declared that Mr. Parnell is gaining power in Ireland with every week and day, and that the next general election will verify that power in the most ample manner. Lord Hartington then concluded the debate, with a warm vindication of the conduct of the Government in releasing Mr. Parnell, and a good deal of ridicule of the attempt which had been made to make Mr. Gladstone responsible for Mr. Herbert Gladstone's rather impartial attitude towards Home-rule.

Mr. Parnell, who moved the adjournment of the debate, will have replied to Mr. Forster before this journal is in our readers' hands, though much too late for our issue. Sir Stafford Northcote also gave notice of a formal motion condemning what is called the "Kilmainham Treaty," after nearly a year's hesitation as to his course. Mr. Gladstone himself is to be in London next week, and will be able to bear the brunt of this not very formidable attack. It certainly does seem to us a serious strategical blunder for the Conservatives, after craning so long at the attack, now to take up a matter on which little or no new light has been thrown, solely because the unveiling of the Secret Societies has gravely incensed the public against all Irish evil-doers. Parliament should lead opinion, and not keep a stone for a full year in its pocket, only to cast it when other stones are already flying thick through the air.

We sincerely trust that the British Government will use its influence in Egypt to prevent the gross plunder of the Egyptian people which is now arranged. Every European in Alexandria who lost anything in the insurrection is sending in his bill for "indemnity," which is backed by his Consul and the whole force of his nation. As a rule, he has lost something, but, as a rule also, he considers that he has a right to his losses plus "indirect damages," and, as he cannot claim for them, he adds their amount to the value of his stolen goods. Men, therefore, whose "duds" would not have fetched £100 in any auction-room in Europe are charging as if for Louis-Quinze furniture, and many more are presenting invoices of stores five-sixths of which had previously been sold out. They will all be paid, not according to the amount of their losses, but according to the dread entertained of their Consuls and their own priority of application, the total amount to be expended being limited to £3,500,000. Two millions would probably overpay everybody, and the remainder is plunder, conceded because the Egyptian Ministry is too weak to offend any considerable Power. The International Commissioners have no means whatever of testing accounts, and will have a natural delicacy in snubbing claimants belonging to each other's nationalities; while the witnesses, being all interested, will support each other's statements to the last decimal. The cost, moreover, instead of falling on Alexandria, which was guilty, will fall on Egypt, which was innocent, the legitimate Government having done its best to prevent the insurrection. The scene is scandalous, and worthy only of Tunis under a French Protectorate.

Mr. D. Forrest, who says he has much experience of the Egyptian Fellahs, writes an extraordinary letter to the Times. He declares that it is useless to try to make Egyptians sharpshooters, for the people are universally short-sighted. They cannot see the bull's-eye in a target at a hundred yards, or the target itself at three hundred. This is the explanation of their bad practice in action. That Egyptians are liable to ophthalmia is certain, but this is the first time we have heard of a short-sighted nation. The statement strikes us as prima facie absurd, and yet it is quite possible that eyesight, in the dim light of the North and the bright light of the South, should become different. The strain to see clearly would, in the former case, be perpetual and hereditary. The difficulty is to believe that sunlight would not affect all eyes in all places, and certainly natives of India, living in a light as keen as that of Egypt, show no inclination to short-sight. Their hunters can see like Red Indians. There may, however, be a difference which has escaped notice, and is worth inquiry, the unusual keenness of sight possessed by Scandinavians being a long-noticed fact. Any difference in length of sight, if universal or very usual, would account for very great differences in plastic art, and in the use of colour.

Obstruction began on Friday week, so soon as the Attorney-General moved that "the Speaker do leave the Chair," in order that he might move, in Committee of the whole House, that the Chairman be directed to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Parliamentary Oaths Act. Leave was at once resisted, but the motion was carried by a majority of 90 (160 to 70). On the motion that the Chairman be directed to ask for leave to amend the Oaths Act, motions that progress be reported were at once made, and the whole of the later hours of Friday thus occupied, till the Government gave way, and deferred the motion till after midnight on Monday, Mr. Alderman Fowler calling the Bill a national renunciation of God, and Mr. Warton terming it a preference of Bradlaugh to God.

On Monday, after another fierce little debate, in which Sir Henry Wolff said that the Prime Minister was staying at Cannes chiefly to avoid this Bill, the resolution to ask for leave to bring it in was carried by a majority of 131 (184 to 53), the leaders of Opposition not choosing to bring up their followers to battle at this stage of the conflict. Accordingly, the Bill has been brought in by the Attorney-General, and simply provides that, "Any Member of either House of Parliament may, if he thinks fit, instead of making and subscribing the Oath of Allegiance appointed by the Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866, as amended by the Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1868, make and subscribe a solemn affirmation, in the form of the said oath, substituting the words 'solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm,' for the word 'swear,' and omitting the words 'So help me God,' and the making and subscribing of such affirmation shall have the same effect as the making and subscribing of the said oath." This very simple Bill is not to be read a second time till after the various measures which it is intended to transmit to the Grand Committees have been disposed of in that way. The effort of the Conservatives will then be directed, first to throw out the Bill, and next to limit it to the case of future Members, in order that Mr. Bradlaugh may not be able to avail himself of it, without going through yet another contest. Without pretending to feel anything but deep dissatisfaction at Mr. Bradlaugh's election, we must say that if the Liberals allow themselves to accept this amendment, they will be doing great injustice to Mr. Bradlaugh. And for our own parts, the less we like a public man, the more jealous we feel of any attempt deliberately to persecute him.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Farrer Herschell), in attending a meeting of the Egham Branch of the West Surrey Liberal Association, last Tuesday, held for the purpose of promoting the candidature of Mr. St. George Lane-Fox as a Liberal representative of West Surrey, delivered a very masterly and impressive speech on the claims of the Government on the confidence of the country, and the difficulties with which they had had to deal, which he exhibited with extraordinary force. In speaking of the Rules of Procedure, he made the statement that while the House of Commons of 1874-1880 had only discussed the various Addresses in answer to the various Queen's Speeches during eleven nights, distributed over all its seven Sessions, there were eleven nights consumed in the debate on the Address of the Session of 1882 taken alone; and while declaring his firm belief that the Liberal Party never could afford to burke discussion, if only because it feels too much pride in the superiority of its own reasons, Sir Farrer Herschell assured his audience that the Liberals will necessarily care more than the Conservatives to put a limit to verbal discussion, because they desire action, while the Conservatives may often prefer empty words. He also made a very powerful reply to those who say that the British Government of Mr. Gladstone is impotent and wholly without diplomatic influence in Europe, at the very moment when they assert that its first achievement was to get all the Naval Powers to join in a demonstration against Turkey in the Adriatic, which they declare to have been ridiculous and almost idiotic. When, said Sir Farrer Herschell, did any Government give such a proof of influence yet, as to persuade all the other great Powers to join with it in an act of confessedly ridiculous folly? If the British Government, immediately on its accession to power, had the influence to effect so much as that, it must have exerted influence almost unparalleled in the history of diplomacy.

The French Senate on Friday week finally rejected the Barbey Bill, which allowed the Government to banish any member of a family formerly reigning in France, if he or she had done any overt act as a Pretender, or any act jeopardising the Republic. The reason assigned was "reluctance to begin a régime of proscription;" and though the majority was only five—142 to 137—the Bill is dropped. The Cabinet thereupon resigned, and M. Grévy has formed another, with M. Jules Ferry as Premier, M. Challeml-Lacour as Foreign Minister, General Thibaudin as Minister of War, M. Waldeck-Rousseau as Minister of the Interior, M. Tirard as Minister of Finance, M. Martin Feuillée as Minister of Justice, and M. Raynal as Minister of Public Works. This Cabinet, which is Gambettist, with a tendency towards the Extreme Left, is prepared, as its first act, to stretch an Act of 1834, under which the King could place any officer en retraite, so as to cover the case of the Princes, and loudly proclaims that, in case of necessity, it will defend the Republic with vigour. That is, it will expel the Princes, as an administrative measure. The Cabinet is said to be acceptable to the Chamber, but is suspected of entertaining a "forward" policy in foreign affairs. M. Challeml-Lacour is certainly of that school.

The programme read by M. Ferry on Thursday is lengthy and argumentative. The Ministry say they will "terminate the incident" of the Princes and try to avoid crises, and that they will go forward with reforms one by one, and with moderation. They propose to reform the Magistracy, to improve the Municipal Law, to carry the Habitual Criminals Bill—making thrice-convicted persons liable to transportation—and to introduce Bills establishing provident societies and regulating trades unions. They will negotiate with the great railway companies for the construction of the new lines required, and they will complete the organisation of the Protectorate in Tunis. Their foreign policy is peace, but "a peaceful policy is not necessarily an inactive one. Wherever in foreign questions our interests or honour are involved, we mean and ought to maintain France in the rank belonging to her." These expressions are vague, but it is understood that the internal "reforms" will all be in the ultra-Liberal sense, and that the Ministry will seek foreign influence and more colonies. That is, they will press "claims," in Egypt, Tripoli, Tonquin, Madagascar, and the South Seas. That policy will not be approved by the electors, but it is said that M. Ferry has conciliated the Extremists, and will be supported by the threat of Dissolution, of which his followers stand in great awe. He ruled last time for twelve months, but we hardly anticipate for him on this occasion that extreme longevity. If he can get on till August, he will have done much; and if he is too warlike, he may fall in a month.

Mr. Childers, on Wednesday, received a deputation from the Financial Reform Association of Liverpool, which presented a memorial praying for a "free breakfast-table," and the abolition of the duties on dried fruits and on plate. They thought that in exchange for these duties, the "death duties" could be increased, "so as to yield from four to eight millions more revenue," and acknowledged that their ultimate object was to abolish all indirect taxation in favour of direct, and that they included the liquor duties in indirect taxes,—this latter being, we imagine, a new departure. Mr. Broadhurst, M.P., even suggested a graduated income-tax, increasing with the scale of wealth. Mr. Childers, after taking much trouble to elicit from the deputation their ultimate view, made a sensible reply. He was a convinced Free-trader, believed that, with some few exceptions, every reduction of duties produced benefit, and he would gladly carry through Sir Robert Peel's policy. He had not, however, succeeded, like the Tories, to a surplus of six millions, but was in a very different situation. He made no promises whatever, and hinted very distinctly that he viewed a plan of taxation under which a working teetotaler would possess a vote, yet be exempt altogether from imposts, with considerable distrust. The English dislike of the self-adjusting, indirect taxes, which are so popular in the Colonies, is very curious, as is the failure of any proposal to try the French tax on transfers of real property. The ideas of reformers seem to be confined to income-taxes and succession duties, though Mr. Muspratt, President of the Association, admitted that they had a proposal for a land-tax in reserve.

The Attorney-General has made his anti-Bribery Bill much more bearable, but it is still on one point open to objection. We cordially approve the clauses reducing the limit of allowable expenditure to £350 for every 2,000 voters in boroughs, and to £500 in counties, experience showing that expense is no guarantee for the candidate's respectability. Nor have we any criticism to offer on the penalties for bribery and corruption, whether inflicted on the candidate or on his agents, if proved to be guilty. But we cannot see the justice of punishing the candidate because his agents are corrupt. True, under the new Bill he is not liable penally, but he is liable to be declared incompetent to sit for that borough, and a treacherous agent, who has been bribed by the other side, may still practically disfranchise a Member who has earnestly sought to prevent corruption. Suppose the Women's Rights people pay an agent of Sir Henry James to treat electors, and that he therefore loses his right to contest Taunton. It is most important to put down bribery, and, in a less degree, treating; but suppose we could put it down by disfranchising the Mayor, whenever it occurred in his borough, would Sir Henry vote for that? Let every man answer for his own offences, not those of agents who may be acting in the teeth of instructions.

Hobart Pasha writes to the Times for the millionth time to warn the world that Russia is designing. The Government of St. Petersburg, he says, want the control of the Kilia mouth of the Danube. If they get it, they will deepen the channel, improve the harbour, draw off all water, and control the river for ever. That, clearly, would be horrid, especially as Russia, whether she improves rivers or blocks up rivers, must be treated as having bad objects; but we still want to know why Austria supports that scheme. She has engineers who understand hydraulics, and her statesmen are quite aware that for her a free Danube is a vital question. Russia will not secure the Kilia mouth against Austria's will, and if Austria consents, why does she consent? Is it not just possible that the Austrian engineers are aware that this dream of drawing off the water is all nonsense, that the Danube could supply a dozen months, as the Ganges does, and that the real difficulty is not to preserve the river, but to secure free ingress to it?

Mr. Raikes has had to defend himself this week for the imputation which he recently cast on Mr. Gladstone for attending the Carnival at Nice, and allowing himself to be pelted by confetti, as he sat on the knife-board of an omnibus, at the very time when his colleagues were met in solemn Cabinet, to hear the revelations of the Assassination conspiracy at Dublin. Mr. Raikes is not at all ashamed of himself,—which, indeed, we were not so sanguine as to expect that he would be,—and declares in Thursday's Times that this conduct of Mr. Gladstone's was "an exhibition of rather astonishing levity, on the part of an English Prime Minister of mature age." Mr. Raikes appears to think that when a Minister in search of health is persuaded by his colleagues to absent himself for a time from work, he is bound to keep himself informed by telegraph of the nature of their deliberations, and to reflect in his features the gravity and responsibility of his colleagues' counsels. Mr. Raikes might, perhaps, persuade himself to act so Pecksniffian a part under the same circumstances; but he will hardly persuade the country that Mr. Gladstone would be the better for going through so ignominious an imposture.

The full correspondence between the Pope and the King of Prussia has been published, but its substance does not differ from the sketch originally given. The Pope's ultimatum is clearly that the training of priests in seminaries shall be allowed to continue unchecked by the State.

Bank Rate, 3½ per cent.

Consols were on Friday 102½ to 102¾.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE REVELATIONS IN DUBLIN.

WHAT is the use of affecting to doubt the evidence, especially James Carey's, just produced in the Kilmainham inquiry? Nobody does at heart doubt it. A few Land Leaguers will say they do, and will dilate on the infamous character of the witnesses; but they will be regarded by all men, their own followers included, simply as advocates, pleading as they were expected to plead. Murderers on system who have at last told the truth have existed in all lands, witness our own Parliamentary inquiry into the assassinations in Sheffield, which were morally almost worse, because more sordid, than those in Ireland; and the special baseness of Carey has very little bearing on the matter. About him, it may be admitted once for all, the maddest Irishman has justification for his rage. Upon his own showing, apart from all other evidence, he is either a worse Titus Oates, swearing away his own sworn comrades' lives, or a man who, not being pressed by want or provoked by personal wrong, assisted to organise systematic murders of men to whom he had so little enmity, that when one escaped, he took another for his victim with perfect indifference; who planned and directed all details; who rolled crime under his tongue as a morsel with cynical enjoyment, suggesting seriously that the knives used should be forwarded to the Exhibition, as "specimens of Irish industry;" who proposed in the Town Council an address expressing horror at his own murders; and who then turned on his confederates, and with testimony expressed in the clearest language, and pervaded by a kind of philosophic calm, doomed them to the gallows. No words, Irish or English, can do justice to a man who, though well understood in the East, where he has had many exemplars, is in Europe, God be thanked, exceptional; but that, with experienced men, does not destroy his evidence. They know that such men revel in truth, when it is an offence to tell it; they see how the evidence fits into the facts, and they believe that while any detail may be wrong as to individuals, and while much must still be concealed, the solid substance of the Informers' testimony is true. No one, even if as deeply interested in Irish extremists as the Freeman's Journal, doubts at heart that within the United Kingdom there exists a Society organised to murder any politicians whose death may increase the hostility between England and Ireland, and to keep up, for semi-social, semi-political objects, a reign of terror. The Society, be their instruments who they may, by the admission of Irish Home-rulers would have slaughtered Lord Cowper and Mr. Forster, but for accidents which seem almost miracles—Mr. Forster, if Lord Clive was right, must still have a destiny before him—and they did slaughter Mr. Burke and Lord Frederick Cavendish, and in intention Mr. Field. The only real doubts are as to the identity of those accused, as to the persons indirectly concerned, as to the ramifications of the Society, as to its relation to other bodies apparently only political; and as the inquiry goes on, if the right methods are pursued, those doubts will all slowly and gradually be resolved.

The right method has been hit upon, we believe, by the Irish Government, and was hit upon more than a generation ago, by the singularly cool and merciful men who, after the unsleeping, unwatched, persistent effort of years, finally suppressed and still repress the system known as Thuggee,—perhaps the only grand system of crime ever crushed by men who were formally exempted by the criminals from all danger of personally suffering from its effects. The first law of every Thug was never to touch a European. The Thuggee Commissioners relied, as all Governments in presence of murderous secret societies must rely, upon three great facts. It is nearly impossible for large numbers of men, with their consciences wounded, as every human conscience is wounded, by premeditated murder, not to desire, when under dread of death, to relieve them by confession. It is nearly impossible—we believe, in the whole history of the Thuggee Department there has never been an instance—for such men so situated to burden their consciences afresh by elaborate lies. And it is quite impossible for many men, with no communication with each other, to invent the same detailed falsehoods. Ten clocks in a town may be all wrong, but if they all tell the same time, that is the true time of day, on the scheme of calculation accepted in that town. If, therefore, many men in a secret society are arrested and examined, their statements collated and combined, and then the whole result made known to each, all will gradually come out. We doubt if the impulse to reveal is always fear, though fear may enter into it. The bad are often brave, and we see no good in slandering the evil. The Thugs probably cared about death as little as other Asiatics, and under many circumstances would, we doubt not, have gone in silence to the gallows or the stake. But once convinced that silence shields nothing, that all is known but details, that passionate desire for relief from a burden, which the Roman Catholic Church, wisely or foolishly, has utilised for ages, wakes in assassins to its full strength, and the narratives flow forth as if driven out of the memory—always abnormally acute—by some interior power. It was clearly through the little-noticed clause in the Crimes Act allowing private examination that the revelations about these "Irish Invincibles" were obtained. There lies the secret of strength, and it is through that, and that only, that dangerous societies can be attacked by the State with solid hope of success. Menaces are overpowered by stronger threats. Rewards, even when they are extravagant, fall dead. Carey, recollect, comes in for no reward. Pardons have only a partial effect. It is in the calm, scientific collection of evidence produced by interrogation that the secret of eliciting truth must lie, whoever and wherever the criminals may be. That alone breaks up the combination. There is nothing specially Irish in the matter, unless it be that in Ireland there is, as is possible, a separate horror of death in sin. The Bavarian Judges, the Belgian Judges, the French Judges have never employed any other system; and Bavarians, at all events, are in all ethnical peculiarities the very opposites of Irishmen. We repeat—fiercely as opinion is boiling—that there are no one-legged races, and that it is in human nature, and not in Irish nature, that we must seek for means to secure the victory to the Right.

Whether it would be wise to adopt the Thuggee Law into our jurisprudence, is a question rather for statesmen and experts in the detection of crime than for journalists. We certainly would not adopt it as an exceptional law against Ireland. We loathe these exceptional laws, which at bottom reveal the deep distrust one section of the people entertain of another, and which we believe to intensify national hate as nothing else does. But we are not sure that the first principle of the Thuggee Law, that to be a Thug—that is, to belong to an association which you know intends murder—is a capital offence, is not a principle applicable to the whole United Kingdom, and to every country in the world. Such a law, if properly safeguarded by right of pardon, right of inflicting minor sentences, and right of the accused to bear testimony in their own defence, is clearly in harmony with the first principles of morality and justice. No man whatever, under any provocation, can have any right to join such a society, and we can see no just liberty of Englishmen which such a law would infringe. Why should not an Englishman be questioned as to his share in such a society, his evidence be collated with other evidence, and he then fairly and openly, as in all other cases, be committed and tried? We see no objection, except in the freedom of arrest which such a law might give to the Police, and a safeguard against that could be found by requiring a Judge's warrant, or the fiat of the Attorney-General. The true objection to such a law is the addition it would make to the long list of crimes, and unhappily this crime has added itself. We English are bound, while we are raging about Ireland and its assassins, to remember that we had assassins here, that we could not cope with them, and that we crushed them at last partly by removing grievances, and partly by concessions in the way of pardons which went to the very verge of compacts with crime, if they did not overstep it. The Saw-grinders never struck the great, and their history is therefore forgotten; but it exists in Blue-books, and will teach all who read the ghastly narrative not to confuse the necessary and energetic punishment of crime with questions of race or creed. Assassination Societies must be crushed, and they can be crushed, if only Englishmen will remember that the obstacle is not their justice, or their mercy, or their political situation, but their slavish devotion to methods of inquiry which are hopelessly at variance with circumstances. Suppose all Dublin in Mouravieff's hands. We should not have known one-tenth of what we know from allowing a quiet lawyer to ask questions and promise partial pardons. The men who plead for mere violence are at heart doubtful if the Societies in the struggle may not win. Nonsense! They cannot win, even in Russia, where all depends on an individual; and in a free country, the only society which cannot be defeated, is never betrayed, and cannot be shut up, is the State. The State has only to use the powers at its disposal, without injustice, without violence, and, above all, without proscriptions, and it will strike down political assassination as easily as assassination for plunder. Fanatics? Where is the trace of true fanaticism, in the whole ghastly affair?

THE IRISH DEBATE.

THE amendment on the Address, which Mr. Gorst moved on Tuesday, in relation to Irish policy, was, as every one admits, the offspring of the Dublin "revelations." It appeared to Mr. Gorst that in those revelations there was matter that could be made to cast a new discredit on the policy of the Government in releasing Mr. Parnell and his Parliamentary colleagues last April without conditions, at a time when Mr. Forster was disposed to require more or less impracticable conditions; and accordingly Mr. Gorst moved an amendment to the Address, half patronage, half sneer, requiring the Government to go on with the policy of repression, and to return no more to that policy of concession, which, according to Mr. Gorst, marked the period when Mr. Forster separated himself from his colleagues. It is really on this point that the whole discussion, so far as there has been serious discussion at all, has turned. Those speakers who, like Mr. O'Donnell, delivered something like half-an-hour's declamation on nothing in particular, to every minute they devoted to the question on which they ought to have been speaking, did not discuss the amendment at all; they only endeavoured, not ineffectually, to discredit still further the waning significance of debate in the House of Commons. But a few speakers—especially the Conservatives—have seized the point, that, in Mr. Gorst's opinion, there is a special opportuneness at the present moment in exhorting the Government to have done with the policy of concession, and to stick to the policy of repression which the Crimes Prevention Act has enabled them to pursue; and they hold that that special opportuneness arises from the fact that when the Government let Mr. Parnell out of prison, he was counting on the prospect of putting down outrage by the agency of a man—Mr. Sheridan—to whom the evidence of the informers attributes the organisation of outrage throughout Ireland. Now, have the recent revelations really thrown new light on the Kilmainham transaction, or tended in any degree to support Mr. Forster's judgment of that matter, and to discredit the judgment of the Government? On the contrary—writing with Mr. Forster's speech of Thursday night before us—we should say that, so far as the revelations have thrown any light on the matter at all, they have tended to support the judgment of the Government, and to diminish the presumption that Mr. Forster's personal judgment on the situation in April last was the accurate judgment.

In the first place, if the new revelations are to be trusted,—and, of course, that must be the supposition on which we are to proceed, if we are to take them into account at all,—it is certain that it was the policy of imprisoning on suspicion and without trial that led to the formation of that special Assassination Committee by whom the murders were performed. For that, of course, the Government was fully as responsible as Mr. Forster, though Mr. Forster is understood to have pressed the first Coercion Act on the Government. But, in considering the question whether the Government were right in wishing to relax that irritating policy at the first practicable opportunity, or whether Mr. Forster was right in desiring to maintain it for some months longer, as he certainly did desire, it is impossible to leave out of account that it was the first Coercion Act which, according to the new evidence, really led to the formation of the Assassination Committee, and gave the extreme party the notion that there was no hope without recourse to the most violent measures. No one maintains or even hints that, had Mr. Parnell and his colleagues been detained longer in prison, the Phoenix Park murders would not have taken place. On the contrary, every effort was made to assassinate Mr. Forster himself before the political prisoners had been released, and he only escaped by providential miscarriages of the conspiracy. The new light, therefore, which is shed on the matter by the Dublin evidence,—if it can be trusted at all,—certainly shows this, that Mr. Forster, in sticking so eagerly to the policy of keeping popular leaders in prison without trial,—even when it was known that they had become anxious to suppress outrage,—was intensifying the motive which was at the bottom of the assassinations, while the Government in abandoning that policy at the earliest moment when, from the information which they received, they thought that it might be safely abandoned, were diminishing the force of the motive which chiefly stimulated the assassins.

But then it is said that the new evidence certainly proves this,—that Mr. Parnell was counting on a reputed organiser of outrage to stay the hand of outrage. And though, of course, we must not assume what no one has the right to assume on such evidence as we have already had, that this reputed organiser of outrage had really organised outrage, yet, assuming this to be so, and admitting that Mr. Parnell was really counting on this, the question is not in the least how far Mr. Parnell knew what he was about, but how far Mr. Parnell was or was not in earnest in the desire to use his liberty for the purpose of discouraging outrage. If he was in earnest—and no one has even hinted that the new evidence proves that he was not,—the Government had absolutely no legal right to detain him a day in prison after they had come to the conviction that his release would rather aid the cause of order in Ireland, than hinder it. He had been proved guilty of no crime, was held in prison on suspicion solely, because the Act allowed the Government to detain on suspicion persons whose liberty was believed to be prejudicial to the cause of order in Ireland, and the moment that belief ceased, the power intended to be conferred by the Coercion Act ceased too. Even if Mr. Parnell did intend to stop outrages through the agency of a man who had organised them, there was absolutely no legal right under the Coercion Act to detain him in prison.

But, then, Mr. Forster asserts that he resigned because he could not approve of the release of Mr. Parnell and his colleagues till after the passing of the Crimes Prevention Bill, by which the Irish Government were to gain an equivalent for the power of the Coercion Act which had failed. We reply that, in the first place, there is nothing at all to show that the detention of Mr. Parnell for two or three months longer in prison would have secured the Government against any kind of disorder which they had to encounter in consequence of Mr. Parnell's release;—rather the contrary. Nor, again, was the passing of the Crimes Prevention Bill Mr. Forster's main condition for the release of the suspects. He expressed his willingness to release them on their own undertaking not to obstruct the cause of law and order in Ireland, an undertaking which the Government had absolutely no right to require so soon as they had convinced themselves on adequate moral evidence that the release of the suspects, without conditions, would promote the cause of law and order in Ireland. Further, Mr. Forster's wish that the Crimes Prevention Bill should have taken precedence of the Procedure Resolutions, though it expresses, of course, his own personal view of the crisis, has not been shown to have been communicated by him to his colleagues, while the Prime Minister intimated in the most distinct manner last April that those colleagues had not received any such impression from Mr. Forster.

On the whole, we maintain that the recent revelations in Dublin go to show—so far as they bear on the question at all—that the Government were quite right in releasing the suspects, when they did, without conditions; that so far as that act affected the order of Ireland at all, it affected it for good, and not for evil; that it immensely increased the dismay and horror with which the assassinations were received, and led even to a general feeling of remorse in the minds of Irishmen which would never have been felt had Mr. Parnell remained in prison. We are persuaded, indeed, that, so far from throwing any sinister light on the release of Mr. Parnell, the recent revelations have shown only this,—that the policy of the first Coercion Act was a thoroughly mistaken and irritating policy, which, though it enabled the Government to enforce the Land Act, in every other way operated to stimulate crime and generate a vindictive public sentiment.

Of one feature in the Irish debate—Mr. O'Brien's remarkable speech on Wednesday—we must say a word in this connection. No more furious speech was ever uttered in the House of Commons, and no such furious speech was ever listened to with such singular and complete sang-froid. The new Member for Mallow expressed opinions of the use made of the Crimes Act which amounted to the fiercest possible denunciation of the Government, of the Irish Judges, of the Juries, and of the whole apparatus for killing innocent men, as he professed to declare his belief that the Crimes Act chiefly succeeds in doing. Further, he most pointedly refrained from expressing the smallest regret for having supported the candidature of James Carey for the Municipality of Dublin, and intimated that if, knowing only what he then knew of Carey, he had to act again on the same circumstances, he should act precisely as he acted then. What is the bearing of such a speech as that,—delivered with all the ferocity and menace of something like physical intimidation,—on the amendment which Mr. Gorst has presented to the House? Why, this,—that if the Government be told that it has been right only in enforcing the Crimes Act, and must not again think of a policy of concession like that which released Mr. Parnell and his colleagues, the House will have done all in its power to play into the hands of the fierce party represented by Mr. O'Brien, who treat the Crimes Act as the only significant phase of Liberal policy in Ireland, and try to persuade the Irish people that the policy of justice and of reform has been abandoned by the Liberals for ever. That is a libel for which it is only too easy to gain belief in Ireland, and that is the libel for which the success of Mr. Gorst's amendment would in the most powerful manner assist Mr. O'Brien and his friends to gain credence in Ireland, especially after Mr. Forster's elaborate invective against Mr. Parnell.

GROWING ELECTRIC.

THE scene of Thursday was a scene of very complex and not very easily reconciled elements of political emotion. That Mr. Forster, in his attack on the leaders of the Land League, displayed the same indomitable courage which marked the whole of his Irish administration, every one will admit. Nor do we for a moment doubt that, up to the time when Mr. Parnell and his colleagues in the Land League were lodged in Kilmainham, they had laid themselves open to the most serious suspicions of complicity in a policy of terrorism which involved, and which they must have known to involve, acts of agrarian outrage in Ireland. That was Mr. Forster's justification for lodging them in Kilmainham, and, for our own part, we have always believed that he had established that justification over and over again, to the satisfaction of all moderate men on both sides of the House of Commons. But whether there was any sound political justification for raking up all these charges again, more than a year after date, when there is no pretence, so far as we can hear, for saying that these Land-League leaders have continued, or repeated, their attempts to stimulate violence in Ireland, and when no purpose, so far as we can see, can be answered by the repetition of these accusations, except to render it more difficult for Mr. Parnell and his colleagues to use their influence decisively on the side of order, we are wholly unable to see. We cannot help agreeing with not a little that Mr. T. P. O'Connor urged, in his very effective speech,—and it is not often that we can agree with Mr. T. P. O'Connor,—as to the unfairness of holding Mr. Parnell responsible for everything which was done by his chief subordinates after his incarceration, when every effort was made to hold back from Mr. Parnell the knowledge of what these subordinates were then doing and saying. It seems to us that Mr. Forster on Thursday made the grave error of rekindling very bitter animosities in the House, without any of that absolute justification which he had a year ago for his statements of this kind. Then he was showing why it was absolutely necessary to put down and keep down the Land League, and why it would have been then most unsafe to open the prison doors to men who had acted as Mr. Parnell and his associates had up to April last notoriously acted. Now, it is not even so much as alleged that the liberation of Mr. Parnell has led, or is still leading, to fresh outrage, while it is alleged that his liberation has led and is leading to the adoption of a more moderate course, amongst all those whom Mr. Parnell can influence. That being so, to rake up the old charges,—true as many of them probably are, unjust as some of them, applying to the period of Mr. Parnell's imprisonment, appear to us to be,—is hardly statesmanlike; nor can we see what result it can possibly produce, except to throw Mr. Parnell more and more into the hands of the violent Irish party, a result which no one who desires to see quiet restored to Ireland can for a moment contemplate without regret. The atmosphere of the House of Commons was electric enough, before the speeches of Thursday night. Mr. Forster's speech and Mr. T. P. O'Connor's reply to it, did not make the atmosphere less electric; and we, for our own parts, do not know what but mischief can come of the electrical state so induced. One thing is perfectly clear, that even for Mr. Forster's own strong and sober judgment the electrical condition is not favourable. It is evident that he has committed an error not quite without moment, in throwing doubt on the fact that the Cabinet had considered and agreed to press a Crimes Prevention Bill before he himself left it. At least Lord Hartington, with the access, of which he assured the House that he had carefully availed himself, to official facts, could not easily have been mistaken on this subject, so that it seems nearly certain that Mr. Forster's memory must have become confused, as Lord Hartington suggested, by his frequent and perilous journeys to Ireland. Still, in a less electric condition of things than that of Thursday night, Mr. Forster would never have been misled into laying so much stress upon a supposed error of his colleagues which turns out to have been no error at all.

The real danger of the situation, however, is this:—Here are Irish Members foaming with wrath against the Crimes Prevention Act, and either persuaded, or determined to act as if they were persuaded, that that Act does cause a great number of judicial murders, and is put in force by passion, chicanery, and fraud. Here, on the other hand, are a powerful Conservative Party, quite as passionately convinced that the Crimes Prevention Act is the one sole hope of Ireland; that the only thing for Ireland is to stamp out murder by the most stringent use of that Act, and that every indication of policy which looks in the direction of further reform in Ireland is to be discouraged, as dangerous and pusillanimous weakness. Between these parties there is no little danger of an explosion, which might well convulse the House of Commons. Members of the extreme Irish party are incited to fury by such speeches as Mr. Forster's on Thursday. Members of the extreme Conservative party are incited to no less fury by such speeches as Mr. O'Brien's on Wednesday. It will take sang-froid and temper such as only the British House of Commons can display, to prevent these counter-currents of passion from leading to some violent explosion, in which Constitutional liberty might suffer a serious shock. We believe that the Liberal leaders are equal to the occasion—Lord Hartington certainly appeared quite equal to it on Thursday night—but we cannot look back on such an encounter as that between Mr. Forster and Mr. T. P. O'Connor without a good deal of anxious foreboding for the future.

THE NEW MINISTRY IN FRANCE.

THE crisis in France has resolved itself thus far, that there is again a Ministry which, so long as the Chamber will permit, can act. M. Jules Ferry, though far too Jacobin, especially on religious questions, for our approval, is a man of great and varied capacity, with a certain quality of persistence which has all the effect of firmness, and with a faculty for managing Extremists which is becoming essential to a French statesman. He has gathered together such relics of the Gambettist Administration as are not pledged to M. de Freycinet, and his Cabinet is not unattractive to the majority in the Chamber. They prefer competent men, though they will not support them; and M. Challemeil-Lacour, the Minister for Foreign Affairs; General Thibaudin, the Minister at War; M. Waldeck-Rousseau, the Minister of the Interior; M. Martin Feuillée, Minister of Justice, and M. Raynal, Minister of Public Works, though objectionable on other grounds, have at least the ability required for governing. They are all, in their way, strong men. M. Tirard, the Finance Minister, it is true, may not be,—at least, M. Léon Say obviously distrusts his skill, and he made before some sad blunders as to his surplus,—but the Haute Finance is so opposed to any Ministry of the Left, that the Premier probably had no other choice. The Cabinet, moreover, is composed of the kind of men whom the Deputies individually approve. Several of the Ministers, as, for example, M. Jules Ferry and M. Challemeil-Lacour, are accomplished men; but there is not a "de" among them, none are by birth above the professional class, and one at least—M. Raynal, who was a railway porter, or, more probably, sub-inspector of traffic—is a marked example of the rise of a new couche sociale. Social jealousies go very deep in France, and the Deputies will bear from men of this kind what they would not accept from men of higher social pretensions. They are, too, glad to be able to point out to electors that in France the political career has become easily accessible to all. M. Jules Ferry, therefore, has a Ministry which will be heard, and he has two other great advantages in his favour. This is the most Jacobin Ministry which could hope to govern with the Senate, and will, therefore, attract some support from the Extremists, who recently have been boiling with irritation; and it is the last which can be made without a Dissolution. It is stated that M. Ferry's first condition on taking office was that, if the Chamber proved impracticable, the Senate should be asked to dissolve; and even if that is untrue, the prospect of the demand is on the face of things. M. de Freycinet could not manage the Chamber any more than M. Jules Ferry, while his appointment as Premier would frighten all those holders of Rente, with whom it must not be forgotten the average peasant deeply sympathises. The President cannot go on for ever putting scratch Ministries together, and it is therefore improbable that he will again allow a Ministry to be overthrown without, at all events, exerting his constitutional right to give the Senate advice. The fear of a Dissolution is very deep in the minds of the Deputies, who know that the Government may precede it by a demand for Scrutin de Liste, and who feel that with no Gambetta to thunder out a word of command, the action of universal suffrage must be more or less uncertain. The next Chamber might be unexpectedly moderate, or it might contain a majority of Extremists, who have always this advantage,—that their followers poll to the last man. The Ministry, therefore, will receive much support from the self-interested, while it will not awaken those hatreds which in France are stronger even than self-interest. It is, in fact, as strong as any Ministry in France can now be.

Nevertheless, we cannot either approve this Ministry or predict for it any length of life. It will, we fear, be Jacobin in feeling,—that is, will be disposed to persecute the Church, to threaten the Magistracy, and to proscribe all politicians who are willing to serve France, but not to advance the cause of particular sections of opinion. That is not, in our judgment, the tone which it is either right or safe for a Republic to adopt, more especially when it has still to prove that it can include all citizens who do not openly plot or intrigue against its existence. M. Jules Ferry's compromise about the Princes, his adoption of the law of 1834, which allows the Head of the State to place any officer in retreat, seems to us radically unjust, as unjust as it would be in this country to use the Queen's legal right of dismissing officers without a reason, against all eldest sons. He intends to govern by concessions to political panic, which, when they are obviously unjust, are unworthy of honourable rulers. General Thibaudin agrees with him, and will, moreover, be forced, by his exceptional and unhappy position as a man who has broken parole, into the ranks of those Extremists who forgive everything on account of fidelity to party. His only prospect of a career is to satisfy a party that he is indispensable, and the only party he can so satisfy is the Jacobin. M. Challemlacour again, besides being in opinion of Extremist proclivities, as he showed throughout the discussion on the Proscription Bill, is obviously inclined to the policy known to Americans as "waving the banner," or, in other words, disposed to seek popularity by a forward policy which may disturb the whole world. He can easily do things in Egypt which would throw all Europe into commotion, and we feel no confidence that he will not do them, his very first proposal being a Bill for the settlement of Tunis which will rouse Italian susceptibilities to fever-heat. He is, moreover, known to be devoted to M. Gambetta's idea of extending the dependencies of France, and will press her claims on Madagascar, Tonquin, and the New Hebrides, in a very irritating, if not dangerous way. We look forward, therefore, to the action of the new Ministry with a certain apprehension, while we can hardly believe that it will be popular with the Chamber or the country. The latter is distinctly not disposed to quarrel with the Monarchical Courts, with England, and with China all at once, while the former has repeatedly, as Lord Reay recently showed, voted down every proposal for active intervention in any part of the world. There is, no doubt, a section of the French people which is very sensitive under the sneer implied in the phrase, "The effacement of France;" but M. Clémenceau and his followers will only be irritated by the revival of projects which they thought abandoned. They are, we believe, in earnest in their conviction that France requires "a policy of the fireside," and they will vote down any Ministry which on any serious emergency deserts it. A suspicion that the Ministry intended war would ruin it, and a policy of self-assertion such as M. Challemlacour recommends cannot be carried far without that suspicion being actively aroused. To be at once Chauvinist and peaceful is in France impossible, and the Ministry will probably be wrecked on a vote about some despatch.

While, therefore, we acknowledge that France has again a Government, we do not think it a good one, and doubt if it will last, even under the new pressure of the threat of dissolution. Its programme implies that intention to "combat" as well as govern, which is the very essence of Jacobinism, and which, whenever France is inclined for quiet, must bring any Government down. It may be, of course, that France, imperceptibly to foreigners, has changed her mood; but France is not very variable, except about constitutions, and it is not two years since M. Gambetta, the direct choice of the people, was deserted, because it was thought that his policy must lead ultimately to war. Nothing had occurred since to weaken the indisposition of the peasantry to expend either their children or their money, and we do not believe that it has been weakened. As we understand them, they will insist on quiescence abroad, and steady, though Radical, government at home, and that, though it may be the programme, is not the tone of the Jules-Ferry Ministry, which is presided over by the man who seized Tunis, selects for the Foreign Office a man who defies the Monarchies to prevent proscription, and entrusts the Army to a General with whom German Staff officers say they can hold no communication.

MR. GOSCHEN ON THE PRICE OF GOLD.

THE irritation with which the Farmers' friends listened to Mr. Goschen's speech of Monday was quite natural and excusable. Nobody likes to be told that his grievance, particularly when it is real, is due either to causes which are beyond his control, or to causes other than those in which he himself believes. If it is only a cold that he suffers from, he is vexed to be told that he did not catch it as he supposes, or that it is a malarious attack, and not a cold at all. The majority of the squires, moreover, then in the House probably did not even understand what Mr. Goschen was saying, did not comprehend in particular what "appreciation" meant, for the summarist of the Times, who must be as well instructed as they are, made him say precisely the opposite of his whole argument. To be told that you are all wrong, in words too learned for your intelligence, is, as we all know, almost unendurably aggravating, particularly if the speaker has a reputation which makes you think there must, after all, be something in his words. Nevertheless, though we entirely understand their unwillingness, we do trust the more intelligent squires, as well as other politicians, will read and ponder one of the most weighty and condensed arguments ever addressed to the House of Commons, an argument which had only one defect, that it should have been followed by action, in the shape of a request for a Commission of Inquiry adequate to the importance of the subject. Until the speech has been studied, neither landlords nor tenants will be fully aware of one main condition now threatening all agricultural prosperity. Mr. Goschen is, as they are perhaps aware, of all men in the House the greatest authority on currency; and he suggested, evidently with full conviction, that the value of gold was rising. The United States and Germany, by adopting gold coinages, had absorbed £200,000,000 of the small stock of gold in the world, and, of course, had increased very much the annual demand for wear-and-tear, and had thus, to use the ordinary language of business, made gold comparatively scarce. Of course, the value of gold, under such circumstances, has risen, as that of any other article would, and each sovereign will exchange against more produce, or, in other words, everything will sell for a less price in sovereigns. As a matter of fact, this is the case as regards all articles except cattle, sheep, and their products, the natural fall having been stopped in their case by "a fearful havoc among the flocks and herds." One other thing also, which Mr. Goschen—who, as usual, half spoiled his speech by reducing it to intellectual pemmican—did not mention, has remained stationary, the price of labour, which has been kept up partly by strikes, partly by emigration, and partly by the improved civilisation of the labourer, who is getting educated. The position of the agricultural interest is, therefore, this. The farmer is getting less for every kind of produce, except stock, than before, but still pays his rent in sovereigns, which have increased in value, and still gives as much as before for labour. Moreover, all his taxes, Mr. Goschen says, have increased in weight, for they are nominally unchanged; while, to procure the necessary sovereigns, more wheat, hay, or what not, must be sacrificed. To make this clearer, let us take a familiar illustration. John Smith, of Essex, is bound to pay £300 a year for 300 acres of arable. To clear rent, pay wages, obtain interest on money sunk, and get a living, he must sell, say,

£2,000 a year of produce. If gold has risen 20 per cent., he will obtain for his produce one-fifth less, or £1,600. Nevertheless, in the teeth of that fall, he has to pay not only £300 in rent, but a fifth more—if rent is represented in produce—and a fifth more also upon all taxes. He is hit at both ends, in diminished receipts and increased payments, and gains only in the reduction on his own expenditure in clothes, food, and tools.

If that statement is true, and the rise in gold is permanent, the Farmers' distress is partly, at all events, explained, and can be remedied only, as Mr. Goschen hinted, by a permanent reduction in rent. It is simply impossible that the farmer should, out of less valuable produce, pay a still larger share to his landlord, which, when no reduction has been granted, he is now required to do. Even security will not help him to do that, and if, as in Ireland and in parts of England, he has little spare capital, payment will speedily become impossible. What, then, is the evidence for the rise in gold? Briefly, it is this,—that every important article, stock and the products of stock excepted, has shrunk in value as expressed in sovereigns, and this, though population is increasing; and that almost every competent economist, including men like Mr. Goschen himself, the late Mr. Stanley Jevons, and Mr. Robert Giffen, has become convinced that the first cause of the shrinkage is the scarcity of gold. As to the extent of the rise caused by that scarcity—and therefore the extent of the shrinkage in apparent values—there is difference of opinion; but subject always to better experts, we believe we are right in stating that the usual estimate varies from fifteen to twenty per cent. We will, however, take only ten per cent., and still, a ten-per-cent. fall in the value of all sold off an arable farm, and a ten-per-cent. rise in all fixed payments like rent and taxes, implies, for a trade which has had no "pull" from bumper harvests, but, on the contrary, heavy losses from want of sunshine, a most unusual and wide-spread distress. It has been borne quietly in Great Britain mainly because it has been supposed to be temporary, and because landlords have been exceedingly liberal,—sometimes, as in the Duke of Bedford's case, liberal to a princely extent—but it has been real, and if produced by a permanent cause like a rise in gold, must continue. The seasons, we suppose, must get better in time, though, as regards Ireland, there are serious suspicions of an over-cropped soil which no sunshine will cure; but the value of the sovereign will not, on that account, decline. We are studiously leaving figures to the specialist journals, but it is, we believe, admitted by all experts that, apart from new sources of supply, the annual yield of gold in the world will decline rather than increase, that the annual consumption for wear-and-tear and use in the arts has more than caught up the yield, and that gold, therefore, must get scarcer than ever, until possibly, as Mr. Goschen clearly hinted in his pregnant speech, all relations between debtor and creditor may be undergoing a severe change, to the advantage of the latter. The debtor has to sell more to pay, while the creditor can buy more with what he receives. There is, therefore, no reasonable ground of hope in this direction. The process may be slow, or may stop at a point not far off—though Mr. Goschen evidently apprehends that the change may be of the last importance—but clearly it will be in the direction so painful to States, to leaseholders, and to all who have to receive unfixed and pay away fixed sums in gold. That the supply should be increased is, of course, possible. The United States may annex Lower California, or other provinces of Mexico, which, when searched by American miners, may prove as rich as California or New South Wales. Science has possibly not said its last word as to extracting gold, and there is, we suppose, some dim, far-away chance of the Governments expropriating all silver mines, fixing the out-turn, and so giving that metal a stable value. But these are mere possibilities, and on any calculation that statesmen will seriously consider, gold, if the foregoing facts are correct, must rise, and with it the weight of taxes, of fixed rents, and of fixed payments. That is a melancholy outlook for agriculturists.

For ourselves, we believe that Mr. Goschen is thoroughly in the right, though we do not pretend to define the precise extent of the movement he foreshadowed, and our object to-day is to ask whether the time has not arrived when a Royal Commission, consisting of men like Mr. Goschen, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Hubbard, Mr. R. Giffen, and the like, should be appointed, to consider the whole subject? We have no hope of remedies, distrusting currency doctors beyond all men; but it is of the last political importance that the plain arithmetical facts should be made clear to ordinary men's minds. A rise in the purchasing power of the sovereign affects every trade and every interest, and nothing is so dangerous as the effort of any powerful but ignorant interest to get rid of a malaise the cause of which it does not thoroughly understand. Here are the English Farmers, for example, worrying Parliament for grants in aid of rates, which, if they get them, will not relieve them of their burdens to the extent of sixpence an acre; and fighting fiercely for a security which, though they ought to have it, will not, as Mr. James Howard tells them every day, at present rents, help them to keep solvent. The movement of gold, if it is real—which, for ourselves, we do not doubt—must be telling on a country like Ireland with a force of itself sufficient to produce endless irritation; and Ireland is but an extreme instance of a much more widely diffused social suffering. The facts must be made clear, before either politicians or electors can think to any purpose, and the only authority which can explain them with sufficient weight to be immediately trusted is a Royal Commission.

THE SALVATION ARMY IN SWITZERLAND.

IF the Salvation Army has many such officers as Miss Charlesworth, we do not wonder that it makes converts. Her account of her conflict with the "Unsaved" authorities of Geneva, and of the mingled acuteness and simplicity with which she drove them into expelling her from the Canton because they could do nothing with her while she remained in it, is one of the most charming bits of narrative which we have come across for a very long time. Enthusiasm, devotion, self-possession, courage, humour, are all apparent in it; and when it is remembered that Miss Charlesworth is at the most just seventeen, it needs no more to show that even the Skeleton Army would find in her a very dangerous foe; supposing, that is, that they consented to give her a hearing. Miss Charlesworth beat the officials who examined her on all points. She proved to them that what they called a public meeting was really a private meeting. She challenged them to show that wearing her uniform in the kitchen of a cottage was a breach of the law forbidding any one to wear a religious dress on the public highway. She produced her "leave to stay," &c., referred them to the police for her passport. And, finally, when she was waiting for the final decision of the officials, "All at once it struck me," says Miss Charlesworth, "that we would have a prayer meeting. 'Zitza,' I said, 'we will pray. Let us go down on our knees and pray for these people, for if ever we wanted the Lord with us, it is now.' So down we went, and prayed out loud for about ten minutes, and it did us good." In the end, Miss Charlesworth was turned out of the Canton, as she puts it, "Because, first, I had broken the law by speaking in a public meeting (lie number one); secondly, because I had nothing to show that my parents consented to my being with Miss Booth (lie number two);" and so the little heroine had to go.

Things are a little changed, it must be confessed, when Miss Charlesworth's father comes upon the stage. It is not clear from his own account whether Mr. Charlesworth did or did not consent to his daughter being at Geneva. He says himself that he "arranged with Miss Booth to leave her for a time in Paris, that she might assist Miss Booth in her arduous work among the poor," and he does not say that he forbade her going to Geneva when Miss Booth went there. Indeed, financial considerations would probably have made it impossible for Miss Charlesworth to accompany her friend against her father's express prohibition. Mr. Charlesworth has evidently been in great straits how to manage his daughter for some time past. About two years ago, Miss Charlesworth was introduced to the Salvation Army, and from that time forward it has absorbed her whole life. Mr. Charlesworth seems to have thought well of the Army in the first instance, but he was not quite prepared to make it a present of his daughter. When he found that things were rapidly coming to this point, he tried, he says, to induce those of Mr. Booth's family with whom Miss Charlesworth seemed most associated, not to encourage the influence which the Army was gaining over her. Miss Charlesworth, as we can easily believe, was too attractive and too useful a convert to be lightly let go. No weight was given either to her youth, or the fact that she was still a schoolgirl. The Army, says Mr. Charlesworth, believes "that its work is paramount in importance to all other pursuits and obligations, and even to the known wishes of parents." Mr. Charlesworth then seems to have taken the wisest course open to him. He saw that his daughter would be miserable, if she were withdrawn altogether from the Army work; while, at the same time, the excitement of that work, as carried on in London, was obviously bad for her. In Paris, however, the work of the Army promised to be quieter, and when he took her over there, he was "greatly pleased with the moderation and propriety which pervaded all the proceedings, under the superintendence of Miss Booth." The violation of the stipulations which Mr. Charlesworth made as regards wearing the uniform and becoming an officer is, perhaps, due to the exciting circumstances in which Miss Booth and Miss Charlesworth have been placed at Geneva. It would probably be almost impossible to restrain Miss Charlesworth from doing everything that her friend did, when it became a question of sharing that friend's bonds and imprisonment. It is fair, moreover, to Mr. Booth to acknowledge that Mr. Charlesworth has evidently been more willing to allow his daughter to take part in the work of the Army than he now cares to remember. Only so late as January 31st, he wrote to Miss Booth, leaving it entirely to her judgment whether Miss Charlesworth remained at Geneva or at Paris during Miss Booth's proposed visit to England next month. "Let her," he says, "be where she will be most helpful to you, and most useful in the Lord's service. . . . I can quite trust to your arrangements for my child. I know you will counsel her and enforce rules for her guidance in your absence." This is certainly not quite in the tone of his letter to the Times. Mr. Charlesworth has evidently found that his daughter's connection with the Salvation Army has brought her into greater prominence than he wished, and in the irritation of the discovery he seeks to throw the blame on Miss Booth. But Miss Charlesworth only seems to have run the risks which are inseparable from an organisation of so peculiar a character as the Salvation Army. The adoption of military forms and military methods brings with it a certain liability to military danger.

The real moral of the whole story is that parents who do not wish their children to become officers in the Salvation Army, had better forbid them attending the meetings in the first instance. When once the flame is kindled, there is nothing in the rules of the Salvation Army which forbids them to fan it by every means in their power. The part which the Army assigns to women has extraordinary attractions for these times. They can be in every way rivals of men, they can take an absolutely equal part in the establishment and building-up of the new organisation. By the side of such experiences as this career opens to them, the ordinary routine of home must appear intolerably dull. Mr. Charlesworth himself is of opinion that it "has undoubtedly been accomplishing a great work, in the conversion and reformation of thousands of the most ignorant and depraved." Where, in Clapham, from which he dates his letter, can Mr. Charlesworth hope to offer his daughter any career that will stand comparison with one that admits of such possibilities as these? It is undoubtedly hard upon him to lose a daughter; but if he now takes her back, he will receive but a shadow of her real self. Her heart will be with the Army, no matter where her body may be. Probably, Mr. Charlesworth can ensure that she shall not be placed in positions of such excessive prominence, or made an object of such European interest. In that way, her mind may change, and she may eventually return to her father's house a less enthusiastic, but also a wiser woman. Whether to wish for such an ending for her own sake, it is hard to say. For a nature of this ardent and excitable type to be disillusioned is no common trial, and we could almost wish that she may never be disturbed in her conviction that she belongs to that chosen band which embraces great Missionaries and the founders of religious Orders, and generally, all those who have ardently loved and deeply moved their fellow-men.

THE SECRET MOTIVE OF SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE motives which impel ordinary men, and especially ordinary men without personal wrongs to avenge, to enter Secret Societies embodied with an intention to kill are doubtless many and diverse; but, we take it, the dominant one in all is the desire for power. There are probably in all such societies, especially at first, a few men with wrongs to avenge, or a few victims of true fanaticism,—that is, men dominated by an idea which, like a monomania, masters alike conscience and brain; but the majority are of a much more frequent and, so to speak, vulgar type. In a time and place of Secret Societies, a strong-willed man, full of desire to be somebody, to be efficient, to exercise real and direct power, knows that if he enters such a society and rises high, his ambition will speedily be gratified to the fullest extent. With little money, no birth, and no ascendancy abroad, he may within and through the Society exercise a power which, to him who wields it, must seem tremendous, far transcending the power of any Minister or any General. The power, it must be remembered, is necessarily far greater in his eyes than in those of any outsider. The world knows only his acts, but he knows also his own designs, and in their easy prospect of realisation they appear to him like acts. He feels, in not killing, as if he had spared. The world sees that a man, possibly a great man, has fallen; but the man who made him fall feels as if anybody might fall at his signal, as if he were distributing death and life, were an arbiter of destiny, a potentate secretly wielding the lightning at his will. He feels almost like a deity. "There is the great official, full of rank, and honour, and wealth, whose word is so weighty, and his person so revered; and I, whom nobody knows, who am but one of the humble, a man always in shadow, can with a word reduce him to mere clay. There is that other, still greater, and I pass him by, and he does not know that he has been enveloped in lightning made powerless by my hand." That was, it is known, the feeling of Thomassen, the "monster" of Bremerhaven, who delighted in dining with passengers about to sail in ships which he had doomed by his clock-work apparatus to sink in mid-ocean; and that is the attraction which, as all their confessions attest, has always carried away successful poisoners. They feel the sense of power in its most concentrated and extatic form, power over the issues of life and death, the power which, to whomsoever it belongs, be he Cæsar, or Sultan, or criminal, separates him utterly from his kind. The leading spirit of a Secret Society enjoys that, and in a higher degree than the poisoner, for he can act by others, and even at a distance, and his volition does not therefore seem to himself impeded and weakened in its thunderbolt character by the small trickeries and precautions and petty efforts essential to the poisoner's success. He wills like a despot; and the victim falls. That is the luxury of the position, and we can easily conceive that to men with a strong thirst for power—and that thirst is in some men the most intense of all cravings—with steady nerves, and indurated hearts, that fascination may be nearly irresistible, more especially as there is added to it another, the fascination so sovereign with a large section of mankind—with one-half, for example, of all English gentlemen—the fascination of hunting game which may turn and rend them. No elephant, no tiger, can rend the huntsman, as the great official can rend assassins, if they spring and miss their mark. All the evidence given at Kilmainham suggests that when the assassins were hunting Mr. Forster or Mr. Burke, the dominant sense among them was that of being engaged in a battue of very large and very dangerous game. Carey in particular, throughout his narrative, tells of his arranging signals and giving signals, and marking distances, and retiring to safe points of observation, exactly as he would have told of some grand tiger-hunt, in which he was so interested that no detail escaped him, yet in which it was expedient that the actual conflict should be left to stronger hands. The Indian Thugs all showed this feeling in the strongest form, all avowed that they were huntsmen, all declared that there was no "shikar" like theirs, at once so dangerous and so exciting, and once their tongues were loosened, all described their sport with the minuteness and accuracy with which a man who has been after tigers recalls the details of the chase. Twenty years after, a Thug would remember every detail, down to the minutest personal marks upon his victim, just as twenty years after "the Old Shekarry" could describe with unflinching accuracy every detail of a dangerous hunt after bear, or tiger, or anaconda, every stumble his elephant made, every shot that was fired, every mark in the slaughtered game. To distribute life and death, and to distribute it so, was a gratification which attracted into such societies men who were neither fanatics, nor conscious of an undying grievance, nor, as we believe, in many cases, full of political hate. With such men, we suspect fidelity to associates is never very strong. They do not think of them in their hearts as associates, but as instruments. punish them remorselessly when they fail to act, or betray them; but break them, when they are useless, as readily as any other weapons. What are they? Rifles in the grand shikar. Mr. Bosworth Smith, in his new "Life of Lord Lawrence," tells how a petty prince ordered an enemy to be killed, and sent with the murderer a runner, to give aid or to report. The man, utterly faithful to the prince, saw the deed done, and ran ninety miles continuously to his master to report success, was received with delight, and dismissed, and then,—and then stooped down to raise the carpet portière of his master's chamber, certain that he should hear the order for his own assassination. It came, as he expected, and he fled on faster than the prince's horsemen, to his own home in the mountains, to relate the story to John Lawrence. That prince was but Carey in another clime, and his order as to his runner would create in his principality as little surprise as it did in the runner himself, who yet flew on to the betrayal he knew to be so nearly certain. Why, under such circumstances, confidence exists at all, why the runner serves the prince, why, in an Irish Secret Society, any one trusts any one else, is only to be explained by the belief each man entertains that the catastrophe will not happen to him, that he will be successful, and that, being successful, faith will be kept.

But the conscience? The conscience of the despot who is often inflicting unjust penalties does not seem to wake while he is inflicting them, nor does that of brigands. If there is one thing certain in the history of crime, it is that habitual murder acts like some powerful drug as a stupifier to the conscience. The great poisoners have seldom betrayed a trace of it, or the great pirates, or the great brigands. That it can wake, even in such men, we firmly believe; but it is slow to waken. The Thugs, who seem, while their career lasts, absolutely without it, do, we believe, after years of their quiet, industrious seclusion—they all make tents for the Army—show most distinct traces of it, traces so deep that their experienced watchers will not allow visitors to allude to their crimes; but it wakes more slowly than in any class of criminals. It impels them to confession, to an abstinence from small crimes—a striking peculiarity of the Thugs, as of many of the worst French Terrorists—but not, till the stupefaction has passed away, to personal remorse. We can offer no explanation of the phenomenon, except the very obvious one that no man in whom conscience was vigorous would join such a society, or the possible hypothesis that to such a man a human being does actually become, as it were, game; but of the fact there can be no question, and its existence is one more justification of the horror with which mankind regards such associations. We all know the tremendous effect of opinion upon conscience, frequently almost stupefying it permanently; and such associations, it would seem certain, generate within themselves an opinion under which the sense of criminality in murder disappears,—an opinion, doubtless, helped by the internal law dooming every recalcitrant to death, and so producing the feeling that crime is not crime, but only obedience to irresistible necessity. Carey, as yet, is only anxious to defend himself from the charge of being "an informer." Years hence, the pressure on his conscience will be other than that; but till then, there is in all who take up assassination as a work a blood-drunkness.

THE POWER OF FASHION.

IF one may trust the general impression in political circles, the strong feeling expressed by the Princess of Wales on the barbarous sport of Pigeon-shooting, as it has lately been practised in England, is likely to make it a very easy task to carry through the Bill for its suppression. It is quite true, of course, that the sport, as it has usually been practised, is no true sport at all, that it tests neither the perceptions, nor the endurance, nor the resources of those who engage in it, as a true sport ought to test them, and that while very cruel in its incidents, it is barren of the kind of discipline which every such sport should involve. That is perfectly true, and we are far from saying that the Princess of Wales would have formed the opinion she has formed against the pigeon-shooting of the day, had she not had these good grounds to go upon; and still less do we say that had she formed an unfavourable opinion that was comparatively groundless on any sport, she would have had the same sort of success in persuading other people to adopt it which she notoriously has had under existing circumstances. But this we do say,—that other things remaining exactly as they are, if it had not been for the fortunate circumstance that the Princess of Wales has taken up the matter as she has, it would have been many years before opinion in political circles would have ripened, as it has actually ripened, to the point of rendering it easy to put this barbarous sport down. Fashion has still an immense power in the circles in which political opinion is formed. Let the Queen, or any popular member of the Royal Family, take up a sound view of a question of this kind, and we may be sure of this,—that it is more than equivalent in political effect to the separate conversion of at least ten thousand ordinary mortals to the same opinion. It is not easy to explain exactly how the thing works. But it does work, and works most powerfully in rendering everybody whose influence is of importance in such matters predisposed to come over to the influential side. We do not say, and do not mean, that it would work equally in favour of a really weak or false opinion. But in favour of a sound or true opinion, the adoption of it by a really influential member of the highest social-circles is equivalent to a good many years' start in public favour without any such advantage. And it is a matter of no little interest, therefore, to understand how this power of Fashion works, and why it smooths away obstacles which it would otherwise take a very powerful popular movement to dispose of.

We believe the explanation to be precisely of the same kind as the explanation why it is comparatively easy for the greater Public Schools to set a fashion as to cricket or football, or what pastime you will, to the schools of second rank, when it would be impossible for the schools of second rank to set the fashion to the schools above them. As to all the so-called amusements of life at least, men take hints from those who are supposed to have carried their amusements to a more refined point, and not from those who are supposed to have had less opportunity and leisure for the elaboration of their amusements. And whatever else the highest social circles understand, it is always assumed that they understand better the amusements and refinements of life than the circles beneath them: and, no doubt, to some extent, this is the truth. The higher breeding, as it is called, certainly does not involve a higher morality; in some points, it is apt to involve a definitely lower morality than the breeding of the professional classes; but it does involve, on the whole, better trained and more refined tastes as to things external,—often finer senses,—almost always a better class of conventions, conventions protecting individual freedom better, and imposing finer tests of individual capacity and skill. This is the reason, we take it, why amusements are so apt to descend in the social scale, while moral convictions ascend. You frequently find, that when first an amusement is borrowed by one class from the class above it, it does not give half the real satisfaction to the class on which it is imposed which the old amusements supplanted by it used to give. And yet it will hold its ground, because there is some secret conviction that it will educate and train those who have adopted it, till they find as much in it as those from whom they have borrowed it have found. There is at least sufficient social hero-worship to engender the conviction that the higher strata of society understand amusing themselves more completely than the lower strata, and that what the former have long preferred, the latter will come to prefer so soon as they have been educated sufficiently by following the example of their betters. This, as we suppose, is the reason why a fashion setting in against such a sport as pigeon-shooting removes the chief difficulty in the way of abolishing it. Men cannot enjoy an amusement, after they are once seriously possessed by the conviction that they are feeling what it is "bad form" to feel in every moment's pleasure that it gives them. It takes, after all, a number of subtle conditions to render a social amusement of any kind really delightful, and of these almost the very first is that you shall not feel lowered in the eyes of those who set you the standard of amusement by the pleasure you take in it. When the Princess of Wales and her set take up the notion that a certain amusement is "bad form," the fact that they have done so vitally diminishes, if it does not destroy, the animation with which that amusement is pursued in a hundred circles just beneath her own; in other words, in those circles the amusement becomes less amusing, becomes dull and lifeless, or else defiant. But men cannot be defiant when they are amusing themselves and still take full delight in their amusements, though they may, and often do, show themselves contemptuous or scornful in their amusements and still take full delight in them. But here is just the difference. In their amusements, men naturally support themselves on the sanction of those socially above them, and very often feed themselves on their contempt for those socially beneath them, but never vice versa. While they often have a shrewd suspicion that the classes below them have higher moral convictions than their own, they never have the least suspicion that the classes beneath their own understand the art of enjoying themselves half so well. Hence, as we believe, the savour is taken out of an amusement by its discouragement from above, in a way in which it is impossible to take the savour out of it by its discouragement from below.

Even in regard to moral questions, the power of Fashion has, we believe, always been exerted through its effect on men's social position, i.e., on the position which they value chiefly for the sake of their tastes and their enjoyments, and not through its effect on their conscience. The Code of Honour, which was the Code of Fashion in another form, exerted its enormous power to make men fear the repute of cowardice much more than the reality, because the repute of cowardice was so utterly inconsistent with the pleasant mutual respect and freedom of ordinary social intercourse. The code of honour exerted the tyrannous influence it had—and, indeed, still has, so far as it still obtains—not because any defiance of it interfered gravely with men's duties, but because it interfered so gravely with all the social freedom and cheer of the hours of leisure and recreation. A man who had not satisfied the code of honour was a man with whom no one chose to associate needlessly, and even with whom it was "bad form" to be friendly, a man with whom it was discreditable to talk and laugh and ride and play, a man who ought to be "sent to Coventry" for all but the most absolute exigencies of life. Nothing shows more powerfully how tremendous is the influence which such an ostracism as this inflicts, than the number of duellistic murders which men used to commit against their conscience, and with a permanent loss of peace ultimately as well as of self-respect at the time of the duel, just because they could not bear to be ostracised in this way from all the give-and-take of the lighter social intercourse. Yet it was the terror of this banishment chiefly, if not solely, that gave the code of honour all its powerful sanctions, and rendered it so difficult a matter to break its yoke. When at last it was broken, in the matter of duels, it was rather, we imagine, because the mimicking of these so-called vindications of honour by vulgar and unfashionable people had contrived to make them ridiculous, than because their wickedness had become really intolerable to men. The tyranny of Fashion is almost always broken from above, and hardly ever effectually from below.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

WHY MR. FORSTER RESIGNED.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As a rule, the public are apt to take their impressions of what passes in Parliament from the leading articles of the papers they read rather than from a perusal of Members' speeches. It has thus come to be believed that Mr. Forster resigned office because his colleagues insisted on making a bargain with Mr. Parnell as a condition of his release from prison, while Mr. Forster would not release him on any condition. The facts are precisely the contrary. It was Mr. Forster who wished to come to an understanding with Mr. Parnell and other leading suspects. It was Mr. Forster's colleagues who refused to have any bargaining. Here are Mr. Forster's own words, as reported in the Times of May 5, 1882, in the speech in which he explained the cause of his resignation:—"There are three conditions, either of which I should regard as a fair ground for releasing them." The conditions were, "a public promise on their part; Ireland quiet; or the acquisition of fresh powers by the Government. . . . I am told that hopes are held out to us that there will be a change on the part of himself [Parnell] and his colleagues. . . . But what I want is an avowal of a change, a promise to help the Government, if the Government do something, an undertaking to uphold the Government in enforcing the law."

On a subsequent occasion Mr. Forster declared that he "was not very exigent in his demands" on Messrs. Parnell, Dillon, and O'Kelly, as a condition of their release. "As I should be very sorry," he said, "to say anything disrespectful of those gentlemen, I was willing to take their word." The difference between Mr. Forster and his colleagues is, therefore, reduced to this. He thought, as did his colleagues, that "if they [i.e., Mr. Parnell and his two friends] could be released with safety, they ought to be released." His guarantee for safety was either Ireland pacified; or a public confession of wrong-doing, coupled with a promise of good behaviour for the future on the part of Mr. Parnell and his friends; or the passing of the Prevention of Crimes Act. On obtaining of any one of these conditions, Mr. Forster was willing to open the doors of Kilmainham Prison.

Mr. Forster's colleagues, on the other hand, decided that they ought to let out Mr. Parnell and his friends without any understanding or condition whatsoever, the moment they received authentic information that Mr. Parnell and his friends were favourable to the policy of putting down the outrages. To have kept them in prison till Ireland was "quiet" was an absurd impossibility, for they must have been released in any case within five months, by the lapse of Mr. Forster's Coercion Act. To have exacted a humiliating confession of sins and a promise of good-conduct in future would have been to destroy Mr. Parnell's influence for good, if he were ever so anxious to put down crime. And to have kept him and his friends in prison till the Prevention of Crimes Act became law would practically have been to keep them in prison till they must have been let out in any case by the expiration of the power to imprison them. How much wiser was the conduct of the Government, as explained by Lord Hartington in the same debate! "There was no understanding whatever," he said, with Mr. Parnell, or any of the Land-leaguers. But "when the moment arrived when we could no longer say that their continued imprisonment was required for the safety of the country, then we were not only justified, but absolutely compelled to agree to their release,"—surely a nobler and wiser policy than a haggling over impracticable conditions. And it is a policy which has been amply vindicated by events. It is a lurid proof of the utter inefficiency of Mr. Forster's Coercion Act and its administration that he let out of prison James Carey, Mr. Sheridan, and Mr. M'Cafferty, the triumvirate who, according to Carey's evidence, organised the Phoenix Park murders.

Anybody who will take the trouble to read the whole debate will see that the above statement is an accurate summary of the facts. There was absolutely no connection between the Arrears Act and Mr. Parnell's release. No promise of any kind was exacted or given on either side. The Government made up its mind and announced its intention to pass the Arrears Act before the Kilmainham negotiations were thought of.—I am, Sir, &c.,

VINDEX.

THE PROSPECTS OF ENGLISH LAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As the Land Question is exciting such general interest, and our Land System is being so severely tried by agricultural depression, I venture to ask for space in the Spectator to state my views and experience on the subject. Having for upwards of a quarter of a century divided my time between England and the Continent, where I have been much associated with peasant-proprietors, I have enjoyed unusual facilities for comparing the English and Continental systems of land tenure and cultivation.

Although I am now the owner of extensive estates, mostly divided into large farms, I cannot rid myself of a strong leaning to peasant-proprietorship, wherever such proprietorship is economically possible, and am decidedly of opinion that the ownership of land cannot be severed from the cultivation of it without both economical and moral loss to the community. Our system of letting our land to tenant-farmers is, I believe, inherently vicious, encouraging, as it does, the tendency to conflicts of interest, concealment of facts, and the grudging treatment of the soil. Under that system, now that agriculture is depressed, the land itself is turning restive, and refuses to support the gentleman-owner, the widow and younger children of the preceding owner, the gentleman-farmer and the labourer, in addition to the heavy burden of the rates.

As long as landowning remains such a losing and precarious business as it is at present, I have little hope of much relief from any land legislation. For where is the advantage of the liberty to sell, given to life-tenants by Lord Cairns' Act of last Session, at a time when agricultural land is unsaleable, except at a ruinous sacrifice? What hope is there of tenant-farmers—the most desirable purchasers—half ruined by the badness of the times, coming forward as bidders for the land they occupy? I am tired of urging in vain some of my own tenants to relieve me of the burden of owning so much land. The labourers, unfortunately, having no money, are still less likely buyers, and the inducement to capitalists to invest in land are becoming less every year. Social influence is diminishing, sporting is threatened, and the difficulty of letting it increases.

It appears, then, that the present owners have got to make the best they can out of the situation. One good, I think, will result, that, from inability to find tenants, many owners will be forced to farm their own land. But to the success of this course, the general want both of skill and capital on the part of the present generation of landowners will be a serious obstacle. I fear a marked falling-off in the condition of the land and amount of the produce is inevitable, for some years to come. In spite of my predilection for small holdings, especially where, as on the Continent, the ownership commonly is united with the occupancy of land, I am compelled to admit that the large-farm system is the only one economically possible over the corn-growing districts of England, and especially in the eastern and northern counties. In those districts, the smallness of the rainfall, and the lateness and severity of the spring frosts, render the grass and fruit-crops, by which peasant-farmers may thrive in the West of England, too precarious for any dependence on them, for a living to be possible. I am more and more convinced, as my experience increases, of the truth of the opinion expressed to me by the late Charles Kingsley, that peasant-proprietorship can only be economically successful in fruit and dairy districts, or where, as in France and Italy, the climate is favourable to the production of wine, oil, tobacco, flowers, and other crops requiring skilled garden-culture, and commanding at all times a high price in the market.

Had the soil of England been as subdivided as that of France, the ruin of the peasant cultivators must have been very general of late years. If large farmers, with plenty of stock—the only remunerative branch of farming, now-a-days—have barely succeeded in keeping their heads above water, what would have become of the peasants, with little or none? In order to provide steps by which the more industrious and thrifty of the labourers might mount into the status of small farmers, I have cut slices off several large farms, laid portions down in grass to promote cow-keeping, and let them as small holdings. But even these picked men require a certain amount of bolstering-up, and the process of putting up the requisite buildings and keeping them in repair is so costly as to deter any but an enthusiast in the cause from similar experiments. Association will, I hope, in the future help to raise the condition of the labourers, and the application of the principle of admitting them to a share in the profits, when profits are again to be made out of agriculture.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Six-Mile Bottom, February 23rd. W. H. BULLOCK-HALL.

THE MILES PLATTING CASE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I beg to withdraw unreservedly what I said of the Bishop of London, in a letter printed in the Spectator of February 10th. I find that in the cases which I had in view, Dr. Jackson was not responsible for the action by which the congregations were dispersed. I find, further, that a high opinion of his fairness and kindness is held by men who differ from him on questions of ritual much more widely than the Spectator does. But you do not answer me on the main issue. Your argument has been that the Bishop of Manchester, in objecting to Mr. Cowgill's nomination, is breaking a treaty by which he is morally bound. This, to my mind, you have not proved; but it is a grave charge, and should be proved. A Bishop who moves on, disregarding alike popularity and unpopularity during a strenuous episcopate of thirteen years, may frequently be mistaken in judgment,—will certainly be frequently charged with mistakes. But if he is accused of failing in respect to any moral obligation, it should be shown very clearly, first, that the assumed moral obligation binds him; and, secondly, that he disregards it.

Dr. Fraser's allowance of the Miles Plating ritual, until the living was vacant and the nomination of Mr. Cowgill understood to be imminent, involves, you think, and I agree with you, the protection of the disputed ritual under a new incumbent. But I differ from you, when you infer that it involves the acceptance of Mr. Cowgill as that incumbent. The only object that I can see for the change of curates was to bar Mr. Cowgill's claim upon the incumbency. To your suggestion that by dismissing Mr. Cowgill the Bishop scattered or intended to scatter the congregation, the answer is plain. No congregation can be dispersed by an interim arrangement between the deprivation of one incumbent and the institution of another. And as to the difficulty of finding a suitable incumbent, Miles Plating is a living of £300 a year, with a rectory house and a generous patron. It is not an eligible place of residence, but neither is St. Peter's, London Docks, nor many of the parishes in which Ritualism has entrenched itself. The last thing which a Ritualist may expect to be accused of is that he is afraid of bad air or a low population.—I am, Sir, &c., J. S.

[We do not understand our correspondent's point. We thought the Archbishop of Canterbury's action right, and Bishop Fraser's action inconsistent with and antagonistic to it.—Ed. Spectator.]

"PREVISION OF RAIN BY THE SPECTROSCOPE."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to some comments of yours on a letter of mine, published in the Times of Wednesday, February 7th, on the subject of "The Prevision of Rain by the Spectroscope." You ask,—Can I get anything like equally good results two or three hours sooner? Unfortunately, the spectro-scope for rainband purposes can only be used by daylight, so that would be impossible. At this time of the year, the rainband may be seen as early as seven a.m., but, for forecasting, it is better to take observations at about nine a.m. or three p.m. all the year round. Although the spectro-scope can only be depended on with any certainty for six or seven hours in some instances, yet there are cases, like the one of persistent high rainband mentioned in my letter, when rain may be predicted for days beforehand.

It is of the very greatest importance for us to know whether an approaching depression will be accompanied by much rain or not, for some are attended by a large rainfall, whilst others have with them a comparatively small amount of precipitation. It is here where the spectro-scope would prove to be of the highest value, for no other instrument would foretell such characteristics; and the sooner means are taken for its adoption at the stations in connection with our Meteorological Office, the better will be the daily predictions of rain or no rain, which, I must confess, are sometimes rather disappointing, although those in regard to wind are very successful.—I am, Sir, &c., F. W. CORY, F.M.S.

Buckhurst Hill, Essex, February 17th.

MR. SPENCER'S ETHICAL VIEWS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Though it is impossible for correction to overtake error, on all the roads it takes, it may overtake it on a few of its roads; and it seems in some cases needful to point out the error, lest silence should be construed into assent. Especially it seems needful when the error is a grave one, and repetition of it seriously mischievous.

In the review of Mr. Mivart's "Nature and Thought," contained in your last number, the writer gives fresh currency to a misrepresentation which has already reappeared more than once. It was originally made by Professor Goldwin Smith, in the Contemporary Review. One of his perversions of my views I pointed out in the next number of that periodical; and I added that there were many others which I would specify, if called upon. Notwithstanding this warning that Professor Smith's statements were untrustworthy, Mr. Peek, following his lead, repeated in the same periodical the particular misrepresentation which I wish now to point out as having been again repeated by your reviewer. Your reviewer says of me:—"His highest instance of right conduct is a mother suckling her child, because 'there is at once to the mother gratification and to the child satisfaction of appetite, a satisfaction which accompanies furtherance of life, growth, and increasing enjoyment.'"

Now, I have nowhere given this as the "highest instance of right conduct." I have given it as "among the best examples of absolutely right actions." The meanings of the words "absolute" and "highest," confounded by Professor Goldwin Smith, and all who have followed him, are widely unlike. The accepted definition of "absolutely right" is, right "without restriction or limitation;" and the context shows quite clearly that it is used by me in this sense. Further, it will be seen that if this sense be given to it,—if the act of a mother suckling her infant is said to be right "without restriction or limitation," there disappears at once the absurdity ascribed to me.

An illustration will best show the distinction I have pointed out, and what utter confusion of thought results from neglecting it. Suppose I had given, as an example of an absolute mathematical truth, the truth that two and two make four; and suppose a critic had thereupon represented me as naming the truth that two and two make four, as an example of the highest mathematical truth; his statement would be equally wide of the mark with that made by Professor Goldwin Smith, and those who have adopted his interpretation.—I am, Sir, &c.,

HERBERT SPENCER.

[The word "highest" was not our own, but Mr. Spencer's. On the very page from which our example was taken ("Data of Ethics," Third Edition, p. 261), he says:—"Conduct which has any concomitant of pain or any painful consequence is partially wrong; and the highest claim to be made for such conduct is that it is the least wrong which, under the conditions, is possible—the relatively right." The obvious inference from this is that a far higher claim—nay, the highest—is made by absolutely right conduct, or "perfect conduct," as he calls it, which is instanced a few lines lower down by the healthy mother suckling her child. The distinction which he now draws between what is "absolutely right" (or "perfect") and the "highest" right conduct is not expressed in the "Data of Ethics;" and although we, of course, think the distinction perfectly valid, we have been unable to find in that work any ground indicated on which conduct may be considered high, other than that assigned by implication in our quotation for its absolute rightness. It seems to us that, according to his principles, no less than according to his words, he can say no more for the instance we gave of the man who sacrifices his life for his friend, than that his action is "the least wrong which under the conditions is possible,"—if, indeed, he could say so much. We should add that on p. 33, he states that "perfection is synonymous with goodness in the highest degree," so that we were not guilty of any logical leap in inferring that he holds the "highest" right conduct to be identical with what he himself styles "perfect conduct."—Ed. Spectator.]

PROMOTION OF LIBERAL CLERGY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Is it quite true that Mr. Gladstone has, "as a rule," passed over Liberal Clergy in his recent Church appointments? Do not facts point to an exactly opposite conclusion? I may be mistaken in assigning Liberal opinions to all the Clergy in the following list, who have recently been promoted by Mr. Gladstone, but I think it will be found that they are, nearly every one of them, consistent members of the Liberal party. Here is the list:—

Bishop.—Newcastle (Canon Wilberforce).

Deans.—Westminster (Dr. Bradley); Carlisle (Rev. J. Oakley); Wells (Professor Plumptre).

Canons.—Dr. Barry (Westminster); Rev. D. Melville (Worcester); Hon. and Rev. W. H. Lyttelton (Gloucester); Rev. T. J. Rowsell (Westminster); Rev. W. J. Knox-Little (Worcester); Rev. G. Butler (Winchester); and I strongly suspect that to this list might be added the name of Canon Boyd Carpenter, of Windsor.

This is surely not small promotion for the Liberal party,—one Bishopric, three Deaneries, six or seven Canonries.—I am, Sir, &c.,

E. V. H.

BOOKS.

THE DEAN ON THE DEAN.*

THIS is a very graceful and charming picture of one of the most graceful and charming of men. It is difficult to read anything about the late Dean of Westminster without being reminded in every page of Carlyle's somewhat artificial, but still, as his wont was, singularly vivid picture of the peculiar radiance of the nature of John Sterling. "Rapidly as of pulsing auroras, as of dancing lightnings, rapidly in all forms characterised him." "A man of infinite susceptibility, who caught everywhere, more than others, the colour of the element he lived in, the infection of all that was or appeared honourable, beautiful, and manful in the tendencies of his time." "Here visible to myself for some while, was a brilliant human presence, distinguishable, honourable, and loveable, amid the dim common populations, among the million little beautiful, once more a beautiful human soul, whom I among others recognised and lovingly walked with, while the years and the hours were." The whole description Carlyle gives of Sterling has always seemed to the present writer to apply with much more force to Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, to whom, indeed, it was given, as it has been given to few others of this generation, to produce the impression of moral beauty, of "sheet-lightning," of "pulsing auroras," as Carlyle, in his vivid image, calls it, on the many friends of whose lives he formed one of the brightest ornaments. And this is precisely the impression which Dean Bradley's terse and graphic little book produces; while Carlyle's never really produced that impression on our mind concerning Sterling, partly because Sterling's own letters hardly bear out Carlyle's description, while they produce a decidedly stronger impression in some directions than Carlyle chose to receive,—partly because Carlyle himself in speaking of Sterling, sometimes strikes an inconsistent note with the main tenor of his description, as when he says, for instance, "At times he could crackle with his dexterous petulancies, making the air all like needles round you," which is not at all in the same plane with the main delineation. Anyhow, Dean Bradley's actual picture of his predecessor seems to us to sum itself up much more truly in Carlyle's general portrait of the swift, sunny, and radiant nature which he attributed to John Sterling, than the drift of Sterling's own life does. In almost every page of Dean Bradley's charming little book some one or more of Carlyle's characterising epithets for Sterling came back upon the mind of the present reviewer.

Let us give, first, Dean Bradley's account of Stanley's reception of himself, as a scholar of University College, forty-one years before he was called upon to succeed him as Dean of Westminster:—

"May I be allowed to insert here what is to myself something more than a slight personal reminiscence? It was after his migration from Balliol, that it became the duty of the new Fellow of University, early in the year 1840, to take part in the annual Scholarship Examination, which ended in the election of a Rugby schoolboy, the first of many whom his rising fame drew not from Rugby only, to a College which had so wisely added to its teaching staff so attractive and magnetic an influence. More than two-and-forty years have passed since, on that bright March afternoon, the loud congratulations of old friends and schoolfellows were hushed for a moment as the young Examiner stepped into the quadrangle and turned to greet the new scholar. How well does he recall that kindly greeting—the hearty grasp of the friendly hand that seemed to carry the heart in it—the bright, expressive countenance of the young tutor, so full of all that might win and charm a somewhat imaginative schoolboy, which shines still out of the distance in all its first youthful beauty 'as the face of an angel.' He at once invited the newly-elected scholar to take a walk with him on his return from a formal visit to the Master of the College, and that dull road that led out by the then unplanted, unreclaimed, Oxford Parks, is still lit, in the memory of him who trod it by his side, with something fairer than the bright March sun which shone across it. 'We are walking,' he said, 'towards Rugby,' and at once placed his companion at his ease by questions about his friends there, and about the Master who was the object of as enthusiastic a devotion to the younger as to the older Rugbyman. How little did it occur to either, as they parted, how strangely near their lives were to be drawn to each other! The younger might have listened to a soothsayer who had said, 'You have won to-day something that you will soon count far more precious than the scholarship in which you are exulting;' but how contemptuously would he have turned from the prediction that he would years after be called from the headship of the College of which he was that day enrolled as the youngest member, to succeed, in his new friend, not the least illustrious and the most lamented of the Deans of Westminster. It is in virtue of the friendship of which that day was the birthday that I have stood before you this evening."

One of the most charming and fascinating of Dean Stanley's characteristics was, as Mr. Disraeli aptly termed it, his "picturesque sensibility." But in many men, picturesque sensibility, far from being a brightening and enlivening, proves to be rather a relaxing and depressing quality. Unless accompanied with animation, good-sense, an eye fixed on the object, and a judgment using subjective feelings only to make the object clearer, picturesque sensibility is often a most wearisome and oppressive kind of faculty, which fills the air with morbid elements. This was never so with Dean Stanley, because his "picturesque sensibility" was, as Dean Bradley shows us, altogether historic in its turn, because it was always lighting up some interesting external scene with its insight,—and nothing really adds more to the charm of social intercourse than that. How happy is Stanley's first remark on his father's Palace at Norwich, just after Dr. Stanley had succeeded to the Bishopric!—

"In the same letter, addressed to his brother on board H.M.S. 'Terror,' he gives a characteristic account of their new home, contrasting the ugliness of the Palace with the surpassing beauty of the Cathedral that overshadows it. 'The former is,' says the yet untravelling traveller, 'among houses what Moscow is, I should think, among cities. Rooms which one may really call very fine, side by side with the meanest of passages and staircases. By the river-side,' he characteristically writes, 'is a ruin where a Bishop once killed a wolf; over the river, a road down which another Bishop marched with 6,000 men at arms.'"

* Recollections of Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, late Dean of Westminster. Three Lectures, delivered in Edinburgh in November, 1882. By George Granville Bradley, D.D., Dean of Westminster. London: John Murray.

And here is Dean Bradley's most terse and admirable comment on Stanley's powers of description:—

"Scenery in and for itself, the aspects of Nature as viewed in their own light and for their own sake, he never, I think I am right in saying, never once attempts to describe. In one of his letters to an old pupil, written at Canterbury in 1854, there is a passage which gives the key alike to the excellencies and the deficiencies of this great painter of Nature. 'I cannot think,' he says, 'that mere effusions of emotion at the transient blushes of Nature deserve an everlasting record. I feel about such effusions, almost as I feel about my present, oftentimes ineffectual, labours at reproducing scenes of my travels' (he was then at work at 'Sinai and Palestine'), 'that they are not worth publishing, except as a framework to events or ideas of greater magnitude.' Of Nature, as studied for her own sake, in the spirit of Wordsworth, or of so many true poets in all ages, or of Mr. Ruskin among modern prose writers, there will be found, I venture to say, no trace in his published writings or in his letters since he grew to manhood. Whenever he becomes enthusiastic on the beauties of nature, we may feel sure that there is always at work a motive other than that of the artist—that behind nature lies some human or historical interest. 'How mysterious,' he says, in a letter to a younger friend, then at Rome, 'the Alban lake! How beautiful Nemi! how romantic Subiaco; how solemn Ostia! how desolate Gabii!' What could be better? you will say. Yes; but behind all these, there lay on his mental retina the background of the history of Rome—the one only place,' he goes on to say, 'in the whole world, that is absolutely inexhaustible!' It is quite true that, occasionally, in some three, or four, or five remarkable passages, occurring especially, and for an obvious reason, in his American addresses, he introduces pictures of some natural phenomena, quite apart from any direct historical association. Such is the splendid picture of the Falls of Niagara; the graceful and touching image, a true sonnet in prose, drawn from two trees, the graceful maple and the gnarled and twisted oak, growing side by side; the description of the course of the St. Lawrence as contrasted with that of the Nile; of sunrise, as seen from the summit of the Righi. But in each of these apparent exceptions to his ordinary habit, he seizes on some aspect of external nature, not for its own sake, but as the symbol of some idea—some truth, that he wishes to enforce or interpret. As a general rule, he looks on nature not as a poetical interpreter of nature—not, we may fairly say, as a poet in the truest sense—but as one who seems never to feel that he has thoroughly mastered any event, or chain of events, in human or sacred history, till he has seen the spot and breathed the air which give to each occurrence its peculiar and local colouring. And with what an eye he sees!—with what a power of insight and discrimination he reproduces the exact points in which nature and history meet and blend with, and mutually influence, each other! 'We go,' he said in his Sermons in the East, 'to the Jerusalem where Christ died and rose again. To see that Holy City, even though the exact spots of His death and resurrection are unknown, is to give a new force to the sound of the name, whenever afterwards we hear it in Church, or read it in the Bible.' The words apply in their first sense to the most sacred of all lands and of all scenes. But the feeling that dictated them is the key to something else, to the unwearied, the insatiable avidity—I can call it nothing less—with which he would fatigue the most indefatigable of fellow travellers or hosts, by visiting any and every spot, however apparently insignificant, which was connected, directly or indirectly, with any historical event or person, or with any scene in the works of the great masters of poetry or fiction, or even with any important legend that had ever influenced the human mind. 'At Lindisfarne,' says one who visited it with him, 'his mind was, I am sure, quite as much occupied with the immurement of Constance, as with the memory of St. Aidan and St. Cuthbert.' Tours was to him quite as much associated with Quentin Durward as with St. Martin, or with Hildegard, or Louis XI., or Henry II. His persistence in dragging a fellow-traveller to call on the Archbishop of Granada was based quite as much on his being the lineal successor of the master of Gil Blas, as on his being the occupant of that historic see. And the keen eye for detecting resemblances and points of agreement under superficial or real differences, that gave such a character to his whole treatment of history and of theology, followed him also in his visits to historic places. As he saw an analogy to the yet unvisited Moscow in his new home in Norwich, so he delighted to point out the seven hills of Rome in the same city."

The tenderness and ardour of Stanley's friendships are also most powerfully presented by his friend and successor. We must find room for one more extract, because it shows that the brilliancy of Stanley's feelings must have added yet more to the significance of his friendships, than it added even to the vivacity of his social intercourse:—

"At the conclusion of his tour in Greece, he wrote the letter to Dr. Arnold to which I have already referred, in solitude, or worse than solitude. His fellow-sufferers under the miseries of a Maltese quarantine were some young men, whose loose talk revolted him, and who had not the good-sense to discover that beneath the mask of that averted countenance and those silent lips, was one, to enjoy whose society and conversation many wiser than themselves would have gladly faced the horrors of that tedious imprisonment. Released at last, he arrived alone at Naples, depressed, home-sick, and yearning for some congenial society. In the Museum he met an English acquaintance, who said, 'Of course, you have seen Hugh Pearson?' mentioning the name of one of his closest Balliol friends. 'Hugh Pearson!' he exclaimed; 'where is he?' and darted in search of him.

He found him in front of a well-known statue, rushed up to him, and, overcome with joy and emotion, fell into his friend's arms with a burst of uncontrollable tears. I mention the incident, not merely as illustrative of his tender and affectionate nature, which never lost a spark of its youthful warmth till the hand relaxed its clasp, and the heart had ceased to beat, but because the companion whom he then found, and with whom he completed his homeward journey, became from that time the very closest and most inseparable of all his friends. When sorrowing mourners gathered in April last round the grave of that friend, from whom death had severed him for a time, there was one feeling in many hearts—that they had lost one who, beyond any living person, was in full possession of the whole soul of him to whom death had reunited him—that the most trustworthy, the most intimate, the most continuous of the authorities for the history of Arthur Stanley, had passed into the world beyond the grave, in the person of his friend, Hugh Pearson."

Dean Bradley's Recollections are recollections only, and contain no criticism. We may add that the only criticism which is in any way appropriate to the book is this,—that Stanley's ardour for breadth and comprehensiveness, tending as it did to rest on a purely historic basis, and to justify almost every development which could naturally link itself with the past, necessarily became less an ardour for truth than an ardour for charity, and that in his hands the Christian religion becomes almost purely a religion of love, while its intellectual outlines on every side seem to fade away. That is the defect, so far as there is a defect, in Stanley's mind, a defect visible throughout. He helps you to understand everything which needs chiefly new local and historic colour for its interpretation, but does not help you to see what there is which is permanent beneath the constant fluctuations and changes of local and historic colour; so that his writings tend rather to produce on the mind the false impression that truth itself changes from age to age, just as the human capacity to understand it certainly does change. That is the take-off from the great moral beauty of the picture here presented to us by Stanley's warm friend and wise successor.

THE WHITE PILGRIM.*

MR. MERIVALE has long been well known for the buoyant and abundant humour of his serio-comic verse. Our readers, at least, are not likely to have forgotten that charming manifesto which appeared in March, 1880, under the heading "Ben-Bastes Furioso," in which the lines occurred, which they will find again in this volume:—

"Intelligent England! now the time has come,
As all must own
And see,
When you must rally round Me and the Throne—
Particularly Me."

These and many other poems of the same class bubble over with a mirth that is most infectious, which will win a laugh from many melancholy and quite unaccustomed lips, and fill many heads with the fascinating juggle of most unexpected and ingenious rhymes. We will give one specimen of this class of Mr. Merivale's verse,—a specimen of "Special Correspondence" at least as good as anything Thackeray ever wrote, though it has not the slightest echo of Thackeray's specific style. It would be impossible to rattle on in the Special Correspondent's peculiarly honorific style more effectively than this:—

"THE ROYAL WEDDING.

(VIDE 'THE TIMES,' MARCH 14TH, 1879.)

"I'm a reporter, bound to do
Reporter's duty;
In language beautiful all through
I sing of Beauty.
And he who thinks these words of mine
Something too many,
Let him reflect—for every line
I get a penny.
I sing of how the Red Prince took
His pretty daughter,
To marry her to Connaught's Dook
Across the water.
Oh, bright was Windsor's quaint old town,
Decked out with bravery;
And blessed Spring had ne'er a frown,
Or such-like knavery.
The sea of legs before the gate
And round the steeple,—
In short, the marvellously great Amount of people,—
Instead of treading upon toes
And dresses tearing,
Was (as a royal marriage goes),
I thought forbearing.

* The White Pilgrim, and Other Poems. By Herman Charles Merivale. London: Chapman and Hall.

The church-bells rang, the brass bands played,
The place was quite full,
Before the Quality had made
The scene delightful.

They came from Paddington by scores,
'Mid rustics ploughing,
And women huddled at the doors,
And infants bowing.

While condescension on their part
We quite expected,
On ours, as usual, England's heart
Was much affected.

When'er we welcome Rank and Worth
From foreign lands, it Becomes a wonder how on earth
That organ stands it!

The Berkshire Volunteers in gray
(Lloyd-Lindsay, Colonel),
And the bold Rifles hold the way,
With Captain Burnell.

To guard St. George's brilliant nave,
Believe me, no men
Could properly themselves behave
Except the yeomen.

Spring dresses came 'like daffodils
Before the swallow,'
On ladies' pretty forms (with bills,
Alas! to follow).

Their beauty 'took the winds of March'
(Which in my rhymes is
A theft Shakespeare an and arch:
It is the Times's).

Sir Elvey played a solemn air;
I sent a wish up;
Four Bishops came to join the pair,
And one Archbishop.

Nine minor parsons after that
To help them poured in;
One strange-named man among them sate,
The Rev. Tabourdin.

But oh! how this 'prolific pen'
Of mine must falter,
When I describe the noblemen
Before the altar!

There was the Lady Em'ly King-
scote, like a tulip;
The Maharajah Duleep Singh,
And Mrs. Duleep.

The gallant Teck might there be seen,
With sword and buckler,
His Mary in a dark sage-green,
And Countess Puckler.

Count Schlippenbach, the Ladies Schliefen and De Grunne,
And other names that seem to me
A little funny.

Though from his years the child was warm,
Prince Albert Victor
Looked, in his naval uniform,
A perfect pictur.

The Marchioness of Salisbury
I wondered at in Reseda velvet draped with myosotis satin.

Dark amethyst on jupes of poul
Wore the Princesses;
And ostrich feathers seemed to moult
From half the dresses.

Real diamonds were as thick as peas,
And sham ones thicker—
Till overcome, your special flees
To ask for liquor!

The show is o'er: by twos and twos
I see them fleeing off,
Lord Beaconsfield, the Daily News,
And Major Vietinghoff.

The happy couple lead the way,
For life embarking;
Then Captain Egerton and Lady Adela—Larking.

Louisa Margaret! to thee
Be grief a stranger,
And may thy husband never be
A Connaught Ranger.

If in the blush of mutual hopes,
And fond devotion,
You're honeymooning on the Slopes,
I've not a notion.

But this I feel, that for your true
And honest passion,
All sober folks wish well to you
In manly fashion.

While, for your chroniclers, I know,
Regnante V.R.,
From east to west 'twere hard to show
Such men as we are!"

It would be a great mistake, however, to suppose that the chief attraction of the present volume is to be found in poems of this class. Mr. Merivale has, perhaps a little unfortunately, acquired a reputation for them, which will render people slow to believe that he can write very grave poetry of a high order, in comparison with which all that is burlesque is only too easily forgotten. Nevertheless, The White Pilgrim is a poem of this class, a drama with one or two powerful dramatic situations in it, founded on a wild Norse legend, and worked out with a power and passion that lend a real spell to almost every scene it contains. Oddly enough, the only element in the poem that we regret is the semi-comic element, the scenes between the waiting-man and waiting-woman, Rolf and Gerda, which fail of their effect, and seem to a certain extent impertinent in the crisis of the tragedy which they interrupt. But this is the only take-off. For the rest, the rather improbable mixture of Norse fate and Christian providence being fairly allowed for, it would not be easy to conceive the passions of the situation more powerfully portrayed. Doubtless, it is impossible to understand how Harold's character can be so mere a vehicle for the alternate play of a good and evil spirit, as it is represented to be; nor can it be legitimate to absolve him from all responsibility for what he did under the one influence, without also denying to him all responsibility for what he does under the other. He acts like a very weak and very bad man throughout almost the whole of the play, and yet because he turns towards the right at the close, is fully absolved, and rewarded by the highest and holiest death, dying in the closest companionship with her whom he had loved and deserted, without being disgraced in any degree by the evil part which, under the inspiration, as it is supposed, of his bad angel, he had previously played. But this is, we suppose, the element of Norse fatality woven into the legend itself, which we are bound to accept, if we are to admit the legend of The White Pilgrim at all. The White Pilgrim is the Christian Angel of Death, who comes into Norway to supersede the cruel and barbarous conceptions with which the old Norse legends had coloured the scenery of the spiritual world. To whomsoever the White Pilgrim unveils herself, death comes at once, but comes in some pitying, resting, and spiritualising form; while, without such full manifestation, she is more or less indistinctly visible chiefly to the eyes of those whose minds are in some degree prepared for the Christian faith. The legend is founded on the oath by Odin which the ruler of Finland used to take, on Earl Olaf's sword, to slay before the month was out any Norman who should enter his castle within twenty-four hours after the oath was taken. Here are the words of the oath, in Mr. Merivale's singularly eloquent version:—

"By the might of Odin's hand,
By the light of Odin's brand,
By the trumpet-blast sent forth
On the echoes of the north,
By the thunderbolt of war
Welded by the hand of Thor,
By this falchion's jewelled hilt,
By the blood its blade hath spilt,
Northern valour, Norman guilt,
By its dye of scarlet red,
By the living, by the dead—
Ere the world's unmeasured bound
Once the sun hath travelled round,
Should but foot of Norman fall
In the shadow of my wall,
Yonder moon of silver stain
Shall not wane and wax again,
Ere with sure and secret blow
I will lay that Norman low!
By mine own hand he shall die,
Meed of Norman perjury!
If he fall not so, then Death
Call for me, that break my faith!
Hear mine oath, and mark it well;
Be my witness, Death—and Hell!"

Harold's temptation to take this oath, however, appears to be nothing more than the old boyish dread of ridicule. He knows that it is wrong, knows that it is in complete antagonism to the higher vow he has just given to his chosen wife, Thordisa, to adopt her Christian faith, and he is moved to the heathenish rite simply by the sneers of one of his own Norse chieftains, who is bent on keeping him within the sphere of the old Norse habits and superstitions, and of sowing a quarrel between him and the Christian girl, whose influence he so deeply dreads. Of course, the oath is hardly taken before a Norman knight and his lady apply for hospitality at the castle, and Harold is bound by his oath to murder the new guest, or if he fails, to take the penalty of death, which he has so deliberately invoked, upon himself. The result of the conflict into which his mind is thus plunged is that he falls from bad to worse, and commits himself not only to the design of murder as regards the husband, but to the attempt also to seduce the fidelity of the wife. In this, of course, his evil genius seconds him, in order the better to wean him from all danger of a Christian relapse; but before the month is over, Thordisa, his Christian love, returns from her pilgrimage, and then comes the struggle between her and the evil genius of the piece for Harold's soul. The scenes between the Christian Thordisa and Sigurd—the said evil genius—and again between Thordisa and Harold, are full of passion of the truest kind. We give the earlier scene in full:—

"SIG. Forsworn, forsown! within an hour, forsown!
Unless the spiteful pilot of the world,
Who laughs to see men sorry, should bethink him
Of that same silken-favoured Norman there,
As a fair freight worth wrecking in its prime,
And blasting into everlasting waste,
Just when it promises best. Why, when I die,
I needs must have some share i' the government
Of mortal business, for it goes almost
As cross as I would rule it.

Enter ROLF.

Well, what news?
What does your master? Does he know the hour?
ROLF. He sits and watches time as it goes by;
And ever as the last sands leave the glass,
And mark another footprint on the day,
He moves his lips and mutters to himself
Something I cannot hear.

SIG. He has been thus
All the day long?

ROLF. All the long night and day,
Since he beheld Thordisa, has he sat
Locked in its turret, all access denied,
Save to me only; and on me he looks
As upon nothing—sees me, knows me not.

SIG. Has he not spoken?

ROLF. No; though once or twice
I thought he named Thordisa.

SIG. Let her come
And look upon her work. Now, but for her,
Last night had ended all; but since she came,
And cast the icy shadow of her presence
Upon the face of the sun, I might as well
Move yon dull rock to strike the insolent waves
That chatter at its base, as wake in him
The spirit of his fathers. Ay, howl on!
Nature herself is up in arms to-night,
In censure of our paltering, and the Spirit
Of Death rides forth upon the wings o' the storm
To claim the craven who invoked him here,
And dares not stand the challenge.

ROLF. What a flash!
Methought it showed me that white form again,
Waiting for Harold. What a slave was I
To stay his hand! I should have armed it here
In triple steel against the Norman stranger,
Who were more fit to die to spare an ache
To Harold's finger, than my lord to fall
For all the blood that waters Normandy!
There may be time—

SIG. Too late! The spell is on him,
Which none may loose but the fell witch that wove it.
Send his Thordisa here.

Enter THORDISA.

THO. Who speaks of me?
Lord Harold's evil spirit?

SIG. Oh, fair creature,
I would not claim precedence of yourself;
But 'tis no time to bandy courtesies.
Do you love Harold?

THO. If you love him, no.

SIG. Say that I love him not, then. Only think
That every storm-driven minute, as it goes,
Is heavy with his life, and bid him hasten
To keep the oath he swore.

THO. Bid Harold come,
If my poor name has yet the charm to draw him
To a brief converse. Do not answer. Go!

[Exit ROLF.]

SIG. His life is in your hands; oh, think of that!
A word from you will steel the nerveless heart—
A look from you will fire the frozen spirit.
Could I but rob you of the power you own
To move him to your wishes, I would kill you
Here where you stand, in your pale saintliness,
And think the deed well done.

THO. I ask no better.

SIG. 'Tis ill to die.

THO. Yes; to die ill is ill; but to die well
Is better than the best.

SIG. Tell Hugo that;
And do not rob him of so great a boon.
For me, I am not enough in love with death,
To court it for myself, or for my boy.
What will you say to him?

THO. Leave that to me.

SIG. I cannot read the purpose of your heart
In that cold eye of yours. But mark me, woman!
If that harm comes to Harold, you shall rue it,
For I will kill you.

THO. Pagan to your knees!
And pray the Heaven whose stern arrest you dread
To strike at others, but to spare you yet
For late remorse—repentance—sorrow—shame!
Talk you of killing—you, whose every word
Might kill the one immortal part in you,
But that it is immortal, which should make
Even of that crooked form a thing more fair
Than the dead glories of the universe?
Thou, that hast lived for evil from thy birth,
Thou, that in very wantonness of ill
Hast laid this bitter sin on Harold's soul,
On Harold's whom thou lovest! Lovest—thou!
Thou, that hast perjured him, and widowed me;
Thou, that has blighted man, and outraged God,
Look on the ruin round thee—'tis thy work!

Enter HAROLD.

SIG. Harold!

HAR. Go in; this is no place for you,
For where she is, is Heaven; go forth from it.

[SIGURD shrinks off.]

